Some curious particulars are related respecting these blasphemous practices, by a Mr. Higby, who was eight months an Elder in the Mormon church, and which he published in a small pamphlet. He says that shortly after he joined them, a Mormon Elder said to him, "you must go to work in the vineyard of the Lord as a preacher of the Gospel. I have viewed your heart by the spirit of discernment; I see what is in your heart; and what the will of the Lord is, concerning you all." Mr. Higby says that he was soon after ordained an Elder in the said church, and commissioned to preach and baptize, ordain Elders, confirm the churches, heal the sick, in short, that he was ordained to all the gifts of the church, which were the same as given to the apostles of old. He continues—"about the 10th of April following, R. Cahoon and D. Patton came again to the place—a meeting was called, and previous to the meeting, they said that some one would speak with tongues before they left the place. Accordingly he set himself to work at that meeting to verify his prophecy. During the meeting he said, 'Father H. if you will rise in the name of Jesus Christ, you can speak in Tongues.' He arose immediately, hesitated, and said, 'my faith fails me—I have not faith enough.'—Said Patton, 'you have—speak in the name of Jesus Christ—make some sound as you list, without further thought, and God will make it a language.' The old gentleman, after considerable urging, spoke and made some sounds, which were pronounced to be a correct tongue. Several others spoke in a similar manner, and among them was myself. I spoke as I listed, not knowing what I said, yet it was declared to be a tongue. The sound of the words used by some, in speaking in tongues, was a medium between talking and singing—and all, as I am now convinced, a mere gibberish, spoken at random and without thought.

"We had another meeting shortly after, at which there were present several others, besides those of the church.—Cahoon spoke in unknown tongues, as he pretended, going on at considerable length, which Patton interpreted nearly as follows: that the judgment of God should follow the men of this generation; that their tongues should be stayed that they should not utter; and their flesh should fall from off their bones; their eyes pine away in their sockets; and it shall come to pass that the beasts of the forest and the fowls of the air shall devour them, nearly as it is written in the prophets. He then asked me to speak, which I did, and he interpreted as he thought proper.

"The next time those men came among us, they gave us a rule for speaking in unknown tongues, and also for interpreting what was spoken by others. This rule, they said, was perfect—that as long as we followed it we could not err. And so I believe; it was a perfect rule to lead men astray. The rule, as given by Cahoon, is this: rise upon your feet and look and lean on Christ; speak or make some sound; continue to make sounds of some kind, and the Lord will make a correct tongue or language of it. The interpretation was to be given in the same way."

Upon this, Mr. H. justly remarks:—"Men of sense may smile at this recital; and those who scoff at all religion and know nothing of those feelings of the human heart which the devotional man enjoys, in converse with his Maker, will doubtless ridicule what they consider the weakness of folly; but the man of religious feeling will know how to pity, rather than upbraid, that zeal without knowledge, which leads a man to fancy that he has found the ladder of Jacob, and that he sees the angel of the Lord ascending and descending before his eyes; while the Christian philosopher, who has read the history of mankind, will find abundant apology for that man, who, by a constant and over anxious exercise of mind, is led at length to fancy himself on the banks of the Ulai with Daniel, or on the Isle of Patmos with St John."

They would frequently sing in this gibberish, forming a tune as they proceeded. The same songs, they said, would be sung when the lost tribes appeared in Zion, in Missouri.

Another seceder from this delusion, relates that he was present on a certain occasion, in an upper room in Kirtland, where were assembled from fifteen to twenty Elders and High Priests. After sundry exhortation by the priests, the prophet himself arose, and with much earnestness, warned his followers to be zealous and faithful in their duties, saying, "It is our privilege to see God face to face—yes, (says he) I will prophecy unto you in the name of the Lord, that the day will come when no man will be permitted to preach unless he has seen the Lord—people will ask each teacher, 'have you seen the face of the Lord,' and if he say nay, they will say, away with this fellow, for we will have a man to teach us that has seen the face of the Lord.'" After a short pause, he added, "the Lord is willing we should see his glory to-day, and all that will exercise faith, shall see the Lord of Glory." They then concluded to spend the day in fasting and prayer. Each one kept his seat with his eyes closed, and his body inclined forward. Soon after Joseph says, "Sidney (Rigdon,) have you seen the Lord?" He answered, "I saw the image of a man pass before my face, whose locks were white, and whose countenance was exceedingly fair, even surpassing all beauty that I ever beheld." Then Joseph replied, "I knew you had seen a vision but would have seen more were it not for unbelief." Sidney confessed his faith was weak that morning. Hiram Smith said he had seen nearly the same as Sidney, which was pronounced by Joseph to be the Redeemer of the world. Upon this, R. Cahoon fell upon his knees, holding his hands in an erect position. In fifteen or twenty minutes he arose and declared he had seen the temple of Zion, filled with disciples, while the top was covered with the glory of the Lord, in the form of a cloud. Another one then placed himself in the same position, but saw no vision, his faith being weak. Joseph next arose, and passing round the room laying his hand upon each one, and spoke as follows, as near as the narrator can recollect:—

"Ak man oh son oh man ah ne commene en holle goste en haben en glai hosanne, hosanne en holle goste en esac milkea jeremiah, ezeziel, Nephi, Lehi, St. John," &c. &c. After administering the sacrament, several of the brethren were called upon to arise and speak in tongues. Several of them performed with considerable applause. Our informant says he was at length called upon to speak or sing, "in tongues," at his own option—preferring the latter mode, he sung, to the tune of Bruce's Address, a combination of sounds, which astonished all present.

This gibberish for several months was practised almost daily, while they were about their common avocations, as well as when they assembled for worship. But we will not dwell upon this part of our history. A particular recital of such scenes of fanaticism, gives too much pain to the intelligent mind, and excites a contempt for our species.

We would here, barely ask the subjects of this delusion, and all others who may become so, whether it be possible, that the great and intelligent Ruler of the Universe, can be thus miraculously engaged in bestowing all sorts of language upon a few people merely for their own amusement?—languages that can neither benefit themselves, or any one else, because no one can understand them. For the full introduction of the Gospel, the gift of tongues was wisely conferred upon the Apostles & some others who were engaged in its first promulgation. But for what purpose? was it a mere pastime to them, by means of which they could divert each other, while assembled in their private rooms, without knowing the import of any thing they said? If such were the facts, then these modern tongues may be genuine—But no—they were for a wiser and more noble purpose—a purpose every way worthy of that exalted Being. The gospel was to be proclaimed and published to “every creature,” to perhaps a hundred different nations, all speaking a distinct tongue—and to be preached, too, by a small number of men, who had been taught only a single language. Whenever they spoke in a language not their own, it was most clearly understood, by themselves and others, who had assembled from various nations, without the intervention of soothsayers, or one pretending to have the “spirit of interpretation.” Will any one presume to compare the wisdom of God in those manifestations, with what has been related by Smith and his followers? Yes—a distorted imagination can discover infinitely more power and glory in the unintelligible jargon of Mormonism.

If what has been exhibited here, are truly languages, they must be such as are spoken and understood by human beings somewhere : otherwise the names of "tongues" or languages will not attach to them. But they are a mere gibberish. If these people had the "gift of tongues," as they impudently assert, how much more consistent with rationality, and worthy of the Deity, would it appear for them to show it forth and test its true character, before an audience of French or Spanish, or some of the numerous Indian tribes in our country, all speaking different tongues, and to whom they profess to be more especially sent ? No—such an attempt would explode the whole system of folly and delusion. It would seem that they would much rather be talking their nonsense to each other, and declaring it to the world as an extraordinary manifestation of the power of God.

CHMPTER XII.

The difficulties which had been for some time accumulating between the inhabitants of Missouri and the followers of Smith, began now to assume a more serious aspect. About a year previous, a small newspaper had been started at Independence, in which were published, monthly, the orders and decrees of the prophet, which were called revelations, together with all the other wild and fanatical dogmas of the sect. Like pilgrims to the tomb of Mahomet, they continued to wend their way from different parts, to the "promised land." To accomplish this journey was the height of their ambition. They really supposed their prophet had at that place opened the very gates of Heaven to them, and nothing else was necessary to insure all temporal and spiritual blessings, but their arrival there. Those of them who did not choose to sacrifice their property, however, stayed behind, leaving the poor, and those not encumbered with property, to be the pioneers. Their numbers, men, women and children, were now about 1200 in Jackson county. Besides the printing apparatus, they had also a mercantile establishment, (denominated the "Lord's Store House,") and some mechanic shops in Independence. This village was made their head quarters, although their converts had effected small settlements in different parts of the county. Smith had appointed as his Bishop, one Edward Partridge, a very honest and industrious hatter, of Painesville, Ohio, who had, withal, a comfortable stock of the good things of the world. He was stationed at Independence, and had the sole control of all the temporal and spiritual affairs of the colony, always obedient, however, to the revelations promulgated by Smith, who still sat perched upon his throne, in Kirtland, with Rigdon, and most of his family connexions.

Under these circumstances, the people of Jackson Co. became somewhat excited and alarmed for their civil rights. Enmity had been for some time increasing, till finally an open rupture ensued. On the 20th July, 1833, a meeting was held of 400 or 500 persons, at Independence. They avowed their object to be, to take some effectual means to rid themselves of their fanatical neighbors. Col. Richard Simpson was appointed Chairman, and Col. J. D. Lucas and J. H. Flourney, Postmaster, Secretaries. A Committee was then appointed to report an address to the public, in relation to the object of the meeting. This Committee soon after submitted an address, which was unanimously adopted.

The address represented that the Mormonites in that county numbered about 1200 souls,—that each successive spring and autumn poured forth its swarms among them, with a gradual falling off of their characters, until they had nearly reached the low condition of the black population—that the citizens were daily told that they were to be cut off, and their lands appropriated to the Mormons for inheritances—that they sometimes said this was to be accomplished either by the destroying angel, or by their own power, under the direction of God. The said Committee expressed their fears, that, should this population continue to increase they would soon have all the offices in the county in their hands; and that the lives and property of the other citizens would be insecure, under the administration of men who are so ignorant and superstitious as to believe that they have been the subjects of miraculous and supernatural cures, professing to hold converse with God and Angels,—possessing and exercising the gift of divination and unknown tongues, and are withal so poor, as to be unable to procure bread and meat. The Committee further state, that “one of the means resorted to by them, in order to drive us to emigrate, is an indirect invitation to the free brethren of color in Illinois, to come like the rest, to the land of Zion.” In conclusion, the Committee say, “of their pretended revelations from Heaven, their personal intercourse with God and his angels—the maladies they pretend to heal, by the laying on of hands, and the contemptible gibberish with which they habitually profane the Sabbath, and which they dignify by the appellation of “unknown tongues,” we have nothing to say. Vengeance belongs to God alone. But as to the other matters set forth in this paper, we feel called upon by every consideration of self-preservation, good society, public morals, and the fair prospect, if not blasted in the germ, that awaits this young and beautiful country, at once to declare :—

"1st. That no Mormon shall in future move and settle in this county.

"2d. That those now here, who shall give a definite pledge of their intention, within a reasonable time, to remove out of the county, shall be allowed to remain unmolested until they shall have sufficient time to sell their property, and close their business without any sacrifice.

"3d. That the editor of the "Star," be required forthwith to close his office, and discontinue the business of printing in this county: and as to all other stores and shops belonging to the sect, their owners must in every case comply with the terms strictly, agreeably to the 2d article of this declaration: and upon failure, prompt and efficient measures will be taken to close the same.

"4th. That the Mormon leaders here, are required to use their influence in preventing any further emigration of their distant brethren to this county, and counsel and advise their brethren to comply with the above requisitions.

"5th. That those who fail to comply with the above requisitions, be referred to those of their brethren who have the gift of tongues, to inform them of the lot that awaits them."

After the propositions of the Committee had been considered and adopted, it was "Resolved, That a committee of twelve be appointed forthwith to wait on the Mormon leaders, and see that the foregoing requisitions be strictly complied with by them; and upon their refusal, that the said Committee do as the organ of the county, inform them that it is our unwavering determination and fixed purpose, after the fullest consideration of all the consequences and responsibilities under which we act, to use such means as shall insure their complete and full adoption; and that said Committee, so far as may be in their power, report to this present meeting."

The Committee of twelve were appointed, composed of the most prominent men in the county, both civil and military. After an adjournment of two hours, the meeting again convened, and the Committee reported that they had called upon the Editor, the Bishop, and the "keeper of the Lord's Store House," and others, "who declined giving any direct answer, to the requisitions made of them, and wished an unreasonable time for consultation, not only with their brethren here, but the prophet in Ohio." Whereupon, it was unanimously resolved by the meeting, that the printing office should be razed to the ground, and the type and press secured. This is said, by the meeting, to have been accomplished with but little noise or disturbance, or any personal injury. The Mormon account, however, is, that there was a great tumult, books and printed sheets destroyed, the Bishop and one other person tarred and feathered, and that the keeper of the Store was compelled to pack up his goods and close his door.

The meeting was then adjourned for three days, when a much larger assemblage took place. Another Committee of seventeen was then appointed to wait upon the Mormon leaders, who had intimated a wish to have a conference.— In two hours this committee reported to the meeting, that they had entered into an amicable agreement with them, in writing, and that they had assured the editor of the Star that whenever he was ready to remove, the amount of all his losses should be paid to him by the citizens. The contract was in the following words:

"Memorandum of an agreement between the undersigned of the Mormon society, in Jackson County, Missouri, and a Committee appointed by a public meeting of the citizens of said County, made the 23d day of July, 1833 :

"It is understood that the undersigned members of the society do give their solemn pledges each for himself, as follows, to wit:

“That Oliver Cowdery, W. W. Phelps, Wm. McClelland, Edward Partridge, Lyman Wight, Simeon Carter, Peter and John Whitmer, and Harvey Whitlock, shall remove with their families out of this county, on or before the 1st day of January next; and that they, as well as the two hereinafter mentioned, use all their influence to induce all the brethren now here, to remove as soon as possible—one half, say, by the 1st of January next, and all by the 1st of April next; to advise and try all means in their power to stop any more of their sect from moving to this county; and as to those now on the road, they will use their influence to prevent them settling permanently in this county, but that they shall only make arrangements for their temporary shelter, till a new location is agreed on for the Society. John Carrol and Algernon Gilbert are allowed to remain as general agents to wind up the business of the Society, so long as necessity shall require:—and said Gilbert may sell out his merchandize now on hand, but is to make no new importations.

“The Star is not again to be published—nor a press set up by any of the Society in this county.

“If the said Edward Partridge, and W. W. Phelps move their families by the 1st of January, as aforesaid, that they themselves will be allowed to go and come in order to transact and wind up their business.

“The Committee pledge themselves to use all their influence to prevent any violence being used, so long as a compliance with the foregoing terms are observed by the parties concerned, to which agreement is subscribed the names of the above named Committee, as also those of the Mormon brethren named in the Report as having been present.”

Tranquility was thus measurably restored for a time.—The Mormons made no preparations for removing, but applied to the Governor for relief. He informed them that he could furnish them no aid in the business, until they had resorted to the laws, and ascertained that they could not be enforced. They, therefore, commenced civil suits for the loss of property. From this proceeding the citizens began to conclude that the Mormons did not intend to perform any part of their stipulation, and about the last of October, the people of the county again commenced depredations. Forty or fifty made an attack upon a small portion, about ten miles from head-quarters, unroofed several houses, whipped some of the men, and frightened some of the women and children. The next night attacks were made upon another branch, and upon the "Lord's Store House," and the dwelling of its keeper, in Independence. For two or three days following, several parties met each other with fire arms, in which two of the citizens and one of the Mormons were killed. The Mormons were finally compelled to cross the Missouri river into Clay county.

These proceedings, on the part of the people of Jackson county, were in total disregard of all law, and must be condemned by all. They were wholly at war with every principle of right, and the genius of our institutions. Outrages can never be justified upon any ground, although the reasons which induced them, ought to be stated. Among the Mormon fanatics, as among every other combination, there are the prudent and the imprudent—some who are very civil agreeable citizens, and some who are extremely intolerent, unmannerly, bigoted and supercilious—priding themselves greatly upon their being supposed the peculiar favorites of Heaven, and their possession of greater light than all the world besides. These latter it is who deal out the anathemas, disclose the secret plottings, and expose the fanatical notions and opinions which have been conceived by the leaders of this sect. The Mormons have endeavored to inculcate the belief, as extensively as possible, that their difficulties with the people of Jackson county, have arisen solely on account of their religion—because they were more pure and holy than any of their neighbors, and for that reason alone they have been persecuted as were the Apostles of old. This we are not disposed to believe. Their first salutations to every community that does not believe their book and pretensions, are, that destruction awaits them for their unbelief—that there has been no Christian church upon earth for 1400 years—no one has had any authority to administer ordinances till Smith dug out his golden bible—that he is the appointed one of God, to re-establish a church, and all that do not come to him for power and instructions will be damned. Add to this, some among them frequently boast of their increasing strength, and that consequently they will soon be enabled to possess themselves of all the secular power of the country, as they already have of the spiritual. This they calculate to accomplish by concentrating their forces in particular neighborhoods. We have been credibly informed that Rigdon has given it as his opinion that the Mormons will be able to elect a member of Congress in five years, and that in three years they would take the offices in the town of Kirtland. They say that when they get the secular power into their hands, every thing will be performed by immediate revelations from God. We shall then have Pope Joseph the First, and his hierarchy.

Such things have been thrown out, and have, no doubt, had a strong agency in bringing about the outrages in Missouri.

Again, one of their leading articles of faith is, that the Indians of North America, in a very few years, will be converted to Mormonism, and through rivers of blood will again take possession of their ancient “inheritance.” As their bible pretends to be a record of the aborigines, every effort will be made to inculcate a belief in it among them. To facilitate this project, was one strong ground for their establishing themselves in Missouri, knowing that the general government was taking active measures to remove all the Indians west of the Mississippi. Were it possible, therefore, for Mormonism to be inculcated among the tribes of the west, a religious spirit would be easily excited.—One of the imaginary prophets in the Book of Mormon, says that such events will take place. He says, “Therefore, I write unto you, Gentiles, (the whites,) and also unto you, house of Israel, (the Indians,) when the work shall commence (Mormonism) that ye shall be about to return to the land of your inheritance.” Again, in speaking to the Indians, “Know ye that ye are of the House of Israel. Know ye that you must lay down your weapons of war, and delight no more in the shedding of blood, and take them not again, save it be that God shall command you”—(through the mouth of Smith.) He also prophesied that they should be “driven and scattered by the Gentiles,” and after that the Lord would remember his covenant with Abraham.—And then, “O ye Gentiles, how can ye stand before the power of God—therefore, repent ye, lest a remnant of the seed of Jacob (meaning the Indians) shall go forth among you as a lion, and tear you in pieces, and there is none to deliver.”

CHAPTER XIII.

After the conflict had subsided in Jackson Co., two or three High Priests repaired with all possible speed to the prophet in Kirtland, magnifying greatly the events that had taken place. These new, unexpected and extraordinary circumstances, must be met in an extraordinary manner.-- They were trying times, requiring the combined wisdom of the prophet and his head men, in bringing out a revelation upon the subject, which would astonish his dupes and strengthen their faith in the imposition, which had been so far shaken in many, that they proposed selling their new "eternal inheritance," in Jackson County, for a "mess of pottage." But the prophet more readily discovered the new advantages that would ultimately accrue to his cause, by a little perseverance. He well knew that the laws could not continue to be violated in our country for any length of time, and that he and his followers would, in the end, be the greatest gainers, by the cry of persecution which they could raise, and by showing to the world, in their ultimate triumph, that the Lord was on their side and directed all their movements in putting their enemies to flight. The following was accordingly issued from their press in Kirtland, in the form of a handbill:

"Verily, I say unto you, concerning your brethren who have been afflicted and persecuted, and cast out from the land of their inheritance: I the Lord hath suffered the affliction to come upon them, wherewith they have been afflicted in consequence of their transgressions; yet, I will own them, and they shall be mine in that day when I shall come to make up my jewels.

“Therefore, they must be chastened, and tried, even as Abraham, who was commanded to offer up his only son ; for all those who will not endure chastening, but deny me, cannot be sanctified.

“Behold, I say unto you, there were jarrings, and contentions, and envyings, and strifes, and lustful and covetous desires among them; therefore, by these things they polluted their inheritances. They were slow to hearken unto the voice of the Lord their God ; therefore, the Lord their God is slow to hearken unto their prayers, to answer them in the day of their trouble. In the day of their peace they esteemed lightly my counsel; but in the day of their trouble, of necessity they feel after me.

“Verily, I say unto you, notwithstanding their sins my bowels are filled with compassion toward them : I will not utterly cast them off ; and in the day of wrath I will remember mercy. I have sworn, and the decree hath gone forth by a former commandment which I have given unto you, that I would let fall the sword of mine indignation in the behalf of my people; and even as I have said it shall come to pass. Mine indignation is soon to be poured out without measure upon all nations, and this will I do when the cup of their iniquity is full.

“And in that day, all who are found upon the watch tower, or in other words, all mine Israel shall be saved. And they that have been scattered shall be gathered ; and all they who have mourned shall be comforted ; and all they who have given their lives for my name shall be crowned.

“Therefore, let your hearts be comforted concerning Zion, for all flesh in mine hands: be still, and know that I am God. Zion shall not be moved out of her place, notwithstanding her children are scattered, they that remain and are pure in heart shall return and come to their inheritances, they and their children, with songs of everlasting joy; to build up the waste places of Zion. And all these things, that the prophets might be fulfilled.

“And behold, there is none other place appointed; neither shall there be any other place appointed than that which I have appointed for the work of gathering my saints, until the day cometh when there is found no more room for them; and then I have other places which I will appoint unto them, and they shall be called stakes, for the curtains, or the strength of Zion.

“Behold, it is my will, that all who call on my name, and worship me according to mine everlasting gospel, should gather together and stand in holy places, and prepare for the revelation which is to come when the veil for the covering of my temple, in my tabernacle, which hideth the earth, shall be taken off, and all flesh shall see me together. And every corruptible thing, both of man, or the beasts of the field, or of the fowls of heaven or of the fish of the sea, that dwell upon the face of the earth, shall be consumed; and also, that of element shall melt with fervent heat; and all things shall become new, that my glory may dwell upon all the earth.

“And in that day the enmity of man, and the enmity of beasts; yea, the enmity of all flesh shall cease from before my face. And in that day whatsoever any man shall ask it shall be given unto him. And in that day satan shall not have power to tempt any man. And there shall be no sorrow because there is no death. In that day an infant shall not die until he is old, and his life shall be as the age of a tree, and when he dies he shall not sleep, (that is to say in the earth,) he shall be changed in the twinkling of an eye, and shall be caught up, and his rest shall be glorious.

“Yea, verily I say unto you, in that day when the Lord shall come he shall reveal all things; things which have passed, and hidden things which no man knew; things of the earth by which it was made, and the purpose and the end thereof; things most precious; things that are above and things that are beneath; things that are in the earth, and upon the earth, and in heaven. And all they who suffer persecution for my name, and endure in faith, though they are called to lay down their lives for my sake, yet shall they partake of all this glory.

“Therefore, fear not even unto death; for in this world your joy is not full, but in me your joy is full. Therefore, care not for the body, neither for the life of the body; but care for the soul, and for the life of the soul: and seek the face of the Lord always, that in patience ye may possess your souls, and ye shall have eternal life.

“When men are called unto mine everlasting gospel, and covenant with an everlasting covenant, they are accounted as the salt of the earth, and the savor of men. Therefore, if that salt of the earth lose its savor, behold it is thenceforth good for nothing, only to be cast out and trodden under the feet of men. Behold, hear wisdom concerning the children of Zion; even many, but not all: they were found transgressors, therefore, they must needs be chastened. He that exalteth himself shall be abased, and he that abaseth himself shall be exalted.

“And now, I will show unto you a parable that you may know my will concerning the redemption of Zion: A certain nobleman had a spot of land, very choice; and he said unto his servants, go ye into my vineyard; even upon this very choice piece of land, and plant twelve olive trees; and set watchmen round about them and build a tower, that one may overlook the land round about, to be a watchman upon the tower; that mine olive trees may not be broken down, when the enemy shall come to spoil, and take unto themselves the fruit of my vineyard.

their lord commanded them ; and planted the olive trees, and built a hedge round about, and set watchmen, and began to build the tower. And while they were yet laying the foundation thereof, they began to say among themselves, and what need hath my lord of this tower? And consulted for a long time, saying among themselves, What need hath my lord of this tower? seeing this is a time of peace!— Might not this money be given to the exchangers? for there is no need of these things!

“And while they were at variance one with another, they became very slothful, and they hearkened not unto the commandments of their lord : and the enemy came by night, and broke down the hedge, and the servants of the nobleman arose, and were affrighted, and fled : and the enemy destroyed their works, and broke down the olive trees.

“Now behold the nobleman, the lord of the vineyard, called upon his servants, and said unto them, Why! what is the cause of this gaeat evil? Ought ye not to have done even as I commanded you? And after ye had planted the vineyard, and built the hedge round about, and set watchmen upon the walls thereof, built the tower also, and set a watchmen upon the tower? and watched for my vineyard, and not have fallen asleep, lest the enemy should come upon you, and behold, the watchman upon the tower would have seen the enemy while he was yet afar off: and then ye could have made ready and kept the enemy from breaking down the hedge thereof, and saved my vineyard from the hands of the destroyer.

“And the lord of the vineyard said unto one of his servants, Go and gather together the residue of my servants; and take all the strength of mine house, which are my warriors, my young men, and they that are of middle age also, among all my servants, who are the strength of mine house, save those only whom I have appointed to tarry ; and go ye straightway unto the land of my vineyard, and redeem my vineyard, for it is mine, I have bought it with money.— Therefore get ye straightway unto my land ; break down the walls of mine enemies; throw down their tower, and scatter their watchmen; and inasmuch as they gather together against you, avenge me of mine enemies; that by and by, I may come with the residue of mine house and possess the land.

“And the servant said unto his lord, when shall these things be? And he said unto his servant, when I will: go ye straightway, do all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and this shall be my seal and blessing upon you: A faithful and wise steward in the midst of mine house:— A ruler over my kingdom.

“And his servant went straightway, and done all things whatsoever his lord commanded him, and after many days all things were fulfilled.

“Again, verily I say unto you I will show unto you wisdom in me concerning all the churches, inasmuch as they are willing to be guided in a right and proper way for their salvation, that the work of the gathering together of my saints may continue, that I may build them up unto my name upon holy places; for the time of harvest is come, and my word must needs be fulfilled. Therefore, I must gather together my people according to the parable of the wheat and the tares, that the wheat may be secured in the garners to possess eternal life, and be crowned with celestial glory when I shall come in the kingdom of my father, to reward every man according as his work shall be, while the tares shall be bound in bundles, and their bands made strong, that they may be burned with unquenchable fire.

“Therefore, a commandment I give unto all the churches, that they shall continue to gather together unto all the places which I have appointed : nevertheless, as I have said unto you in a former commandment, let not your gathering be in haste, nor by flight; but let all things be prepared before you, and in order that all things be prepared before you, observe the commandments which I have given concerning these things, which saith, or teacheth, to purchase all the lands by money; which can be purchased for money, in the region round about the land which I have appointed to be the land of Zion, for the beginning of the gathering of my saints; all the land which can be purchased in Jackson county, and the counties round about, and leave the residue in mine hand.

“Now verily I say unto you, let all the churches gather together all their moneys; let these things be done in their time, be not in haste; and observe to have all things prepared before you. And let honorable men be appointed, even wise men, and send them to purchase these lands; and every church in the eastern countries when they are built up, if they will hearken unto this counsel, they may buy lands and gather together upon them, in this way they may establish Zion. There is even now already in store a sufficient; yea, even abundance to redeem Zion, and establish her waste places no more to be thrown down, were the churches who call themselves after my name willing to hearken to my voice. And, again I say unto you, those who have been scattered by their enemies, it is my will that they should continue to importune for redress, and redemption, by the hands of those who are placed as rulers, and are in authority over you according to the laws and the constitution of the people which I have suffered to be established, and should be maintained for the rights and protection of all flesh, according to just and holy principles, that every man may act in doctrine, and principle pertaining to futurity, according to the moral agency which I have given unto them that every man may be accountable for his own sins in the day of judgment. Therefore it is not right that any man should be in bondage one to another. And for this purpose have I established the Constitution of this land, by the hands of wise men whom I raised up unto this very purpose, and redeemed the land by the shedding of blood.

“Now, unto what shall I liken the children of Zion? I will liken them unto the parable of the woman and the unjust judge, (for men ought always to pray and not faint,) which saith, There was in the city a judge which feared not God, neither regarded man. And there was a widow in that city, and she came unto him, saying, avenge me of mine adversary. And he would not for a while, but afterward he said within himself, though I fear not God, nor regard man, yet because this widow troubleth me I will avenge her, lest by her continual coming she weary me.—Thus will I liken the children of Zion.

“Let them importune at the feet of the judge; and if he heed them not, let them importune at the feet of the governor; and if the governor heed them not, let them importune at the feet of the president; and if the president heed them not, then will the Lord arise and come forth out of his hiding place, and in his fury vex the nation, and in his hot displeasure, and in his fierce anger, in his time, cut off these wicked, unfaithful and unjust stewards, and appoint them their portion among hypocrites and unbelievers; even in outer darkness, where there is weeping, and wailing and gnashing of teeth. Pray ye therefore, that their ears may be opened unto your cries, that I may be merciful unto them, that these things may not come upon them.

“What I have said unto you, must needs be that all men may be left without excuse; and that wise men and rulers may hear and know that which they have never considered; that I may proceed to bring to pass my act, my strange act, and perform my work. That men may discern between the righteous and the wicked, saith your God.

“And, again I say unto you, it is contrary to my commandment, and my will, that my servant Sidney G. [Gilbert] should sell my store house, which I have appointed unto my people, into the hands of mine enemies. Let not that which I have appointed, be polluted by mine enemies, by the consent of those who call themselves after my name; for this is a very sore and grievous sin against me, and against my people, in consequence of those things which I have decreed, and are soon to befall the nations.

“Therefore, it is my will that my people should claim and hold claim, upon that which I have appointed unto them, though they should not be permitted to dwell thereon; nevertheless, I do not say they shall not dwell thereon; for inasmuch as they bring forth fruit and works meet for my kingdom, they shall dwell thereon; they shall build, and another shall not inherit it: they shall plant vineyards, and they shall eat the fruit thereof; even so: Amen.”

On the publication of this proclamation, it was taken up by all their priests and carried to all their congregations, some of which were actually sold for one dollar per copy. Preparations immediately began to be made for a crusade to their Holy Land, to drive out the infidels. As it was hinted in the revelation, “All the strength of mine house, which are my warriors, my young men, and they that are of middle age also, among all my servants, who are the strength of mine house,” began to make ready for battle.—Old muskets, rifles, pistols, rusty swords and butcher knives, were soon put in a state of repair and scoured up. Some were borrowed, and some were bought, on a credit, if possible, and others were manufactured by their own mechanics. The 1st of May following being finally fixed upon, as the time of setting out on the crusade, “my warriors,” which were scattered in most of the Eastern and Northern States, previous to that time, began to assemble at the quarters of the Prophet, in Kirtland, preparatory to marching. Several places farther west, were also selected for rendezvous, to those living in that direction. All the faithful pressed forward; but the services of some were refused by the prophet, in consequence of their not being able, from their own resources, to furnish some instrument of death and five dollars in cash. Old men, invalids, and females, not of the 'strength of mine house,' who could not endure the toils and hardships of a pedestrian excursion of 1000 miles, felt it to be a great privilege to contribute liberally, in the way of funds, and the materiel of war. Poor fanatical females, who could save no more than a shilling per day, by their exertions, threw in all they could raise, for the purpose of helping on with the expedition, and, as they supposed, thereby securing the smiles and blessings of the Lord.

About the first of May the grand army of fanatics, commenced its march, in small detachments, from the different places of concentration. On the 3d, the Prophet, with a life guard, of about 80 men, the elite of his army, left his quarters in Kirtland, with a few baggage wagons, containing their arms, amunitions, stores, &c.

The day before his departure, being Sunday, the Prophet had a general meeting of his troops and all the brethren in the neighborhood, on which occasion he and his vicegerant, Rigdon, harangued them to deeds of valor, to perseverance, and to a renewal of their faith in his commandments—dwelling largely, of course, on ancient persecutions of the Christians—their own persecution, and the beauties of martyrdom, as sure passports to glory—assuring them that they should all return, safe and sound, if they followed his instructions. On the morning of their departure, a meeting was assembled, and proceeded to business, after the "manner of the world," by appointing the Prophet Chairman, and Cowdery Secretary. Whereupon, Rigdon moved that they hereafter assume the title and name of the "Church of the Latter Day Saints," discarding the name of Mormonite, which they began to consider rather a reproach. This was carried unanimously, of course. What their particular object was in the movement, at that particular crisis, we have not been able to understand, unless for the purpose of denying, in the most positive terms, as they passed through the country, that they belonged to the sect known as Mormonites, thereby deceiving the people as to their true character, objects and intentions. But why was not this question settled, as all others are, by a revelation. The Lord had before given them directions not to chew tobacco, nor feed corn to their horses; but in the important matter of giving them a name, by which they were ever after to be known, he had wholly refused to interfere, or they had not time to ask him.

During the progress of these preparations, the brethren in Missouri waited patiently the coming of the "liberating army," or some new revelations, not daring to take any steps which their circumstances or necessities might seem to require. In the month of February, several of the Elders, at their request, were escorted back to Independence, by a company of militia from another county, by order of the Governor of the State, for the purpose of testifying before the court then sitting for Jackson county, against those who had been concerned in the former outrages and riots. After staying one night under the protection of the guards, they were, in the morning informed, by the public prosecutor, that no indictments would be had, for the reason that the members of the Grand Jury were more or less implicated. Neither could any private suits be instituted for the loss of property, for similar reasons. The Elders were then marched back, it is said, to the tune of "Yankee Doodle," and set across the Missouri.

In the mean time, the people of Jackson county were not inattentive to the premeditated attack of Gen. Smith, the Prophet.

CHAPTER XIV.

But to return to the grand army. On the second day of their march, they arrived at New Portage, about 40 miles distant; where about 100 more fell into the ranks. Here the whole were organized into bands of fourteen men, each band having a captain, baggage wagon, tents, &c. Just before leaving this place, Smith proposed to his army, that they should appoint a treasurer to take possession of the funds of each individual, for the purpose of paying it out as he should think their necessities required. The measure was carried, without a dissenting voice, of course. The Prophet was nominated and voted in, as Treasurer, no one, of course, doubting his right. After pocketing the cash of his dupes, the line of march was resumed, and a white flag raised, bearing upon it, the inscription of "PEACE," written in red.

Somewhere on their route a large black snake was discovered near the road, over five feet in length. This offered a fair opportunity for some of the company to try their skill at miracles, and Martin Harris took off his shoes and stockings, to "take up serpents," without being harmed.—He presented his toes to the head of the snake, which made no attempt to bite; upon which Martin proclaimed a victory over serpents; but passing on a few rods farther, another of much larger dimensions was discovered, and on presenting his bare foot to this one also, he received a bite in the ankle, which drew blood. This was imputed to his want of faith and produced much merriment to the company.

A large mound was one day discovered, upon which Gen. Smith ordered an excavation to be made into it; and about one foot from the top of the ground, the bones of a human skeleton were found, which were carefully laid out upon a board, when Smith made a speech, prophesying or declaring that they were the remains of a celebrated General among the Nephites, mentioning his name and the battle in which he was slain, some 1500 years ago. This was undoubtedly done to encourage the troops to deeds of daring, when they should meet the Missourians in battle array.

On arriving at Salt creek, Illinois, they were joined by Lyman Wight and Hiram Smith, (brother of the prophet,) with a reinforcement of twenty men, which they had picked up on the way. Here the grand army, which being fully completed, encamped for the space of three days.—The whole number was now estimated at 220, rank and file. During their stay here, the troops were kept under a constant drill of manual exercise with guns and swords, and their arms put in a state of repair—the Prophet became very expert with a sword, and felt himself equal to his prototype Coriantumr. He had the best sword in the army, (probably a true model of Laban's, if not the identical one itself,) an elegant brace of pistols, which were purchased on a credit of six months, a rifle, and four horses. Wight was appointed second in command, or fighting general, who, together with the prophet, had an armour bearer appointed, selected from among the most expert tacticians, whose duty it was to be in constant attendance upon their masters with their arms. The generals then appointed a new captain to each band, organized two companies of rangers, or sharp shooters, to act as scouts or flankers, when they should arrive upon the field of carnage. After this they dubbed themselves the "army of Zion," and Hiram Smith was chosen to carry the flag; which he kept unfurled during the remainder of the march.

The march of the grand army was then resumed for two or three days, when it was agreed to spend half a day in a sham fight. For this purpose four divisions were formed, and took positions, and went to work, agreeably to the most approved forms of Bonaparte, Black Hawk, Coriantumr or Shiz. After coming to close quarters, however, all discipline was lost sight of, and each one adopted a mode agreeable to his taste. Some preferred the real British push with the bayonet, some the old Kentucky dodging from tree to tree, while others preferred the Lamanite mode of tomahawking, scalping and ripping open the bowels. The final result was, that several guns and swords were broken, some of the combatants wounded, and each one well pleased with his own exploits.

After crossing the Mississippi, spies on horseback were kept constantly on the look out, several miles in front & rear. The Prophet went in disguise, changing his dress frequently, riding on the different baggage wagons, and, to all appearance, expecting every moment to be his last. Near the close of one day, they approached a prairie, which was 30 miles in extent, without inhabitants. Here an altercation took place between the two generals, which almost amounted to a mutiny. The prophet declared it was not safe to stay there over night, as the enemy would probably be upon them. Gen. Wight totally refused to enter the prairie, as they would not be able to find water, or to build a fire to cook their provisions, besides the great fatigue it would cause the troops. Smith said he would show them how to eat raw pork. Hiram said he knew by the spirit that it was dangerous to stay there. The prophet finally exclaimed, "Thus saith the Lord God—March on;" this settled the matter—and they all moved on about fifteen miles, and thinking themselves out of danger, they encamped beside a muddy pool, and went through the raw pork operation. Here the controversy was again renewed between the two generals. Smith said "he knew exactly when to pray, when to sing, when to talk, and when to laugh, by the Spirit of God—that God never commanded any one to pray for his enemies." The whole seemed much dissatisfied, and came nigh breaking out into open mutiny.

The Prophet had, besides his other weapons, a large bull dog, which was exceedingly cross during the nights, and frequently attempted to bite persons stirring about. One of the captains, (a High Priest,) one evening, declared to the Prophet that he would shoot the dog, if he ever attempted to bite him. Smith replied, "that if he continued in the same spirit, and did not repent, the dog would yet eat the flesh off his bones, and he would not have the power to resist." This was the commencement of a controversy between the Prophet and his High Priest, which was not settled till some time after their return to head-quarters, in Kirtland, when the former underwent a formal trial on divers serious charges, before his Priests, honorably acquitted, and the latter made to acknowledge that he had been possessed of several devils, for many weeks. The dog, however, a few nights after the controversy commenced, was shot through the leg by a sentinel, near the Prophet's tent, and died instantly.

When within twelve miles of Liberty, Clay county, Mo. (the head-quarters of the fanatics in that state,) the "army of Zion" was met by two gentlemen, who had been deputed by the citizens of another county, for the purpose of enquiring into the motive and object of such a hostile and warlike appearance upon their borders. These gentlemen openly warned the military band and their Prophet, to desist from their intended operations, and leave the settlement of their difficulties with the people of Jackson county, in other hands—advised them to be very careful what they did and said, as the citizens of not only Jackson, but some of the adjacent counties, were very much enraged and excited, and were fully determined to resist the first attempt upon them, by an armed force from other States. A few hours after this, the Prophet brought out a revelation, for the use of his troops, which said, in substance, that “they had been tried, even as Abraham was tried, and the offering was accepted by the Lord, and when Abraham received his reward, they would receive theirs.” Upon this, the war was declared to be at an end. A call for volunteers, however, was made, to take up their abode in Clay county, when about 150 turned out. The next day they marched to Liberty, and each man received an honorable discharge, under the signature of Gen. Wight. The army then scattered in different directions, some making their way back from whence they came, the best way they could, begging their expenses from the inhabitants. The Prophet and his chief men, however, had plenty of money, and travelled as other gentlemen do. Before leaving Liberty, the Cholera broke out among them, and carried off thirteen of their number, viz: John S. Carter, Eber Wilcox, Seth Hitchcock, Erastus Rudd, Algernon S. Gilbert, Alfred Fisk, Edward Ives, Noah Johnson, Jesse B. Lawson, Robert McCord, Eliel Strong, Jesse Smith and Betsey Parish. A new revelation was now had, that the brethren could purchase land and settle in any of the adjacent counties, or “regions round about.”

The particulars of this expedition have been related to us by an eye witness, who was one of the sharp shooters, and marched the whole distance, full of faith in the assertions of Jo Smith, that "Zion was to be delivered." He came back, well satisfied with Mormonism, and is esteemed a man of truth and veracity, by his acquaintances. And now, had we the pen of a Cervantes, we should be strongly tempted to draw out another volume, as an appendix, from the valorous deeds of our modern Knight of La Mancha, for we do not believe that in all the history of knight errantry, whether true or fabulous, an excursion by any set of men, so fraught with delusion and nonsense, can be found. And, in fact, it came well nigh loosening the scales from the eyes of most of the dupes to the imposition—and the whole camp came near breaking up, after the return of the Prophet to Kirtland. There was a constant uproar among the brethren, for three or four weeks, which only terminated in a sham trial of the Prophet; wherein, as near as we can learn, he was judge, jury and witness; and, as one of the brethren said, (very imprudently,) a more disgraceful transaction never took place. The Prophet considered it a trying time with himself, and a point on which his future prospects turned. He accordingly put in requisition all his powers of speech and tact at deception, to cover over his transactions, and reclaim his refractory followers. On one occasion he harangued and belabored them for six hours upon a stretch, and finally succeeded in restoring order, with the loss of two or three members. It would seem that the Prophet anticipated trouble, on his return, as he secured a deed of a valuable farm, just before starting, by the contributions of his followers. He also took a deed of the ground on which stands a huge stone temple, sixty by eighty feet; and which is now nearly completed. Possessing himself, personally, of this edifice, gave such dissatisfaction, that the deed was finally altered, so as run to him and his successor.

But to return to the Missouri war. On hearing of the approach of the prophet and his troops, the people of Jackson county had a general meeting, organized a military force, and appointed a committee of ten persons to proceed to Liberty, in order to effect a settlement of their controversy with the Mormons. They met the Mormon leaders, in a public meeting, when the following correspondence passed between them; but as the Prophet had not then arrived, nothing could be accomplished.

“Propositions of the People of Jackson to the Mormons.

“The undersigned committee, being fully authorized by the people of Jackson county, hereby propose to the Mormons, that they will buy all the land that the said Mormons own in the county of Jackson; and also, all the improvements which the said Mormons had on any public lands in said county of Jackson, as they existed before the first disturbances between the people of Jackson and the Mormons, and for such as they have made since. They further propose, that the valuation of said land and improvements shall be ascertained by three disinterested arbitrators, to be chosen and agreed to by both parties. They further propose, that should the said parties disagree in the choice of arbitrators, then ——— is to choose them. They further propose that twelve of the Mormons shall be permitted to go along with the arbitrators, to show them their land and improvements, while valuing the same, and such other of the Mormons as the arbitrators shall wish to do so, to give them information: and the people of Jackson hereby guarantee their entire safety while doing so. They further propose, that when the arbitrators report the value of the land and improvements, as aforesaid, the people of Jackson will pay the valuation, with one hundred per cent. thereon, to the Mormons, within thirty days thereafter. They further propose that the Mormons are not to make any effort ever after to settle, either collectively or individually, within the limits of Jackson county. The Mormons are to enter into bonds to insure the conveyance of their land in Jackson county, according to the above terms, when the payment shall be made; and the committee will enter into a like bond, with such security as may be deemed sufficient, for the payment of the money, according to the above propositions. While the arbitrators are investigating and deciding the matter referred to them, the Mormons are not to attempt to enter Jackson county, or to settle there, except such as are, by the foregoing proposition permitted to go there. They further propose that the people of Jackson will sell all their lands, and improvements on public lands in Jackson county, to the Mormons—the valuation to be obtained in the same manner—the same per cent. in addition to be paid—and the time the money is to be paid is the same as above set forth in our proposition to buy—the Mormons to give good security for the payment of the money, and the undersigned will give good security that the land will be conveyed to the Mormons. They further propose, that all parties are to remain as they are till the payment is made, at which time the people of Jackson will give possession.

ANSWER.

"Gentlemen:—

"Your proposition for an adjustment of the difficulties between the citizens of Jackson county, and the Mormons, is before us; and as explained to you in the court house, this day, we are not authorized to say to you that our brethren will submit to your proposals; but we agree to spread general notice, and call a meeting of our people in all, the present week, and lay before you an answer as soon as Saturday or Monday next. We can say for ourselves, and in behalf of our brethren, that peace is what we desire, and what we are disposed to cultivate with all men; and to effect peace, we feel disposed to use all our influence, as far as would be required at our hands, as free born citizens of these United States. And as fears have been expressed that we designed to commence hostilities against the inhabitants of Jackson county, we hereby pledge ourselves to them, and to the hospitable citizens of Clay county, that we will not, and neither have designed, as a people, to commence hostilities against the aforesaid citizens of Jackson county, or any other people.

“Our answer shall be handed to Judge Turnham, the Chairman of the meeting, even earlier than the time before stated, if possible.

W. W. PHELPS,

Wm. E. McLELIN,

ISAAC MORLEY,

A. S. GILBERT,

JOHN CARRILL.

“N. B. As we are informed that a large number of people are on their way, removing into Jackson county, we agree to use our influence immediately to prevent the said company from entering into Jackson county, until you shall receive an answer to the proposition aforesaid.”

About the same time the following correspondence appeared in the Missouri Enquirer, a paper printed at Liberty, Clay Co., Missouri :

“Being a citizen of Clay county, and knowing that there is considerable excitement among the people thereof, and also knowing that different reports are arriving almost hour ly, and being requested by the Hon. J. F. Ryland to meet the Mormons under arms, and obtain from the leaders thereof the correctness of the various reports in circulation—the true intent and meaning of their present movements, and their views generally regarding the difficulties existing between them and the citizens of Jackson county—I did, in company with other gentlemen, call upon the said leaders of the Mormons, at their camp, in Clay county; and now give to the people of Clay county their written statement, containing the substance of what passed between us.

“Being called upon by the above named gentlemen, at our camp, in Clay county, to ascertain from the leaders of our men our intentions, views and designs, in approaching this county in the manner that we have: we, therefore, the more cheerfully comply with their request, because we are called upon by gentlemen of good feelings, who are disposed for peace, and an amicable adjustment of the difficulties existing between us and the people of Jackson county. The reports of our intentions are various, and have gone abroad in a light calculated to arouse the feelings of almost every man. For instance, one report is, that we intend to demolish the printing office in Liberty; another report is, that we intend crossing the Missouri River, on Sunday next, and falling upon women and children, and slaying them; another is, that our men were employed to perform this expedition, being taken from the manufacturing establishments in the East that had closed business; also, that we carried a flag, bearing peace on one side, and war or blood on the other; and various others too numerous to mention. All of which, a plain declaration of our intentions, from under our own hands, will show are not correct.

In the first place, it is not our intention to commit hostilities against any man or body of men. It is not our intention to injure any man's person or property, except in defending ourselves. Our flag has been exhibited to the above gentlemen, who will be able to describe it. Our men were not taken from any manufacturing establishment. It is our intention to go back upon our lands in Jackson, by order of the Executive of the State, if possible. We have brought our arms with us for the purpose of self-defence, as it is well known to almost every man of the State that we have every reason to put ourselves in an attitude of defence, considering the abuse we have suffered in Jackson county. We are anxious for a settlement of the difficulties existing between us, upon honorable and constitutional principles. We are willing for twelve disinterested men, six to be chosen by each party, and these men shall say what the possessions of those men are worth who cannot live with us in the county, and they shall have their money in one year; and none of the Mormons shall enter that county to reside until the money is paid. The damages that we have sustained in consequence of being driven away shall also be left to the above twelve men. Or they may all live in the county, if they choose, and we will never molest them if they let us alone, and permit us to enjoy our rights. We wish to live in peace with all men, and equal rights is all we ask. We wish to become permanent citizens of this State, and wish to bear our proportion in the support of the Government, and to be protected by its laws. If the above proposals are complied with, we are willing to give security on our part; and we shall want the same of the people of Jackson county for the performance of this agreement.— We do not wish to settle down in a body, except where we can purchase the lands with money; for to take possession by conquest is entirely foreign to our feelings. The shedding of blood we shall not be guilty of until all honorable means prove insufficient to restore peace. Attest:

"Messrs. KELLEY & DAVIS:

"Gentlemen: Having understood that a communication from the Mormons, addressed to the people of Clay county, a copy of which was also forwarded to us, dated 21st inst. has been left with you for publication, we have thought proper to give the said communication a passing notice, especially as it bears the signatures of Jo. Smith, Jr. F. G. Williams, Lyman Wight, Roger Orton, Orson Hyde, and John S. Carter. We are unable to say with precision, who of the Mormons hold land in Jackson county, by any earthly title; but, so far as we can obtain any information at the Register's office at Lexington, so far as the sales of Seminary lands, of the 16th sections of the Township School Lands, inform us, and so far as the Recorder's Office furnishes any information of lands transferred by deeds recorded, neither of the above gentlemen Mormons own any lands in Jackson County; although, throughout their whole communication, they hold out the idea, that their only wish and desire is to return to their lands in Jackson. From the above, it would seem that if those who signed the communication above alluded to, have titles to any lands in Jackson county, they are titles unknown to the laws of the State, and of a character not known to common conveyances.—Why men, who do not, so far as we can learn, own any lands in Jackson, should promulgate to the world, that they have been expelled from them, appears to us inexplicable ; unless, indeed, it is done with a view to deceive. Why men, living in the State of Ohio, should there raise an armed force, and march the distance of 6 or 800 miles, under the pretence of taking possession of their lands in Jackson, when, in fact, they have no earthly title to any, that would be to us also inexplicable, had we not the best possible reasons to know and believe their true intent and purpose.— Joseph Smith, jr., whose name is first to the paper of which we speak, we confidently believe, does not, neither did he ever, own a foot of land in Jackson county. Said Smith, two years or more ago, was in Jackson county some two or three weeks; since which time, he has not been, or at least known publicly to have been, in Jackson county. F. G. Williams, the second signer, we are informed, on competent authority, has never been a resident of Jackson county. But, if here at all, his stay was short, (our informant was, if not yet, a Mormon.) Lyman Wight had been for some time a resident of this county, but had no title to any land, as we believe, for the facts above stated. Roger Orton is unknown to any of the citizens of this county, so far as we have been able to make inquiry, and is unknown to some of the Mormon faith. Orson Hyde is known, and of famous memory to most of the people of this county, not by personal acquaintance, for, as we are informed, he had been but a short time here ; but, by his communications, which appeared in the St. Louis Republican last November, (with what truth we will not here discuss.) John S. Carter is unknown to any person in this county, so far as we can learn.

“Thus it would seem, that the signers of the above paper, or a majority of them, have no interest whatever in this county, any further than the Mormon church is concerned; and yet, they avow to the citizens of Clay, that their sole object in arming and marching to this county was, and is, to take possession of their lands, when in fact they had no lands to take possession of; that the abuse they received here last Fall is sufficient to warrant them coming here armed. What abuse, we ask, did the Prophet Jo. Smith, Jr., receive in this county last Fall, and he not in the State? None, indeed, to his person. Again, they say that they never intended to get possession of Zion, (that is Jackson,) by the shedding of blood! But, in Revelation No. 54, given in Kirtland, Ohio, August, 1831, near three years since, which we find in a Book of Revelations, printed by the Mormons, we discover the following in the thirteenth verse, to wit: 'Wherefore, the land of Zion shall be obtained but by PURCHASE or by BLOOD, otherwise there is no inheritance for you.' Thus it would seem, that either the Revelation is false, or the statement made by Jo. Smith and others to the people of Clay county is false.— And we cannot but conclude, that the statement was got up for the sole purpose of allaying public excitement against them, and without much regard to their real object in coming here. The fact is, that an armed force coming from another State, many, and indeed most of whom have never, as we are informed and believe, been here before, produces the strongest conviction to our minds, that the Mormons do not intend to rely upon the arm of the civil law for protection, and redress of grievances; but that under the pretence of getting back to their lands in Jackson county, a pretence which, applied to nineteen out of twenty of them, is false, they intend to redress of themselves their real as well as imaginary wrongs. We have already offered them two prices for their lands; they will not sell—neither will they buy ours on the same terms. All this pertinacity and infatuation of theirs, show that they are determined, at all hazards, and regardless of all consequences, to shake and convulse not only Jackson but the surrounding counties, to their very centre, and to imbrue the whole upper Missouri in blood and carnage. We will here observe, in conclusion, that our proposition to the Mormons to sell their lands to us on the same terms on which we offer ours to them, must be regarded as a proof of our desire to do them justice, and thus put a final termination to this controversy.

“SAMUEL C. OWENS,

“Chairman of Jackson county Committee,

“Independence, (Mo.) June 23, 1834.”

Copy of a Letter from Daniel Dunklin, Governor of the State of Missouri, to Col. James Thornton, dated

CITY OF JEFFERSON, June 6, 1834.

Dear Sir: I was pleased at the receipt of your letter, concurred in by Messrs. Ress, Atchison, and Donaphin, on the subject of the Mormon difficulties. I should be gratified, indeed, if the parties could compromise on the terms you suggested, or, indeed, upon any other terms satisfactory to themselves. But I should travel out of the line of my strict duty, as chief executive officer of the government, were I to take upon myself the task of effecting a compromise between the parties. Had I not supposed it possible, yes, probable, that I should, as Executive of the State, have to act, I should, before now, have interfered individually, in the way you suggest, or in some other way, in order, if possible, to effect a compromise. Uncommitted as I am, to either party, I shall feel no embarrassment in doing my duty; though it may be done with extreme regret. My duty in the relation in which I now stand to the parties, is plain and straight forward. By an official interposition, I might embarrass my course, and urge a measure for the purpose of effecting a compromise, and if it should fail, and in the end, should I find it my duty to act contrary to the advice I had given, it might be said, that I either advised wrong, or acted wrong; or that I was partial to one side or the other, in giving advice that I would not, as an officer, follow. A more clear and indisputable right does not exist, than that the Mormon people, who were expelled from their homes in Jackson county, to return and live on their lands, and if they cannot be persuaded as a matter of policy, to give up that right, or to qualify it, my course, as the chief Executive officer of the State, is a plain one. The Constitution of the United States declares,—“That the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.” Then we cannot interdict any people who have a political franchise, in the United States, from emigrating to this State, nor from choosing what part of the State they will settle in providing they do not trespass on the property or rights of others.—Our State Constitution declares that the people’s “right to bear arms, in defence of themselves, and of the State, cannot be questioned.” Then it is their constitutional right to arm themselves. Indeed, our militia law makes it the duty of every man, not exempt by law, between the ages of 18 and 45, to arm himself with a musket, rifle, or some fire-lock, with a certain quantity of amunition, &c. And again, our Constitution says, ‘that all men have a natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences.’ I am fully persuaded that the eccentricity of the religious opinions and practices of the Mormons, is at the bottom of the outrages committed against them.

“They have the right constitutionally guaranteed to them, and it is indefeasible, to believe and worship Jo Smith, as a man, an angel, or even as the true and living God, and to call their habitation Zion, the Holy Land, or even Heaven itself. Indeed, there is nothing so absurd or ridiculous, that they have not a right to adopt as their religion, so that in its exercise, they do not interfere with the right of others.

“It is not long since an impostor assumed the character of Jesus Christ, and attempted to minister as such; but I never heard of any combination to deprive him of his rights.

“I consider it the duty of every good citizen of Jackson and the adjoining counties, to exert themselves to effect a compromise of these difficulties, and were I assured that I would not have to act in my official capacity in the affair, I would visit the parties in person, and exert myself to the utmost to settle it. My first advice would be to the Mormons to sell out their lands in Jackson county, and to settle somewhere else, where they could live in peace, if they could get a fair price for their lands, and reasonable damages for injuries received. If this failed, I would try the citizens and advise them to rescind their illegal resolves of last summer; and agree to conform to the laws in every particular, in respect to the Mormons. If both these failed, I would then advise the plan you have suggested, for each party to take separate territory and confine their members within their respective limits, with the exception of the right of egress and regress upon the highway. If all these failed, then the simple question of legal right would have to settle it. It is this last that I am afraid I shall have to conform my action to in the end. And hence the necessity of keeping myself in the best situation to do my duty impartially.

“Rumor says that each party are preparing themselves with cannon.—That would be illegal. It is not necessary for self-defence, as guaranteed by the Constitution. And as there are no artillery companies organized in this State, nor field pieces provided by the public, any preparations of that kind will be considered as without right; and in the present state of things, would be understood to be with a criminal intent. I am told that the people of Jackson county expect assistance from the adjoining counties, to oppose the Mormons in taking or keeping possession of their lands. I should regret it extremely, if any should be so imprudent as to do so; it would give a different aspect to the affair.

"The citizens of Jackson county have a right to arm themselves and parade for military duty in their own county independent of the commander-in-chief; but if the citizens march there from other counties, with arms, without orders from the commander-in-chief or some one authorized by him, it would produce a very different state of things. Indeed, the Mormons have no right to march to Jackson county in arms, unless by order or permission of the commander-in-chief. Men must not "levy war" in taking possession of their rights, any more than others should in opposing them in taking possession.

"As you have manifested a deep interest in a peaceable compromise of this important affair, I presume you will not be unwilling to be placed in a situation, in which, perhaps, you can be more serviceable to these parties. I have therefore taken the liberty of appointing you an Aid to the commander-in-chief, and hope it will be agreeable to you to accept. In this situation you can give your propositions all the influence they would have, were they to emanate from the Executive, without committing yourself or the commander-in-chief in the event of a failure.

"I would be glad if you or some other gentleman who joined in your communication, would keep a close correspondence with these parties, and by each mail, write me.

"The character of the State has been injured in consequence of this unfortunate affair: and I sincerely hope it may not be disgraced by it in the end.

"With high respect, your obedient servant,

Signed:

"DANIEL DUNKLIN."

Thus ended the far-famed Morman war, and thus the difficulties stand at the present time. It was set on foot, as they constantly held out, by a command of the Lord, for the sole and express purpose of "redeeming Zion," as the dupes who marched under the orders of the prophet, firmly believed. They entertained not the least doubt that they were to have a brush with the people of Jackson county, and some were sorely disappointed and chagrined, when it was first announced that no blood was to be spilt; so much so, that one, at least, manifested a determination not to submit to the decision of the Prophet, and was only pacified by an exhibition of the revelation to his view. After all, Smith had the hardihood and affrontery to declare, after his return, that his sole and only object in marching his troops thither, was to carry money and other supplies to his brethren, who were in destitute circumstances. But the reasons why the expedition was so suddenly terminated, may be readily discovered in the Governor's letter, and the manifestations of the citizens in that part of the country. Smith and his High Priests supposed that they had nothing to do but to make a display of their instruments of destruction, and their flag, to restore peace to the country. All the benefit, therefore, which was derived from his long march and expenditure of money, was, for the Prophet to get the information that he had no business there, and that it would be the most prudent course to "march back again."

CHAPTER XV.

The following letters were written by Ezra Booth, a Methodist Clergyman, and addressed to a presiding Elder. He was an early convert to Mormonism, and renounced it as soon as he was fully convinced of its nature and design.—He gives a clear and comprehensive view of the whole imposition, in a plain and unvarnished style, and will doubtless carry conviction to every rational mind, that the whole is a base fabrication. They were originally published in the Ohio Star; but their limited circulation has induced us to place them in this work.

LETTER I.

NELSON, Portage Co. Sept. 1831.

Rev. Ira Eddy—

Dear Sir: I received yours of the 2d inst. and heartily thank you for the favor. It revives afresh in my recollection the scenes of past years, upon the remembrance of which, I dwell with a mixture of pleasurable and painful sensations. I arrived at my home on the 1st of the present month, having finished my tour to the west; since which time the scenes and events in the history of my life, for the last few months, have passed in review before my mind.

You are not, it is probable, ignorant of the designs of my most singular and romantic undertaking: sufficient to say, it was for the purpose of exploring the promised land—laying the foundation of the city of Zion, and placing the corner stone of the temple of God. A journey of one thousand miles to the west, has taught me far more abundantly, than I should have probably learned from any other source. It has taught me quite beyond my knowledge, the imbecility of human nature, and especially my own weakness. It has unfolded in its proper character, a delusion to which I had fallen a victim, and taught me the humiliating truth, that I was exerting the powers of both my mind and body, and sacrificing my time and property, to build up a system of delusion, almost unparalleled in the annals of the world.

If God be a God of consistency and wisdom I now know Mormonism to be a delusion; and this knowledge is built upon the testimony of my senses. In proclaiming it, I am aware I proclaim my own misfortune—but in doing it, I remove a burden from my mind, and discharge a duty as humbling to myself, as it may be profitable to others. You had heard the story of my wanderings, and “was induced to believe that I had been visited with a species of mental derangement,” and therefore, you “had given me up, as one among those friends of early association, who in the lapse of time, would be as though they had not existed.” You had concluded that the magic charm of delusion and falsehood, had so wrapped its sable mantle around me, as to exclude the light of truth and secure me a devoted slave. But thanks be to God! the spell is dissipated, and the “captive exile hasteneth that he may be loosed, and not die in the pit.”

When I embraced Mormonism, I conscientiously believed it to be of God. The impressions of my mind were deep and powerful, and my feelings were excited to a degree to which I had been a stranger. Like a ghost, it haunted me by night and by day, until I was mysteriously hurried, as it were, by a kind of necessity, into the vortex of delusion.—At times I was much elated; but generally, things in prospect were the greatest stimulants to action.

On our arrival in the western part of the State of Missouri, the place of our destination, we discovered that prophecy and vision had failed, or rather had proved false.— This fact was so notorious, and the evidence so clear, that no one could mistake it—so much so, that Mr. Rigdon himself said, that “Joseph’s vision was a bad thing.” This was glossed over, apparently, to the satisfaction of most persons present; but not fully to my own. It excited a suspicion that some things were not right, and prepared my mind for the investigation of a variety of circumstances, which occurred during my residence there, and indeed, to review the whole subject, from its commencement to that time. My opportunities for a thorough investigation, were far greater than they could have been, had I remained at home; and therefore, I do not regret that I made the journey, though I sincerely regret the cause of it. Since my return, I have had several interviews with Messrs. Smith, Rigdon and Cowdery, and the various shifts and turns, to which they resorted in order to obviate objections and difficulties, produced in my mind additional evidence, that there was nothing else than a deeply laid plan of craft and deception.

The relation in which Smith stands to the church, is that of a Prophet, Seer, Revealer, and Translator; and when he speaks by the Spirit, or says he knows a thing by the communication of the Spirit, it is received as coming directly from the mouth of the Lord. When he says he knows a thing to be so, thus it must stand without controversy. A question is agitated between two Elders of the church—whether or not a bucket of water will become heavier by putting a living fish in it. Much is said by each of the disputants; when at length, Smith decides it in the negative, by saying—“I know by the spirit, that it will be no heavier.” Any person who chooses, may easily ascertain by actual experiment, whether the Prophet was influenced in this decision, by a true or false spirit.

It is not my design, at this time, to enter into particulars relative to the evidence upon which my renunciation of Mormonism is founded. This evidence is derived from various sources, and is clear and full, and the conviction which it produces, at least on my mind, is irresistible. You are not aware of the nature of this deception, and the spirit that uniformly attends it; nor can you ever know it, unless you yield to its influence, and by experience learn what it is to fall under its power: "from which my earnest prayer is, that you may ever, ever escape."

There probably never was a plan better suited to lead the sinner and the conscientious, when in an unguarded hour they listen to its fatal insinuations. The plan is so ingeniously contrived, having for its aim one principal point, viz: the establishment of a society in Missouri, over which the contrivers of this delusive system, are to possess unlimited and despotic sway. To accomplish this, the Elders of the church, by commandment given in Missouri, and of which I was both an eye and an ear witness, are to go forth to preach Mormonism to every creature; and now, said Mr. Rigdon—"The Lord has set us our stint; no matter how soon we perform it—for when this is done, he will make his second appearance."

I do sincerely, and I trust in deep humility, return unfeigned gratitude to the God of infinite mercy, who, in condescension to my weakness, by a peculiar train of providences, brought me to the light, enabled me to see the hidden things of darkness, and delivered me from the snare of the fowler, and from the contagious pestilence which threatened my entire destruction. The scenes of a few past months, are so different from all others in my life, that they are in truth to me "as a dream when one awaketh." Had my fall affected only myself, my reflections would be far less painful ~~man~~ they now are. But to know—that whatever influence

I may have possessed, has been exerted to draw others into a delusion, from which they may not soon be extricated, is to me a source of sorrow and deep regret. They are at this moment the object of my greatest anxiety and commiseration. I crave their forgiveness, and assure them, that they will ever have an interest in my addresses to the throne of grace. It shall be my endeavor to undo, as far as possible, what I have done in this case, and also to prevent the spread of a delusion, pernicious in its influence, and destructive in its consequences to the body and the soul—to the present and eternal interests of all men.

I am, through restoring mercy and grace, as in former years, though unworthily, yet affectionately yours in Christ,
EZRA BOOTH.

LETTER II.

Were there none but myself interested in the exposition of Mormonism, I can assure you my time would be otherwise employed than in writing upon a subject which has heretofore been to me one of deep interest, and at times has occasioned a painful anxiety of mind. I could wish, if possible, to bury it in oblivion; and to remember it no more forever. But as this is a thing which cannot be accomplished in a moment, for the sake of others, who may be exposed to the delusion, from which, through the mercy of God, I have been recovered, and others who are at present involved in it: and also in compliance with your request, I will, as far as I have ability, unfold a system of darkness, fraught with glaring absurdity, and deceptive as falsehood itself.

This system, to some, carries the face of plausibility, and appears under an imposing form. It claims the Bible for its patron and proffers the restoration of the apostolic church, with all the gifts and graces with which the primitive saints were endowed. It is called the fullness of the gospel of both Jew and Gentile: and is the test by which every man's faith is to be tried. Judgments are denounced against the sinners of this generation; or in other words, all who reject the Book of Mormon, are threatened with eternal damnation. Great promises are made to such as embrace it, signs and wonders are to attend them, such as healing the sick, the blind made to see, the lame to walk, &c.; and they are to receive an everlasting inheritance in "the land of Missouri," where the Savior will make his second appearance; at which place the foundation of the temple of God, and the City of Zion, have recently been laid, and are soon to be built. It is also to be a city of Refuge, and a safe asylum when the storms of vengeance shall pour upon the earth, and those who reject the Book of Mormon, shall be swept off as with the besom of destruction. Then shall the riches of the Gentile be consecrated to the Mormonites; they shall have lands and cattle in abundance, and shall possess the gold and silver, and all the treasures of their enemies.

The Mormonite preachers go forth proclaiming repentance and baptism for the remission of sins, and the laying on of hands for the reception of the Holy Ghost. The form of baptism is similar to other orders; only it is prefaced with—"having authority given me of Jesus Christ;" also, the laying on of hands—"In the name of Jesus Christ, receive ye the Holy Ghost." Many of them have been ordained to the High Priesthood, or the order of Melchisedec; and profess to be endowed with the same power as the ancient apostles were. But they have been hitherto unsuccessful in finding the lame, the halt, and the blind, who had faith sufficient to become the subjects of their miracles: and it is now concluded that this work must be postponed until they get to Missouri; for the Lord will not show those signs to this wicked and adulterous generation. In the commandment given to the churches in the State of New York, to remove to the State of Ohio, they were assured that these miracles should be wrought in the State of Ohio; but now they must be deferred until they are settled in Missouri.

As the Mormonite church depends principally upon the commandments, and as most of them are concealed from the world, it will be necessary to make some statement respecting them. These commandments come from Smith, at such times and on such occasions as he feels disposed to speak, and Rigdon or Cowdery to write them. Their exact number I have never taken pains to ascertain. I have the "27th commandment to Emma my daughter in Zion;" and should presume there are betwixt fifty and a hundred.—They received the addition of five or six while in Missouri; and these are considered a miracle in themselves, sufficient to convince any rational mind. But none but the strong in faith are permitted to witness their origin. I had an opportunity of seeing this wonderful exhibition of the wisdom and power of God, at three different times; and I must say, that it bore striking marks of human weakness and wickedness. They are received in the church as divinely inspired, and the name of the Lord is substituted for that of Smith. They are called "The Commandments of the Lord." They are considered "The mysteries of the Kingdom;" and to divulge them to the world, is the same as casting pearls before swine. When they and the Scriptures are at variance, the Scriptures are wrongly translated; and Smith, though totally ignorant of the original, being a translator or an alterator, can easily harmonize them. Every thing in the church is done by commandment: and yet it is said to be done by the voice of the church. For instance, Smith gets a commandment that he shall be the "head of the church," or that he "shall rule the Conference," or that the Church shall build him an elegant house, and give him 1000 dollars. For this the members of the church must vote, or they will be cast off for rebelling against the commandments of the Lord. In addition to the Book of Mormon, and the commandments, there are revelations which are not written.—In this department, though Smith is the principal, yet there are others who profess to receive revelations; but after all, Smith is to decide whether they come from the Lord or the devil. Some have been so unfortunate as to have their revelations palmed upon the latter. These revelations entirely supercede the Bible, and in fact, the Bible is declared too defective to be trusted, in its present form; and it is designed that it shall undergo a thorough alteration, or as they say, translation. This work is now in operation. The Gospel of St. Matthew has already received the purifying touch, and is prepared for the use of the church. It was intended to have kept this work a profound secret, and strict commandments were given for that purpose; and even the salvation of the church was said to depend upon it. The secret is divulged, but the penalty is not as yet inflicted.—Their revelations are said to be an addition to the Bible.—But instead of being an addition, they destroy its use; for every thing which need be known, whether present, past or future, they can learn from Smith, for he has declared to the church, that he “knows all things that will take place from this time to the end of the world.” If then, placing the Bible under circumstances which render it entirely useless, is infidelity, Mormonism is infidelity.

Joseph Smith, Jun., Sidney Rigdon, Oliver Cowdery and Martin Harris, may be considered as the principals in this work; and let Martin Harris tell the story, and he is the most conspicuous of the four.—He informed me, that he went to the place where Joseph resided, and Joseph had given it up, on account of the opposition of his wife and others; but he told Joseph, "I have not come down here for nothing, and we will go on with it." Martin Harris is what may be called a great talker, an extravagant boaster; so much so, that he renders himself disagreeable to many of his society. The money he has expended, and the great things he has done, form a considerable topic of his conversation; he understands all prophecies, and knows every thing by the spirit, and he can silence almost any opposer by talking faster, and louder than he can: or by telling him, "I know every thing and you know nothing; I am a wise man and you are a fool;" and in this respect he stands a fair sample of many others in the church. Yours affectionately,

E. BOOTH.

LETTER III.

Mormonism has in part changed its character, and assumed a different dress, from that under which it made its first appearance on the Western Reserve. Many extraordinary circumstances which then existed, have vanished out of sight; and the Mormonites desire, not only to forget them, but wish them blotted out of the memory of others. Those wonders which they wish to have forgotten, stand as the principal foundation of the faith of several hundred of the members of their church.

With the wonders of Mormonism, or some of them, I design to occupy your attention in this letter; and I wish you to observe here, and hereafter remember, that the evidence by which all my statements are supported, is derived from my own experience and observation, or from testimony of persons who still adhere to Mormonism; and I hold myself responsible to any tribunal, whether on earth or in heaven, for the truth of what I write, or at least for an intention to write the truth, and nothing but the truth.

"Being carried away by the spirit," and "I know it to be so by the spirit," are well known phrases, and in common use in the Mormonite church. We will first notice the gift of tongues, exercised by some when carried away in the spirit. These persons were apparently lost to all surrounding circumstances, and wrapt up in the contemplation of things, and in communication with persons not present.—They articulated sounds, which but few present professed to understand; and those few declared them to be the Indian language. A merchant, who had formerly been a member of the Methodist society, observed, he had formerly traded with the Indians, and he knew it to be their dialect. Being myself present on one of these occasions, a person proffered his services as my interpreter, and translated these sounds to me which were unintelligible, into the English language. One individual could read any chapter of the Old or New Testament, in several different languages. This was known to be the case by a person who professed to understand those languages. In the midst of this delirium they would, at times, fancy themselves addressing a congregation of their red brethren; mounted on a stump, or the fence, or from some elevated situation, would harangue their assembly until they had convinced or converted them. They would then lead them into the water, and baptize them, and pronounce their sins forgiven. In this exercise, some of them actually went into the water; and in the water, performed the ceremony used in baptizing. These actors assumed the visage of the savage, and so nearly imitated him, not only in language, but in gestures and actions, that it seemed the soul and body were completely metamorphosed into the Indian. No doubt was then entertained but that was an extraordinary work of the Lord, designed to prepare those young men for the Indian mission; and many who are still leaders of the church, could say, "we know by the spirit that it is the work of the Lord." And now they can say, "they know it is the work of the devil." Most of those who were the principal actors, have since apostatized, and the work is unanimously discarded by the church. The limits which my want of time to write, as well as your want of patience to read compel me to prescribe for myself, will allow me only to touch on some of the most prominent parts of this newly invented, and heterogeneous system.

A new method of obtaining authority to preach the Gospel was introduced into the church. One declared he had received a commission, directly from Heaven, written upon parchment. Another, that it was written upon the palm of his hand, and upon the lid of his Bible, &c. Three witnesses, and they were formerly considered persons of veracity, testified that they saw the parchment, or something like it, when put into the hands of the candidate. These commissions, when transcribed upon a piece of paper, were read to the church, and the persons who had received them, were ordained to the Elder's office, and sent out into the world to preach. But this also sunk into discredit, and experienced the fate of the former.

Visions, also, were in high credit, and sounded abroad as an infallible testimony in favor of Mormonism. The visionary, at times, imagined he saw the city of New Jerusalem; unlocked its gate, and entered within the walls; passed through its various apartments, and then returned, locked the gate, and put the key into his pocket. When this tour was finished, he would entertain his admiring friends, with a detailed description of the Heavenly City.

The condition of the ten tribes of Israel since their captivity, unto the present time, has excited considerable anxiety, and given rise to much speculation among the learned. But after all the researches which have been made, the place of their residence has never been satisfactorily ascertained. But these visionaries have discovered their place of residence to be contiguous to the north pole; separated from the rest of the world by impassable mountains of ice and snow. In this sequestered residence, they enjoy the society of Elijah the Prophet, and John the Revelator, and perhaps the three immortalized Nephites.—By and by, the mountains of ice and snow are to give way, and open a passage for the return of these tribes, to the land of Palestine.

About this time the ministration of angels was supposed to be frequent in the church. The Heavenly visitors made their appearance to certain individuals: they seldom made any communication, but presented themselves as spectacles to be gazed upon, with silent admiration.

Smith is the only one at present, to my knowledge, who pretends to hold converse with the inhabitants of the celestial world. It seems from his statements, that he can have access to them, when and where he pleases. He does not pretend that he sees them with his natural, but with his spiritual eyes; and he says he can see them as well with his eyes shut, as with them open. So also in translating.—The subject stands before his eyes in print, but it matters not whether his eyes are open or shut; he can see as well one way as the other.

You have probably read the testimony of the three witnesses appended to the Book of Mormon. These witnesses testify that an angel appeared to them, and presented them the golden plates, and the voice of God declared it to be a divine record. To this they frequently testify, in the presence of large congregations. When in Missouri, I had an opportunity to examine a commandment given to these witnesses, previous to their seeing the plates. They were informed that they should see and hear those things by faith, and then they should testify to the world, as though they had seen and heard, as I see a man, and hear his voice: but after all, it amounts simply to this—that by faith or imagination, they saw the plates and the angel, and by faith or imagination they heard the voice of the Lord.

Smith describes an angel, as having the appearance of “a tall, slim, well built, handsome man, with a bright pillar upon his head.” The Devil once, he says appeared to him in the same form, excepting upon his head he had a “black pillar,” and by this mark he was able to distinguish him from the former.

It passes for a current fact in the Mormonite church, that there are immense treasures in the earth, especially in those places in the State of New York from whence many of the Mormonites emigrated last spring: and when they become sufficiently purified, these treasures are to be poured into the lap of their church; to use their own language, they are to be the richest people in the world. These treasures were discovered several years since, by means of the dark glass, the same with which Smith says he translated the most of the Book of Mormon. Several of those persons, together with Smith, who were unsuccessfully engaged in digging and searching for these treasures, now reside in this county, and from themselves I received this information.

EZRA BOOTH.

LETTER IV.

From the time that Mormonism first made its appearance upon the stage, until the grand tour to the Missouri, an expectation universally pervaded the church, that the time was not far distant, when the deaf, the dumb, the maimed, the blind, &c. would become the subjects of the miraculous power of God, so that every defect in their systems would be entirely removed.

This expectation originated from, and was grounded upon a variety of premises, included in a number of commandments, or verbal revelations from Smith, or, as he is styled "the head of the church." As the 4th of June last was appointed for the sessions of the conference, it was ascertained, that that was the time specified, when the great and mighty work was to be commenced, and such was the confidence of some, that knowledge superceded their faith, and they did not hesitate to declare themselves perfectly assured that the work of miracles would commence at the ensuing conference. With such strong assurances, and with the most elevated expectations, the conference assembled at the time appointed. To give, if possible, energy to expectation, Smith, the day before the conference, professing to be filled with the spirit of prophecy, declared, that "not three days should pass away, before some should see their Savior, face to face." Soon after the session commenced, Smith arose to harangue the conference. He reminded those present of the prophecy, which he said "was given by the spirit yesterday." He wished them not to be overcome with surprise, when that event ushered in. He continued, until by long speaking, himself and some others became much excited. He then laid his hands on the head of Elder Wight, who had participated largely in the warm feeling of his leader, and ordained him to the High Priesthood. He was set apart for the service of the Indians, and was ordained to the gift of tongues, healing the sick, casting out devils, and discerning spirits; and in like manner he ordained several others; and then called upon Wight to take the floor. Wight arose, and presented a pale countenance, a fierce look, with his arms extended, and his hands cramped back, the whole system agitated, and a very unpleasant object to look upon. He exhibited himself as an instance of the great power of God, and called upon those around him, "if you want to see a sign, look at me." He then stepped upon a bench, and declared with a loud voice, he saw the Savior : and thereby, for the time being, rescued Smith's prophecy from merited contempt.—It, however, procured Wight the authority to ordain the rest. So said the spirit, and so said Smith. The spirit in Smith selected those to be ordained, and the spirit in Wight ordained them. But the spirit in Wight proved an erring dictator; so much so, that some of the candidates felt the weight of hands thrice, before the work was rightly done. Another Elder, who had been ordained to the same office as Wight, at the bidding of Smith, stepped upon the floor. Then ensued a scene, of which you can form no adequate conception ; and which, I would forbear relating, did not the truth require it. The Elder moved upon the floor, his legs inclining to a bend ; one shoulder elevated above the other, upon which the head seemed disposed to recline, his arms partly extended ; his hands partly clenched ; his mouth partly open, and contracted in the shape of an italic O ; his eyes assumed a wild ferocious cast, and his whole appearance presented a frightful object to the view of the beholder.—“Speak, Brother Harvey” said Smith. But Harvey intimated by signs, that his power of articulation was in a state of suspense, and that he was unable to speak. Some conjectured that Harvey was possessed of the devil, but Smith said, “the Lord binds in order to set at liberty.” After different opinions had been given, and there had been much confusion, Smith learnt by the spirit, that Harvey was under a diabolical influence, and that Satan had bound him ; and he commanded the unclean spirit to come out of him.

It now became clearly manifest, that “the man of sin was revealed,” for the express purpose that the elders should become acquainted with the devices of Satan ; and after that they would possess knowledge sufficient to manage him. This, Smith declared to be a miracle, and his success in this case, encouraged him to work other and different miracles. Taking the hand of one of the Elders in his own, a hand which by accident had been rendered defective, he said, "Brother Murdock, I command you in the name of Jesus Christ to straighten your hand; in the mean while, endeavoring to accomplish the work by using his own hand to open the hand of the other. The effort proved unsuccessful; but he again articulated the same commandment, in a more authoritative and louder tone of voice; and while uttering with his tongue, his hands were at work; but after all the exertion of his power, both natural and supernatural, the deficient hand returned to its former position, where it still remains. But ill success in this case, did not discourage him from undertaking another. One of the Elders, who was decriped in one of his legs, was set upon the floor, and commanded, in the name of Jeses Christ to walk. He walked a step or two, his faith failed, and he was again compelled to have recourse to his former assistant, and he has had occasion to use it ever since.

A dead body, which had been retained above ground two or three days, under the expectation that the dead would be raised, was insensible to the voice of those who commanded it to awake into life, and is destined to sleep in the grave till the last trump shall sound, and the power of God easily accomplishes the work, which frustrated the attempts, and bid defiance to the puny efforts of the Mormonite.*

*That an attempt was made to raise the child, is denied; of course, as every other attempt has been, after its entire failure was obvious to all. The parents of the deceased child, however, state, that they were prevented from procuring medical aid for the child, by the representations of the elders, that it was in no danger—that it would certainly be restored. The father had no other idea but that the child was to be raised; neither did his faith fail him till preparations were made for its interment. He then awoke from his dream of delusion, and dissolved his connexion with the impostors.

Under these discouraging circumstances, the horizon of Mormonism gathered darkness, and a storm seemed to hang impending over the church. The gloom of disappointed expectation, overspread the countenances of many, while they labored to investigate the cause of this failure. To add, if possible, to their mortification, a larger assembly collected on the Sabbath, in order to hear preaching. In the midst of the meeting, the congregation was dismissed by Rigdon, and the people sent to their homes. He was directed to do this, he said, by the spirit. But it was generally believed, that he was directed solely by fear; and that he had mistaken the spirit of cowardice, for the spirit of the Lord. Several of the Elders said they "felt the spirit to preach" to the congregation: and Rigdon felt the spirit to send the people home: such was the unity which then prevailed among them.

You will doubtless say, can it be possible that the minds of men, and men who possess the appearance of honesty, can be so strangely infatuated, as still to adhere to a system, after it had occasioned so much agitation, and so much disappointment. One reason which can be assigned for this, is, the adherents are generally inclined to consider the system so perfect, as to admit of no suspicion; and the confusion and disappointment, are attributed to some other cause. Another, and principal reason is, delusion always affects the mind with a species of delirium, and this delirium arises in a degree proportionate to the magnitude of the delusion. These men, upon other subjects, will converse like other men; but when their favorite system is brought into view, its inconsistencies and contradictions are resolved into inexplicable mystery; and this will not only apply to the delusions now under consideration, but in my view, to every delusion, from the highest to the lowest; and it matters not whether it carries the stamp of popularity or its opposite. Yours affectionately, EZRA BOOTH.

LETTER V.

In my last letter I gave you a faint representation of the events which transpired and the circumstances which attended the meeting of the Mormonite Conference. Though many stumbled, yet none irrecoverably fell. Another grand object was presented, and the attention was somewhat diverted from these scenes of disappointment, through which we had recently passed. The tour to the Missouri, revived the sinking expectations, and gave new energy to faith and hope. In that distant region, anticipation was to be realized in full, and the objects of faith and hope, were to become the objects of knowledge and fruition. A commandment was received, and Elders were directed to take their journey for the "promised land." They were commanded to go two by two, with the exception of Rigdon, Smith, Harris, and Partridge; and it was designed that these should find an easier method of transporting themselves, than to travel that distance on foot. They were careful to make suitable provision for themselves, both in money and other articles, that while on their journey, they might carry the appearance of gentlemen filling some important station in life; while many, who were destined to travel on foot, with packs on their backs, were so fired with the ardor of enthusiasm, that they supposed they could travel to Missouri with but little or no money. These carried the appearance, and were justly entitled to the character of beggars, for when the little money they took with them was expended, they subsisted by begging, until they arrived at their journey's end.

on foot, I hesitated for a while ; but believing it to be the will of God, I resolved on an unreserved surrender of myself to the work, and on the 15th of June, in company with the one appointed to travel with me, took up my line of march for Missouri. I do not design to trouble you with a relation of the particulars, but will observe, that after I left the north part of the State of Ohio, I made a speedy and prosperous journey to Missouri. I preached twice in Ohio, thrice in Indiana, once in Illinois, and once in Missouri. We were commanded to preach by the spirit, and my impressions were, that farther to the westward, I should enjoy more of the spirit's influence; and though I travelled one thousand miles to the west, my anticipations in this respect, were never realized. I seldom proclaimed Mormonism with that liberty which I enjoyed in my public exercises, while a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. I supposed that at some future time, the spirit would endow me to preach with an unusual degree of liberty. That period has never arrived, and I am persuaded it never will, and I now sincerely desire the spirit of truth to direct my pen, while I endeavor to expose the errors and absurdities of the system I then advocated.

When we arrived at the place to which our mission destined us, we perceived to our mortification, that disappointment, instead of being confined to the State of Ohio, had journeyed thither before us. We would gladly have avoided here an interview with this, our old companion; but this was impossible, she met us, and stared us in the face which way soever we turned, nor was it possible to look her out of countenance, or put the blush upon her pallid features, or expel her from our society. Some were for making the best of her they could; but for myself, I resolved that she should be expelled, or at any rate, that her visits should be less frequent, or I would abandon the habitation entirely.

When we commenced our journey for Missouri, we expected an "effectual door" would be opened, to proclaim the new system of faith, in that region; and that those who were ordained to the gift of tongues, would have an opportunity to display their supernatural talent, in communicating to the Indians, in their own dialect. Some who were ordained to this office, absolutely knew that through this medium, they should gain access to the natives; and I will venture to say, I know, that their success will be similar to that of their predecessor, Oliver Cowdrey, who stated that he was endowed with the same fore knowledge. But the event has proved his presumption false. For more than two weeks, while I remained there, the disposition of the Elders appeared to be averse to preaching, either to the white or the red people, and indeed adverse circumstances prevented it.

We expected to assemble together in conference according to the commandment, and the Lord would signally display his power, for the confirmation of our faith; but we commenced our journey home before most of the Elders arrived. It is true, a conference was held, but it was considered so unimportant, that myself and another man were permitted to be absent, for the purpose of procuring the means of conveyance down the river. We expected to find a large church, which Smith said, was revealed to him in a vision, Oliver had raised up there. This large church was found to consist of four females.

We expected to witness the exercise of those miraculous gifts, to which some were ordained while in the State of Ohio. But the same difficulty, the same want of faith among the people, which counteracted them here, prevailed there; consequently no miracles could be wrought. We expected to see the foundation of the City and temple laid; and this we were permitted to see, and it was in fact a curiosity, but not worth going to Missouri to see. The honor of consecrating the land, &c. was conferred on Rigdon.—The commandment reads thus: “let my servant Sidney consecrate and dedicate the land, and the spot for the Temple”—again, “Behold I give unto my servant Sidney a commandment, that he shall write a description of the land of Zion, and a statement of the will of God, as it shall be made known to him by the spirit, and a subscription to be presented to the Churches, to obtain money to purchase lands, for the inheritance of the children of God: for behold the Lord willeth that his Disciples, and the children of men, should open their hearts, to purchase the whole region of country, lest they receive none inheritance, save it be by the shedding of blood.” The childish exultation of the Mormonite leaders, while they echoed and re-echoed, the Lord has given us this whole region of country; “this whole region of country is ours;” when it was manifest, agreeable to the commandment, that the gift was only obtained, by purchasing it at a dear rate with money, and that, in order to save themselves the trouble of “the shedding of blood,” would, under other circumstances, have been truly diverting. But when viewing it as an instance of a deep laid scheme, and the cunning artifice of crafty impostors, designed to allure the credulous and the unsuspecting, into a state of unqualified vassalage, it presents a melancholy picture of the depravity of the human heart, while destitute of those virtues, inculcated in the Gospel by the blessed Redeemer.

It was conjectured by the inhabitants of Jackson county, that the Mormonites, as a body are wealthy, and many of them entertain fears, that next December, when the list of land is exposed for sale, they will out-bid others, and establish themselves as the most powerful body in the county.—But they may dismiss their fears in this respect; for the Mormonites as a body, are comparatively poor, and destined so to remain, until they pursue a different course as it relates to economy and industry, from what they have hitherto pursued. There were ten families, which came by water, landed there the day on which I arrived; and all the land which the Bishop said they had means to purchase, was less than thirty acres to the family; and thirty acres in that country, is little enough for wood and timber land; as fifteen acres upon an average here, are worth thirty there. Neither need they fear that the Mormonites, were they so disposed, will obtain the possession of their lands "by shedding of blood," until the spirit selects more courageous leaders than Smith or Rigdon.

Yours affectionately,

EZRA BOOTH.

LETTER VI.

It is well known that the ostensible design of the Mormonites in settling in the western part of Missouri, is to convert the Indians to the faith of Mormonism. In this, the leaders appear to have in view, as a mode, the Jesuits of the 16th century, who established themselves in South America, by gaining an entire ascendancy over the hearts and consciences of the natives, and thereby became their masters. As Independence is the place of general rendezvous and headquarters of the Mormonites, it may not be amiss to notice it. It is a new town, containing a court-house built of brick, two or three merchant's stores, and 15 or 20 dwelling houses, built mostly of logs hewed on both sides; and is situated on a handsome rise of ground, about three miles south of Missouri river, and about 12 miles east of the dividing line between the United States and the Indian Reserve, and is the county seat of Jackson county. In this place it is designed to establish the Lord's printing press, of which Wm. W. Phelps and O. Cowdery are to have the management; and also, the Lord's store-house, committed in charge to S. Gilbert. By the means of these two grand engines, they expect to make the wicked feel the weight of their tremendous power. West of the line lies the territory, selected by the government of the United States, for the future residence of the Indians; to which place, a number of tribes have recently emigrated. The question is frequently asked, do the Indians seem disposed to receive Mormonism; or have any of them as yet embraced it? To which question I have heard some of the leaders reply, "O yes," when the truth is, not an individual had embraced it when I left that place. Nor is there any prospect they will embrace it. It is true, that some of the Indians appear to listen with a degree of attention, while the Mormonite teacher pretends to disclose to them the secrets of their origin, the history of their ancestors, and that the great Spirit designs, in this generation, to restore them to the possession of their lands, now occupied by the whites; and the Indians shall go forth among the white people, "as a lion among the beasts of the forests, and as a young lion among the flocks of sheep, who, if he goeth through, both treadeth down and teareth to pieces, and no man can deliver. Thy hand shall be lifted up against thy adversaries, (the whites) and all their enemies (the whites) shall be cut off." Here you have a fair specimen of the method adopted in the Book of Mormon, and preached by the Mormonite teachers, for the purpose of enlisting the feelings, and ingratiating themselves with the Indians; and should success attend their endeavors, and the minds of the Indians become inflamed with the enthusiastic spirit which Mormonism inspires, they may be inclined to try the experiment, whether "by shedding of blood," they can expel the white inhabitants, or reduce them to a state of servitude; and by this means, regain the possession of the lands occupied by their forefathers.

The laying of the foundation of Zion was attended with considerable parade and an ostentatious display of talents, both by Rigdon and Cowdery. The place being designated as the site where the city was to commence, on the day appointed we repaired to the spot, not only as spectators, but each one to act the part assigned him in the great work of laying the foundation, of the "glorious city of New Jerusalem." Rigdon consecrated the ground, by an address in the first place to the God whom the Mormonites profess to worship; and then making some remarks respecting the extraordinary purpose for which we were assembled, prepared the way for administering the oath of allegiance, to those who were to receive their "everlasting inheritance" in that city. He laid them under the most solemn obligations, to constantly obey all the commandments of Smith. He enjoined it upon them to express a great degree of gratitude for the free donation, and then, as the Lord's Vicegerent, he gratuitously bestowed upon them, that for which they had paid an exorbitant price in money. These preliminaries being ended, a shrub oak, about ten inches in diameter at the butt, the best that could be obtained near at hand, was prostrated; trimmed, and cut off at a suitable length; and twelve men, answering to the twelve Apostles, by means of handspikes, conveyed it to the place. Cowdery craved the privilege of laying the corner stone. He selected a small rough stone, the best he could find, carried it in one hand to the spot, removed the surface of the earth to prepare a place for its reception, and then displayed his oratorical power, in delivering an address, suited to the important occasion. The stone being placed, one end of the shrub oak stick was laid upon it; and there was laid down the first stone and stick, which are to form an essential part of the splendid city of Zion.

The next day the ground for the temple was consecrated, and Smith claimed the honor of laying the corner-stone himself. Should the inhabitants of Independence, feel a desire to visit this place, destined at some future time to become celebrated, they will have only to walk one half of a mile out of the town, to a rise of ground, a short distance south of the road. They will be able to ascertain the spot by the means of a sapling, distinguished from the others by the bark being broken off on the north and on the east side. On the south side of the sapling will be found the letter T, which stands for Temple; and on the east side ZOM! for Zomas; which Smith says is the original word for Zion. Near the foot of the sapling, they will find a small stone covered over with bushes, which were cut for that purpose. This is the corner stone for the temple.—They can there have the privilege of beholding the mighty work, accomplished by about thirty men, who left their homes, traveled one thousand miles, most of them on foot, and expended more than $1,000 in cash.

Having completed the work, or rather finding but little business for us to accomplish in Missouri, most of us became anxious to return home. And none appeared to be more so than Rigdon and Smith, whose plans for future subsistence were considerably frustrated. They expected to find a country abounding with the necessities and comforts of life. But the prospect appeared somewhat gloomy, and will probably remain so for some years to come. That they were disappointed, is evident from the change which appeared in their calculations. Before they went to Missouri, their language was, "we shall winter in Ohio but one winter more;" and when in Missouri, "it will be many years before we come here, for the Lord has a great work for us to do in Ohio," and the great work is, to make a thorough alteration of the Bible, and invent new revelations, and these are to be sent to Missouri, in order to be printed.

This coming to save the expense of postage, is parallel with their other calculations. But no matter for that, it will save them the difficulties and hardships incident to the settling of a new country ; and also the dangers to which they would be exposed, in case the Indians should commence hostilities upon the whites; and moreover, they have an easy method to supply themselves with cash at any time when occasion requires. The authority of a commandment will easily untie the purse strings of those whose consciences are under their control ; and they find it much easier, and better suited to their dispositions, to write commandments, than to gain a livelihood by the sweat of the brow ; and indeed, Smith has commanded himself not to labor, and by his mandate, has enjoined it upon the church to support him. The Bishop, when we were in Missouri, intimated that he and others were too much inclined to indolence.— He replied, “I am commanded not to labor.”

Yours affectionately, EZRA BOOTH.

LETTER VII.

The following, with but little variation, is the copy of a letter witten to the Bishop of the Mormonite church, who, by commandment, has received his station, and now resides in Missouri. His business is to superintend the secular concerns of the church. He holds a deed of the lands, and the members receive a writing from him, signifying, that they are to possess the land as their own, so long as they are obedient to Smith's commandments. The Bishop is, in reality, the Vicegerant of Smith, and those in coalition with him; and holds his office during their will and pleasure. I think him to be an honest man as yet, but there is a point beyond which he cannot go, unless he prostrates his honor in the dust, and prostitutes his conscience to the vilest of purposes. He has frequently staggered and been ready to fall. The conference last year, gave him a tremendous shock, from which with difficulty he recovered. The law of the church enjoins, that no debt with the world shall be contracted. But a thousand acres of land in the town of Thompson could be purchased for one half its value, and he was commanded to secure it; and in order to do it, he was under the necessity to contract a debt to the world. He hesitated, but the command was repeated, "you must secure the land." He was one of the number who was ordained to the gift of discerning spirits; and in a commandment, a pattern was given by which the good spirit might be distinguished from the bad, which rendered the gift of spiritual discernment useless: for the division was to be made from external appearances, and not from any thing discovered internally. He saw the impropriety, and it shook his faith. I am suspicious the time is not far distant, when by commandment, this office will be bestowed upon a more trusty and confidential person; perhaps Smith's brother or father, or some one who has been disciplined in the State of New York. Then it will become his business to make over the whole property, by deed of conveyance, to the person appointed by the commandment to supercede him. The Mormonites will tell you, that business of this nature is done by the voice of the church. It is like this: a sovereign issues his decrees, and then says to his subjects, hold up your right hands, in favor of my decrees being carried into effect. Should any refuse, they are sure to be hung for rebellion.

SEPTEMBER 20, 1831.

Mr. Partridge:

Sir—From a sense of duty, I take up my pen, to communicate to you the present impressions of my mind, which originated from facts, which occurred during my stay there, and while returning home. I arrived safely at my home, on the 1st instant, after having passed through a variety of scenes, some of which, I design to disclose to you in this letter. You will probably be surprised, when you learn, that I am no longer a member of the Mormonite church.—The circumstances which led to this are numerous, and of such a character, that I should have been compelled to sacrifice every principle of honesty, or cease to support a system, which I conceive to be grossly inconsistent, and in opposition to the best interests of human society. The first thing that materially affected my mind, so as to weaken my confidence, was the falsehood of Joseph's vision. You know perfectly well, that Joseph had, or said he had, a vision, or revelation, in which it was made known to him by the spirit, that Oliver had raised up a large church in Missouri. This was so confidently believed, previous to our leaving Ohio, that while calculating the number of the church, several hundred were added, supposed to be in Missouri. The great church was found to consist of three or four females. The night we took lodgings in the school house, and the morning which succeeded it, presented circumstances which I had not anticipated. When you intimated to Joseph that the land which he and Oliver had selected, was inferior in point of quality to other lands adjoining, had you seen the same spirit manifested in me, which you saw in him, would you not have concluded me to be under the influence of violent passions, bordering on madness, rather than the meek and gentle spirit which the Gospel inculcates? When you complained that he had abused you, and observed to him, "I wish you not to tell us any more, that you know these by the spirit when you do not; you told us, that Oliver had raised up a large church here, and there is no such thing;" he replied, "I see it, and it will be so." This appeared to me, to be a shift, better suited to an impostor, than a true Prophet of the Lord.

And from that time I resolved to weigh well every circumstance; and I can assure you that no one that has a bearing on the subject, escaped my notice. But the spirit considered your insolence to Joseph too intolerable to be passed over unnoticed. Hence the commandment: "If he repent not of his sins, which is unbelief and blindness of heart, let him take heed lest he fall. Behold his mission is given unto him, and it shall not be given again."—You are to be careful, to submit to [all the abuse which Joseph sees fit to pour upon you; and to swallow, passively, all the spurious visions, and false prophecies, that he in his clemency thinks proper to bestow upon you, lest you fall from your Bishoprick, never to regain it. These men under whose influence you act, were entire strangers to you until you embraced this new system of faith. Now, permit me to inquire, have you not frequently observed in Joseph, a want of that sobriety, prudence and stability, which are some of the most prominent traits in the christian character? Have you not often discovered in him, a spirit of lightness and levity, a temper easily irritated, and an habitual proneness to jesting and joking? Have you not often proven to your satisfaction that he says he knows things to be so by the spirit, when they are not so? You most certainly have. Have you not reason to believe, or at least to suspect, that the revelations which come from him, are something short of infallible, and instead of being the production of divine wisdom, emanate from his own weak mind? Some suppose his weakness, nay, his wickedness, can form no reasonable objection to his revelations; and "were he to get another man's wife, and seek to kill her husband, it could be no reason why we should not believe revelations through him, for David did the same." So Sidney asserted, and many others concurred with him in sentiment. The commandment we received to purchase, or make a water craft, directed us to proceed down the river in it as far as St. Louis, and from thence, with the exception of Joseph, and his two scribes, we were to proceed on our journey home two by two. The means of conveyance being procured, we embarked for St. Louis, but unpropitious events rolled on, superceded the commandment, frustrated our plans, and we had separated before we had accomplished one half of the voyage. The cause which produced this disastrous result, was a spirit of animosity and discord, which made its appearance on board, the morning after we left Independence. The conduct of some of the Elders became very displeasing to Oliver, who, in the greatness of his power, uttered this malediction: "as the Lord God liveth, if you do not behave better, some accident will befall you." The manner in which this was handed out, evinced it to be the ebullition of a spirit, similar to that which influenced Joseph in the school-house. No accident, however, befel them, until Joseph, in the afternoon of the third day, assumed the direction of affairs on board that canoe, which, with other matters of difference, together with Oliver's curse, increased the irritation of the crew, who, in time of danger, refused to exert their physical powers, in consequence of which, they ran foul of a sawyer, and were in danger of upsetting. This was sufficient to flutter the timid spirit of the Prophet and his scribe, who had accompanied him on board of that canoe, and like the sea-tossed mariner, when threatened with a watery grave, they unanimously desired to set their feet once more upon something more firm than a liquid surface; therefore, by the persuasion of Joseph, we landed before sunset, intending to pass the night upon the bank of the river. Preparations were made to spend the night as comfortably as existing circumstances would admit, and then an attempt was made, to effect a reconciliation betwixt the contending parties. The business of settlement commenced, which elicited much conversation, and excited considerable feeling on both sides. Oliver's denunciation was brought into view; his conduct and equipage, were compared to "a fop of a sportsman;" he and Joseph were represented, as highly imperious and quite dictatorial; and Joseph and Sidney were reprimanded for their excessive cowardice. Joseph seemed inclined to arm himself, according to his usual custom, in case of opposition, with the judgment of God, for the purpose of pouring them, like a thunder bolt upon the rebellious Elders; but one or two retorted, "none of your threats:" which completely disarmed him, and he reserved his judgment for a more suitable occasion. Finding myself but little interested in the settlement, believing the principles of discord too deeply rooted to be easily eradicated, I laid myself down upon the ground, and in silence contemplated awhile the events of the evening, as they passed before me. These are the men to whom the Lord has intrusted the mysteries, and the keys of his kingdom; whom he has authorized to bind or loose on earth, and their decision shall be ratified in Heaven. These are the men sent forth, to promulgate a new revelation, and to usher in a new dispensation—at whose presence the "Heavens are to shake, the hills tremble, the mountains quake, and the earth open and swallow up their enemies."—These are the leaders of the church, and the only church on earth the Lord beholds with approbation. Surely, I never witnessed so much confusion and discord, among the Elders of any other church; nevertheless they are all doomed to a perpetual curse, except they receive the doctrines and precepts which Mormonism inculcates, and place themselves under the tuition of men, more ignorant and unholy than themselves. In the midst of meditations like these, I sunk into the arms of sleep, but was awakened at a late hour, to witness and consent to a reconciliation between the parties. The next morning, Joseph manifested an aversion to risk his person any more, upon the rough and angry current of the Missouri, and in fact, upon any other river ; and he again had recourse to his usual method, of freeing himself from the embarrassments of a former commandment, by obtaining another in opposition to it. A new commandment was issued, in which a great curse was pronounced against the waters; navigating them, was to be attended with extreme danger; and all the saints in general, were prohibited in journeying upon them, to the promised land. From this circumstance, the Missouri river was named the river of Destruction. It was decreed, that we should proceed on our journey by land, and preach by the way as we passed along. Joseph, Sidney, and Oliver, were to press their way forward with all possible speed, and to preach only in Cincinnati; and there they were to lift up their voices, and proclaim against the whole of that wicked city. The method by which Joseph and Co. designed to proceed home, it was discovered, would be very expensive. "The Lord don't care how much money it takes to get us home," said Sidney. Not satisfied with the money they received from you, they used their best endeavors to exact money from others, who had but little compared with what they had ; telling them in substance, "you can beg your passage on foot, but as we are to travel in the stage, we must have money." You will find, sir, that the expense of these three men, was one hundred dollars more than three of our company expended, while on our journey home; and for the sake of truth and honesty, let these men never again open their mouths, to insult the common sense of mankind, by contending for equality, and the community of goods in society, until there is a thorough alteration in their method of proceeding. It seems, however, they had drained their pockets, when they arrived at Cincinnati, for there they were under the necessity of pawning their trunk, in order to continue their journey home. Here they violated the commandment, by not preaching ; and when an inquiry was made respecting the cause of that neglect, at one time they said, they could get no house to preach in ; at another time they stated, that they could have had the court-house, had they staid a day or two longer, but the Lord made it known to them, that they should go on ; and other similar excuses, involving like contradictions. Thus they turn and twist the commandments to suit their whims, and they violate them when they please with perfect impunity. They can at any time obtain a commandment suited to their desires, and as their desires fluctuate and become reversed, they get a new one to supercede the other, and hence the contradictions which abound in this species of revelation. The next day after, we were cast upon the shore, and had commenced our journey by land, myself and three others went on board of a canoe, and recommenced our voyage down the river. From this time a constant gale of prosperity wafted us forward, and not an event transpired, but what tended to our advancement, until we arrived at our much desired homes. At St. Louis, we took passage in a steam-boat, and came to Wellsville ; and from thence in the stage home. We travelled about eight hundred miles farther than the three who took their passage in the stage, and arrived at our homes but a few days later.— It is true, we violated the commandment by not preaching by the way, and so did they by not preaching at Cincinnati. But it seems that none of us considered the commandment worthy of much notice.

In this voyage upon the waters, we demonstrated that the great dangers existed only in imagination, and the commandment to be the offspring of a pusillanimous spirit.— The spirit also revealed to Joseph, that “on the steamboats, plots were already laid for our destruction.” This too we proved to be false. While descending the Missouri river, Peter and Frederick, two of my company, divulged a secret respecting Oliver, which placed his conduct on a parallel with Ziba’s; for which Ziba was deprived of his Elder and Apostleship: “Let that which was bestowed upon Ziba be taken from him, and let him stand as a member in the church, and let him labor with his own hands with the brethren.” And thus by commandment, poor Ziba, one of the twelve Apostles, is thrust down; while Oliver the scribe, also an Apostle, who had been guilty of similar conduct, is set on high, to prepare work for the press; and no commandment touches him, only to exalt him higher.—These two persons stated, that had they known previous to their journey to Missouri, what they then knew, they never should have accompanied Oliver thither.

Sidney, since his return has written a description of Zion. But it differs essentially from that which you wrote; so much so, that either yours or his must be false. Knowing him to be constitutionally inclined to exaggerate, and suspecting that this habit would be as likely to preponderate, in his written as in his oral communications, you cautioned him against it. “What I write will be written by the most infallible inspiration of the holy spirit,” said he with an air of contempt. You must be careful, sir, or it will again sound in your ears, “if he repent not” for giving a false description of the land of Zion, let him take heed lest he fall from his office. This, Sidney said, was one reason why you was not permitted to return to the State of Ohio. The want of time and paper warn me to bring this letter to a close. And now permit me to entreat you, to candidly view the whole matter, from the commencement unto the present time. Look at it with your own eyes, and no longer suffer these strangers to blind your eyes, and daub you over with their untempered mortar. Think how often you have been stumbled by these discordant revelations, false visions, and lying prophecies. Put into practice the resolutions you expressed to me the morning after the collision in the school house, that you would go home, and attend to your own business. Transfer the lands you hold in your hands, to the persons whose money paid for it. Place yourself from under the influence of the men who have deceived you; burst asunder the bands of delusion; fly for your life, fly from the habitations haunted by impostors; and having done this, you most surely will be glad and rejoice, and prove to your own satisfaction, as I have done, the falsity of Joseph's prophetic declaration, "if you turn against us you will enjoy no more satisfaction in the world." E. B.

Some things are intimated in the foregoing letter, which more properly belongs to Cowdery's mission to the Indians; and when I come to notice that mission, those things will probably be more fully exhibited.

It is also indirectly stated, that Rigdon has acquired the habit of exaggeration. The truth of this statement, I presume, will be doubted but by few, who have been long acquainted with him. Most of his communications carry the appearance of high and false coloring; and I am persuaded, that truth by this embellishing touch, often degenerates into fiction. I have heard him several different times, give a representation of the interview between himself, and to use his own phraseology, "the far-famed Alexander Campbell." This man's wonted shrewdness and presence of mind forsook him when in the presence of this gigantic Mormonite; so much so, that "he was quite confused and silly." I will give you a specimen of the language, with which Rigdon said he assailed him: "You have lied, Alexander. Alexander you have lied. If you do not receive the Book of Mormon, you will be damned." With such like arguments he brow-beat his antagonist, until he had silenced and set him down, like the pusillanimous cur, at the feet of his chastising master. "You are a liar, you are a child of the Devil, you are an enemy to all righteousness, and the spirit of the Devil is in you," and the like is dealt out profusely against an obstinate opponent, and especially, one whom they are pleased to nickname apostate. I regret the necessity I am under of making such statements, and could wish there had been no occasion for them. But truth compels me to it, and the good of society demands it.—Yours, &c.

LETTER VIII.

The origin of the aborigines of this country, and the history before the introduction of eastern literature into the western hemisphere, has afforded a subject for much speculation, and deep research among the learned; and has occasioned considerable curiosity, among various classes of people. But the subject still remains in impenetrable obscurity; and will so remain, unless He who has the power to speak, "let there be light," and the light shall break forth out of obscurity. But as this is a subject better calculated to gratify the speculative inquirer, than to purify the heart, by rectifying wrong principles in the mind, or to increase that kind of knowledge intimately connected with, and essential to practical improvements either in civil or religious society, we may reasonably doubt, whether the great Jehovah will soon, if ever, condescend to clear away the darkness, by giving a revelation, merely to gratify the desires of persons, who delight to wander in the region of conjecture and speculation. But he has already done it, cries the Mormonite herald. The Book of Mormon, which I hold in my hand, is a divine revelation, and the very thing we need, to burst the cloud and remove the darkness, which has long surrounded the mysterious and degraded aborigines. We now know that the natives who inhabit the forests of America, are a "branch of the House of Israel;" and by means of this blessed book, they are soon, even in this generation, to be restored to the knowledge, and the true worship of the God of Israel.—Among them is to be built, the "glorious city of the New Jerusalem." In the midst of which is to stand, the splendid and magnificent temple, dedicated to the Most High God, and "Oliver being called and commanded of the Lord God, to go forth among the Lamanites, to proclaim glad tidings of great joy unto them, by presenting unto them, the fullness of the gospel of the only begotten son of God," &c. The grand enterprise of introducing this new dispensation, or the fullness of the Gospel, among the Indian tribes, who have recently received the appellation of Lamanites, was committed in charge to Oliver Cowdery, a young man of high fame among the Mormonites. His credentials, and the credentials of the three others associated with him in the mission, will be found in the following revelations, which I transcribe for your perusal, and also for some further remarks, which I design to offer.

A REVELATION UNTO OLIVER, GIVEN SEPTEMBER, 1830.

Behold, I say unto you Oliver, that it shall be given thee, that thou shalt be heard by the church in all things whatsoever thou shalt teach them by the comforter, concerning the revelations and commandments which I have given. But, verily, verily, I say unto you, no one shall be appointed to receive commandments and revelations in the church, excepting my servant Joseph, for he receiveth them even as Moses, and thou shalt be obedient unto the things which I shall give unto him, even as Aaron, to declare faithfully the commandments and revelations, with power and authority unto the church. And if thou art led at any time by the comforter to speak or teach, or at all times by the way of commandment unto the church, thou mayst do it; but shall not write by way of commandment but by wisdom: and thou shalt not command him who is at thy head, and at the head of the church; for I have given him the keys of the mysteries of the revelations which are sealed, until I shall appoint unto him another in his stead—and now behold I say unto you, that thou shalt go unto the Lamanites and preach my gospel unto them; and thou shalt have revelations, but write them not by way of commandment.—And now I say unto you, that it is not revealed, and no man knoweth where the city shall be built, but it shall be given hereafter. Behold, I say unto you, that it shall be among the Lamanites. Thou shalt not leave this place until after the conference, and my servant Joseph shall be appointed to rule the conference, by the voice of it; and what he saith unto thee that thou shalt tell. And again, thou shalt take thy brother Hiram between him and thee alone, and tell him that these things which he hath written from that stone, are not of me, and that Satan hath deceived him, for these things have not been appointed unto him, neither shall any thing be appointed to any in this church, contrary to the church covenant, for all things must be done in order, and by commandment, by the prayer of faith, and thou shalt settle all these things before thou shalt take thy journey among the Lamanites; and it shall be given from time to time, that thou shalt go, until the time that thou shalt return, what thou shalt do; and thou must open thy mouth at all times, declaring my gospel with the sound of rejoicing.—Amen.

MANCHESTER, October 17, 1830.

I, Oliver, being commanded by the Lord God, to go forth unto the Lamanites, to proclaim glad tidings of great joy unto them, by presenting unto them the fullness of the gospel, of the only begotten son of God; and also, to rear up a pillar as a witness where the temple of God shall be built, in the glorious New Jerusalem; and having certain brothers with me, who are called of God to assist me, whose names are Parley, Peter, and Ziba, do therefore most solemnly covenant with God, that I will walk humbly before him, and do this business, and this glorious work according as he shall direct me by the Holy Ghost; ever praying for mine and their prosperity, and deliverance from bonds, and from imprisonment, and whatsoever may befall us, with all patience and faith.—Amen. OLIVER COWDERY.

We, the undersigned, being called and commanded of the Lord God, to accompany our brother Oliver Cowdery, to go to the Lamanites, and to assist in the above mentioned glorious work and business. We do, therefore, most solemnly covenant before God, that we will assist him faithfully in this thing, by giving heed unto all his words and advice, which is, or shall be given him by the spirit of truth, ever praying with all prayer and supplication, for our and his prosperity, and our deliverance from bonds, and imprisonments, and whatsoever may come upon us, with all patience and faith.—Amen.

PETER WHITMER.

In the preceding revelation, the principal thing which claims your attention, is the mission to the Indians; for with that mission many circumstances are connected, which clearly evince, that it originated from human imbecility, and diabolical depravity.—There are also some other things the meaning of which you will not be likely to apprehend, without some explanation. In this, as well as several of the commandments, it is clearly and explicitly stated, that the right of delivering written commandments, and revelations, belong exclusively to Smith, and no other person can interfere, without being guilty of sacrilege. In this office he is to stand, until another is appointed in his place, and no other person can be appointed in his stead, unless he falls through transgression; and in such a case, he himself is authorized to appoint his successor. But how is he to be detected, should he become guilty of transgression. The commandment makes provision for this. His guilt will become manifest by his inability to utter any more revelations, and should he presume "to get another man's wife," and commit adultery; and "by the shedding of blood, seek to kill her husband," if he retain the use of his tongue, so as to be able to utter his jargon, he can continue as long as he pleases in the bed of adultery, and wrap himself with garments stained with blood, shed by his own hands, and still retain the spotless innocence of the holiest among mortals; and must be continued in the office of revelator, and head of the church. Some others, and especially Cowdery, have earnestly desired to relieve Smith of some part of his burden. Cowdery's desires for this work were so keen and excessive, as, to use his own language, "it was unto me a burning fire shut up in my bones, and I was weary with forbearing, and I could forbear no longer;" and he did in fact, issue some productions, which he said bore the divine impress; but Smith fixed upon them the stamp of devilish. But it seems, in order to compromise the matter, that Cowdery was permitted to "speak or to teach, at all times, by way of commandment unto the church; but not to write them by way of commandment:" thus Cowdery is authorized to give verbal commandments to the church, by the inspiration of the spirit, which, if he afterwards writes, ceases to be inspiration; therefore, a commandment delivered orally, may be divinely inspired; but the same communicated, written verbatim, so far loses its former character, that it degenerates into a production of an infernal stamp. Here is a mystery, for aught I know, peculiar to Mormonism; and none but Mormonites, I presume, will attempt to unravel it. But it finds its parallel in the following: Smith assures his followers, that what he speaks by the spirit, and is written, is infallible in operation, but if it is not written, he may sometimes be mistaken.—He tells them that the right to deliver written revelations, belongs exclusively to himself, and no other person shall interfere in the business; and if he transgresses he will graciously condescend to appoint another in his stead, and the only proof produced for the support of such assertions, is barely his word, upon which they implicitly rely, and become entirely resigned to place their person and property under his control, and even risk the salvation of their souls upon his say-so. Such glaring duplicity on the one hand, and unaccountable credulity on the other, seldom have a parallel in the annals of man.

Never was there a despot more jealous of his prerogative than Smith; and never was a fortress guarded with more vigilance and ardor against every invading foe, than he guards these. Smith apprehended a rival in the department of written inspiration, from another quarter, and hence Cowdery was commissioned to commence an attack and suppress the enemy, before he had acquired sufficient stability and strength so as to become formidable. “Thou shalt take thy brother Hiram, between him and thee alone, and tell him that the things he hath written from that stone, &c.” Hiram Page, one of the eight witnesses, and also one of the “money diggers,” found a smooth stone, upon which there appeared to be a writing, which when transcribed upon paper, disappeared from the stone, and another impression appeared in its place. This when copied, vanished as the former had done, and so it continued, alternately appearing and disappearing; in the meanwhile, he continued to write, until he had written over considerable paper. It bore striking marks of a Mormonite revelation, and was received as an authentic document by most of the Mormonites, till Smith, by his superior sagacity, discovered it to be a Satanic fraud.

A female professing to be a prophetess, made her appearance in Kirtland, and so ingratiated herself into the esteem and favor of some of the Elders, that they received her, as a person commissioned to act a conspicuous part in Mormonizing the world. Rigdon, and some others, gave her the right hand of fellowship; and literally saluted her with what they called the kiss of charity. But Smith, viewing her as an encroachment upon his sacred premises, declared her an impostor, and she returned to the place from whence she came. Her visit, however, made a deep impression on the minds of many, and the barbed arrow which she left in the hearts of some, is not yet eradicated.

Yours affectionately,

EZRA BOOTH.

LETTER IX.

In this letter the mission to the Indians will be brought into view, and with it are connected circumstances and facts, sufficient, one would suppose, to convince every honest and unprejudiced Mormonite, of the fallacy and deception of Mormonism. But a Mormonite of the highest grade is invulnerable by facts the most notorious, and evidence as glaring as the noon-day sun; for they affirm, they know by the spirit that Mormonism is what it pretends to be, and should Smith acknowledge it to be a fabrication, they would not believe him. This forms the highest climax in Mormonism, and but few have attained to it. After Cowdery, and his three associates had left the State of New York, while bending their course to the west, he was directed by the spirit to Kirtland, for the special purpose of enlisting Rigdon in the Mormonite cause. I have since learned that the spirit which directed in this enterprise, was no other than Pratt, who had previously become acquainted with Rigdon and had been proselyted by him into what is called the Campbellite faith. This new system appears to have been particularly suited to Rigdon's taste, and calculated to make an impression on his mind. But before he could fully embrace it, he must "receive a testimony from God." In order to this he labored as he was directed by his Preceptor, almost incessantly and earnestly in praying, till at length his mind was wrapped up in a vision; and to use his own language, "to my astonishment I saw the different orders of professing Christians passing before my eyes, with their hearts, exposed to view, and they were as corrupt as corruption itself. That society to which I belonged also passed before my eyes, and to my astonishment it was as corrupt as the others. Last of all that little man who bro't me the Book of Mormon, passed before my eyes with his heart open, and it was as pure as an angel; and this was a testimony from God; that the Book of Mormon, was a Divine Revelation." Rigdon is one who has ascended to the summit of Mormonism; and this vision stands as the foundation of his knowledge. He frequently affirms, that these things are not a matter of faith with him, but of absolute knowledge. He has been favored with many remarkable and extraordinary visions, in some of which he saw Kirtland with the surrounding country, consecrated as the promised land, and the churches in the State of New York expected to receive their everlasting inheritance in the State of Ohio, and this expectation was grounded on Rigdon's vision while in the State of New York. These visions are considered by the church as entitled to no credit, and laid aside as mere rubbish.

As it relates to the purity of the heart of "that little man," if a pure and pleasant fountain can send forth corrupt and bitter streams, then may the heart of that man be pure, who enters into a matrimonial contract with a young lady, and obtains the consent of her parents; but as soon as his back is turned upon her, he violates his engagements, and prostitutes his honor by becoming the gallant of another, and resolved in his heart, and expresses resolutions to marry her. But as the practice of a man will ever stand as a general criterion by which the principles of the heart are to be tested, we say that the heart of such a man is the reverse of purity.

From Kirtland, Cowdery & Co. were directed by the spirit to Sandusky, where they contemplated opening their mission, and proselyting the Indians residing at that place. But neither Cowdery, nor the spirit which directed him, was able to open the way to, or make any impression upon their minds. Being frustrated in this, his first attempt to convert the natives, he turned his attention and course to the Missouri, and when near the eastern line of that state, he halted for several days, for the purpose of obtaining, by inquiry, information respecting the Indians still further west. It appears that he was fearful that his infallible guide, (the spirit,) was incapable to direct him, while proceeding further to the west; consequently, he applied to men more capable of giving instruction than the spirit, by which he was influenced. When he arrived at the western line of Missouri, he passed into the Indian territory, where he remained but a short time, before he was notified by the U. S. Agent, that he must either re-cross the line, or be compelled to take up his residence in the garrison, forty miles up the Arkansas river. As there was no other alternative, the former seemed to him the most expedient; and he never possessed courage sufficient to pass the line, or visit the residence of the Indians since. Thus you behold a man, "called and commanded of the Lord God, to go forth unto the Lamanites," and establish his church among them; but no sooner is he set down in the field of his mission, and surrounded by his anticipated converts, than he is driven by a comparative nothing, from the field, and obliged to relinquish his contemplated harvest.—This is the person commissioned by the Lord to proceed to the western wilds, and as he himself stated, "to the place where the foot of a white man never trod," to rear up a pillar for a witness, where the temple of God shall be built, in the glorious New Jerusalem. But alas! he was arrested by man in his course, and by the breath of man the mighty undertaking was blown into the air, and Cowdery was thrown back among the Gentiles, to wait for the spirit, to devise some new plans in the place of those which had been frustrated. But as the city and temple must be built, as every avenue leading to the Indians was closed against the Mormonites, it was thought that they should be built among the Gentiles, which is in direct opposition to the original plan—as foreign from the design of the spirit, expressed in several commandments, as it would have been had the Directors, who were appointed to build the court-house in Ravenna, built it in Trumbull county, foreign from the design of those who intrusted them with the business.

Though their plans had hitherto failed, they were unwilling to abandon the Indian enterprise; and in a commandment it was stated, that Cowdery and others should receive a written recommendation, signed by the Elders, for the purpose of presenting it to the Indian agent, in order to obtain permission to visit the Indians in their settlements.—The recommendation was written according to the commandment, and frequent opportunities occurred in which it might have been presented to the agent, but it never was presented, and of course was useless; he was censured by some for not presenting it, but I suppose the spirit directed him not to do it.

Another method has been invented, in order to remove obstacles which hitherto had proved insurmountable. "The Lord's store-house," is to be furnished with goods suited to the Indian trade, and persons are to obtain license from the government to dispose of them to the Indians in their own territory; at the same time they are to disseminate the principles of Mormonism among them. From this smuggling method of preaching to the Indians, they anticipate a favorable result. In addition to this, and to co-operate with it, it has been made known by revelation, that it will be pleasing to the Lord, should they form a matrimonial alliance with the natives; and by this means the Elders, who comply with the thing so pleasing to the Lord, and for which the Lord has promised to bless those who do it abundantly, gain a residence in the Indian territory, independent of the agent. It has been made known to one, who has left his wife in the State of New York, that he is entirely free from his wife, and he is at pleasure to take him a wife from among the Lamanites. It was easily perceived that this permission was perfectly suited to his desires. I have frequently heard him state that the Lord had made it known to him, that he is as free from his wife as from any other woman; and the only crime I ever heard alleged against her is, she is violently opposed to Mormonism. But before this contemplated marriage can be carried into effect, he must return to the State of New York and settle his business, for fear, should he return after that affair had taken place, the civil authority would apprehend him as a criminal.

It is with pleasure I close this exposition, having in part accomplished, what I intended when I commenced it. The employment has been an unpleasant one to me, and from the first, I should gladly have avoided it, could I have done it, and maintained a conscience void of offence, towards God and man.—But should an individual by this exposition, be extricated or prevented from falling into the delusion, which has been the subject of consideration, I shall be amply compensated, for the painful task which I have performed

Yours affectionately, EZRA BOOTH.

CHAPTER XVI.

We have already given the reader a pretty fair view of this artful imposition, which may be considered all that is requisite to stamp it with infamy, in the estimation of rational minds. The preceding letters alone are amply sufficient to scatter the whole system of deception to the four winds; but we have yet many curious and rare documents in store. A few revelations will be here inserted, as a specimen of the manner in which the Prophet governs and rebukes his dupes. The first will show the means he employed to get over and obviate the contentions among them, on their first visit to Missouri, briefly alluded to by Mr. Booth. In this the cloven foot is very prominent.

“ZION, August 3d, 1831.

“Hearken, O ye Elders of my Church, and give ear to my word, and learn of me what I will concerning you; for verily I say unto you, blessed is he that keepeth my commandments, whether in life or in death; and he that is faithful in tribulation, the reward of the same is greater in the Kingdom. Ye cannot behold with your natural eyes, for the present time, the design of your God concerning those things which shall follow after much tribulation, for after much tribulation cometh the blessing. Wherefore, the day cometh that ye shall be rewarded with much glory—the hour is not yet, but is nigh at hand; remember this, which I told you before, that you may lay it to heart, and receive that which shall follow.

“Behold, verily I say unto you, for this cause have I sent you—that ye might be obedient, and that your hearts might be prepared to bear testimony of the things which are to come, and also that you might be favored of laying the foundation, and bearing record of the land upon which the Zion of God shall stand, and also that a feast of fat things might be prepared for the poor, yea, a feast of fat things, of wine on the lees well refined, that the earth may know that the mouths of the prophets shall not fail; yea, a supper of the house of the Lord, well prepared; unto which all nations shall be invited: firstly, the rich, and the learned, the wise and the noble; and after that cometh the day of my power—then shall the poor, the lame, and the blind, and the deaf, come in unto the marriage of the lamb, prepared for the great day to come; behold, I the Lord hath spoken it, and that the testimony might go forth from Zion, yea, from the mouth of the city of the heritage of God; yea, for this cause I have sent you hither, and I have selected and chosen my servant Edward, and appointed unto him his mission in this land; but if he repent not of his sins, which is unbelief and blindness of heart, let him take heed lest he fall. Behold, his mission is given unto him, and it shall not be given again; and whosoever standeth in that mission is appointed to be a judge in Israel, like as it was in ancient days, to divide the lands of the heritage of God unto his children, and to judge his people by the testimony of the just by the assistance of his counsellors, according to the laws of the kingdom, which were given by the prophets of God; for, verily I say unto you, my laws shall be kept in the land; let no man think that he is ruler, but let God rule, that judgeth according to the council of his own will, or in other words, him that sitteth upon the judgment seat. Let no man break the laws of the land, wherefore, be subject to the powers that be, until he reigns whose right it is to reign and subdue all his enemies under his feet. Behold the laws which ye have recorded from my hand, are the laws of the church—in this light shall ye hold them forth. Behold, here is wisdom, and as I speak concerning my servant Edward, this land is the land of his residence, and those whom he hath appointed for his counsellors, and all the land of the residence of him whom I have appointed to keep my store-house. Wherefore, let them bring their families to this land, as they shall counsel between themselves and me; for, behold it is not meet that I should command in all things, for he that is compelled in all things, is a slothful and not a wise servant; wherefore, he receiveth no reward. Verily I say, men should be anxiously engaged in a good cause, and do many things of their own free will and bring to pass much righteousness, for the power is in them, wherein they are agents unto themselves; and inasmuch as men do good they shall in no wise loose their reward; but he that doeth not any thing until he is commanded, and receiveth a commandment with a doubtful heart, and keepeth it with slothfulness, the same is damned. Who am I that made man, saith the Lord, that will hold him guiltless that obey not my commandments. Who am I, saith the Lord, that have ordained and have not fulfilled. I command, and a man obey not; I revoke, and they receive not the blessing—then they say in their hearts this is not the work of the Lord, for his promises are not fulfilled; but woe unto such, for their reward lurketh beneath and not from above. And now I give unto you further directions concerning this land; it is wisdom in me that my servant Martin, should be an example unto the church, in laying his money before the bishop of the church; and also, this is the law unto every man that cometh into this land to receive an inheritance, and he shall do with his money according as the law directs; and it is wisdom, also, that there should be lands purchased in Independence for the place of the store-house, and also for the house of the printing, and other directions concerning my servant Martin, of the spirit that he may receive his inheritance as seemeth him good—and let him repent of his sins, for he seeketh praise of the world; and also let my servant William stand in the office which I have appointed him, and receive his inheritance in the land; and also he hath need to repent, for I the Lord am not pleased with him, for he seeketh to exult, and he is not sufficiently meek. Behold, he that hath repented of his sins, the same is forgiven, and I the Lord remembereth them no more—by this may ye know if a man repenteth of his sins, behold he will confess them and forsake them; and now, verily I say concerning the residue of the Elders of my church, the time has not yet come for many years, for them to receive their inheritance in this land, except they desire it through prayer only, as it shall be appointed unto them, for behold they shall push the people together from the ends of the earth, wherefore, assemble yourselves together, and he that is not appointed to stay in the land, let them preach the gospel in the regions round about; and after that let them return to their homes. Let them preach by the way, and bear testimony of the truth in all places, and call upon the rich, the high, and the low, and the poor, to repent; and let them build up churches, inasmuch as the inhabitants of the earth will repent; and let there be an agent appointed, by the voice of the church. And I give unto my servant Sidney, a commandment, that he shall write a description of Zion, and a statement of the will of God, as it shall be made known by the spirit unto him; and an epistle and a subscription unto all the churches, to obtain moneys to be put into the hands of the Bishop, to purchase lands for an inheritance for the children of God, of himself or of the agent as seemeth him good, or as he shall direct, for behold the Lord willeth that the disciples and the children of men should open their hearts, even to purchase this whole region of country, as soon as time will permit; behold here is wisdom, lest they receive none inheritance, save by the shedding of blood; and again, inasmuch as there is lands obtained, let there be workmen sent forth, of all kinds, unto this land, to labor for the saints of God: let all of these things be done in order, and let the privilege of the land be made known from time to time by the Bishop or the agent of the church; and let the work of the gathering be not by haste nor by flight, but let it be done as it shall be counselled by the Elders of the church at the conference—according to the knowledge which they shall receive from time to time; and let my servant Sidney consecrate and dedicate this land, and the spot of the temple, unto the Lord; and let a conference meeting be called. And after that, let my servant Sidney and Joseph return, and also my servant Oliver with them, to accomplish the residue of the work which I have appointed unto them in their own land; and the residue as shall be ruled by the conference. And let no man return from this land, except he bear record by the way of that which he knows and most assuredly believes; let that which has been given to Ziba be taken from him, and let him stand as a member in the church, and labor with his hands with the brethren, until he is sufficiently chastened for all his sins, for he confesseth them not ; and he thinketh to hide them. Let the residue of the Elders of this church who are coming to this land, some of whom are exceedingly blessed, also hold a conference upon this land, and let my servant Edward direct the conference which shall be held by them ; and let them also return, preaching the Gospel by the way, bearing record of the things which are revealed unto them, for the sound must go forth from this place into all the world, and unto the uttermost ends of the earth, the gospel must be preached unto every creature, with signs following them that believe, and behold the son of man cometh.—Amen.”

In many of the special revelations, Martin Harris' money has been the ostensible object with the prophet ; he being a willing dupe and an excellent stool-pigeon, by which the fiscal department and designs could be accomplished.

The spiritual eye of the prophet ever kept in view the finances of his devoted followers, and to filch from their pockets he had only to issue a revelation. In the foregoing manifesto, Martin is called upon, in propria persona, to lay his money before the Bishop, merely as an example to all others. In this, the prophet judged correctly ; he well knew the manner in which Martin was associated with him, and the ease with which, through his agency, others could be deceived.

A small volume of these revelations has been published, but has been carefully and studiously kept from the “aliens from the house of Israel,” and only used by the “strong in faith ;” even those of the dupes who dared to think for themselves, have been denied a copy.

A great variety of commandments are delivered orally, on special occasions. And such is the infatuation of the followers of Smith, that every little domestic transaction which he wishes to control, nothing is necessary but a commandment, and the mandate is obeyed. The control of Smith over his simple devotees, is well exhibited in a revelation which secured to his heirs and assigns, the fee simple of one hundred and forty-two acres of valuable land, adjoining their stone temple, in Kirtland; for which the grantor acknowledges the receipt of two thousand two hundred dollars. Two other small lots are also deeded to Smith, as president, and his successor in office. (Query—will he ever appoint a successor?) Sidney Rigdon also has a deed of two small lots of land, for which $550 purports to be the consideration money. Oliver Cowdery being the next important personage, has a deed of but one small lot.—These lands were no doubt honestly acquired, in their way of doing business; but we very much doubt whether these large sums of money were obtained in the ordinary way. Thus it is that these self-made prophets and high priests are acquiring possession of real estate in a rich and flourishing country, while their dupes are packed off to the wilds of Missouri, and compelled to “lay their moneys before the bishop,” and receive an “inheritance” of about 40 acres of land, if they are so fortunate as to have enough to buy it.

ANOTHER REVELATION.

“A word of wisdom for the benefit of the council of high priests assembled in Kirtland, and church; and, also, the saints in Zion: to be sent greeting : not by commandment, or constraint : but by revelation and the word of wisdom : showing forth the order and will of God in the temporal salvation of all saints in the last days. Given for a principle with promise, adapted to the capacity of the weak, and the weakest of all saints, who are or can be called saints.

“Behold, verily thus saith the Lord unto you, in consequence of evils and designs which do, and will exist in the hearts of conspiring men in the last days, I have warned you and forwarn you, by giving unto you this word of wisdom by revelation, that inasmuch as any man drinketh wine or strong drink among you, behold it is not good, neither meet in the sight of your Father, only in assembling yourselves together, to offer up your sacraments before him.— And behold, this should be wine, yea, pure wine of the grape of the vine of your own make.

“And again, strong drinks are not for the belly, but for the washing of your bodies.

“And again, tobacco is not for the body, neither for the belly; and is not good for man; but is an herb for bruises, and all sick cattle, to be used with judgment and skill.

“And again, hot drinks are not for the body, or belly.

“And again, verily I say unto you, all wholesome herbs God hath ordained for the constitution, nature, and use of man. Every herb in the season thereof, and every fruit in the season thereof. All these to be used with prudence and thanksgiving. Yea, flesh also of beasts and of the fowls of the air, I the Lord hath ordained for the use of man, with thanksgiving. Nevertheless, they are to be used sparingly; and it is pleasing unto me, that they should not be used only in time of winter or of cold, or famine. All grain is ordained for the use of man and beasts, to be the staff of life, not only for man, but for the beasts of the field, and the fowls of heaven, and all wild animals that run or creep on the earth: and these hath God made for the use of man only in time of famine, and excess of hunger.

“All grain is good for the food of man, as also the fruit of the vine, that which yieldeth fruit, whether in the ground or above the ground. Nevertheless, wheat for man, and corn for the ox, and oats for the horse, and rye for the fowls, and for swine, and for all bests of the field, and barley for all useful animals, and for mild drinks; as also other grain.

“And all saints who remember to keep and do these sayings, walking in obedience to the commandments, shall receive health in their naval and marrow in their bones; and shall find wisdom and great treasures of knowledge, even hidden treasures; and shall run and not be weary, and shall walk and not faint; and I the Lord give unto them a promise, that the destroying angel shall pass by them, as the children of Israel, and not slay them:—Amen.”

In the above revelation, we are presented with the will of heaven, not by way of commandment, but by the word of wisdom adapted to the weakest of all saints.

If such commands originate in the wisdom of God, let us examine them. The first is, that strong drink is forbid, except as an external application—in this we are inclined measurably to agree with the mandate; but believe there might be reasonable arguments urged in favor of its internal use, under particular circumstances; besides the inspiration of olden time restrained the excessive use and abuse of wine and strong drink, and not its entire abandonment. But like all other modern Mormon inspirations, a little improvement is made to God's former will, as he made it known through his apostles and prophets.

The next command forbids the use of tobacco, but is recommended for all sick cattle as an excellent remedy.—For the first time we are presented with a remedy direct from heaven, but requires human skill to apply it. To this mode of revealing we object, for this reason, that it requires less research to find remedies, than to apply them; therefore, to say that tobacco is a good remedy for sick cattle, and not defining the quantity nor the quality, nor in what sickness, is the summit of folly and ignorance, and none but a religious maniac would give credence to such pretensions.

We are next told that every wholesome herb, God ordained for the use of man!! and we should infer that the writer or the recording angel had been inducted into the modern use of herbs, by the celebrated Doct. F. G. Williams, who is associated with the prophet and the nominal proprietor of a monthly paper, which is issued from the Mormon kennel, in Kirtland. F. G. Williams is a revised quack, well known in this vicinity, by his herbarium on either side of his horse; but whether he claims protection by right of letters patent from the General Government or by communion with spirits from other worlds, we are not authorized to determine, but should conclude he would be adequate to dictate the above mockery at revelation and rigmarole, in relation to food for cattle, &c.

In conclusion, it is revealed to the "weak saints," that if they live without ardent spirits and tobacco, and use all the herbs which are wholesome, (which they are left to guess at,) and feed each kind of domestic animal their appropriate grain, and not feed corn to horses, they shall have health in their navel and marrow in their bones.—Humph. It is likewise promised them that they shall improve in wisdom, and that their muscular powers shall be strengthened—no little consideration for a weak saint.

CHAPTER XVII.]

We next present to the reader a few, among the many depositions which have been obtained from the neighborhood of the Smith family, and the scene where the far famed Gold Bible had its pretended origin.

The divine authenticity of the Gold Bible or the Book of Mormon, is established by three special and eight collateral witnesses, making in the whole eleven, without whom there is no pretension to testimony; and if their testimony is probable and consistent with truth, and unimpeached, according to the common rules of jurisprudence, we are bound to believe them.

Upon the principles of common law, we are prepared to meet them; and they are offered to us in no other light.— Under all circumstances, in civil and ecclesiastical tribunals, witnesses may be impeached, and after a fair hearing, on both sides, the veracity and credibility may be adjudged.

If the eleven witnesses are considered, from what has already been said, unimpeached, we will offer the depositions of some of the most respectable citizens of our country, who solemnly declare upon their oaths that no credit can be given to any one member of the Smith family. Many witnesses declare that they are in the possession of the means of knowing the Smiths for truth and veracity, and that they are not upon a par with mankind in general.— Then, according to the common rules of weighing testimony, the eleven witnesses stand impeached before the public; and until rebutting testimony can be produced which shall go to invalidate the respectable host which are here offered, we claim that no credit can or ought to be given to the witnesses to the Book of Mormon.

We have not only testimony impeaching the moral characters of the Smith family, but we show by the witnesses, that they told contradictory stories, from time to time, in relation to their finding the plates, and other circumstances attending it, which go clearly to show that none of them had the fear of God before their eyes, but were moved and instigated by the devil.

Palmyra, Wayne Co. N. Y. Dec. 2d, 1833.

I, Peter Ingersoll, first became acquainted with the family of Jopesh Smith, Sen. in the year of our Lord, 1822.—I lived in the neighborhood of said family, until about 1830; during which time the following facts came under my observation.

The general employment of the family, was digging for money. I had frequent invitations to join the company, but always declined being one of their number. They used various arguments to induce me to accept of their invitations. I was once ploughing near the house of Joseph Smith, Sen. about noon, he requested me to walk with him a short distance from his house, for the purpose of seeing whether a mineral rod would work in my hand, saying at the same time he was confident it would. As my oxen were eating, and being myself at leisure, I accepted the invitation.—When we arrived near the place at which he thought there was money, he cut a small witch hazle bush and gave me direction how to hold it. He then went off some rods, and told me to say to the rod, “work to the money,” which I did, in an audible voice. He rebuked me severely for speaking it loud, and said it must be spoken in a whisper. This was rare sport for me. While the old man was standing off some rods, throwing himself into various shapes, I told him the rod did not work. He seemed much surprised at this, and said he thought he saw it move in my hand. It was now time for me to return to my labor. On my return, I picked up a small stone and was carelessly tossing it from one hand to the other. Said he, (looking very earnestly) what are you going to do with that stone? Throw it at the birds, I replied. No, said the old man, it is of great worth; and upon this I gave it to him. Now, says he, if you only knew the value there is back of my house, (and pointing to a place near)—there, exclaimed he, is one chest of gold and another of silver. He then put the stone which I had given him, into his hat, and stooping forward, he bowed and made sundry maneuvers, quite similar to those of a stool pigeon. At length he took down his hat, and being very much exhausted, said, in a faint voice, “if you knew what I had seen, you would believe.” To see the old man thus try to impose upon me, I confess, rather had a tendency to excite contempt than pity. Yet I thought it best to conceal my feelings, preferring to appear the dupe of my credulity, than to expose myself to his resentment. His son Alvin then went through with the same performance, which was equally disgusting.

Another time, the said Joseph, Senr. told me that the best time for digging money, was, in the heat of summer, when the heat of the sun caused the chests of money to rise near the top of the ground. You notice, said he, the large stones on the top of the ground—we call them rocks, and they truly appear so, but they are, in fact, most of them chests of money raised by the heat of the sun.

At another time, he told me that the ancient inhabitants of this country used camels instead of horses. For proof of this fact, he stated that in a certain hill on the farm of Mr. Cuyler, there was a cave containing an immense value of gold and silver, stands of arms, also, a saddle for a camel, hanging on a peg at one side of the cave. I asked him, of what kind of wood the peg was. He could not tell, but said it had become similar to stone or iron.

The old man at last laid a plan which he thought would accomplish his design. His cows and mine had been gone for some time, and were not to be found, notwithstanding our diligent search for them. Day after day was spent in fruitless search, until at length he proposed to find them by his art of divination. So he took his stand near the corner of his house, with a small stick in his hand, and made several strange and peculiar motions, and then said he could go directly to the cows. So he started off, and went into the woods about one hundred rods distant and found the lost cows. But on finding out the secret of the mystery, Harrison had found the cows, and drove them to the above named place, and milked them. So that this stratagem turned out rather more to his profit than it did to my edification.—The old man finding that all his efforts to make me a money digger, had proved abortive, at length ceased his importunities. One circumstance, however, I will mention before leaving him. Some time before young Joseph found, or pretended to find, the gold plates, the old man told me that in Canada, there had been a book found, in a hollow tree, that gave an account of the first settlement of this country before it was discovered by Columbus.

In the month of August, 1827, I was hired by Joseph Smith, Jr. to go to Pennsylvania, to move his wife's household furniture up to Manchester, where his wife then was. When we arrived at Mr. Hale's, in Harmony, Pa. from which place he had taken his wife, a scene presented itself, truly affecting. His father-in-law (Mr. Hale) addressed Joseph, in a flood of tears: "You have stolen my daughter and married her. I had much rather have followed her to her grave. You spend your time in digging for money—pretend to see in a stone, and thus try to deceive people." Joseph wept, and acknowledged he could not see in a stone now, nor never could; and that his former pretensions in that respect, were all false. He then promised to give up his old habits of digging for money and looking into stones. Mr. Hale told Joseph, if he would move to Pennsylvania and work for a living, he would assist him in getting into business. Joseph acceded to this proposition. I then returned with Joseph and his wife to Manchester. One circumstance occurred on the road, worthy of notice, and I believe this is the only instance where Jo ever exhibited true yankee wit. On our journey to Pennsylvania, we could not make the exact change at the toll gate near Ithaca. Joseph told the gate tender, that he would "hand" him the toll on his return, as he was coming back in a few days. On our return, Joseph tendered to him 25 cents, the toll being 12½. He did not recognize Smith, so he accordingly gave him back the 12½ cents. After we had passed the gate, I asked him if he did not agree to pay double gatage on our return? No, said he, I agreed to "hand" it to him, and I did, but he handed it back again.

Joseph told me on his return, that he intended to keep the promise which he had made to his father-in-law; but, said he, it will be hard for me, for they will all oppose, as they want me to look in the stone for them to dig money: and in fact it was as he predicted. They urged him, day after day, to resume his old practice of looking in the stone.—He seemed much perplexed as to the course he should pursue. In this dilemma, he made me his confident and told me what daily transpired in the family of Smiths. One day he came, and greeted me with a joyful countenance.—Upon asking the cause of his unusual happiness, he replied in the following language: "As I was passing, yesterday, across the woods, after a heavy shower of rain, I found, in a hollow, some beautiful white sand, that had been washed up by the water. I took off my frock, and tied up several quarts of it, and then went home. On my entering the house, I found the family at the table eating dinner. They were all anxious to know the contents of my frock. At that moment, I happened to think of what I had heard about a history found in Canada, called the golden Bible ; so I very gravely told them it was the golden Bible. To my surprise, they were credulous enough to believe what I said. Accordingly I told them that I had received a commandment to let no one see it, for, says I, no man can see it with the naked eye and live. However, I offered to take out the book and show it to them, but they refuse to see it, and left the room." Now, said Jo, "I have got the damned fools fixed, and will carry out the fun." Notwithstanding, he told me he had no such book, and believed there never was any such book, yet, he told me that he actually went to Willard Chase, to get him to make a chest, in which he might deposit his golden Bible. But, as Chase would not do it, he made a box himself, of clap-boards, and put it into a pillow case, and allowed people only to lift it, and feel of it through the case.

In the fall of 1827, Joseph wanted to go to Pennsylvania. His brother-in-law had come to assist him in moving, but he himself was out of money. He wished to borrow the money of me, and he presented Mr. Hale as security. I told him in case he could obtain assistance from no other source, I would let him have some money. Joseph then went to Palmyra; and, said he, I there met that dam fool, Martin Harris, and told him that I had a command to ask the first honest man I met with, for fifty dollars in money, and he would let me have it. I saw at once, said Jo, that it took his notion, for he promptly gave me the fifty.

Joseph thought this sum was sufficient to bear his expenses to Pennsylvania. So he immediately started off, and since that time I have not been much in his society. While the Smiths were living at Waterloo, William visited my neighborhood, and upon my inquiry how they came on, he replied, "we do better there than here; we were too well known here to do much.

TESTIMONY OF WILLIAM STAFFORD.

Manchester, Ontario Co. N. Y. Dec. 8th, 1833.

I, William Stafford, having been called upon to give a true statement of my knowledge, concerning the character and conduct of the family of Smiths, known to the world as the founders of the Mormon sect, do say, that I first became acquainted with Joseph, Sen., and his family in the year 1820. They lived, at that time, in Palmyra, about one mile and a half from my residence. A great part of their time was devoted to digging for money: especially in the night time, when they said the money could be most easily obtained. I have heard them tell marvellous tales, respecting the discoveries they had made in their peculiar occupation of money digging. They would say, for instance, that in such a place, in such a hill, on a certain man's farm, there were deposited keys, barrels and hogsheads of coined silver and gold—bars of gold, golden images, brass kettles filled with gold and silver—gold candlesticks, swords, &c. &c. They would say, also, that nearly all the hills in this part of New York, were thrown up by human hands, and in them were large caves, which Joseph, Jr., could see, by placing a stone of singular appearance in his hat, in such a manner as to exclude all light; at which time they pretended he could see all things within and under the earth,—that he could see within the above mentioned caves, large gold bars and silver plates—that he could also discover the spirits in whose charge these treasures were, clothed in ancient dress. At certain times, these treasures could be obtained very easily; at others, the obtaining of them was difficult. The facility of approaching them, depended in a great measure on the state of the moon. New moon and good Friday, I believe, were regarded as the most favorable times for obtaining these treasures. These tales I regarded as visionary. However, being prompted by curiosity, I at length accepted of their invitations, to join them in their nocturnal excursions. I will now relate a few incidents attending these excursions.

Joseph Smith, Sen., came to me one night, and told me, that Joseph Jr. had been looking in his glass, and had seen, not many rods from his house, two or three kegs of gold and silver, some feet under the surface of the earth; and that none others but the elder Joseph and myself could get them. I accordingly consented to go, and early in the evening repaired to the place of deposit. Joseph, Sen. first made a circle, twelve or fourteen feet in diameter. This circle, said he, contains the treasure. He then stuck in the ground a row of witch hazel sticks, around the said circle, for the purpose of keeping off the evil spirits. Within this circle he made another, of about eight or ten feet in diameter. He walked around three times on the periphery of this last circle, muttering to himself something which I could not understand. He next stuck a steel rod in the centre of the circles, and then enjoined profound silence upon us, lest we should arouse the evil spirit who had the charge of these treasures. After we had dug a trench about five feet in depth around the rod, the old man by signs and motions, asked leave of absence, and went to the house to inquire of young Joseph the cause of our disappointment. He soon returned and said, that Joseph had remained all this time in the house, looking in his stone and watching the motions of the evil spirit—that he saw the spirit come up to the ring and as soon as it beheld the cone which we had formed around the rod, it caused the money to sink. We then went into the house, and the old man observed, that we had made a mistake in the commencement of the operation; if it had not been for that, said he, we should have got the money.

At another time, they devised a scheme, by which they might satiate their hunger, with the mutton of one of my sheep. They had seen in my flock of sheep, a large, fat, black weather. Old Joseph and one of the boys came to me one day, and said that Joseph Jr. had discovered some very remarkable and valuable treasures, which could be procured only in one way. That way, was as follows:—That a black sheep should be taken on to the ground where the treasures were concealed—that after cutting its throat, it should be led around a circle while bleeding. This being done, the wrath of the evil spirit would be appeased: the treasures could then be obtained, and my share of them was to be four fold. To gratify my curiosity, I let them have a large fat sheep. They afterwards informed me, that the sheep was killed pursuant to commandment; but as there was some mistake in the process, it did not have the desired effect. This, I believe, is the only time they ever made money-digging a profitable business. They, however, had around them constantly a worthless gang, whose employment it was to dig money nights, and who, day times, had more to do with mutton than money.

When they found that the people of this vicinity would no longer put any faith in their schemes for digging money, they then pretended to find a gold bible, of which, they said, the book of Mormon was only an introduction. This latter book was at length fitted for the press. No means were taken by any individual to suppress its publication: No one apprehended any danger from a book, originating with individuals who had neither influence, honesty or honor. The two Josephs and Hiram, promised to show me the plates, after the book of Mormon was translated. But, afterwards, they pretended to have received an express commandment, forbidding them to show the plates. Respecting the manner of receiving and translating the book of Mormon, their statements were always discordant. The elder Joseph would say that he had seen the plates, and that he knew them to be gold; at other times he would say that they looked like gold; and other times he would say he had not seen the plates at all. I have thus briefly stated a few of the facts, in relation to the conduct and character of this family of Smiths; probably sufficient has been stated without my going into detail. WILLIAM STAFFORD.

TESTIMONY OF WILLARD CHASE.

Manchester, Ontario Co. N. Y. 1833.

I became acquainted with the Smith family, known as the authors of the Mormon Bible, in the year 1820. At that time, they were engaged in the money digging business, which they followed until the latter part of the season of 1827. In the year 1822, I was engaged in digging a well. I employed Alvin and Joseph Smith to assist me; the latter of whom is now known as the Mormon prophet. After digging about twenty feet below the surface of the earth, we discovered a singularly appearing stone, which excited my curiosity. I brought it to the top of the well, and as we were examining it, Joseph put it into his hat, and then his face into the top of his hat. It has been said by Smith, that he brought the stone from the well; but this is false. There was no one in the well but myself. The next morning he came to me, and wished to obtain the stone, alledging that he could see in it; but I told him I did not wish to part with it on account of its being a curiosity, but would lend it. After obtaining the stone, he began to publish abroad what wonders he could discover by looking in it, and made so much disturbance among the credulous part of community, that I ordered the stone to be returned to me again. He had it in his possession about two years.— I believe, some time in 1825, Hiram Smith (brother of Joseph Smith) came to me, and wished to borrow the same stone, alledging that they wanted to accomplish some business of importance, which could not very well be done without the aid of the stone. I told him it was of no particular worth to me, but merely wished to keep it as a curiosity, and if he would pledge me his word and honor, that I should have it when called for, he might take it; which he did and took the stone. I thought I could rely on his word at this time, as he had made a profession of religion. But in this I was disappointed, for he disregarded both his word and honor.

In the fall of 1826, a friend called upon me and wished to see that stone, about which so much had been said; and I told him if he would go with me to Smith's, (a distance of about half a mile) he might see it. But to my surprise, on going to Smith's, and asking him for the stone, he said, "you cannot have it;" I told him it belonged to me, repeated to him the promise he made me, at the time of obtaining the stone: upon which he faced me with a malignant look and said, "I don't care who in the Devil it belongs to, you shall not have it."

In the month of June, 1827, Joseph Smith, Sen., related to me the following story: "That some years ago, a spirit had appeared to Joseph his son, in a vision, and informed him that in a certain place there was a record on plates of gold, and that he was the person that must obtain them, and this he must do in the following manner: On the 22d of September, he must repair to the place where was deposited this manuscript, dressed in black clothes, and riding a black horse with a switch tail, and demand the book in a certain name, and after obtaining it, he must go directly away, and neither lay it down nor look behind him. They accordingly fitted out Joseph with a suit of black clothes and borrowed a black horse. He repaired to the place of deposit and demanded the book, which was in a stone box, unsealed, and so near the top of the ground that he could see one end of it, and raising it up, took out the book of gold; but fearing some one might discover where he got it, he laid it down to place back the top stone, as he found it; and turning round, to his surprise there was no book in sight. He again opened the box, and in it saw the book, and attempted to take it out, but was hindered. He saw in the box something like a toad, which soon assumed the appearance of a man, and struck him on the side of his head.—Not being discouraged at trifles, he again stooped down and strove to take the book, when the spirit struck him again, and knocked him three or four rods, and hurt him prodigiously. After recovering from his fright, he enquired why he could not obtain the plates; to which the spirit made reply, because you have not obeyed your orders. He then enquired when he could have them, and was answered thus: come one year from this day, and bring with you your oldest brother, and you shall have them. This spirit, he said was the spirit of the prophet who wrote this book, and who was sent to Joseph Smith, to make known these things to him. Before the expiration of the year, his oldest brother died; which the old man said was an accidental providence!

Joseph went one year from that day, to demand the book, and the spirit enquired for his brother, and he said that he was dead. The spirit then commanded him to come again, in just one year, and bring a man with him. On asking who might be the man, he was answered that he would know him when he saw him.

Joseph believed that one Samuel T. Lawrence was the man alluded to by the spirit, and went with him to a singular looking hill, in Manchester, and shewed him where the treasure was. Lawrence asked him if he had ever discovered any thing with the plates of gold; he said no: he then asked him to look in his stone, to see if there was any thing with them. He looked, and said there was nothing; he told him to look again, and see if there was not a large pair of specks with the plates; he looked and soon saw a pair of spectacles, the same with which Joseph says he translated the Book of Mormon. Lawrence told him it would not be prudent to let these plates be seen for about two years, as it would make a great disturbance in the neighborhood. Not long after this, Joseph altered his mind, and said L. was not the right man, nor had he told him the right place. About this time he went to Harmony in Pennsylvania, and formed an acquaintance with a young lady, by the name of Emma Hale, whom he wished to marry.— In the fall of 1826, he wanted to go to Pennsylvania to be married; but being destitute of means, he now set his wits to work, how he should raise money, and get recommendations, to procure the fair one of his choice. He went to Lawrence with the following story, as related to me by Lawrence himself. That he had discovered in Pennsylvania, on the bank of the Susquehannah River, a very rich mine of silver, and if he would go there with him, he might have a share in the profits; that it was near high water mark and that they could load it into boats and take it down the river to Philadelphia, to market. Lawrence then asked Joseph if he was not deceiving him; no, said he, for I have been there and seen it with my own eyes, and if you do not find it so when we get there, I will bind myself to be your servant for three years. By these grave and fair promises Lawrence was induced to believe something in it, and agreed to go with him. L. soon found that Joseph was out of money, and had to bear his expenses on the way. When they got to Pennsylvania, Joseph wanted L. to recommend him to Miss H., which he did, although he was asked to do it; but could not well get rid of it as he was in his company. L. then wished to see the silver mine, and he and Joseph went to the river, and made search, but found nothing. Thus, Lawrence had his trouble for his pains, and returned home lighter than he went, while Joseph had got his expenses borne, and a recommendation to his girl.

Joseph's next move was to get married; the girl's parents being opposed to the match: as they happened to be from home, he took advantage of the opportunity, and went off with her and was married.

Now, being still destitute of money, he set his wits at work, how he should get back to Manchester, his place of residence; he hit upon the following plan, which succeeded very well. He went to an honest old Dutchman, by the name of Stowel, and told him that he had discovered on the bank of Black River, in the village of Watertown, Jefferson County, N. Y. a cave, in which he had found a bar of gold, as big as his leg, and about three or four feet long.—That he could not get it out alone, on account of its being fast at one end; and if he would move him to Manchester,

N. Y. they would go together, and take a chisel and mallet, and get it, and Stowel should share the prize with him. Stowel moved him.

A short time after their arrival at Manchester, Stowel reminded Joseph of his promise ; but he calmly replied, that he would not go, because his wife was now among strangers, and would be very lonesome if he went away. Mr. Stowel was then obliged to return without any gold, and with less money than he came.

In the fore part of September, (I believe,) 1827, the Prophet requested me to make him a chest, informing me that he designed to move back to Pennsylvania, and expecting soon to get his gold book, he wanted a chest to lock it up, giving me to understand at the same time, that if I would make the chest he would give me a share in the book. I told him my business was such that I could not make it : but if he would bring the book to me, I would lock it up for him. He said that would not do, as he was commanded to keep it two years, without letting it come to the eye of any one but himself. This commandment, however, he did not keep, for in less than two years, twelve men said they had seen it. I told him to get it and convince me of its existence, and I would make him a chest; but he said, that would not do, as he must have a chest to lock the book in, as soon as he took it out of the ground. I saw him a few days after, when he told me that I must make the chest. I told him plainly that I could not, upon which he told me that I could have no share in the book.

A few weeks after this conversation, he came to my house, and related the following story: That on the 22d of September, he arose early in the morning, and took a one horse wagon, of some one that had stayed over night at their house, without leave or license; and, together with his wife, repaired to the hill which contained the book. He left his wife in the wagon, by the road, and went alone to the hill, a distance of thirty or forty rods from the road ; he said he then took the book out of the ground and hid it in a tree top, and returned home. He then went to the town of Macedon to work. After about ten days, it having been suggested that some one had got his book, his wife went after him; he hired a horse, and went home in the afternoon, staid long enough to drink one cup of tea, and then went for his book, found it safe, took off his frock, wrapt it round it, put it under his arm and run all the way home, a distance of about two miles. He said he should think it would weigh sixty pounds, and was sure it would weigh forty. On his return home, he said he was attacked by two men in the woods, and knocked them both down and made his escape, arrived safe and secured his treasure.— He then observed that if it had not been for that stone, (which he acknowledged belonged to me,) he would not have obtained the book. A few days afterwards, he told one of my neighbors that he had not got any such book; nor never had such an one ; but that he had told the story to deceive the d——d fool, (meaning me,) to get him to make a chest. His neighbors having become disgusted with his foolish stories, he determined to go back to Pennsylvania, to avoid what he called persecution. His wits were now put to the task to contrive how he should get money to bear his expenses. He met one day in the streets of Palmyra, a rich man, whose name was Martin Harris, and addressed him thus ; “I have a commandment from God to ask the first man I meet in the street to give me fifty dollars, to assist me in doing the work of the Lord by translating the Golden Bible.” Martin being naturally a credulous man, hands Joseph the money. In the Spring 1829, Harris went to Pennsylvania, and on his return to Palmyra, reported that the Prophet’s wife, in the month of June following would be delivered of a male child that would be able when two years old to translate the Gold Bible. Then, said he, you will see Joseph Smith, Jr. walking through the streets of Palmyra, with a Gold Bible under his arm, and having a gold breast-plate on, and a gold sword hanging by his side. This, however, by the by, proved false.

In April, 1830, I again asked Hiram for the stone which he had borrowed of me; he told me I should not have it, for Joseph made use of it in translating his Bible. I reminded him of his promise, and that he had pledged his honor to return it; but he gave me the lie, saying the stone was not mine nor never was. Harris at the same time flew in a rage, took me by the collar and said I was a liar, and he could prove it by twelve witnesses. After I had extricated myself from him, Hiram, in a rage shook his fist at me, and abused me in a most scandalous manner. Thus I might proceed in describing the character of these High Priests, by relating one transaction after another, which would all tend to set them in the same light in which they were regarded by their neighbors, viz: as a pest to society. I have regarded Joseph Smith Jr. from the time I first became acquainted with him until he left this part of the country, as a man whose word could not be depended upon.—Hiram's character was but very little better. What I have said respecting the characters of these men, will apply to the whole family. What I have stated relative to the characters of these individuals, thus far, is wholly true. After they became thorough Mormons, their conduct was more disgraceful than before. They did not hesitate to abuse any man, no matter how fair his character, provided he did not embrace their creed. Their tongues were continually employed in spreading scandal and abuse. Although they left this part of the country without paying their just debts, yet their creditors were glad to have them do so, rather than to have them stay, disturbing the neighborhood.

Signed,

WILLARD CHASE.

On the 11th December, 1833, the said Willard Chase appeared before me, and made oath that the foregoing statement to which he has subscribed his name, is true, according to his best recollection and belief.

THE TESTIMONY OF PARLEY CHASE.

Manchester, December 2d, 1833.

I was acquainted with the family of Joseph Smith, Sen., both before and since they became Mormons, and feel free to state that not one of the male members of the Smith family were entitled to any credit, whatsoever. They were lazy, intemperate and worthless men, very much addicted to lying. In this they frequently boasted of their skill. Digging for money was their principal employment. In regard to their Gold Bible speculation, they scarcely ever told two stories alike. The Mormon Bible is said to be a revelation from God, through Joseph Smith Jr., his Prophet, and this same Joseph Smith Jr. to my knowledge, bore the reputation among his neighbors of being a liar. The foregoing statement can be corroborated by all his former neighbors.

THE TESTIMONY OF DAVID STAFFORD.

Manchester, December 5th, 1833.

I have been acquainted with the family of Joseph Smith Sen. for several years, and I know him to be a drunkard and a liar, and to be much in the habit of gambling. He and his boys were truly a lazy set of fellows, and more particularly Joseph, who, very aptly followed his father's example, and in some respects was worse. When intoxicated he was very quarrelsome. Previous to his going to Pennsylvania to get married, we worked together making a coal-pit. While at work at one time, a dispute arose between us, (he having dranked a little too freely) and some hard words passed between us, and as usual with him at such times, was for fighting. He got the advantage of me in the scuffle, and a gentleman by the name of Ford interfered, when Joseph turned to fighting him. We both entered a complaint against him and he was fined for the breach of the Peace. It is well known, that the general employment of the Smith family was money digging and fortune-telling. They kept around them constantly, a gang of worthless fellows who dug for money nights, and were idle in the day time. It was a mystery to their neighbors how they got their living. I will mention some circumstances and the public may judge for themselves. At different times I have seen them come from the woods early in the morning, bringing meat which looked like mutton. I went into the woods one morning very early, shooting patridges and found Joseph Smith Sen. in company with two other men, with hoes, shovels and meat that looked like mutton. On seeing me they run like wild men to get out of sight.— Seeing the old man a few day afterwards, I asked him why he run so the other day in the woods; ah, said he, you know that circumstances alter cases; it will not do to be seen at all time.

I can also state, that Oliver Cowdrey proved himself to be a worthless person and not to be trusted or believed when he taught school in this neighborhood. After his going into the ministry, while officiating in performing the ordinance of baptism in a brook, William Smith, (brother of Joseph Smith) seeing a young man writing down what was said on a piece of board, was quite offended and attempted to take it from him, kicked at him and clinched for a scuffle.— Such was the conduct of these pretended Disciples of the Lord.

DAVID STAFFORD.

On the 12th day of December, 1833, the said David Stafford appeared before me, and made oath that the foregoing statement, by him subscribed, is true.

THE TESTIMONY OF BARTON STAFFORD.

Manchester, Ontario Co., N. Y. Nov. 3d, 1833.

Being called upon to give a statement of the character of the family of Joseph Smith, Sen. as far as I know, I can state that I became acquainted with them in 1820, and knew them until 1831, when they left this neighborhood.— Joseph Smith, Sen. was a noted drunkard and most of the family followed his example, and Joseph, Jr. especially, who was very much addicted to intemperance. In short, not one of the family had the least claims to respectability. Even since he professed to be inspired of the Lord to translate the Book of Mormon, he one day while at work in my father's field, got quite drunk on a composition of cider, molasses and water. Finding his legs to refuse their office he leaned upon the fence and hung for sometime ; at length recovering again, he fell to scuffling with one of the workmen, who tore his shirt nearly off from him. His wife who was at our house on a visit, appeared very much grieved at his conduct, and to protect his back from the rays of the sun, and conceal his nakedness, threw her shawl over his shoulders and in that plight escorted the Prophet home. As an evidence of his piety and devotion, when intoxicated, he frequently made his religion the topic of conversation ! !

BARTON STAFFORD.

State of New York, Wayne County, ss :

I certify that on the 9th day of December 1833, personally appeared before me, the above named Barton Stafford, to me known, and solemnly affirmed according to law, to the truth of the above statement and subscribed the same.

THOS. P. BALDWIN,

a Judge of Wayne County Court.

I, Henry Harris, do state that I became acquainted with the family of Joseph Smith, Sen. about the year 1820, in the town of Manchester, N. York. They were a family that labored very little—the chief they did, was to dig for money. Joseph Smith, Jr. the pretended Prophet, used to pretend to tell fortunes ; he had a stone which he used to put in his hat, by means of which he professed to tell people's fortunes.

Joseph Smith, Jr. Martin Harris and others, used to meet together in private, a while before the gold plates were found, and were familiarly known by the name of the "Gold Bible Company." They were regarded by the community in which they lived, as a lying and indolent set of men and no confidence could be placed in them.

The character of Joseph Smith, Jr. for truth and veracity was such, that I would not believe him under oath. I was once on a jury before a Justice's Court and the Jury could not, and did not, believe his testimony to be true. After he pretended to have found the gold plates, I had a conversation with him, and asked him where he found them and how he come to know where they were. He said he had a revelation from God that told him they were hid in a certain hill and he looked in his stone and saw them in the place of deposit ; that an angel appeared, and told him he could not get the plates until he was married, and that when he saw the woman that was to be his wife, he should know her, and she would know him. He then went to Pennsylvania, got his wife, and they both went together and got the gold plates—he said it was revealed to him, that no one must see the plates but himself and wife.

I then asked him what letters were engraved on them, he said italic letters written in an unknown language, and that he had copied some of the words and sent them to Dr. Mitchell and Professor Anthon of New York. By looking on the plates he said he could not understand the words, but it was made known to him that he was the person that must translate them, and on looking through the stone was enabled to translate.

After the Book was published, I frequently bantered him for a copy. He asked fourteen shillings a piece for them ; I told him I would not give so much ; he told me had had a revelation that they must be sold at that price.

Sometime afterwards I talked with Martin Harris about buying one of the Books and he told me they had had a new revelation, that they might be sold at ten shillings a piece.

State of Ohio, Cuyahoga County, ss :

Personally appeared before me, Henry Harris, and made oath in due form of law, that the foregoing statements subscribed by him are true.

JONATHAN LAPHAM,
Justice of the Peace.

Palmyra, Wayne Co. N. Y. 11th mo. 28th, 1833.

In the early part of the winter in 1828, I made a visit to Martin Harris' and was joined in company by Jos. Smith, sen. and his wife. The Gold Bible business, so called, was the topic of conversation, to which I paid particular attention, that I might learn the truth of the whole matter.— They told me that the report that Joseph, jun. had found golden plates, was true, and that he was in Harmony, Pa. translating them—that such plates were in existence, and that Joseph, jun. was to obtain them, was revealed to him by the spirit of one of the Saints that was on this continent, previous to its being discovered by Columbus. Old Mrs. Smith observed that she thought he must be a Quaker, as he was dressed very plain. They said that the plates he then had in possession were but an introduction to the Gold Bible—that all of them upon which the bible was written, were so heavy that it would take four stout men to load them into a cart—that Joseph had also discovered by looking through his stone, the vessel in which the gold was melted from which the plates were made, and also the machine with which they were rolled; he also discovered in the bottom of the vessel three balls of gold, each as large as his fist. The old lady said also, that after the book was translated, the plates were to be publicly exhibited—admittance 25 cents. She calculated it would bring in annually an enormous sum of money—that money would then be very plenty, and the book would also sell for a great price, as it was something entirely new—that they had been commanded to obtain all the money they could borrow for present necessity, and to repay with gold. The remainder was to be kept in store for the benefit of their family and children. This and the like conversation detained me until about 11 o'clock. Early the next morning, the mystery of the Spirit being like myself (one of the order called Friends) was reveal by the following circumstance : The old lady took me into another room, and after closing the door, she said, "have you four or five dollars in money that you can lend until our business is brought to a close ? the spirit has said you shall receive four fold." I told her that when I gave, I did it not expecting to receive again—as for money I had none to lend. I then asked her what her particular want of money was ; to which she replied, "Joseph wants to take the stage and come home from Pennsylvania to see what we are all about." To which I replied, he might look in his stone and save his time and money. The old lady seemed confused, and left the room, and thus ended the visit.

In the second month following, Martin Harris and his wife were at my house. In conversation about Mormon-ites, she observed, that she wished her husband would quit them, as she believed it was all false and a delusion. To which I heard Mr. Harris reply : "What if it is a lie ; if you will let me alone I will make money out of it !" I was both an eye and an ear witness of what has been stated above, which is now fresh in my memory, and I give it to the world for the good of mankind. I speak the truth and lie not, God bearing me witness.

ABIGAIL HARRIS.

Palmyra, Nov. 29, 1833.

Being called upon to give a statement to the world of what I know respecting the Gold Bible speculation, and also of the conduct of Martin Harris, my husband, who is a leading character among the Mormons, I do it free from prejudice, realizing that I must give an account at the bar of God for what I say. Martin Harris was once industrious attentive to his domestic concerns, and thought to be worth about ten thousand dollars. He is naturally quick in his temper and in his mad-fits frequently abuses all who may dare to oppose him in his wishes. However strange it may seem, I have been a great sufferer by his unreasonable conduct. At different times while I lived with him, he has whipped, kicked, and turned me out of the house. About a year previous to the report being raised that Smith had found gold plates, he became very intimate with the Smith family, and said he believed Joseph could see in his stone any thing he wished. After this he apparently became very sanguine in his belief, and frequently said he would have no one in his house that did not believe in Mormonism; and because I would not give credit to the report he made about the gold plates, he became more austere towards me. In one of his fits of rage he struck me with the but end of a whip, which I think had been used for driving oxen, and was about the size of my thumb, and three or four feet long. He beat me on the head four or five times, and the next day turned me out of doors twice, and beat me in a shameful manner.—The next day I went to the town of Marion, and while there my flesh was black and blue in many places. His main complaint against me was, that I was always trying to hinder his making money.

When he found out that I was going to Mr. Putnam's, in Marion, he said he was going too, that they had sent for him to pay them a visit. On arriving at Mr. Putnam's, I asked them if they had sent for Mr. Harris; they replied, they knew nothing about it; he, however, came in the evening. Mrs. Putnam told him never to strike or abuse me any more; he then denied ever striking me; she was however convinced that he lied, as the marks of his beating me were plain to be seen, and remained more than two weeks. Whether the Mormon religion be true or false, I leave the world to judge, for its effects upon Martin Harris have been to make him more cross, turbulent and abusive to me. His whole object was to make money by it. I will give one circumstance in proof of it. One day, while at Peter Harris' house; I told him he had better leave the company of the Smiths, as their religion was false ; to which he replied, if you would let me alone, I could make money by it.

It is in vain for the Mormons to deny these facts ; for they are all well known to most of his former neighbors. The man has now become rather an object of pity ; he has spent most of his property, and lost the confidence of his former friends. If he had labored as hard on his farm as he has to make Mormons, he might now be one of the wealthiest farmers in the country. He now spends his time in travelling through the country spreading the delusion of Mormonism, and has no regard whatever for his family.

With regard to Mr. Harris' being intimate with Mrs. Haggard, as has been reported, it is but justice to myself to state what facts have come within my own observation, to show whether I had any grounds for jealousy or not. Mr. Harris was very intimate with this family, for some time previous to their going to Ohio. They lived a while in a house which he had built for their accommodation, and here he spent the most of his leisure hours ; and made her presents of articles from the store and house. He carried these presents in a private manner, and frequently when he went there, he would pretend to be going to some of the neighbors, on an errand, or to be going into the fields.-- After getting out of sight of the house, he would steer a straight course for Haggard's house, especially if Haggard was from home. At times when Haggard was from home, he would go there in the manner above described, and stay till twelve or one o'clock at night, and sometimes until day light.

If his intentions were evil, the Lord will judge him accordingly, but if good, he did not mean to let his left hand know what his right hand did. The above statement of facts, I affirm to be true.

LUCY HARRIS.

Manchester, Ontario County, Dec. 1st, 1833.

I, Roswell Nichols, first became acquainted with the family of Joseph Smith, Sen. nearly five years ago, and I lived a neighbor to the said family about two years. My acquaintance with the family has enabled me to know something of its character for good citizenship, probity and veracity—For breach of contracts, for the non-payment of debts and borrowed money, and for duplicity with their neighbors, the family was notorious. Once, since the Gold Bible speculation commenced, the old man was sued; and while the sheriff was at his house, he lied to him and was detected in the falsehood. Before he left the house, he confessed that it was sometimes necessary for him to tell an honest lie, in order to live. At another time, he told me that he had received an express command for me to repent and believe as he did, or I must be damned. I refused to comply, and at the same time told him of the various impositions of his family. He then stated their digging was not for money but it was for the obtaining of a Gold Bible. Thus contradicting what he had told me before: for he had often said, that the hills in our neighborhood were nearly all erected by human hands—that they were all full of gold and silver. And one time, when we were talking on the subject, he pointed to a small hill on my farm, and said, “in that hill there is a stone which is full of gold and silver. I know it to be so, for I have been to the hole, and God said unto me, go not in now, but at a future day you shall go in and find the book open, and then you shall have the treasures.” He said that gold and silver was once as plenty as the stones in the field are now—that the ancients, half of them melted the ore and made the gold and silver, while the other half buried it deeper in the earth, which accounted for these hills. Upon my enquiring who furnished the food for the whole, he flew into a passion, and called me a sinner, and said he, "you must be eternally damned."

I mention these facts, not because of their intrinsic importance, but simply to show the weak mindedness and low character of the man.

ROSWELL NICHOLS.

Manchester, Ontario County, Nov. 15th, 1833.

I, Joshua Stafford, became acquainted with the family of Joseph Smith, Sen. about the year 1819 or 20. They then were laboring people, in low circumstances. A short time after this, they commenced digging for hidden treasures, and soon after they became indolent, and told marvellous stories about tghosts, hob-goblins, caverns, and various other mysterious matters. Joseph once showed me a piece of wood which he said he took from a box of money, and the reason he gave for not obtaining the box, was, that it moved. At another time, he, (Joseph, Jr.) at a husking, called on me to become security for a horse, and said he would reward me handsomely, for he had found a box of watches, and they were as large as his fist, and he put one of them to his ear, and he could hear it "tick forty rods." Since he could not dispose of them profitably at Canandaigua or Palmyra, he wished to go east with them. He said if he did not return with the horse, I might take his life. I replied, that he knew I would not do that. Well, said he, I did not suppose you would, yet I would be willing that you should. He was nearly intoxicated at the time of the above conversation.

JOSHUA STAFFORD.

Manchester, Ontario County, Nov. 8th, 1833.

I, Joseph Capron, became acquainted with Joseph Smith, Sen. in the year of our Lord, 1827. They have, since then, been really a peculiar people—fond of the foolish and the marvelous—at one time addicted to vice and the grossest immoralities—at another time making the highest pretensions to piety and holy intercourse with Almighty God. The family of Smiths held Joseph Jr. in high estimation on account of some supernatural power, which he was supposed to possess. This power he pretended to have received through the medium of a stone of peculiar quality. The stone was placed in a hat, in such a manner as to exclude all light, except that which emanated from the stone itself. This light of the stone, he pretended, enabled him to see any thing he wished. Accordingly he discovered ghosts, infernal spirits, mountains of gold and silver, and many other invaluable treasures deposited in the earth. He would often tell his neighbors of his wonderful discoveries, and urge them to embark in the money digging business. Luxury and wealth were to be given to all who would adhere to his counsel. A gang was soon assembled. Some of them were influenced by curiosity, others were sanguine in their expectations of immediate gain. I will mention one circumstance, by which the uninitiated may know how the company dug for treasures. The sapient Joseph discovered, north west of my house, a chest of gold watches; but, as they were in the possession of the evil spirit, it required skill and stratagem to obtain them. Accordingly, orders were given to stick a parcel of large stakes in the ground, several rods around, in a circular form. This was to be done directly over the spot where the treasures were deposited. A messenger was then sent to Palmyra to procure a polished sword: after which, Samuel F. Lawrence, with a drawn sword in his hand, marched around to guard any assault which his Satanic majesty might be disposed to make. Meantime, the rest of the company were busily employed in digging for the watches. They worked as usual till quite exhausted. But, in spite of their brave defender, Lawrence, and their bulwark of stakes, the devil came off victorious, and carried away the watches. I might mention numerous schemes by which this young visionary and impostor had recourse to for the purpose of obtaining a livelihood. He, and indeed the whole of the family of Smiths, were notorious for indolence, foolery and falsehood. Their great object appeared to be, to live without work. While they were digging for money, they were daily harrassed by the demands of creditors, which they never were able to pay. At length, Joseph pretended to find the Gold plates. This scheme, he believed, would relieve the family from all pecuniary embarrassment. His father told me, that when the book was published, they would be enabled, from the profits of the work, to carry into successful operation the money digging business. He gave me no intimation, at that time that the book was to be of a religious character, or that it had any thing to do with revelation. He declared it to be a speculation, and said he, "when it is completed, my family will be placed on a level above the generality of mankind"!!

JOSEPH CAPRON.

Palmyra, Nov. 28th, 1833

Having been called upon to state a few facts which are material to the characters of some of the leaders of the Mormon sect, I will do so in a concise and plain manner. I have been acquainted with Martin Harris, about thirty years. As a farmer, he was industrious and enterprising, so much so, that he had, (previous to his going into the Gold Bible speculation) accumulated, in real estate, some eight or ten thousand dollars. Although he possessed wealth, his moral and religious character was such, as not to entitle him to respect among his neighbors. He was fretful, peevish and quarrelsome, not only in the neighborhood, but in his family. He was known to frequently abuse his wife, by whipping her, kicking her out of bed and turning her out of doors &c. Yet he was a public professor of some religion. He was first an orthodox Quaker, then a Universalist, next a Restorationer, then a Baptist, next a Presbyterian, and then a Mormon. By his willingness to become all things unto all men, he has attained a high standing among his Mormon brethren. The Smith family never made any pretensions to respectability.

G. W. STODARD.

I hereby concur in the above statement.

RICHARD H. FORD.

Palmyra, Dec. 4, 1833.

We, the undersigned, have been acquainted with the Smith family, for a number of years, while they resided near this place, and we have no hesitation in saying, that we consider them destitute of that moral character, which ought to entitle them to the confidence of any community. They were particularly famous for visionary projects, spent much of their time in digging for money which they pretended was hid in the earth; and to this day, large excavations may be seen in the earth, not far from their residence, where they used to spend their time in digging for hidden treasures. Joseph Smith, Senior, and his son Joseph, were in particular, considered entirely destitute of moral character, and addicted to vicious habits:

Martin Harris was a man who had acquired a handsome property, and in matters of business his word was considered good; but on moral and religious subjects, he was perfectly visionary—sometimes advocating one sentiment, and sometimes another. And in reference to all with whom we were acquainted, that have embraced Mormonism from this neighborhood, we are compelled to say, were very visionary, and most of them destitute of moral character, and without influence in this community ; and this may account why they were permitted to go on with their impositions undisturbed. It was not supposed that any of them were possessed of sufficient character or influence to make any one believe their book or their sentiments, and we know not of a single individual in this vicinity that puts the least confidence in their pretended revelations.

We, the undersigned, being personally acquainted with the family of Joseph Smith, sen. with whom the celebrated Gold Bible, so called, originated, state: that they were not only a lazy, indolent set of men, but also intemperate; and their word was not to be depended upon ; and that we are truly glad to dispense with their society.

I first became acquainted with Joseph Smith, Jr. in November, 1825. He was at that time in the employ of a set of men who were called "money diggers;" and his occupation was that of seeing, or pretending to see by means of a stone placed in his hat, and his hat closed over his face. In this way he pretended to discover minerals and hidden treasure. His appearance at this time, was that of a careless young man—not very well educated, and very saucy and insolent to his father. Smith, and his father, with several other 'money-diggers' boarded at my house while they were employed in digging for a mine that they supposed had been opened and worked by the Spaniards, many years since. Young Smith gave the 'money-diggers' great encouragement, at first, but when they had arrived in digging, to near the place where he had stated an immense treasure would be found—he said the enchantment was so powerful that he could not see. They then became discouraged, and soon after dispersed. This took place about the 17th of November, 1825; and one of the company gave me his note for $12 68 for his board, which is still unpaid.

After these occurrences, young Smith made several visits at my house, and at length asked my consent to his marrying my daughter Emma. This I refused, and gave my reasons for so doing; some of which were, that he was a stranger, and followed a business that I could not approve; he then left the place. Not long after this, he returned, and while I was absent from home, carried off my daughter, into the state of New York, where they were married without my approbation or consent. After they had arrived at Palmyra N. Y., Emma wrote to me enquiring whether she could take her property, consisting of clothing, furniture, cows, &c. I replied that her property was safe, and at her disposal. In a short time they returned, bringing with them a Peter Ingersol, and subsequently came to the conclusion that they would move out, and reside upon a place near my residence.

Smith stated to me, that he had given up what he called "glass-looking," and that he expected to work hard for a living, and was willing to do so. He also made arrangements with my son Alva Hale, to go to Palmyra, and move his (Smith's) furniture &c. to this place. He then returned to Palmyra, and soon after, Alva, agreeable to the arrangement, went up and returned with Smith and his family. Soon after this, I was informed they had brought a wonderful book of Plates down with them. I was shown a box in which it is said they were contained, which had to all appearances, been used as a glass box of the common window glass. I was allowed to feel the weight of the box, and they gave me to understand, that the book of plates was then in the box—into which, however, I was not allowed to look.

I inquired of Joseph Smith Jr., who was to be the first who would be allowed to see the Book of Plates? He said it was a young child. After this, I became dissatisfied, and informed him that if there was any thing in my house of that description, which I could not be allowed to see, he must take it away; if he did not, I was determined to see it. After that, the Plates were said to be hid in the woods.

About this time, Martin Harris made his appearance upon the stage; and Smith began to interpret the characters or hieroglyphics which he said were engraven upon the plates, while Harris wrote down the interpretation. It was said, that Harris wrote down one hundred and sixteen pages, and lost them. Soon after this happened, Martin Harris informed me that he must have a greater witness, and said that he had talked with Joseph about it—Joseph informed him that he could not, or durst not show him the plates, but that he (Joseph) would go into the woods where the Book of Plates was, and that after he came back, Harris should follow his track in the snow, and find the Book, and examine it for himself. Harris informed me afterwards, that he followed Smith's directions, and could not find the Plates, and was still dissatisfied.

The next day after this happened, I went to the house where Joseph Smith Jr., lived, and where he and Harris were engaged in their translation of the Book. Each of them had a written piece of paper which they were comparing, and some of the words were "my servant seeketh a greater witness, but no greater witness can be given him." There was also something said about "three that were to see the thing"—meaning I supposed, the Book of Plates, and that "if the three did not go exactly according to the orders, the thing would be taken from them." I enquired whose words they were, and was informed by Joseph or Emma, (I rather think it was the former) that they were the words of Jesus Christ. I told them, that I considered the whole of it a delusion, and advised them to abandon it. The manner in which he pretended to read and interpret, was the same as when he looked for the money-diggers, with the stone in his hat, and his hat over his face, while the Book of Plates were at the same time hid in the woods!

After this, Martin Harris went away, and Oliver Cowdery came and wrote for Smith, while he interpreted as above described. This is the same Oliver Cowdery, whose name may be found in the Book of Mormon. Cowdery continued a scribe for Smith until the Book of Mormon was completed as I supposed and understood.

Joseph Smith Jr. resided near me for some time after this, and I had a good opportunity of becoming acquainted with him, and somewhat acquainted with his associates, and I conscientiously believe from the facts I have detailed, and from many other circumstances, which I do not deem it necessary to relate, that the whole "Book of Mormon" (so called) is a silly fabrication of falsehood and wickedness, got up for speculation, and with a design to dupe the credu-lous and unwary—and in order that its fabricators may live upon the spoils of those who swallow the deception.

We, the subscribers, associate Judges of the Court of Common Pleas, in and for said county, do certify that we have been many years personally acquainted with Isaac Hale, of Harmony township in this county, who has attested the foregoing statement; and that he is a man of excellent moral character, and of undoubted veracity. Witness our hands.

WILLIAM THOMPSON.

DAVIS DIMOCK.

March 21st, 1834.

Elder Lewis also certifies and affirms in relation to Smith as follows :

“I have been acquainted with Joseph Smith Jr. for some time : being a relation of his wife, and residing near him, I have had frequent opportunities of conversation with him, and of knowing his opinions and pursuits. From my standing in the Methodist Episcopal Church, I suppose he was careful how he conducted or expressed himself before me. At one time, however, he came to my house, and asked my advice, whether he should proceed to translate the Book of Plates (referred to by Mr. Hale) or not. He said that God had commanded him to translate it, but he was afraid of the people : he remarked, that he was to exhibit the plates to the world, at a certain time, which was then about eighteen months distant. I told him I was not qualified to give advice in such cases. Smith frequently said to me that I should see the plates at the time appointed.

After the time stipulated, had passed away, Smith being at my house was asked why he did not fulfil his promise, show the Golden Plates and prove himself an honest man? He replied that he, himself was deceived, but that I should see them if I were where they were. I reminded him then, that I stated at the time he made the promise, I was fearful "the enchantment would be so powerful" as to remove the plates, when the time came in which they were to be revealed.

"These circumstances and many others of a similar tenor, embolden me to say that Joseph Smith Jr. is not a man of truth and veracity; and that his general character in this part of the country, is that of an impostor, hypocrite and liar.

NATHANIEL C. LEWIS."

CHARLES DIMON, J. Peace.

We subjoin the substance of several affidavits, all taken and made before Charles Dimon Esq. by credible individuals, who have resided near to, and been well acquainted with Joseph Smith Jr.—illustrative of his character and conduct, while in this region.

Joshua M'Kune states, that he "was acquainted with Joseph Smith Jr. and Martin Harris, during their residence in Harmouy, Pa., and knew them to be artful seducers;" —That they informed him that "Smith had found a sword, breast-plate, and a pair of spectacles, at the time he found the gold plates"—that these were to be shewn to all the world as evidence of the truth of what was contained in those plates," and that "he (M'Kune) and others should see them at a specified time." He also states that "the time for the exhibition of the Plates, &c. has gone by, and he has not seen them." "Joseph Smith, Jr. told him that (Smith's) first-born child was to translate the characters, and hieroglyphics, upon the Plates into our language at the age of three years; but this child was not permitted to live to verify the prediction." He also states, that "he has been intimately acquainted with Isaac Hale twenty-four years, and has always found him to be a man of truth, and good morals."

HEZEKIAH M'KUNE states, that "in conversation with Joseph Smith Jr., he (Smith) said he was nearly equal to Jesus Christ; that he was a prophet sent by God to bring in the Jews, and that he was the greatest prophet that had ever arisen."

ALVA HALE, son of Isaac Hale, states, that Joseph Smith Jr. told him that his (Smith's) gift in seeing with a stone and hat, was a gift from God," but also states "that Smith told him at another time that this "peeping" was all d——d nonsense. He (Smith) was deceived himself but did not intend to deceive others;—that he intended to quit the business, (of peeping) and labor for his livelihood." That afterwards, Smith told him, he should see the Plates from which he translated the book of Mormon," and accordingly at the time specified by Smith, he (Hale) "called to see the plates, but Smith did not show them, but appeared angry." He further states, that he knows Joseph Smith Jr. to be an impostor, and a liar, and knows Martin Harris to be a liar likewise.

LEVI LEWIS states, that he has "been acquainted with Joseph Smith Jr. and Martin Harris, and that he has heard them both say, adultery was no crime. Harris said he did not blame Smith for his (Smith's) attempt to seduce Eliza Winters &c.;"—Mr. Lewis says that he "knows Smith to be a liar;—that he saw him (Smith) intoxicated at three different times while he was composing the Book of Mormon, and also that he has heard Smith when driving oxen, use language of the greatest profanity. Mr. Lewis also testifies that he heard Smith say he (Smith) was as good as Jesus Christ;—that it was as bad to injure him as it was to injure Jesus Christ." "With regard to the plates, Smith said God had deceived him—which was the reason he (Smith) did not show them."

SOPHIA LEWIS, certifies that she "heard a conversation between Joseph Smith Jr., and the Rev. James B. Roach, in which Smith called Mr. R. a d——d fool. Smith also said in the same conversation that he (Smith) was as good as Jesus Christ;" and that she "has frequently heard Smith use profane language. She states that she heard Smith say "the Book of Plates could not be opened under penalty of death by any other person but his (Smith's) first-born, which was to be a male." She says she "was present at the birth of this child, and that it was still-born and very much deformed."

CHAPTER XVIII.

It is asserted in the Mormon Bible, that the engravings upon the plates, were in the "Reformed Egyptian." In conformity to this, the Mormonite preachers, and others of the sect, have frequently declared that the engravings upon the plates were, by some of our learned men, who had a specimen shown them, pronounced to be "reformed Egyptian hieroglyphics," or "ancient short hand Egyptian."—Among others, Professor Anthon, of New York, was frequently mentioned as giving such an opinion. This act of deception and falsehood is only one among hundreds of others, equally gross, which are resorted to by these impostors, to gain proselytes. It being calculated to have considerable weight, when fully believed, we took the liberty to inform Mr. Anthon of the vile use that was made of his name, in this country; and to request of him a statement of the facts respecting it. The following is his reply:

New York, Feb. 17, 1834.

Dear Sir—I received this morning your favor of the 9th instant, and lose no time in making a reply. The whole story about my having pronounced the Mormonite inscription to be “reformed Egyptian hieroglyphics” is perfectly false. Some years ago, a plain, and apparently simple-hearted farmer, called upon me with a note from Dr. Mitchell of our city, now deceased, requesting me to decypher, if possible, a paper, which the farmer would hand me, and which Dr. M. confessed he had been unable to understand. Upon examining the paper in question, I soon came to the conclusion that it was all a trick, perhaps a hoax. When I asked the person, who brought it, how he obtained the writing, he gave me, as far as I can now recollect, the following account: A “gold book,” consisting of a number of plates of gold, fastened together in the shape of a book by wires of the same metal, had been dug up in the northern part of the state of New York, and along with the book an enormous pair of “gold spectacles”! These spectacles were so large, that, if a person attempted to look through them, his two eyes would have to be turned towards one of the glasses merely, the spectacles in question being altogether too large for the breadth of the human face. Whoever examined the plates through the spectacles, was enabled not only to read them, but fully to understand their meaning. All this knowledge, however, was confined at that time to a young man, who had the trunk containing the book and spectacles in his sole possession. This young man was placed behind a curtain, in the garret of a farm house, and, being thus concealed from view, put on the spectacles occasionally, or rather, looked through one of the glasses, decyphered the characters in the book, and, having committed some of them to paper, handed copies from behind the curtain, to those who stood on the outside. Not a word, however, was said about the plates having been decyphered "by the gift of God." Every thing, in this way, was effected by the large pair of spectacles. The farmer added, that he had been requested to contribute a sum of money towards the publication of the "golden book," the contents of which would, as he had been assured, produce an entire change in the world and save it from ruin. So urgent had been these solicitations, that he intended selling his farm and handing over the amount received to those who wished to publish the plates. As a last precautionary step, however, he had resolved to come to New York, and obtain the opinion of the learned about the meaning of the paper which he brought with him, and which had been given him as a part of the contents of the book, although no translation had been furnished at the time by the young man with the spectacles. On hearing this odd story, I changed my opinion about the paper, and, instead of viewing it any longer as a hoax upon the learned, I began to regard it as part of a scheme to cheat the farmer of his money, and I communicated my suspicions to him, warning him to beware of rogues. He requested an opinion from me in writing, which of course I declined giving, and he then took his leave carrying the paper with him. This paper was in fact a singular scrawl. It consisted of all kinds of crooked characters disposed in columns, and had evidently been prepared by some person who had before him at the time a book containing various alphabets. Greek and Hebrew letters, crosses and flourishes, Roman letters inverted or placed sideways, were arranged in perpendicular columns, and the whole ended in a rude delineation of a circle divided into various compartments, decked with various strange marks, and evidently copied after the Mexican Calender given by Humboldt, but copied in such a way as not to betray the source whence it was derived. I am thus particular as to the contents of the paper, inasmuch as I have frequently conversed with my friends on the subject, since the Mormonite excitement began, and well remember that the paper contained any thing else but "Egyptian Hieroglyphics." Some time after, the same farmer paid me a second visit. He brought with him the golden book in print, and offered it to me for sale. I declined purchasing. He then asked permission to leave the book with me for examination. I declined receiving it, although his manner was strangely urgent. I adverted once more to the roguery which had been in my opinion practised upon him, and asked him what had become of the gold plates. He informed me that they were in a trunk with the large pair of spectacles. I advised him to go to a magistrate and have the trunk examined. He said the "curse of God" would come upon him should he do this. On my pressing him, however, to pursue the course which I had recommended, he told me that he would open the trunk, if I would take the "curse of God" upon myself. I replied that I would do so with the greatest willingness, and would incur every risk of that nature, provided I could only extricate him from the grasp of rogues. He then left me.

I have thus given you a full statement of all that I know respecting the origin of Mormonism, and must beg you, as a personal favor, to publish this letter immediately, should you find my name mentioned again by these wretched fanatics. Yours respectfully,

CHAS. ANTHON.

E. D. Howe, Esq. Painesville, Ohio.

That the impostors made the declarations respecting Professor Anthon, they will undoubtedly deny, as this is their uniform practice, after being fully convinced of any act which militates against them; but in this case it will be in vain. The following letter from Wm. W. Phelps, a very important personage among them, (who was for a time denominated the Lord's printer) in answer to some enquiries touching the origin of Mormonism, will show what was taught him while a pupil under Smith and Rigdon, and that the story about Mr. Anthon's declarations, was one upon which they placed great reliance. We give the letter in full, for the purpose of further comments:

Canandaigua, Jan. 15, 1831.

Dear Sir—Yours of the 11th, is before me, but to give you a satisfactory answer, is out of my power. To be sure, I am acquainted with a number of the persons concerned in the publication, called the "Book of Mormon."—Joseph Smith is a person of very limited abilities in common learning—but his knowledge of divine things, since the appearance of his book, has astonished many. Mr. Harris, whose name is in the book, is a wealthy farmer, but of small literary acquirements; he is honest, and sincerely declares upon his soul's salvation that the book is true, and was interpreted by Joseph Smith, through a pair of silver spectacles, found with the plates. The places where they dug for the plates, in Manchester, are to be seen. When the plates were said to have been found, a copy of one or two lines of the characters, were taken by Mr. Harris to Utica, Albany and New York; at New York, they were shown to Dr. Mitchell, and he referred to professor Anthon who translated and declared them to be the ancient shorthand Egyptian. So much is true. The family of Smiths is poor, and generally ignorant in common learning.

I have read the book, and many others have, but we have nothing by which we can positively detect it as an imposition, nor have we any thing more than what I have stated and the book itself, to show its genuineness. We doubt—supposing, if it is false, it will fall, and if of God, God will sustain it.

I had ten hours discourse with a man from your state, named Sidney Rigdon, a convert to its doctrines, and he declared it was true, and he knew it by the power of the Holy Ghost, which was again given to man in preparation for the millennium : he appeared to be a man of talents, and sincere in his profession. Should any new light be shed on the subject, I will apprise you. Respectfully,

E. D. HOWE, Esq.

W. W. PHELPS.

The author of the above letter is, perhaps, deserving of a little more notice. Before the rise of Mormonism, he was an avowed infidel; having a remarkable propensity for fame and eminence, he was supercilious, haughty and egotistical. His great ambition was to embark in some speculation where he could shine pre-eminent. He took an active part for several years in the political contests of New York, and made no little display as an editor of a partizan newspaper, and after being foiled in his desires to become a candidate for Lt. Governor of that state, his attention was suddenly diverted by the prospects which were held out to him in the Gold Bible speculation. In this he was sure of becoming a great man, and made the dupes believe he was master of fourteen different languages, of which they frequently boasted. But he soon found that the prophet would suffer no growing rivalships, whose sagacity he had not well calculated, until he was met by a revelation, which informed him that he could rise no higher than a printer: "Let my servant William stand in the office which I have appointed him, and receive his inheritance in the land, and also he hath need to repent, for I the Lord [Jo] am not pleased with him, for he seeketh to exult." It will be noticed by the foregoing letter, that he had already made up his mind to embrace Mormonism, but still wished to conceal his intentions. It was not till about six months after that he had made definite arrangements to join them; by first fully understanding what his business was to be. After being created an Elder and Lord's printer, he repaired to Missouri with the squad that first went out, and on his return called on us to "acknowledge his gratitude," as he expressed it, for first directing his attention to Mormonism, saying that he knew nothing about it, till the receipt of our letter—that he then commenced an investigation of the subject, "and found it to be true"! stating that he had made great sacrifices, and abandoned a business worth $2500 a year. We mention these things to show the hypocrisy of the man.

His letter it will be seen is dated the 15th Jan. in answer to ours of the 11th, only four days intervening. During these four days, then, our letter must have travelled over 300 miles, he talked with Rigdon ten hours, examined the holes where Smith had dug for money, and obtained all the other information which he communicates. Besides it is a well known fact that, notwithstanding his large income, he had been thrown into jail on a small debt, and offered to sell out his printing establishment for one hundred and fifty dollars. For his honesty, however, the prophet has left him to till the soil in Missouri, while the business of printing has been transferred to Kirtland, Ohio, and placed under the direction of O. Cowdery.

REMARKABLE EVENTS—THE CUT.

The reader will already have observed, that a great variety of contradictory stories were related by the Smith family, before they had any fixed plan of operation, respecting the finding of the plates, from which their book was translated. One is, that after the plates were taken from their hiding place by Jo, he again laid them down, looked into the hole, where he saw a toad, which immediately transformed itself into a spirit, and gave him a tremendous blow. Another is, that after he had got the plates, a spirit assaulted him with the intention of getting them from his possession, and actually jerked them out of his hands—Jo, nothing daunted, in return seized them again, and started to run, when his Satanic Majesty, (or the spirit) applied his foot to the prophet's seat of honor, which raised him three or four feet from the ground. This being the opening scene of Mormonism, we have represented the wonderful event in our frontispiece. That the prophet has related a story of this kind, to some of his "weak saints," we have no manner of doubt.

Here, then, is the finding of the plates, containing a new revelation from Heaven; and the modus operandi may seem to the Mormon, truly wonderful, and in character with that Being who upholds and sustains the Universe; but to the rational mind it can excite no other emotion than contempt for his species.

One scene in the drama of disposing of the plates, we have also placed upon the same cut—being two of the most important events in the history of Mormonism. The latter story was related by Lemon Copley, (who had been an elder of the society, and was at the time for aught that appeared) under oath, before two magistrates, of Painesville Township, on a trial where the prophet had sworn the peace against one of his seceding brethren.

Mr. Copley testified, that after the Mormon brethren arrived here from the Susquehannah, one of them, by the name of Joseph Knight, related to him a story as having been related to him by Joseph Smith, Jun. which excited some curiosity in his mind, he determined to ask Joseph more particularly about it, on the first opportunity. Not long after it was confirmed to him by Joseph himself, who again related it in the following manner : "After he had finished translating the Book of Mormon, he again buried up the plates in the side of a mountain, by command of the Lord; some time after this, he was going through a piece of woods, on a by-path, when he discovered an old man dressed in ordinary gray apparel, sitting upon a log, having in his hand or near by, a small box. On approaching him, he asked him what he had in his box. To which the old man replied, that he had a MONKEY, and for five coppers he might see it. Joseph answered, that he would not give a cent to see a monkey, for he had seen a hundred of them. He then asked the old man where he was going, who said he was going to Charzee. Joseph then passed on, and not recollecting any such place in that part of the country, began to ponder over the strange interview, and finally asked the Lord the meaning of it. The Lord told him that the man he saw was MORONI, with the plates, and if he had given him the five coppers, he might have got his plates again."

Here we have a story related by our modern prophet, to his followers, for no other purpose, as we conceive, but to make his pretensions more "marvelous in their eyes." A celebrated Mormon prophet, of ancient times, and one of modern date, have an interview in the woods, and hold a conversation about a MONKEY; one prophet of the Lord relating a falsehood to another!!!

CHAPTER XIX.

WE proposed in the commencement of this work, to give to the world all the light, of which we were in possession, as to the real and original author or authors of the Book of Mormon. That there has been, from the beginning of the imposture, a more talented knave behind the curtain, is evident to our mind, at least ; but whether he will ever be clearly, fully and positively unveiled and brought into open day-light, may of course he doubted. For no person of common prudence and understanding, it may well be presumed, would ever undertake such a speculation upon human credulity, without closing and well securing every door and avenue to a discovery, step by step, as he proceeded. Hence, our investigations upon the subject have necessarily been more limited than was desirable. At the same time, we think that facts and data have been elicited, sufficient at least to raise a strong presumption that the leading features of the "Gold Bible" were first conceived and concocted by one SOLOMON SPALDING, while a resident of Conneaut, Ashtabula county, Ohio. It is admitted by our soundest jurists, that a train of circumstances may often lead the mind to a more satisfactory and unerring conclusion, than positive testimony, unsupported by circumstantial evidence—for the plain reason, that the one species of testimony is more prone to falsehood than the other. But we proceed with our testimony.

The first witness is Mr. John Spalding, a brother of Solomon, now a resident of Crawford county, Pa. who says :

"Solomon Spalding was born in Ashford, Conn. in 1761, and in early life contracted a taste for literary pursuits. After he left school, he entered Plainfield Academy, where he made great proficiency in study, and excelled most of his class-mates. He next commenced the study of Law, in Windham county, in which he made little progress, having in the mean time turned his attention to religious subjects. He soon after entered Dartmouth College, with the intention of qualifying himself for the ministry, where he obtained the degree of A. M. and was afterwards regularly ordained. After preaching three or four years, he gave it up, removed to Cherry Valley, N. Y., and commenced the mercantile business in company with his brother Josiah.— In a few years he failed in business, and in the year 1809 removed to Conneaut, in Ohio. The year following, I removed to Ohio, and found him engaged in building a forge. I made him a visit in about three years after; and found that he had failed, and considerably involved in debt. He then told me had he been writing a book, which he intended to have printed, the avails of which he thought would enable him to pay all his debts. The book was entitled the “Manuscript Found,” of which he read to me many passages.— It was an historical romance of the first settlers of America, endeavoring to show that the American Indians are the descendants of the Jews, or the lost tribes. It gave a detailed account of their journey from Jerusalem, by land and sea, till they arrived in America, under the command of NEPHI and LEHI. They afterwards had quarrels and contentions, and separated into two distinct nations, one of which he denominated Nephites and the other Lamanites. Cruel and bloody wars ensued, in which great multitudes were slain. They buried their dead in large heaps, which caused the mounds so common in this country. Their arts, sciences and civilization were brought into view, in order to account for all the curious antiquities, found in various parts of North and South America. I have recently read the Book of Mormon, and to my great surprize I find nearly the same historical matter, names, &c. as they were in my brother's writings. I well remember that he wrote in the old style, and commenced about every sentence with "and it came to pass," or "now it came to pass," the same as in the Book of Mormon, and according to the best of my recollection and belief, it is the same as my brother Solomon wrote, with the exception of the religious matter.—By what means it has fallen into the hands of Joseph Smith, Jr. I am unable to determine. JOHN SPALDING."

Martha Spalding, the wife of John Spalding, says:—

"I was personally acquainted with Solomon Spalding, about twenty years ago. I was at his house a short time before he left Conneaut; he was then writing a historical novel founded upon the first settlers of America. He represented them as an enlightened and warlike people. He had for many years contended that the aborigines of America were the descendants of some of the lost tribes of Israel, and this idea he carried out in the book in question.—The lapse of time which has intervened, prevents my recollecting but few of the leading incidents of his writings; but the names of Nephi and Lehi are yet fresh in my memory, as being the principal heroes of his tale. They were officers of the company which first came off from Jerusalem. He gave a particular account of their journey by land and sea, till they arrived in America, after which, disputes arose between the chiefs, which caused them to separate into different lands, one of which was called Lamanites and the other Nephites. Between these were recounted tremendous battles, which frequently covered the ground with the slain; and their being buried in large heaps was the cause of the numerous mounds in the country.—Some of these people he represented as being very large.

I have read the Book of Mormon, which has brought fresh to my recollection the writings of Solomon Spalding; and I have no manner of doubt that the historical part of it, is the same that I read and heard read, more than 20 years ago. The old, obsolete style, and the phrases of "and it came to pass," &c. are the same.

MARTHA SPALDING."

We would here remark by the way, that it would appear that Sol. Spalding, like many other authors, was somewhat vain of his writing, and was constantly showing and reading them to his neighbors. In this way most of his intimate acquaintances became conversant at that time with his writings and designs. We might therefore introduce a great number of witnesses all testifying to the same general facts; but we have not taken the trouble to procure the statements of but few, all of whom are the most respectable men, and highly esteemed for their moral worth, and their characters for truth and veracity, are unimpeachable. In fact, the word of any one of them, would have more weight in any respectable community, than the whole family of Smiths and Whitmers, who have told about hearing the voice of an angel.

Conneaut, Ashtabula Co. O. September, 1833.

I left the state of New York, late in the year 1810, and arrived at this place, about the 1st of Jan. following. Soon after my arrival, I formed a co-partnership with Solomon Spalding, for the purpose of re-building a forge which he had commenced a year or two before. He very frequently read to me from a manuscript which he was writing, which he entitled the "Manuscript Found," and which he represented as being found in this town. I spent many hours in hearing him read said writings, and became well acquainted with its contents. He wished me to assist him in getting his production printed, alleging that a book of that kind would meet with a rapid sale. I designed doing so, but the forge not meeting our anticipations, we failed in business, when I declined having any thing to do with the publication of the book. This book represented the American Indians as the descendants of the lost tribes, gave an account of their leaving Jerusalem, their contentions and wars, which were many and great. One time, when he was reading to me the tragic account of Laban, I pointed out to him what I considered an inconsistency, which he promised to correct; but by referring to the Book of Mormon, I find to my surprise that it stands there just as he read it to me then.—Some months ago I borrowed the Golden Bible, put it into my pocket, carried it home, and thought no more of it.—About a week after, my wife found the book in my coat pocket, as it hung up, and commenced reading it aloud as I lay upon the bed. She had not read 20 minutes till I was astonished to find the same passages in it that Spalding had read to me more than twenty years before, from his “Manuscript Found.” Since that, I have more fully examined the said Golden Bible, and have no hesitation in saying that the historical part of it is principally, if not wholly taken from the “Manuscript Found.” I well recollect telling Mr. Spalding, that the so frequent use of the words “And it came to pass,” “Now it came to pass,” rendered it ridiculous. Spalding left here in 1812, and I furnished him the means to carry him to Pittsburgh, where he said he would get the book printed, and pay me. But I never heard any more from him or his writings, till I saw them in the Book of Mormon.

HENRY LAKE.

Springfield, Pa. September, 1833.

In the year 1811, I was in the employ of Henry Lake and Solomon Spalding, at Conneaut, engaged in rebuilding a forge. While there, I boarded and lodged in the family of said Spalding, for several months. I was soon introduced to the manuscript of Spalding, and perused them as often as I had leisure. He had written two or three books or pamphlets on different subjects; but that which more particularly drew my attention, was one which he called the "Manuscript Found." From this he would frequently read some humorous passages to the company present. It purported to be the history of the first settlement of America, before discovered by Columbus. He brought them off from Jerusalem, under their leaders; detailing their travels by land and water, their manners, customs, laws, wars, &c. He said that he designed it as a historical novel, and that in after years it would be believed by many people as much as the history of England. He soon after failed in business, and told me he should retire from the din of his creditors, finish his book and have it published, which would enable him to pay his debts and support his family. He soon after removed to Pittsburgh, as I understood.

I have recently examined the Book of Mormon, and find in it the writings of Solomon Spalding, from beginning to end, but mixed up with scripture and other religious matter, which I did not meet with in the "Manuscript Found." Many of the passages in the Mormon Book are verbatim from Spalding, and others in part. The names of Nephi, Lehi, Moroni, and in fact all the principal names, are bro't fresh to my recollection, by the Gold Bible. When Spalding divested his history of its fabulous names, by a verbal explanation, he landed his people near the Straits of Darien, which I am very confident he called Zarahemla, they were marched about that country for a length of time, in which wars and great blood shed ensued, he brought them across North America in a north east direction.

JOHN N. MILLER.

Conneaut, August, 1833.

I first became acquainted with Solomon Spalding in 1808 or 9, when he commenced building a forge on Conneaut creek. When at his house, one day, he showed and read to me a history he was writing, of the lost tribes of Israel, purporting that they were the first settlers of America, and that the Indians were their decendants. Upon this subject we had frequent conversations. He traced their journey from Jerusalem to America, as it is given in the Book of Mormon, excepting the religious matter. The historical part of the Book of Mormon, I know to be the same as I read and heard read from the writings of Spalding, more than twenty years ago; the names more especially are the same without any alteration. He told me his object was to account for all the fortifications, &c. to be found in this country, and said that in time it would be fully believed by all, except learned men and historians. I once anticipated reading his writings in print, but little expected to see them in a new Bible. Spalding had many other manuscripts, which I expect to see when Smith translates his other plate. In conclusion, I will observe, that the names of, and most of the historical part of the Book of Mormon, were as familiar to me before I read it, as most modern history. If it is not Spalding's writing, it is the same as he wrote; and if Smith was inspired, I think it was by the same spirit that Spalding was, which he confessed to be the love of money.

AARON WRIGHT.

Conneaut, August, 1833.

When Solomon Spalding first came to this place, he purchased a tract of land, surveyed it out and commenced selling it. While engaged in this business, he boarded at my house, in all nearly six months. All his leisure hours were occupied in writing a historical novel, founded upon the first settlers of this country. He said he intended to trace their journey from Jerusalem, by land and sea, till their arrival in America, give an account of their arts, sciences, civilization, wars and contentions. In this way, he would give a satisfactory account of all of the old mounds, so common to this country. During the time he was at my house, I read and heard read one hundred pages or more. Nephi and Lehi were by him represented as leading characters, when they first started for America. Their main object was to escape the judgments which they supposed were coming upon the old world. But no religious matter was introduced, as I now recollect. Just before he left this place, Spalding sent for me to call on him, which I did.—He then said, that although he was in my debt, he intended to leave the country, and hoped I would not prevent him, for, says he, you know I have been writing the history of the first settlement of America, and I intend to go to Pittsburgh, and there live a retired life, till I have completed the work, and when it is printed, it will bring me a fine sum of money, which will enable me to return and pay off all my debts—the book, you know will sell, as every one is anxious to learn something upon that subject. This was the last I heard of Spalding or his book, until the Book of Mormon came into the neighborhood. When I heard the historical part of it related, I at once said it was the writings of old Solomon Spalding. Soon after, I obtained the book, and on reading it, found much of it the same as Spalding had written, more than twenty years before.

OLIVER SMITH.

Conneaut, August, 1833.

I first became acquainted with Solomon Spalding, in Dec. 1810. After that time I frequently saw him at his house, and also at my house. I once in conversation with him expressed a surprise at not having any account of the inhabitants once in this country, who erected the old forts, mounds, &c. He then told me that he was writing a history of that race of people; and afterwards frequently showed me his writings, which I read. I have lately read the Book of Mormon, and believe it to be the same as Spalding wrote, except the religious part. He told me that he intended to get his writings published in Pittsburgh, and he thought that in one century from that time, it would be believed as much as any other history.

NAHUM HOWARD.

Artemas Cunningham, of Perry, Geauga county, states as follows:

“In the month of October, 1811, I went from the township of Madison to Conneaut, for the purpose of securing a debt due me from Solomon Spalding. I tarried with him nearly two days, for the purpose of accomplishing my object, which I was finally unable to do. I found him destitute of the means of paying his debts. His only hope of ever paying his debts, appeared to be upon the sale of a book, which he had been writing. He endeavored to convince me from the nature and character of the work, that it would meet with a ready sale. Before showing me his manuscripts, he went into a verbal relation of its outlines, saying that it was a fabulous or romantic history of the first settlement of this country, and as it purported to have been a record found buried in the earth, or in a cave, he had adopted the ancient or scripture style of writing. He then presented his manuscripts, when we sat down and spent a good share of the night, in reading them, and conversing upon them. I well remember the name of Nephi, which appeared to be the principal hero of the story. The frequent repetition of the phrase, “I Nephi,” I recollect as distinctly as though it was but yesterday, although the general features of the story have passed from my memory, through the lapse of 22 years. He attempted to account for the numerous antiquities which are found upon this continent, and remarked that, after this generation had passed away, his account of the first inhabitants of America would be considered as authentic as any other history. The Mormon Bible I have partially examined, and am fully of the opinion that Solomon Spalding had written its outlines before he left Conneaut."

Statements of the same import, might be multiplied to an indefinite length; but we deem it unnecessary. We are here willing to rest the question, in the hands of any intelligent jury, with a certainty that their verdict would be, that Solomon Spalding first wrote the leading incidents of the Book of Mormon, instead of its being found by the Smith family, while digging for gold, and its contents afterwards made known by the Supreme Being.

But our enquiries did not terminate here. Our next object was to ascertain, if possible, the disposition Spalding made of his manuscripts. For this purpose, a messenger was despatched to look up the widow of Spalding, who was found residing in Massachusetts. From her we learned that Spalding resided in Pittsburgh, about two years, when he removed to the township of Amity, Washington Co. Pa. where he lived about two years, and died in 1816. His widow then removed to Onondaga county, N. Y., married again, and lived in Otsego county; and subsequently removed to Massachusetts. She states that Spalding had a great variety of manuscripts, and recollects that one was entitled the "Manuscript Found," but of its contents she has now no distinct knowledge. While they lived in Pittsburgh, she thinks it was once taken to the printing office of Patterson & Lambdin; but whether it was ever brought back to the house again, she is quite uncertain : if it was, however, it was then with his other writings, in a trunk which she had left in Otsego county, N. Y. This is all the information that could be obtained from her, except that Mr. Spalding, while living, entertained a strong antipathy to the Masonic Institution, which may account for its being so frequently mentioned in the Book of Mormon. The fact also, that Spalding, in the latter part of his life, inclined to infidelity, is established by a letter in his hand-writing, now in our possession.

The trunk referred to by the widow, was subsequently examined, and found to contain only a single M. S. book, in Spalding's hand-writing, containing about one quire of paper. This is a romance, purporting to have been translated from the Latin, found on 24 rolls of parchment in a cave, on the banks of Conneaut Creek, but written in modern style, and giving a fabulous account of a ship's being driven upon the American coast, while proceeding from Rome to Britain, a short time previous to the Christian era, this country then being inhabited by the Indians. This old M. S. has been shown to several of the foregoing witnesses, who recognise it as Spalding's, he having told them that he had altered his first plan of writing, by going farther back with dates, and writing in the old scripture style, in order that it might appear more ancient. They say that it bears no resemblance to the "Manuscript Found."

Here, then, our enquiries after facts partially cease, on this subject. We have fully shown that the Book of Mormon is the joint production of Solomon Spalding and some other designing knave, or if it is what it purports to be, the Lord God has graciously condescended, in revealing to Smith his will, through spectacles, to place before him and appropriate to his own use, the writings and names of men which had been invented by a person long before in the grave. Having established the fact, therefore, that most of the names and leading incidents contained in the Mormon bible, originated with Solomon Spalding, it is not very material, as we conceive, to show the way and manner by which they fell into the hands of the Smith family. To do this, however, we have made some enquiries.

It was inferred at once that some light might be shed upon this subject, and the mystery revealed, by applying to Patterson & Lambdin, in Pittsburgh. But here again death had interposed a barrier. That establishment was dissolved and broken up many years since, and Lambdin died about eight years ago. Mr. Patterson says he has no recollection of any such manuscript being brought there for publication, neither would he have been likely to have seen it, as the business of printing was conducted wholly by Lambdin at that time. He says, however, that many M. S. books and pamphlets were brought to the office about that time, which remained upon their shelves for years, without being printed or even examined. Now, as Spalding's book can no where be found, or any thing heard of it after being carried to this establishment, there is the strongest presumption that it remained there in seclusion, till about the year 1823, or '24, at which time Sidney Rigdon located himself in that city. We have been credibly informed that he was on terms of intimacy with Lambdin, being seen frequently in his shop. Rigdon resided in Pittsburgh about three years, and during the whole of that time, as he has since frequently asserted, abandoned preaching and all other employment, for the purpose of studying the bible. He left there and came into the county where he now resides, about the time Lambdin died, and commenced preaching some new points of doctrine, which were afterwards found to be inculcated in the Mormon Bible. He resided in this vicinity about four years previous to the appearance of the book, during which time he made several long visits to Pittsburgh, and perhaps to the Susquehannah, where Smith was then digging for money, or pretending to be transiating plates. It may be observed also, that about the time Rigdon left Pittsburgh, the Smith family began to tell about finding a book that would contain a history of the first inhabitants of America, and that two years elapsed before they finally got possession of it.

We are, then, irresistibly led to this conclusion :—that Lambdin, after having failed in business, had recourse to the old manuscripts then in his possession, in order to raise the wind, by a book speculation, and placed the “Manuscript Found,” of Spalding, in the hands of Rigdon, to be embellished, altered, and added to, as he might think expedient ; and three years’ study of the bible we should deem little time enough to garble it, as it is transferred to the Mormon book. The former dying, left the latter the sole proprietor, who was obliged to resort to his wits, and in a miraculous way to bring it before the world ; for in no other manner could such a book be published without great sacrifice. And where could a more suitable character be found than Jo Smith, whose necromantic fame and arts of deception, had already extended to a considerable distance? That Lambdin was a person every way qualified and fitted for such an enterprise, we have the testimony of his partner in business, and others of his acquaintance. Add to all these circumstances, the facts, that Rigdon had prepared the minds in a great measure, of nearly a hundred of those who had attended his ministration to be in readiness to embrace the first mysterious ism that should be presented—the appearance of Cowdery at his residence as soon as the Book was printed—his sudden conversion, after many pretensions to disbelieve it—his immediately repairing to the residence of Smith, 300 miles distant, where he was forthwith appointed an elder, high priest, and a scribe to the prophet—the pretended vision that his residence in Ohio was the “promised land,”—the immediate removal of the whole Smith family thither, where they were soon raised from a state of poverty to comparative affluence. We therefore, must hold out Sidney Rigdon to the world as being the original “author and proprietor” of the whole Mormon conspiracy, until further light is elicited upon the lost writings of Solomon Spalding.

Chapter 2.4

A FAMILY AFFAIR

One of the remarkable features of Jesus Christ was His ability to discern. His perception reached far beyond the established body of knowledge.

This chapter will begin with four astute observations by various people. Then it will take a fresh chronological probing of the origins of the Mormon religion, showing how those four observations relate to Mormonism and the Power.

Let's begin with an observation by Mormon leader Brigham Young at a meeting at LDS headquarters in 1845, "When we come to the connections we discover that we all sprung back to the settlement of New England about 200 years ago. It is but a little more than that time when Father Smith, the Goddards, Richards, Youngs and Kimballs were all in one family--as it were. We are all relations. It is only three generations back that Brother Joseph Smith's family were related to this family."¹

Along with this observation goes what Joseph Smith told his sixth cousins Orson and Parley Pratt in the 1830's that their "fathers and his all sprang from the same man a few generations ago."²

Observation #1: The Mormon leadership and many of the original converts to Mormonism came from the same progenitor.

Bernard DeVoto, a scholar studying Mormonism wrote,

"Some subtlety of climate, racial stock or social organization on the frontier of New England and New York made the air fecund. A circle described on a radius of one hundred and fifty miles around such a center as Pittsfield, Massachusetts, would include the birthplace of ninety percent of the American sects and of an even greater percentage of their prophets. Many prophets before Joseph Smith revealed God's will within that circle, and many more came after him."³

Observation #2: 90% of America's new religions and even more of her prophets came from a certain racial group of people located in the geographic area defined by a circle with a radius 100 miles around the center pt. at Pittsfield, Mass.

A very controversial book arrived in 1982. This author has read the criticism of the book, and although some of the book is pure speculation, and 1-track scholarship, this author also agrees with that book's three authors that the bulk of the research is not refuted by any of the critiques. To quote a small portion which briefly summarizes an intricate story, "We have formulated a hypothesis of a bloodline, descended from Jesus, which has continued up to the present day...But our researches have persuaded us that the mystery of Rennes-le-Chateau does involve a serious attempt by influential people to reestablish a Merovingian monarchy in France, if not indeed in the whole of Europe--and that the claim to legitimacy of such a monarchy rests on a Merovingian descent from Jesus. . .And it would be apparent why the Protocols of the Elders of Sion speak of a new king 'of the holy seed of David.'"⁴

The researchers establish that the Masons are intimately part of the conspiracy to establish a new messiah, who is a descendent of Jesus Christ (claimed descendent, that is.)

Observation #3: The Masonic Lodges have been part of plan by a powerful bloodline which claims to be the lineal descendents of Jesus, and seeks to establish their rule. The machinations of this bloodline underlie much of the political and religious activities of Europe, especially Scotland and France.

William J. Schnoebelen, who became a Master Mason, and a Wiccan High Priest, and studied in the esoteric European Masonic rites and had the highest Druid Witch as his mentor, later went on to join the Mormon church. His book Mormonism's Temple of Doom is an astute observation of how Magick, Masonry, and Mormonism's Temple ceremony are the same. On one page alone he indicates fifteen ceremonial similarities (p.43). The grips, oaths, prayers, garments, and the Mormon temple's designs are copied from Magick and Masonry, and are complete with occult significance.⁵

Observation #4: The most sacred Mormon religious ceremonies, which are held in their temples come from Masonry and Magick. All three are practicing what is called the occult.

THE PURITANS

"The revival of chiliasm in the later Middle Ages...had been kept alive in the Middle Ages in Jewish apocalypticism...Throughout the Middle Ages Jewish teachers and commentators, studying Old Testament prophecy and even astronomical phenomena, predicted the appearance of the Messiah and the establishment of a Messianic kingdom."⁶

Jewish rabbi Abba Hillel Silver wrote, "The hope of the Messiah did not at any time disappear in Israel."⁷

The great Jewish philosopher Maimonides felt that belief in the Messiah was an essential article of faith: "King Messiah will arise in the future and will restore the kingship of David to its ancient condition...he will rebuild the Temple and gather the exiled of Israel...all the laws will return as they were in the past." This belief system also included a belief in a resurrection of the dead, a last judgement, and a New Jerusalem. The last great king would be a human figure with the blood of David, the Messiah.⁸

The beliefs called chiliasm or premillialism were branded as Jewish by both Luther and Calvin, and the Augsburg Confession of Faith.

The introduction of millennial beliefs and the occult occurred in the British Isles when the Stuarts, part of the bloodline that secretly claimed to descend from Jesus, took the English throne. The Puritans began during this period in England, and their speculation about the Millennium was on a grand scale.⁹ Certain elements of the Puritans were very much involved with the occult too.¹⁰ The millenarian Puritans suffered political defeat in England, but were able to relocate to the New World. The first puritan group is known as the Pilgrims. The famous Pilgrims would retain a certain separateness from the later Puritan groups that would arrive to populate Massachusetts,¹² and Connecticut. Johnathan Edwards gave intellectual stature to millennial beliefs.¹³ The idea of a coming Millennial Kingdom of a Jewish Messiah led Puritans to feel that they had a divine mission to the world,¹⁴ much in the manner that the Mormons and Jehovah's Witnesses view themselves today.

NEW ENGLANDERS & THE BURNED-OVER DISTRICT

The revivals of the Great Awakening and the Second Great Awakening produced great resurgences in religious activity. Researchers found their hottest points of revival, in those areas where descendants of the Puritans resided.¹⁵ Michael Barkum in his book Crucible of the Millennium discusses many of the connections between the revivals and the Millennial religions that sprang up in what is called the "burned-over district of New York." The burned-over area produced Mormonism, Adventism, as well as a host of other religious groups including 55 communal groups during the years of 1842-1848.¹⁶ Two of the better known groups are the Oneida communal group and the Shakers.

The burned-over area was settled by families, the majority of which had come from western Connecticut, western Massachusetts, and western Vermont.¹⁷ The New Englanders tended to move in groups of families en masse. Where that did not occur, relatives would join afterwards which meant that communities were usually culturally homogeneous and blood related.¹⁸

THE FAMILIES THAT STARTED MORMONISM

It is important to note that the families which formed the nucleus of early Mormonism moved together from Connecticut to Vermont and then on to the Palmyra, New York area.¹⁹ Not only were they intermarried, but they claimed to be Jewish.²⁰ The Jewish Bennett family was also influential on Joseph Smith, Jr.'s thinking.

Three prominent families in this group were the Walters-Winchell-Hurlbut families.²¹ Other families in the group included those of Cowdery, Young, and those related to Royal Barney, Sr., Jabez Carter, Orrin Porter Rockwell, Samuel F. Lawrence, Alva Beman and Erastus Ives.²²

From these families came men that were to play important part in the creation of Mormonism. For instance, Luman Walters, a magician who went to Europe and studied the occult, was related to Joseph Smith, Jr.'s wife through the common ancestor Thomas Tuttle. Luman Walters passed his occult mantle of magick power to Joseph Smith, Jr. Winchell was another occult mentor of Joseph Smith.²⁴ His family had followed the Smiths to the Palmyra, N.Y. area from Vermont.²⁵ Winchell introduced the use of the Rod of Aaron into the group in 1799.²⁶ While in Vermont members of these families had formed a secret religious fraternity called by outsiders the "Fraternity of Rodmen." They were millennial, believed they were Jewish, and believed in restoring the true religion, and that they would someday become masters of the American continent.²⁷ Yet, nobody has given any attention to the fact, these people later were the original Mormons.

BLOOD LINES

Critics who portray Joseph Smith, Jr. as illiterate, superstitious, a liar, and con-artist have only served to cloud the truth about the origins of the Mormon church.

Joseph Smith, Jr.'s people were very keen on genealogy. His mother shows in her book about her son her amazing awareness of the genealogical history of their entire family.²⁸ She traces the Smiths back to 1666.²⁹ It is clear from various statements that not only was Joseph Smith chosen for his work as a prophet because of his intellectual abilities,³⁰ but that his family had been passing down their beliefs and spiritual blessings from generation to generation for some time.³¹

The author's research shows that Joseph Smith, Jr. was a dynamic individual, with many abilities.³² The evidence indicates that the creation of Mormonism may have been a well orchestrated plan by several families to set themselves up as the priest-prophet rulers of the New World that they had claimed was theirs years before Joseph Smith, Jr. ever announced his angelic visits.

In contrast to the role that the Masonic Lodges played in introducing the occult and generic religion, two religious groups that were openly occultic played possibly no role in the future formation of Mormon heresy. These were the Rosicrucians and the Moravian Brethren, whose leader Count Zinzendorf was head of the Rose Croix from 1744 to 1749. One of the names the Moravian Brethren went by is the Moravian Brothers of the Order of Religious Freemasons. Many of the Moravian Brethren were of Jewish blood, although nominally Lutheran. They were gnostic.³³

Various books written by Rosicrucians and Freemasons, which promoted magick, astrology, mysticism, rationalism, deism, and various mystery religions and the occult, were quite popular in colonial New England and made quite an impact. A study of men connected with forming new religions, repeatedly indicates the far ranging impact of men like Boehme, Voltaire, Paine, Swendenborg, Charles Fourier and others.

Acting behind the veil of the Masonic Lodge, wave after wave of new thinking rolled into America. Later, this chapter will discuss how the Philadelphians, organized by the Masons³⁴, would influence Saint-Simon through his friendship with the Philadelphian leader Jacques Rigomer-Bazin. Saint-Simon wrote The New Christianity and his ideas generated religious and communistic experiments³⁵ that eventually would influence the Mormons to adopt communism.

THE FRATERNITY OF RODSMEN

After Nathaniel Woods was excommunicated from his ministry with the Congregational Church he formed a secret religious group³⁶ that included the parents of Joseph Smith, Jr.³⁷ Through Congregational records the link between the Winchells, Woods, Cowderys and Smiths can be made.³⁸ The evidence suggests that the occult practices that Lucy Smith openly admitted her family practiced³⁹ were likely participated in by the entire set of families that formed the Fraternity of Rodmen. Mormon scholar D. Michael Quinn writes, "Such coincidence of time, place, and occult activity among these people suggests that there could have been personal acquaintance that linked them and encouraged them to participate in similar and joint occult activities."⁴⁰

EARLY MASONIC TIES

Heber C. Kimball,⁴¹ Hyrum Smith (brother of Joseph Smith, Jr.)⁴² and others of Joseph's family⁴³ were Freemasons at Palmyra before Joseph ever announced any of his visions or gold plates. Men like the Mason itinerant preacher Lorenzo Dow came through their territory.⁴⁴

Items used by the Smith family prior to Joseph's revelations, also indicate a Masonic influence. A Masonic dove medallion from an English Masonic Lodge was used by Joseph Smith, Jr. Some of the magic items that still survive today of the Smith family are 3 magic laman parchments, a magic Jupiter talisman, the Masonic dove medallion, another Talisman possibly the magic seal of Jupiter, a magic pouch, a healing handkerchief, and a healing amulet (a cape blessed by Joseph used by the John L. Butler family).⁴⁵

Dr. Reed Durham, director of the LDS Institute of Religion at the University of Utah and president of the Mormon History Association announced his discovery in 1974 of information about Joseph Smith's masonic Jupiter talisman,

"...I should like to initiate all of you into what is perhaps the strangest, the most mysterious, occult-like esoteric, and yet Masonically oriented practice ever adopted by Joseph Smith...All available evidence suggests that Joseph Smith the Prophet possessed a magical Masonic medallion, or talisman, which he worked during his lifetime and which was evidently on his person when he was martyred.... originally purchased from the Emma Smith Bidamon family, fully notarized by that family to be authentic and to have belonged to Joseph Smith, can now be identified as a Jupiter talisman...The characters on the talisman are primarily in Hebrew, but there is one inscription in Latin. Every letter in the Hebrew alphabet has a numerical equivalent and those numerical equivalents make up a magic square....To the Egyptians, Jupiter was known as Ammon, but to the Greeks he was Zeus: the ancient sky Father...Jupiter is always associated with high positions, getting one's own way, and all forms of status....The purpose of the Table of Jupiter in talismanic magis (magic?) was to be able to call upon the celestial intelligences, assigned to the particular talisman, to assist one in all endeavors. The names of the deities which we gave to you, who could be invoked by the Table were always written on the talisman or represented by various numbers."⁴⁶

A guest in the Smith's home around 1830 wrote, "This Joseph Smith, Senior, we soon learned, from his own lips, was a firm believer in witchcraft and other supernatural things; and he had brought up his family in the same belief."⁴⁷

In the rituals of the 13th, 14th, and 21st degrees of Masonry the legend (derived from cabbalistic sources) is told of Enoch's gold plate. The resemblances to Joseph Smith, Jr.'s story about finding the gold plates is interesting. The stories are basically identical, which suggests Mormonism may have been founded from the beginning on a Masonic legend.⁴⁸

The use of crystal-gazing which the Smith family, including Joseph Smith, Jr. and their friends, used was called scrying and was practiced in the Masonic Lodges.⁴⁹

These points have been brought out to give the investigator the feel that the Fraternity of Rodmen, which are known to have used the Rod of Aaron to obtain revelation,⁵⁰ may have also had affiliation with witchcraft and masonry. The leaders of the Fraternity had previously been notable citizens, and one had been a state legislator.⁵¹ The Fraternity felt led to build a temple.⁵² The Fraternity became apocalyptic and upset the non-believers in the area. The night that the Fraternity prophesied would bring an apocalyptic event 14 January, 1802, only brought gunfire from the Middletown, Vt. militia who were frightened by the group.⁵³ One witness claimed Joseph Smith, Sr. was one of the leaders of the Fraternity. Justus Winchell, who was involved in the fraternity, became the Mormon prophet-to-be's occult mentor.⁵⁴ After 1802, the group began moving to Palmyra, N.Y.

It has been interesting to note that Palmyra, N.Y. repeatedly shows up in this author's Masonic research as a real stronghold of Masonry, and Poultney, Vt. as a place where new religious ideas seem to appear.⁵⁵

ISRAEL ESTABLISHED BY MASONS

Nine years after the Smiths had moved to Palmyra, N.Y. the Jewish Mason Mordecai Manuel Noah reestablished a City of Refuge for the Jewish people of the world in Buffalo, N.Y. which was about 90 miles from the Smiths. The great event was on September 15, 1825. The National Advocate advertised the event calling on Jews world-wide to participate in the founding of this "City of Refuge." What is interesting is that this great ceremony ended up as a Masonic parade and a Masonic ceremony where a cornerstone of Ararat was placed with the inscription "Hear O Israel, the Lord is our God--The Lord is one. ARARAT The Hebrew's Refuge, founded by Mordecai Manuel Noah". The sandstone monument was placed with a Masonic ceremony. The Reverend Addison Searle of the Episcopal Church of St. Paul played a big role in the event. The church ceremonies opened in the Episcopal church led by the Reverend, followed by a Jewish Declaration of Independence, and a call for Jews around the world to gather in the state of New York so that they could enlighten themselves and qualify for a restoration to their ancient heritage. Afterwards, Noah returned to New York City and advertised his reestablishment of the Jewish nation. This strange event seems most odd. Why the Masons in Buffalo went to such lengths for such a ceremony isn't clear, nor is Noah's authority to be a Judge of Israel.⁵⁶

THE RESTORATION- A MASONIC KINGDOM RULED BY THE LINEAL DESCENDENTS OF JESUS

Joseph Smith, with outstanding talent in cabalistic wizardry,⁵⁷ set out to restore the priesthood of Israel and restore the religion of Jesus.⁵⁸

Joseph Smith's restoration was in fact in line with the Masonic/Rosicrucian beliefs of esoteric Christianity, a type of occultic secret mystery religion taught by the higher Masons, supposedly the original Christianity. Smith's Sept. 1832 revelation, describes a lineage for his beliefs that rests on esoteric Christianity.⁵⁹ Manly P. Hall, 33 degree, calls this "Mystic Christianity", and describes it in detail in his book The Secret Teachings of All Ages. Smith made a revision of Genesis called the Book of Moses which was in line with the occultic Mystic Christian teachings⁶⁰ and its gnosticism. Emanuel Swedenborg was a hermetic philosopher and mystic Christian Mason of high rank. Smith was familiar with Swedenborg's teachings,⁶¹ (indeed Swedenborg's publications were on the shelves at Smith's hometown library and circulating through the Smith's area.)⁶² Smith adopted Swedenborg's concept of 3 heavens, with the highest being what Swedenborg called the "celestial kingdom."

The caballa which forms a basis for mystic Christianity also provides Smith for some of his answers that are canonized as scripture in the Mormon Doctrines and Covenants. Compare D & C 77:2 with Seder Olam Quest. 24, compare (cf.) D & C 77:4 with Seder Olam Question 23, cf. D & C 77:8 with Seder Olam question 42, and D & C 77:15 with Seder Olam question 58.

Joseph Smith believed the Jewish Cabala was sacred knowledge which had been passed from God to Adam and from Adam to Enoch, to Noah, on down the line through Melchizedek to Moses. This priesthood has performed magic. Remember, the Caballa is intimately part of magic. Indeed, much magic derives from the Caballa.

The Masons, Rosicrucians, and mystics like the Ephrata Commune were already practicing the Order of Melchizedek when he established the Order of Mechizedek after the Order of Enoch. By the way, the mystics at Ephrata had baptized the dead long before Joseph Smith copied this mystic ritual.⁶³

Joseph Smith, in a fashion like various Masonic and Magick groups, gave his Mormon leaders and himself new names.⁶⁴ Smith's new name was Enoch.⁶⁵

Masonry claimed to be derived from the ancient mystery religions,⁶⁶ and it was those mysteries that Joseph Smith intended to restore. In D & C 76:7 Smith announces, "And to them will I reveal all mysteries of my kingdom from days of old, and for ages to come."

Joseph Smith needed to restore the mystery religions involved in mystic Christianity, because he believed the magic and occult in Freemasonry was only a shadow, a vestige of the real thing. An examination of Masonic literature prior to the 20th century will reveal teachings on the lineage of Jesus Christ, the importance of the Holy Grail (a blood line from Jesus), the mystical meaning of the crucifixion, the discipling of Jesus by Eastern gurus and other ideas. These are mentioned here, because the lack of public awareness of the old age of these teachings. Joseph Smith was not the first to claim Jesus was married to Mary Magdalene and sired a royal blood line through her.⁶⁷ The New Agers today are not the originators of the idea that Jesus was a Hindu adept, initiated into the Temple of Melchizedek like Pythagorus. Even Justin Martyr noted that the Christian Christ was a parallel to the sons of Jupiter of the pagan mystery religions.⁶⁸

This explains how important it was to Joseph Smith's family that he was a son of Jupiter. And his type of knowledge was preserved in the Masonic lodges. The Mormon Apostle Herber C. Kimball verifies that Joseph Smith, Jr. set out to restore the mysteries of Masonry (the mystery religions & mystic Christianity) when he explained, "we have received some pressious things through the Prophet on the preasthood...thare is a similarity of preast Hood in masonary. Br Joseph ses masonry was taken from preasthood but has become degenerated, but menny things are perfect."⁶⁹

Joseph Smith was speaking about tokens, signs, keys and other masonic things before he was initiated into the Masonic Lodge in 1842.⁷⁰

Joseph Smith claimed that an angel brought him the lost key-word to several Masonic degrees, that would allow him to progress further than the highest Masons.⁷¹ The concept that Mormonism was a higher form of Masonry can be seen in the Mormon writer M.F. Cowley's book Wilford Woodruff, p.160, "The fraternity sought for in that organization (Masonry) was superseded by a more perfect fraternity found in the vows and covenants which the endowment in the House of God afforded members of the church." Joseph Smith, Jr. set out to create a high level super rite of Masonry, perhaps meant to be supreme over all the other rites.

Along with this, he took the practice of white magick to its highest level in North America. That is why the highest Druid witch in North America advised his student witch Schnoebelen that if he wanted to practice the highest form of white magick, he should become a Mormon and partake of the Temple ceremonies.⁷²

This will surprise many people, especially many Mormons, until they understand Magick. An expert Enochian Magician quotes the supreme evil magician Crowley (33° Scottish Rite and other Rites) as defining Magick as "the science and act of causing change to occur in conformity with will." This expert magician further explains, "Essentially, Magick is the ability to bring about a willed change. Suppose that you are hungry. When you will yourself to eat, and then fix yourself a sandwich and eat it, you are performing Magick, at least to a degree. If you will to converse with a friend, and then pick up a phone and call him or her, you are a magician. We all go through life performing Magick. Most of it is so ordinary that we don't think of it in magical terms, but any willed change in ourselves or in our environment is Magick."⁷³

From this the reader will realize that many Mormons have been duped into practicing Magick in the Mormon temples without knowing it. One doesn't have to know he is practicing Magick to practice it. However, for those men who have joined witchcraft before joining Freemasonry or Mormonism, they recognize the close parallels of the Masonic initiations from the beginning with witchcraft, and Mormons going to the Temple endowments with prior witchcraft experience recognize the parallels with the endowment ceremonies.

Schnoebelen was one of the few men to have gone through Witchcraft, Masonry, and Mormonism and to have forsaken it for Christ. His book does an excellent job of revealing the magical meanings and powers involved in the Mormon temple ceremony. (See book recommendations at the back of this chapter.) Even his book doesn't cover all the similarities, by the way which are not coincidental. They are too numerous to be coincidental, but even more important the history of their origins show that it is not coincidence.

Why did the Mormon leaders decide to keep this all secret from their own people? Why haven't the Mormon people been told about the Masonic and occult overtones to their religion? First, they have quietly been told if they look close at what has been said. Second, witchcraft and Luciferian worship within Masonry has always preferred to be veiled. Witchcraft has always preferred darkness and secrecy. Even today, New Age recruiters are telling people that they can "expand their potential" and other sales pitches, rather than saying, "Come worship Lucifer." An ex-New Age recruiter who was into Luciferian worship is now exposing their sales pitches and warning people how New Age recruits are not told when recruited that they are being led to worship Lucifer.

Further, there has been a mass deception to keep hidden that the Mormon leaders are high ranking Freemasons. This deception can only be explained in full by understanding that a conspiracy of great magnitude is underway.

It appears that before the Mormons got their recruiting speels worked out, that some of the original missionary elders were telling people about the mysteries. They were very soon instructed by Joseph Smith, Jr. not to ever tell converts about the mysteries.

Joseph Smith's instructions to the elders to keep mum about the mysteries are preserved in a book compiled by Joseph Fielding Smith of his teachings entitled Teachings of the Prophet Joseph Smith.

"Elders to Preach Repentance and Let Mysteries Alone...Declare the first principles, and let mysteries alone, lest ye be overthrown." ⁷⁴

"Strive not about the mysteries of the kingdom, cast not your pearls before swine, give not the bread of the children to dogs, lest you and the children should suffer, and you thereby offend your righteous Judge." ⁷⁵ See footnote for further references.

As early as 1843, a Mormon secret order called "The Holy Order" which involved both men and women had been created. This order wore a special garment with the Masonic square and compass. The Rites of the group included reenacting scenes from the Garden of Eden. ⁷⁶

If the reader will allow a minor digression, I would like to emphasize that one of the important parts to magic is will power. If you look into Hitler and Nazi doctrine you will find will power was one of the most important features of Nazi doctrine. Why? Hitler and many of the Nazi leaders were into witchcraft. Did the Nazi's overtly tell the masses that their will power doctrines were witchcraft renamed? No. Neither is the New Age today, especially in the Christian churches. 98% of the Christian churches in the Puget Sound area are preaching New Age doctrines of some kind.⁷ The idea of willpower is being promoted hard in many Christian churches. The World Power has suppressed all the information they could about the Nazi's Satanic religion, because it touches too close to home.⁷⁸

Joseph Smith's mother wrote, "...let not the reader suppose that. . . we stopt our labor and went at trying to win the faculty of Abrac, drawing magic circles, or sooth saying, to the neglect of all kinds of business. We never during our lives suffered one important interest to swallow up every other obligation."⁷⁹

To paraphrase Lucy, she is saying that the faculty of Abrac, and these occult practices were important, but not to the point of making the Smiths unbalanced. The Smiths were able to carry out all their other obligations in life.

Masonic sources show that the Faculty of Abrac went back in Masonic history even predating the founding of their constitution.⁸⁰ For more information concerning the Masonic "way of winning the faculty of Abrac", the reader is encouraged to read the sources indicated in the footnote. William Wines Phelps in the town of Canandaigua close to Joseph Smith's home, discussed in 1828 in the Ontario Phoenix (Aug. 25, 1830) about the "very Ancient Masonic Charm, or the way of winning the Faculty of Abrac,..."

Both Lucy (see pg. 37 of her book) and Joseph Smith, Sr. believed in a need for a restoration.⁸¹ What that restoration was to be, appears to have included then a "restoration" of mystical Christianity which meant the reinstitution of magic and the occult into Christianity, and a rejection of all the principle dogmas of orthodox churches. Both of Joseph, Jr.'s parents repeatedly went on record repudiating all the denominations that then existed. The restoration "movement" was not an organized body but rather variously believing individuals including men like Roger Williams that believed there were no real Christian churches. Williams didn't even believe the church he led was real, but he looked for a future restoration. Apparently, for the Fraternity of Rodsmen and the Smiths none of the esoteric groups (Rosicrucians, Moravians, the Ephrata commune, et. al.) had properly restored enough magic and a priesthood enough to satisfy them. THIS IS AN IMPORTANT POINT TO GRASP. It indicates why the One-World-Power has helped the Mormon church. Lucy and Joseph weren't blindly lashing out at Christianity, they knew exactly what they believed in, and it wasn't being taught in the Christian churches.

UNIVERSALISM

Joseph Smith, Sr. was a member of the Universalist church⁸² and most likely had contact with occultic and mystic Masons that were preaching for the Universalist Church in that area. The first Universalist minister in Western NY used occult powers and a rod.⁸³ The Universalist minister who preached at Palmyra, NY from Jan. to Mar. 1825 likely mentioned to his congregations about his visions of Christ.⁸⁴

Universalism is directly connected to Freemasonry. (See chapter 2.3). The public image of the Jehovah's Witness and Mormons is that they teach that they alone will be saved. This is not the case. According to the WT, at Armageddon only baptised JWs will be saved.⁸⁵ But at the resurrection almost all of sinful mankind (the WT figures 20 billion sinful people)⁸⁶ are to be resurrected and given a second chance. Their doctrine is veiled universalism. Likewise, the Mormon church envisions essentially all of mankind will be saved minus a handful of exceptions. Some end up going to a lesser heaven, but this lesser heaven is claimed to have essentially all the blessings of a Christian heaven.

MORMONISM ANOTHER NODE IN THE MATRIX OF POWER

The Mormon religion was from its inception meant to be the mystic Christian religion that the Masons had claimed existed in ancient times, complete with the blood line of Jesus Christ.

Many of the early Mormons had been Masons before joining up with Joseph Smith, Jr. "Among the prominent Mormons who had been Masons for years were the following, though the list does not include them all: Hyrum Smith, Newel K. Whitney, Heber C. Kimball, John C. Bennett, George Miller, Lucius N. Scovil, Elijah Fordham, John Smith, Austin Cowles, Noah Rogers, and James Adams."⁸⁷

The Masonic career of Heber C. Kimball, an outstanding early Mormon leader was described by his daughter Helen Mar Kimball in an article she wrote in Woman's Exponent, (Vol. XII, p.126).

"It was in 1823 when he received the first degrees of Masonry in the lodge at Victor Flats, Ontario Co., New York, and in 1824, previous to receiving all of the rights up to the Royal Arch Masons, the Morgan affair broke out and the Masonic Hall in Canandaigua was burned by anti-Masons, and all their records consumed. It seems that the Masons were persecuted and the same unjust proceedings were heaped upon them by the anti-Masons that have been upon those who hold the Priesthood. 'Not as many as three of us,' father says, 'could meet together, unless in secret, without being mobbed. I have been driven from my houses and possessions with many of my brethren belonging to that fraternity five times, by mobs led by some of their leading men. . . I have been as true as an angel from the heavens to the covenants I made in the lodge at Victor....I wish that all men were Masons and would live up to their professsion, then the world would be in a much better state than it is now."

Several items are noteworthy. Heber C. Kimball was a staunch Mason his entire life. The theory that Mormons quit being Masons after the Nauvoo Lodge was shut down is a deception.

The Mason Sidney Rigdon was a Cambellite leader who had two communes. When Mormons missionaries happened to come through his area Rigdon, immediately invited them in as guests, and in a rather quick way, pronounced to his group that he had discovered the true religion and its new prophet Joseph Smith. That a leader of a group could change overnite, and hand his churches over to another, is rather suspicious. There have been a number of tie-ins made between Rigdon and Smith, before they officially met. Although it is difficult to know for sure, it does appear that Smith and Rigdon were in some type of collusion.

Alexander Campbell, who disliked Freemasonry, but had tried to work with Sidney Rigdon wrote, "Rigdon had been for some time diligently engaged in endeavoring, by obscure hints and glowing millennial theories, to excite the imagination of his hearers, and in seeking by fanciful interpretations of Scripture to prepare the minds of the churches of Northern Ohio for something extraordinary in the near future. He sought especially in private to convince certain influential persons that, along with the primitive gospel, supernatural gifts and miracles ought to be restored, and that, as at the beginning, all things should be held in common....Cowdery and Pratt soon made their appearance in Mentor [one of Rigdon's communes] , and were received as old acquaintances by Rigdon, who at once publicly endorsed their claims and with several others was immersed into the new faith..."

The day-book used by Joseph Smith in Nauvoo is now in the possession of the Iowa Masonic Library. It reveals that the Masonic Lodge funds were considered but a part of the Mormon community's resources.⁸⁸

Interestingly, Horace Greeley, a Republican candidate for president in 1872, and the publisher of the important New York Tribune would give much publicity for the Millerites⁸⁹ and some for the Mormons, while at the same time denouncing Masonry. Greeley also supported communism,⁹⁰ and the occult and spiritism that oddly enough was what the European Masons were promoting. All this at the same time he was maintaining a highly visible anti-Masonic profile. Is the reader beginning to see how this conspiracy operates?

And this book was written in order for Christians to realize that just because someone is publicly against Masonry doesn't mean he is against the New World Order. They feel they are sure to win, because they have camouflaged their power in a Matrix with seemingly independent nodes.

Let us return to the restoration that Smith was bringing to Christianity.

Mormonism isn't simply the Temple ceremonies, but it encompasses an authority structure of priests and a priest/king/prophet ruler along with its mass of revelations and doctrines.

Many of these "revelations" are simply the regurgitation of masonic beliefs from the ages. Even the approach to doctrine is definitively masonic.

A most remarkable book Line Upon Line put out by the liberal Mormon scholars shows the remarkable parallels between the generic theology of the Masons and the generic theology of the Mormons. As the LDS church promotes such men, even while criticizing some of their findings, one concludes that this book's scholarship and documentation is not only accurate but approved.

Mormon scholar Stephen L. Richards writes in this book, "Dogmatism and bigotry have been the deadliest enemies of true religion in the long past." "The very elasticity of prayers, ceremonies, and procedure is additional evidence to me of the adoptability of our religion to human needs and therefore of its divinity."⁹¹ He should have added their elasticity of what is doctrinally and fundamentally true also, for Line Upon Line clearly documents that every major Mormon belief has gone through changes.

Change and development characterize Mormon doctrine, consistency does not. For instance, on p. 178, Mormon scholar Bryd Kirkland states, "...Smith himself departed radically from his own teachings, giving precedent for Young's additional innovations."⁹²

Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt then in turn deviated from Brigham Young,⁹³ the second Prophet's views, and Brigham Young censured Pratt's concepts of God. An official censuring by Young occurred in 1860 and 1865.⁹⁴ Pratt felt God was "The Great First Cause". The idea was rejected by Young. Without going the details, it can be stated that both men were building upon contradictory teachings of Joseph Smith, Jr.⁹⁵

The issue here is not which view point of Joseph Smith was right, but for Mormons the issue revolved around a power struggle. As far as doctrine Mormons are given the flexibility in deciding for themselves. The issue was that Brigham Young felt his authority was being challenged, and he was determined to remain "the Prophet." Today, Young's views of eternal progression and the "second death" would be rejected as heretical by many Mormons.

The generic doctrines of the Mormons is not so troubling then as the authority that the rank and file give to their leaders. It is conceivable that a Mormon could even agree with orthodox doctrine, but it is not conceivable that he could remain Mormon and remain out from under the authority of his King/Priest. Some Mormons are attending New Age churches, but are members in good standing at the LDS church, because they pay their tithe.⁹⁶ They receive their home visits, and are not treated negatively by other Mormons. They are not seen as questioning the LDS church's authority. (Chapter 2.9 picks up the story of the LDS church after Joseph Smith.)

THE IMPORTANT ISSUES

People are believing false doctrine, because they are believing in a false authority. This holds true in a wide range of religious groups. The supposed "restoration" of authority in a priesthood led by a lineal descendent of the seed of David, is the greater threat, than the restoration of mystic Christian doctrine and its magic. The seriousness of the threat may be seen when one is aware of how widespread the masonic and witchcraft support is for this claimed "seed of David" which is being prepared to rule the world.

Bear in mind that the symbols of Luciferian worship adorn the Mormon temples, and that demons are considered part of the same eternal family as the gods, angels, and mortals are in but considered simply to be at a different stage in growth or development.⁹⁷

The Mormon missionaries themselves will tell people that the authority issue--that is, what authority is the right one to submit to, is the crucial issue before people. Yet, the restored priesthood they bring is in submission to the same men who control witchcraft and Freemasonry, and who have at the highest levels pledged alligience to Lucifer. This is the authority of the mystery religions.

Another choice besides the mystery religions is to place oneself under the authority of Christ and the Christian scriptures. Mystic Christianity is a negation of Christ's teachings. This author has seen it seems about every distortion possible done to the pure message of Christ by Masons. The Mason who wrote Esoteric Masonry claims in the book that Jesus was actually a sperm and Judas was the male sexual organ holding his bag. People like this may claim to be Christian, that is their prerogative, but what this Author would like is for legitimate followers of Christ to quit honoring these wolves in sheep clothing. It is also vital we recognize who these people are so that their false messiah will be rejected.

In contrast to Christianity, which stresses all men are sinners, the traditional doctrine of Mormonism is that man is essentially good by nature.⁹⁸ John A. Widtsoe, a leading Mormon writer, argued after Darwin's theory of evolution came out, that "God was not the creator, nor was he omnipotent. He too was governed by natural law, which was fundamental."⁹⁹

Again returning to doctrine, the underlying bottom line in Mormonism, is the Masonic idea of flexible truth. Thaddeus E. Shoemaker, Mormon scholar, advocates that the key to a dynamic faith is to have a theology based on speculation—what he calls "speculative Theology".¹⁰⁰

The generic Mormon mish-mash of Theology, this homemade brew that each Mormon priest and theology student cooks from his own recipe, is very representative of masonic philosophy. Add to that a leadership which gives revelations based on esoteric masonic beliefs, and add to that that all the Mormon prophets have been Masons, then is it any surprise that the ideas of universalism, polytheism, exaltation to godhood, multiple heavens, and many other ideas which have surged through the Masonic Lodges and the books they publish, are part of Mormonism?

The Mormon temple in Salt Lake City is covered with Masonic symbols. These are explained by some Mormon scholars to have been placed there because Mormonism and Masonry come from the same origin. The explanation the Mormon Gavin gives for the Star of David on the Mormon temple is "It must be remembered that the Mormons are Israelites, being descendants of Abraham through the lineage of Joseph who was sold into Egypt....As members of the great nation of Israel, the Mormons have a legal right to use the special insignia and emblems which that ancient nation developed."¹⁰¹

What's involved in starting a new religion?

Extraordinary new material is being presented below. Its contribution is that it may help us to understand or theorize what happened to Joseph Smith Jr.

A MODERN JOSEPH SMITH

One day in modern times an older child was looking at the fire in the fireplace when he saw a shining metallic gold plate. The plate had a type of hieroglyphics or symbol writing that he wrote down. The original drawing made that day is reproduced below. This event led to further revelations, and the angelic beings brought him golden plates. He found he had an ability to translate the plates. He deciphered what they said. He learned that the symbols were from the Azruslan language. He wrote a grammar and a dictionary of the language.

This man became a respected religious leader. The plates formed the basis of a new Scriptures called The Flower of Truth. This American guru had a great deal of dignity and poise. His bearing was what one would expect from a man who had written a Bible. He was a true friend to people, and came across as meek. He was faithful to what he thought was right, indeed he was somewhat of a perfectionist. He was a man of culture and integrity. He had a command of the use of words. He was also a very loving sensitive man who wore long white robes. His search for knowledge led him repeatedly into new realms of knowledge, and he had momentary flights into fantasy. He preferred to investigate things on his own, he was a self-teacher who then taught others. Although he trusted his own research, his biggest shortcoming was perhaps his personal self-deceit. One day he got a revelation that completely changed his life. He went from a modern day Joseph Smith, Jr. to a Christian.

It is rare when the founder of a new religion turns his back on his own New Age Bible and his own followers to follow Christ. Yet, that is what this New Age leader did, because in a later revelation he had it revealed to him that he was serving demons. Upon realizing that the plates and the translation of those plates were demonic, he turned his life over to Christ. He walked away from the religious community he had established in Edmonton, Canada and began living a Christian life.

How many writers of demon inspired scriptures never learn the source of scriptures, or if they did, have never revealed the source of their own scriptures? It takes real moral conviction to do something like that.

WHAT HAD THE DEMONS PASSED TO HIM?

It is very interesting to examine what the Demons had passed to him because today, a religious buffet is being offered the public. Real Christian faith appears to be just one of many viable options.

The Flower of Truth is a syncretic work, a mixture of Hinduism, Buddhism, Christianity et. al. like the lessons of so many New Age groups today.

Examples from The Flower are: (shades of Buddhism) The Fivefold Path, p.9, "I Who in My Christ am called the lotus-born." (shades of Mormonism) The last chapter is called Doctrines and Covenants. (shades of Hinduism) The Fivefold Path, p. 16, "Whoever chants My names in pure devotion to Me, I will lead to the green fields of My Kingdom."

In the preface to the book¹⁰² we are told, "This book was not compiled, nor is it presented, to be a substitute or replacement for the Bible or any of the other great scriptures. The spirit which has spoken to Man in the past through these old books is the same one which speaks to us now through the new. The Torah, the New Testament, the Koran, the Gita, the Flower: are all chapters in the eternal stream..."

Shades of the occult appear in The Flower. Examples are The Opening, p. 5 "The keys to My Kingdom I give to you." The Opening, p. 3 "All men shall desecrate my temple...but wherever the ash will come to rest shall spring up as a legion of pheonix from the flames endless temples."

Even more significant than how eclectic the book is, is that it puts forth all the lies of Satan. Examples are:

The Opening, p.2-"There is no death. All men are saved." The Law, p. 4-"I say unto you, verily, after death I do not punish." Revelation, p. 3 we are presented Situational Ethics- "There is no man that knows what is truth and what is untruth, except judging for himself only,..."

Below, published for the first time to the public in any book are the original drawings, which were entrusted to Dr. K.V. Thampan, and were in the care of this Author for a while. Now after ten years, the public is permitted to see the original demon inspired drawings, which now form a testimony of a great victory for Christ.

1. Schnoebelen. Mormonism's Temple of Doom. This book is an excellent introduction to the parallels between Witchcraft, Masonry and the Mormon temple ceremonies. The book has received much "flak" because its critics are simply not well informed about the practices of witchcraft, and the hidden side of Mormonism.
2. Tanner, Jerald & Sandra. Mormonism. Magic and Masonry. This is good historical research into the early connections. The Tanners fail to inform people of the connections that exist today, but the book is excellent material on the early Mormons. The Tanners have some of the best material on the Mormons for the interested researcher.

Chapter 2.8

Mormons, Moonies, and Masons

WHO ARE THE LDS MORMON LEADERS?

The Mormon Church which is headquartered in Salt Lake City is named the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. The Corporation of the President of the Church of J.C. of LDS is set up to hold the property and copyrights, etc. of the hierarchy. However, an extensive set of corporations, dummy corporations, etc. also exist to manage a far-ranging financial empire under the exclusive control of the head of the Mormon church.

The head of the Mormon Church is called President. He and two other top leaders of the Mormon Church are called the First Presidency. "The First Presidency has authority over all matters pertaining to the Church." ¹

"The next in order are the Twelve Apostles...They hold the same authority in all parts of the world that the First Presidency does at home...The twelve have a president...This presidency is obtained by seniority of age and ordination." ²

These fifteen men are followed by "the seventies". The "seventies" are groups of men whose groups also have a Presidency of seven men over their group, and these intermediate Presidents interface with the twelve apostles. ³

The structure looks like this in descending order:

1. The First Presidency (which consists of 1 President + 2 counselors)
2. The Quorum of the Twelve (which consists of apostles)
3. The Presidency of the Seventy (called members of the Presidency of the Seventy.
4. The First Quorum of the Seventy (members come from the different church districts)
5. The Second Quorum of the Seventy (members also come from the different church districts)

WHAT ARE THE TWO MORMON PRIESTHOODS & THEIR RELATIONSHIP TO THE HIERARCHY

There are two priesthoods the Aaronic and Melchizedek and their relationship to the hierarchy is described by President Joseph F. Smith,

"Ascending the scale of authority, the titles and callings of deacon, teacher, priest and bishop come within the purview of the Aaronic Priesthood; while those of elder, seventy, high priest, patriarch, apostle and president are offices and callings in the Melchizedek Priesthood, to which the Aaronic Priesthood is an appendage. A full equipment is thus shown for the government and conduct of the Church both spiritually and temporally." ⁴

Like the Watchtower Society the LDS church power structure is set up to govern its members totally in both spiritual and temporal affairs.

WHAT THE MORMON FIRST PRESIDENTS ARE

Various ex-Mormon Masons indicate that all of the Presidents, also called Prophets, of the LDS church have been Freemasons. Because this has come from several reliable sources, none of which can be named, it stands the test of being accurate.

This is why 33 degree Mason Norman Vincent Peale has always been good friends with the Mormon prophets. At the 85th birthday of current Mormon Prophet/President Spencer W.

MASONIC PEN

Kimball (who is as mentioned also a Mason) Peale was the keynote speaker. Peale praised Kimball as a true prophet of Christ and a great man of God.⁵

The reader will be presented information concerning the ties between the LDS leadership and the CIA, the Rothschilds, and the New Age. Confidential sources also reveal that couriers have been used to carry commands directly to the LDS leadership from the center of power in England. Some of these courier routes are through UNESCO and INTELLIGENCE AGENCIES. Again because this came from different sources that were not in touch with each other, it must be considered reliable.

THE CONNECTION BETWEEN MASONRY & MORMONISM

Blanchard, 33 degree Mason in his book approved by the highest Masonic authorities, states that Mormonism and Masonry are legally the same institution. "The two institutions are morally and legally the same."⁵

Mervin B. Hogan, who is one of the best Masonic writers, when he was selected to be a Blue Friar in 1976, presented his paper "Mormonism and Freemasonry: The Illinois Episode." In discussing the Articles of Faith of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, he said, "It is evident to anyone who acquaints himself with this creed that there are no conflicts or incompatibilities whatsoever between the teachings, theology, and dogma of Mormonism and the philosophy, principles and tenets of universal Freemasonry...Surely with that simultaneous background, it must be readily acknowledged that Mormonism and Freemasonry are so intimately and inextricably interwoven and interrelated that the two can never be disassociated."⁶

A Mason within the Lodge can say what Hogan spoke and be commended, yet a non-Mason saying the similar things about the Mormon Church to a Baptist church watched Mason Baptists get up from the pews disgusted and leave in the middle of his talk.⁷

To quote only two Masons of the many who have noted the connections between Masonry and Mormonism:

"The general outline of the endowment ceremony, and the signs used therein, are closely connected with Masonry; and, in spite of Mormon denials, it is easily established that a certain amount of the early Masonry which was used freely in the Temple ceremony still survives."—Mason Stuart Martin, The Mystery of Mormonism. p.308.

"Not infrequently the question is asked, 'Does the Mormon church make use of the Masonic ritual in its Temple ceremonies?'...the reader will be left free to make his own deductions."—Past Grand Master S. H. Goodwin. (Goodwin then proceeds to mention many similarities between Masonry and Mormonism in his book Mormonism and Masonry.)

THE OBSERVABLE PHENOMENA

Because individuals that reveal information about the instructions that the Mormon leadership are taking from the New World Order are in the gravest danger, it is more sensible to discuss the observable phenomena. These phenomena are more or less public record, what must remain secret testimony shall.

WHO IS ORCHESTRATING THE MORMON CHURCH ACTIVITIES?

The answer is not as hidden as one might assume. The following are all observable phenomena, that did not take any cloak and dagger activity to learn. William Schnoebelen's books describe the connection between witchcraft and the Mormons. Talks with New Agers reveals that they view the Mormons as co-workers in the work to enlighten the world with a "higher consciousness". Clearly there appears to be some kind of an arrangement of cooperation.

Again confidential sources indicate that the Mormon Temples are used by non-Mormons for witchcraft ceremonies. Such cooperation can only come from the authority of the First Presidency.

After writing the above paragraph early in 1991 from confidential sources about Satanism within the Mormon temples, a confirmation has come out in the form of a memo written by Glenn L. Pace, Second Counselor in the Presiding Bishopric of the LDS church. The memo is authentic, and the Mormon committee it refers to called "Strengthening Church Members Committee" did exist. The memo was only for use for the select inside the Mormon church, but the Utah Lighthouse Ministry got a copy and published it in their newsletter Salt Lake City Messenger (Nov. 1991). Basically, what Mormon General Authority Glenn Pace is warning about is that there is a Satanic conspiracy operating within the Mormon church. Pace interviewed 60 Mormons who had been abused in Satanic rituals. These 60 were all Mormons, the Satanists that had abused them in Satanic rituals were all Mormons, and the abuse had taken place in various places including Mormon churches, the Temples, and even while one was serving as a Mormon missionary. The Satanic abuse had occurred in the following places: Utah (37), Idaho(3), California (4), Mexico (2), other places (14), which indicates Satanism within Mormonism is very widespread. The perpetrators of the Satanic abuse came from such positions in the Mormon church as Young Women leaders, Young Men leaders, bishops, a patriarch, a stake president, temple workers, and members of the Tabernacle Choir. My sources indicate that Glenn Pace's memo is not reaching high enough. That Satanism goes clear to the top. If so then Pace's memo may have been leaked as damage control.

Pace's memo is well written. Unfortunately the Tanners who reprinted it are quite reluctant to admit that a Satanic conspiracy could exist, and have repeatedly shown they are either ignorant of how Satanism is operating or are trying to do damage control for the Mormon church. Some people who are trying to expose the extent that Satanism controls Mormonism feel the Tanners are trying to help the Mormon church.

Within recent years several outstanding events have given the public knowledge that Satanism is widespread within Mormonism, but somehow the lid continues to prevent it becoming public knowledge. In the Salt Lake Tribune, Jan. 13, 1988 was an article about a Mormon who had ritually abused his children and had been convicted. The case was in Provo, and the Tribune had run an article on Dec. 16, 1987 discussing the testimony of a therapist who allege that within one ward as many as 40 people had been ritually abused. The Jan. 13th issue had quoted a spokesperson for the Utah Psychiatric Association who said that mental-health professionals had identified several communities in Utah where groups were abusing children.

Other cases of child abuse by Mormons continue to occur. This author has personally known one perpetrator in Kansas and one in Oregon. From personal knowledge of the Mormon church it can be honestly stated there is little protection within the Mormon church against Satanism, and members who leaned that way that the Author has met, were never to his knowledge rebuked by the church or other members.

Pace's comments in the memo correctly stated that what he reports in his memo "are very minor infractions" compared to what the occult is doing in the Wasatch Utah area. He also correctly notes that the perpetrators are living dual lives, and many of them have temple recommends. Living dual lives is but standard operating procedure for Satanists.

Only through a good grasp of the bigger picture does this cooperation become more visible. Chap. 3.3 discusses the role of the Rothschilds, who helped finance the Mormon church. Chapter 1.7 describes the B'nai B'rith, and its role as a cover for the Power's operations. The B'nai B'rith operates both as an intelligence front and as a conduit transmitting orders to various groups including the Mormon Church and the Masons. A visible result of this close cooperation can be seen in the following information concerning Utah's first "gentile" Governor.

LDS POLITICAL CONTROL

Many observers have noticed the political that the LDS Mormon Church has and exercises in Utah's politics.

"Of course, in Utah, political ambition and religious ambition were always closely allied. It was difficult to rise to prominent public office without the Church's backing. It was virtually impossible to do so against the Church's opposition. That was a fact of life in Utah that any good politician understood..."⁸

Even in modern times, even very recently, reports by non-Mormons, called "Gentiles" by the Mormons, continue to tell how much oppressive opposition, pressure, and control the Mormon Church and the Mormon people are exerting on their lives and on their churches in Utah. The oppressiveness has caused some to move.

The U.S. Congress went on record repeatedly condemning the Mormon Church control of Utah's politics. They declared they needed evidence of the separation of church and state in Utah. Congress dragged their feet in giving Utah statehood.

After statehood the complaints by "gentiles" in Utah continued. And so a charade, an act of deception was foisted on the American people, and most people relaxed, confident that Congress had taken care of the problem. How this was done will be discussed.

The Mormon Church after statehood continued to deny allegations of Church interference in the least in State matters. "The Church does not claim any such right...We disclaim the right to control the political action of the members."⁹

However, assemblies in LDS churches to discuss and advance the cause of a certain political party continued unrebuked by the Church's higher authorities.¹⁰

"Gentiles" did get placed in some of the State's positions, and this was "proof" to the outside world that the Mormon church had no influence on State politics.

However, the outside world did not have the perspective on things that this book gives. The outside world if they noticed a man like James William Cherry sitting on the Supreme Court of Utah would not likely see any connection between this 32 degree Freemason and his Unitarian Church which is involved with the New Age movement and the Mormon Church.¹¹ Is it surprising that we find so many of the "gentiles" in Utah, carrying out policies that the Mormon Church wants?

Joseph L. Rawlins, was portrayed by the Mormon Church as a Gentile, and to its church members as an apostate. This "apostate" is rather suspicious. Notice, that back when Polygamy was an issue between the American people and Congress and the Mormon Church that this apostate stood on the floor in Congress and denied that there was "one syllable of evidence" that Utah had practiced polygamy.¹²

In 1966, the LDS Church was still having to issue statements denying influence in Utah politics, yet even to this day the firm conviction remains with many "Gentiles" who live in Utah that this type of denial is not true. They notice the rumors that circulate through the LDS

Churches about which candidate the Church is in favor of. It is understandable how such rumors could be circulated with or without the Church's responsibility, so the LDS Church can not be blamed unless there are actually people who are able to state that the origins of some of these voting rumors are known by them to start with someone in the hierarchy.

In early Utah, at a time when political tension was high between Gentiles and Mormons in Utah, the election of the first "Gentile" Utah state governor helped to diffuse the tension. His name was Simon Bamberger.

Looking beyond the surface, it is noteworthy that none other than the most prolific Mormon writer who defended the Mormon religion, B.H. Roberts, nominated Simon Bamberger at the state Democratic convention.¹³

Simon Bamberger was a great man for the Mormon Church. He diffused tension, detracted attention from the Church's power, and dispelled the bad publicity of the image of LDS control in Utah. He also carried out a program in public office that was extremely pro-Mormon. He could get away with a pro-Mormon attitude because he wasn't Mormon. Gov. Bamberger opposed anything that opposed the Mormon Church, whether it was anti-Mormon information or anti-Mormon legislation. Simon Bamberger was a Freemason, and he was also a high ranking member of B'nai B'rith.¹⁴ He was Jewish and had recently immigrated from Germany.

THE PRIEURE DE SION & MORMONISM

According to the genealogies put out by the Mormon leadership, who happen to be all related, they are descendents of the Merovingian Dynasty. The Merovingian Dynasty is supposedly the House of David and the blood line through which the new Christ is to come.

Merovee was the first Merovingian king. His son's Clovis I was the second Merovingian king. The tomb of Clovis I contained hundreds of small miniature solid gold bees. The bee was the Merovingian symbol. The Merovingian bloodline went into the Hapsburgs. When Napoleon married the Hapsburg Marie Louise they had sown onto their coronation robes the Merovingian gold bees.

The bee is the state symbol of Utah, and a widely used Mormon symbol, such as with their Deseret Industries.

The Mormon Church leadership ties in very tightly with the New World Order and may very well play a significant leadership role.

THE CIA, FBI CONNECTIONS

The CIA and FBI have many ties to the Mormon Church. This is well known in Utah, because these agencies do so much recruiting in Utah. The CIA and FBI also besides having many Mormon agents, have a high percent of Masons within their ranks.

For instance, the participation of the Robert R. Mullen Co., which is the company which handles the Mormon church's international public relations, is a CIA front.¹⁵ According to testimony before Congress, some of the planning for the Watergate burglary took place in Mullen Co.'s offices, and members of its staff knew ahead of time of the breakin.¹⁶

The book Mormon Spies, Hughes And the CIA investigates the close connections and collaborations between the LDS Church and the CIA.¹⁷

History is full of examples of LDS spying activities. The Tanner's book Unmasking A Mormon Spy The Story of Stan Fields provides an example.

The Mormon Church is very similar to the Masonic Lodge in the way it exercises its authority. The Mormon Church gives its members plenty of latitude for freedom of belief, while exercising strong dictatorial authority over its people. An example of this is that while Mormons have the freedom to visit New Age churches, which this Author has witnessed first hand, and while Mormons work for New Age religious groups, the Mormon Church hierarchy maintains a Big Brother vigilance over their own. One source stated that plans had been made to tap and listen to all the Missionary phones within the Portland area. Whether the plans have actually been implemented or not, it shows the mentality of control and power within the hierarchy. It is not by accident then, that Mormons have the freedom to attend New Age seminars.¹⁸

THE MORMONS & THE CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY

For a while, this Author shared an apartment with a Mormon friend. He was much older than this Author, in the neighborhood of 42. He was in good standing with the LDS Church. It was only natural then, when he became unemployed for him to go to the Mormon church's employment service. There, employment specialists, seek to match their clients skills with their job contacts. Many of their job contacts are from LDS members. After visiting the Mormon employment service, this man went to the Church of Scientology, and after an interview was hired onto Hubbard's Church of Scientology staff.

This Author was surprised that an LDS member in good standing would work for the headquarters of a New Age cult. Mormon friends of this man found nothing alarming in the least that he worked for the Church of Scientology.

Is the Church of Scientology a religion? According to their own literature (which at some times says no) they are. To quote one of their pieces of literature, "Is Scientology a religion? Yes! Scientology is a religion in the truest sense of the word...The church of Scientology's purpose is to help the individual lead a happier life, and so there is nothing in Scientology principles to conflict with other religious beliefs." "The Church of Scientology is non-denominational. One can be a Scientologist and also a member of any religious group. There are Catholics, Protestants, members of the Jewish faith and most any other religion who are also active Scientologists."¹⁹

The Church of Scientology kept asking him to volunteer vast amounts of time, and he was lucky to get peanuts in compensation for his hard work, so after several months he quit. He quit because of the lack of pay, not because of religious scruples.

THE MORMONS & THE UNIFICATION CHURCH

W. Cleon Skousen, an ex-FBI agent and former Salt Lake City Chief of Police, is in charge of the Freeman Institute of the Mormon Church.²⁰ The name Freeman Institute even echoes the name given past Masonic magazines and newspapers. The Freeman Institute was established ostensibly to rescue the U.S. Constitution. Interestingly, close examination of Mormon doctrine, reveals the Church plans to supplant the U.S. Constitution with their own in the long run.²⁰¹ Somewhat akin to the fox guarding the chicken house. Anyway, under the guise of fighting communism the Mormons and Moonies have been working together. Things are coming together now and such type of covers will not long be needed.

For those who are familiar with Rev. Moon's claim to be Jesus Christ,²¹ and the Moonies' belief that they will install their man as the world's future ruler, it seems that the Mormons and Moonies are strange bedfellows. How can the Mormons and Moonies work together when they both claim the same thing for their own respective group? Shouldn't the Moony threat to take over the world be as serious as a Communist takeover to the Mormons?

When the Unification Church was taken to court by the IRS, the Mormon Church along with the ACLU, the Unitarian-Universalist Church, the National Churches of Christ, the American Baptists, the African Methodist Epis. Church, and the Freeman Institute supported the Unification Church's position. The Mormon church only gave amici curiae support, in contrast to the some of these groups which participated even more.²²

W. Cleon Skousen has worked in close cooperation with Rev. Moon's CAUSA organization, and he and other members of the Freeman Institute would participate in CAUSA conferences. The Moonies' CAUSA organization has declared, "We affirm that the the God of Judaism, Catholicism, Protestantism, the Mormons, the Unification Church and the God of all religions are one and the same."²³ (emphasis added)

After all the self-proclaimed Christ Sun Myung Moon's pretensions to fight Communism, Moon went to Moscow and declared that Russia was to "play a major role in the plan of God to construct a world of peace."²⁴ Panda, a business which is headed by Moon's closest associates and chief lieutenant, is investing $1 billion in a major automobile plant in Red China to produce cars (the Chinese version of the Chevrolet Chevette) that will be sold to the United States.²⁵ Moon advocates the Internationalist's line for Global Free Trade.

Rev. Moon, who like Joseph Smith, claims to have been visited by angels and Jesus and given the mission to "restore" Christianity. This restoration is to start in the United States and then eventually spread world-wide. And similar also to the Mormon Church is the emphasis on authority and money.

Rev. Moon's church is a good example of how a synthetic religion can be created from scratch, using state of the art mind control, and other religious manipulations. Members are locked into fund-raising and are programmed to fear outsiders. They are told their children are sinless. Rev. Moon and his wife claim to be the first perfect sinless people.

"After World War II, the Rockefellers had secretly acquired substantial holdings in Japan and wanted to see them develop."²⁶

Chase Manhattan (the Rockefeller's bank) was named the lead banker to the South Korean government and acquired Moon's business. The U.S. military government installed the chiefs of South Korean according to Chase Manhattan's advisors. In Oct. 1962 the Korean Central Intelligence Agency (KCIA) an extension of the CIA sent their KCIA chief Kim to meet with his U.S. counterparts. He met CIA director Jone McCone and Lt. Gen. Carroll, head of the Defence Intelligence Agency. Along with Kim was Moon. The most important meeting Kim and Moon had on that trip was with Nelson and David Rockefeller. Both Moon and Nelson hit it off well immediately because both wanted to see a One-World-Government. The Japanese sector of the Rockefeller empire began to covertly finance Moon. The purpose of Rev. Moon's religious anti-communist crusade was to neutralize the patriotic conservative forces opposing the Rockefellers' dream of a New World Order.

A lawyer who worked for the Rockefellers and who confidentially talked said, "David and Nelson Rockefeller were fanatical globalists, and so is Moon. His Unification Church aims to bring Christianity under the same internationalist rule the Rockefellers planned to clamp on the world's nations. Moreover, to reach this goal, the Chase Manhattan crowd had to penetrate and neutralize the patriotic forces of the so-called Republican right wing. If you look closely, that's just what Moon has accomplished."

Sun Myung Moon's Washington Times, the only newspaper Ronald Reagan said he read daily, makes light of The Spotlight's interest in the Bilderberger. Moon's paper would like people to believe that their meetings are simply weekend picnics for businessmen and diplomats.²⁷

Moon promotes globalism within his church by fixing the marriages for all his adherents, and these marriages often mix different nationalities and cultures together. This is further enhanced by sending different nationalities to other lands to work and the communal living situations that the Moonies live in.

W. Cleon Skousen's anti-communist crusade and his book against communism is a joke. He gives the readers of his book no historical perspective of what has really happened. He gives no hint that Communism and Mormonism were both started by Masons. He gives no hint that the Mormon Church practiced Communism before the Communists. When the Mormon Church's communism failed, the church moved into capitalism. This shift happened toward the end of the 19th century. The Mormon Apostle Canon said in reference to Mormonism, "One of the most promising modern experiments in communism has been frustrated and brought to ruin."²⁸

Kuhn, Loeb & Co. which financed the Mormon church in 1898,²⁹ is also known to have financed the Bolshevik Revolution with $20 million dollars. (In 1918 and 1922, the Reds repaid in gold, 600 million rubles in gold was transferred from Russia to Kuhn, Loeb, and Co.)³⁰

Brigham Young described the Mormon leaderships real attitude toward democracy. He said, "Every government lays the foundation of its own downfall when it permits what are called democratic elections."³¹ The Mormon Church went into capitalism like Socialist Russia is doing today—not out a change in doctrine, but because communism failed to work. Individual Mormons still believe that in the future communism will work under the Mormons.³² When the New Jerusalem is established it will be under "The Law of Consecration" or as the Mormon scholar on Prophecy Crowther puts it, "...this [New Jerusalem] will be carried out under the communal living system known in the Church as the United Order or the Law of Consecration."³³ Russian Communism has been consistently portrayed as an enemy by the Mormons and Masons since the 1920s. This pattern of creating two opposing forces such as the Anti-Communists (the FBI, Mormons, Church of Scientology, and Scottish Rite) and the Communists (leftist Labor Unions, Socialists, Russians, Chinese), has been the masterful outworking of the One-World-Power's belief in Hegelian Philosophy. By controlling both sides, the One-World-Power expects to control the outcome, and to be able to direct people's hate and energy as it wills. See note 30 for further study on how Masons and Communists use Hegelian philosophy.

THE MORMON CHURCH & THE NEW AGE MOVEMENT

Aren't the New Age Movement's beliefs different than Mormon beliefs? Yes and No. An examination of the listings in the National New Age Yellow Pages shows what the New Age movement entails. It includes the following:

Healing, Astrology, Health foods, Channeling, crystals and gemstones, dreams and revelations, divining, Hinduism and polytheistic beliefs, magic and the occult, and Godhead for aspirants.

Mormonism contains all these elements. The same type of path to godhead that the New Age packages and sells is promised by the Mormon Church.

This helps explain the repeated little connections one sees between New Agers and Mormons. Some examples are:

1. A New Agy type Mormon Fireside where Networking Techniques were taught.³⁴ While "networking" itself is a legitimate concept, it is also possible to trace some Networking ideas back to New Age sources.
2. William J. Schnoebelen in his book Mormonism's Temple of Doom reports how he was a Druidic witch. His witchcraft mentor was head of all the Druidic witches in North America. This head Druidic witch told him that the highest form of witchcraft practiced in North America was practiced in the Mormon temple ceremonies. Schnoebelen joined the LDS church to receive a deeper occult experience.³⁵

WITCHCRAFT NOT A RECENT INNOVATION FOR MORMONS

A number of people have been seriously bent out of shape by Schnoebelen's mild exposes of witchcraft and Mormonism. It seems people want to ignore the obvious. What? How is it so obvious that witchcraft is within Mormonism?

An examination of Mormonism from the start reveals that it has always been heavy into Magic.

Five of Peter Whitmer, Sr.'s sons and his son-in-law Hiram Page (named after Hiram Abiff) became the witnesses to the Book of Mormon. Their family were Perm. Dutch from Lancaster Co., Pa. and lived near the Rosicrucians and the Ephrata Commune with its occultism. Obviously some of it rubbed off, because the Whitmer family was into Magic.

The original three witnesses to the Book of Mormon were all involved in magic prior to Smith's revelation.(This information comes from Mormon sources.)³⁶

Of the next 8 witnesses, five are known to have been into Magic.

It appears that "at least two-thirds of Mormonism's first 12 Apostles may have had some affinity to magic."³⁷

Most of Mormonism's early converts were not only connected with magic but religious seekers who were frustrated with the standard denominations. Up to 1837 34.4 percent of Mormon converts were people who had not been affiliated with organized religion.³⁸

With the death of Orson Pratt in 1881, the Quorum of 12 Apostles no longer had any of the original Mormon apostles who publicly endorsed magic practices, and a dramatic public shift in attitudes toward public magic occurred. Magic continued but only in the shadows. As has been documented by Schnoebelen, the Mormon temple ceremonies are white magic. It wasn't until this Author learned that one can practice magic without knowing it, and when I learned what Magic is, that it became quite clear that the Temple ceremonies are magic.

Where magic, such as seer stone divination, was widespread among early Mormonism, such practices became rare in the twentieth century. Mormon scholar Quinn mentions an LDS mission president in the 1940's who still practiced magic. Astrology, which had been popular among 19th century Mormons, fell into disuse.³⁹ Contrast this with the early LDS Deseret News, edited by the second counselor in the LDS First Presidency, which carried an astrological table in its first issue.

The use of Astrology among the Mormons goes back to the Order or Fraternity (called by outsiders the Fraternity of Rodmen). Mormon William W. Phelps, whose family is linked to the Fraternity, published an almanac in 1863 which refers to the LDS use of astrology and the to prophecies. "The moon's days in the signs of the Zodiac are also given near enough for the general reader." His 1865 Deseret Almanac also had Zodiac information.

Many Mormons have enjoyed the practice of the Mormon religion, but felt very disturbed by the Temple ceremonies. Many are so disturbed they never return after their first experience. They have good reason to be disturbed.

THE REORGANIZED LATER-DAY SAINTS

The Reorganized Church of Later-Day Saints is the second largest Mormon denomination. The members of this Church view the Book of Mormon as scripture, and are led by a prophet, but are in practice different than the LDS church.

A NEW TOWER OF BABEL

The design of the long awaited RLDS Temple, built on the site of the world's future Millennial capital was the responsibility of the First Presidency and the Presiding Bishopric.¹ Some people were alarmed when the long awaited RLDS temple in Independence, MO was planned with a spiral design similar to the famed Tower of Babel. Scholars have long viewed the spiral Babylonian Ziggurats to have been the design of the first Tower of Babel, "the identification of the tower of Babel with one such ziggurat seems inescapable."²

The RLDS prophet Wallace B. Smith said, "The design gives the impression of seeking to link that which is earthbound with the creator who is beyond our reach."³ It is "a symbol of our vision of Zion."⁴

According to RLDS sources, this $60 million temple will not be used for temple ceremonies like the LDS temples. If this information is accurate, it would mean that the Masonic-like temple ceremonies like the LDS church's and the top secret witchcraft meetings in the LDS temples would not be take place in the RLDS temple. The public stance of the RLDS church is that its temple will not be used for secret ceremonies.

THE RLDS GOVERNMENT

The government of the RLDS Mormon Church has been described as Theocratic or Theocratic Democracy. Although the RLDS prophets have all been lineal descendents of Joseph Smith, Jr. and his son Joseph Smith III, there has always been an effort toward democratic processes within this denomination.

THE FIRST RLDS PROPHET

The first prophet of the RLDS church was the son of Joseph Smith, Jr. named Joseph Smith III.

Joseph Smith III had a style of leadership much different than his father's. He also was a leader, but his ideas took the RLDS church in a path that seemed more like the mainstream Christian denominations. The RLDS church initially carried out an active missionary program to recruit LDS members over to their organization. It was believed that the credentials of authority of their organization which were superior to the LDS would draw Mormons in Utah into their organization. Because the RLDS church was opposed to polygamy (while the LDS church practiced it), and was opposed to other unscriptural practices that the LDS church practiced, many non-Mormons and Christians have cooperated with them. Likewise, the cordial relationship between Christians and members of the RLDS church continue. For instance, a R.L.D. Saint works with Saints Alive, a Christian ministry to Mormons and Masons.

Joseph Smith III was initially interested in Spiritism, but gave it up, before he became the RLDS prophet.

"Smith took part in the seances in Nauvoo for some time, but by at least 1852 his interest in Spiritism began to wane. Two significant events turned him against the cult and in so doing, may have paved the way for his eventual return to a form of Mormonism."⁵

Joseph Smith III spoke of his rejection of spiritism, "I feel it is not a part of the divine plan to allow spirits to communicate with mortals, and I can scarcely see how we can have tangible intercourse with departed spirits..."⁶

Since Joseph Smith, III, the leadership of the RLDS church has been passed down the line of his decedents. (See appendix for list.)

THE RLDS CHURCH IS OPEN TO THE OCCULT & SECRET SOCIETIES

Although Joseph Smith III sincerely rejected spiritism, the RLDS church itself has never taken a stand against the Masons or other occultic powers. That pattern was established by the General Conference Resolution 175 in 1874.⁷ Joseph Smith III said, "If they [church members] choose to belong to the Masons, or Odd Fellows, or any other secret organization, they are at liberty to do so as far as the church is concerned."⁸

According to various Mason historians, many of the RLDS members have been Masons. The Mason Haywood states, "After the Mormons split, the mother group remained in Illinois, and later made its capital in Independence, Mo.; many of its members have been Masons ever since."⁹

Joseph Smith III's successor reaffirmed the church's open attitude toward Freemasonry when he rebuked in 1906 the editor of the Saints Herald for an editorial the editor had written. The editorial is very revealing in itself. It said, "that members of the United States Senate who were members of the Masonic Order might feel sympathetic toward Mr. Smoot [an LDS senator under investigation] in regards to the secret oaths by which he was said to be bound to the Mormon hierarchy, since they themselves took such oaths on becoming Masons."¹⁰ (Emphasis added.) This comment helps substantiate the Masonic references which state that legally and morally the Masonic Lodge and the LDS church are the same. Here the editor of the Saints Herald. Leon A. Gould, is equating the oaths of the Mormon hierarchy and the Masonic Lodge's oaths.

While the RLDS church gives some good advice against the occult to its members such as an article in the Saints Herald entitled "Magic and Religion",¹¹ it has always given members the latitude to explore and participate in such activity. This has been an open door to subversion by the Masons and the New Age. It appears that the lack of safeguards has indeed permitted the RLDS church leaders to shift their denomination in the direction of participating with the One-World-Religion that is has been established.

PARTICIPATION IN THE ONE-WORLD-RELIGION

There has been a definite shift in the RLDS church toward the New Age. It has joined the World Council of Churches, and other such activities. 19th century Masonic plans had goals to introduce feminism and abortion. In the 1970s the RLDS church came out in favor of these items and gave its support to the pro-New Age group NOW, the liberal feminist National Organization for Women.¹² The RLDS church has begun participating in such things as an international organization "Church Women United" at the United Nations.¹³

SMITH'S DAUGHTER

Wallace B. Smith has no male successor, and there is speculation that one of his daughters will take the helm once he passes on. If this would happen, it would seem to insure that the RLDS church will move even closer to a New Age stance.

THE ORIGIN OF MORMONISM,

By MRS. DR. HORACE EATON, of Palmyra, N. Y.

DEAR SISTERS.—A ride of less than three hours on the New York Central, due east, will bring you to the town of Palmyra, in the vicinity of which, the system of Mormonism was initiated. In this town it has been my privilege to reside for the last thirty-two years. I speak to you from credible testimony. Western New York has strong soil and rank weeds are incidental to strong soil. We must own the deceivers. "They went out from us, but they were not of us." The deceived were elsewhere.

As far as Mormonism was connected with its reputed founder, Joseph, always called "Joe Smith," it had its origin in the brain and heart of an ignorant, deceitful mother. Joe Smith's mother moved in the lowest walks of life, but she had a kind of mental power, which her son shared. With them both, the imagination was the commanding faculty. It was "vain" but vivid. To it was subsidized reason, conscience, truth. Both mother and son were noted for a habit of extravagant assertion. They would look a listener full in the eye, and without confusion or blanching, would fluently improvise startling statements and exciting stories, the warp and woof of which were alike sheer falsehood. Was an inconsistency alluded to, nothing daunted, a subterfuge was always at hand. As one old man, who knew them well, said to me, "You couldn't face them down. They'd lie and stick to it." Many of the noblest specimens of humanity have arisen from a condition of honest poverty; but few of these from one of dishonest poverty. Agur apprehended the danger when he said, "lest I be poor and steal." Mrs. Smith used to go to the houses of the village, and do family washings. But if the articles were left to dry upon the lines and not secured by their owners before midnight, the washer was often the winner—and in these nocturnal depredations she was assisted by her boys, who favored in like manner poultry yards and grain bins. Her son Joe never worked save at chopping bees and raisings, and then whisky was the impetus and the reward. The mother of the high-priest of Mormonism was superstitious to the last degree. The very air she breathed was inhabited by "familiar spirits that peeped and wizards that muttered." She turned many a penny by tracing in the lines of the open palm the fortunes of the inquirer. All ominous signs were heeded. No work was commenced on Friday. The moon over the left shoulder portended calamity; the breaking of a mirror, death. Even in the old Green Mountain State, before the family immigrated to the Genesee country, the then West, Mrs. Smith's mind was made up that one of her sons should be a prophet. The weak father agreed with her that Joseph was the "genus" of their nine children. So it was established that Joseph should be the prophet. To such an extent did the mother impress this idea upon the boy, that all the instincts of childhood were restrained. He rarely smiled or laughed. "His looks and thoughts were always downward bent." He never indulged in demonstrations of fun, since they would not be in keeping with the profound dignity of his allotted vocation. His mother inspired and aided him in every scheme of duplicity and cunning. All acquainted with the facts agree in saying that the evil spirit of Mormonism dwelt first in Joe Smith's mother.

Bad books had much to do with the origin of Mormonism. Joe Smith could read. He could not write. His two standard volumes were "The Life of Stephen Burroughs," the clerical scoundrel, and the autobiography of Capt. Kidd, the pirate. This latter work was eagerly and often perused. There was a fascination to him in the charmed lines:

"My name was Robert Kidd,
As I sailed, as I sailed,
And most wickedly I did,
And God's laws I did forbid,
As I sailed, as I sailed."

At the early age of fifteen, while watching his father digging a well, Joe espied a stone of curious shape. It must have borne resemblance to the stone foot of Buddha, which Mrs. House tells us of at Bangkok, Siam. All the difference, this was smaller, like a child's foot. At any rate, it has left footprints on the sands of time. "This little stone was the acorn of the Mormon-oak." This was the famous Palmyra "seer" or "peek stone," with which Joseph Smith did most certainly divine. Being before instructed of his mother, he immediately set up a claim to miraculous power. In a kneeling posture, with a bandage on his eyes, so luminous was the sight without it, with the stone in a large white stove-pipe hat, and this hat in front of his face, he saw things unutterably wonderful. He could reveal, full too well, the place where stolen property, or wandering flocks could be found. Caskets of gold stored away by the Spaniards, or by his hero, the redoubtable Captain Kidd, coffers of gems, oriental treasures, the "wealth of Ormus and of Ind," gleamed beneath the ground in adjacent fields and woodlands. Digging became the order of the night, and sleep that of the day. Father and brothers, decayed neighbors, all who could be hired with cider or strong drink, were organized into a digging phalanx. They sallied forth in the darkness. Solemn ceremonies prefaced the work. Not a sod was disturbed by the spades, till Joe's mystic wand, the witch hazel, guided by the sacred stone, pointed out the golden somewhere. Entire silence was one condition of success. When hours had passed, and the answering thud on the priceless chest was about to strike the ear, some one, in a rapture of expectancy, always broke the spell by speaking, the riches were spirited away to another quarter, and the digging must be resumed another night. Thus matters went on for some seven or eight years. Little or no attention was paid to the performances of Smith near his home. Lovers of the marvelous from other towns now and then came in to see and hear some new thing. People from greater distances visited the several excavations and wondered. Newspapers heralded and ridiculed. But so far it amounted to nothing, unless it created a certain atmosphere heavy with myth and mystery, favorable to future developments.

The perseverance of Joe Smith was equal to his audacity. Both were boundless. But he alone could never have wrought out the institution of Mormonism. Here we have "black spirits, red spirits and gray." Early in the summer of 1827 a "mysterious stranger" seeks admittance to Joe Smith's cabin. The conferences of the two are most private. This person, whose coming immediately preceded a new departure in the faith, was Sidney Rigdon, a backsliding clergyman, at this time a Campbellite preacher in Mentor, Ohio. Now we have "a literary genius behind the screen." Rigdon was versatile in his gifts, had a taste for theological and scientific discussion, was shrewd, wily, deep and withal utterly unprincipled. Soon after his appearance on the stage, Mormonism begins to assume "a local habitation and a name." Now the angel talks more definitely to Smith, tells him all his sins are pardoned, that none of the sects are accepted of God as his church, but that he shall establish one the Almighty will own; that the North American Indians are a remnant of the Israelites; that hidden beneath the ground are their inspired writings; that these are to be intrusted to him, and to him only, as none other can see them and live. In the stillness of night Smith seeks alone his hill-top of Curmoral, an eminence four miles south of Palmyra, eight north of Canandaigua. Confronted by the very pyrotechnics of Piuto, he averred that he obtained from that place a series of golden plates, on which were written in hieroglyphics, the records so important in the new dispensation. Accompanying the plates is a pair of huge spectacles, the Urim and Thummim, by the aid of which the tablets are to become available. He soon finds it convenient to visit relatives in Pennsylvania, in which state, Rigdon was then sojourning. After a while he returns with an accurate translation. He appeals to the cupidity of a rich farmer, a semi-monomaniac, and prevails upon him to mortgage his estate to pay for the printing. Here is a copy taken off in sheets from the first edition, kindly loaned me by Major John Gilbert, of Palmyra, the venerable printer, who finished the work in 1830.

But who wrote the book? Surely not Smith or Rigdon. We will go back to the time when Joe Smith lay in his cradle in Sharon, Vt. In 1809, a Congregational minister, Rev. Solomon Spaulding, a graduate of Dartmouth College, left his native state of Vermont, sojourned awhile in ours, and then sought the more genial climate of Conneaut, Ashtabula County, Ohio. He was obliged by the state of his health to abandon preaching. The cast of his mind was peculiar. He often diverted himself by writing romances on different subjects. The mounds of that section of Ohio then attracted much attention. Mr. Spaulding was intensely interested in their study, and even opened up one near his own dwelling. He adopted the theory that these mounds were evidences of the existence of an extinct race, higher in the scale than the American aborigines. He wrote a story in Biblical phraseology, delineating in a fanciful manner the wanderings, wars, exploits, and fate of this primeval people. He afterward removed to Pittsburgh, Pa. Some said to him as John Bunyan's friends to the dreamer, "Print it." He left it with a publisher in Pittsburgh by the name of Patterson. For some reason it never went to press. After three years it was returned to its author, who died in 1816. Without doubt, Mr. Spaulding's romance, entitled "The Manuscript Found" is the Golden Bible, or Book of Mormon.*

But how came Rigdon or Smith, or both, in the possession of Mr. Spaulding's book? Here we have not absolute certainty. There were two or three ways in which the men and the book could have been brought together. This is common to each—by theft.

Smith was at one time servant or teamster in the family of William H. Sabine Esq., the brother of Mrs. Spaulding, and could easily have had access to this manuscript in an unlocked trunk in the garret of Mr. Sabine's house. It is generally believed however that Rigdon, while a journeyman printer in the office of Patterson, copied Mr. Spaulding's story: that by some means he heard of Smith, knew his man even at a distance, and was sure Smith's idiosyncrasies would just file in with his own purpose of carrying out a foul and lucrative imposture. There was a ubiquitous tin peddler in those days by the name of Parley P. Pratt. He knew everybody in Western New York and Northern Ohio. He was a member of Rev. Sidney Rigdon's church in Mentor, Ohio. Perhaps Pratt was the carrier-vulture who told Rigdon of the money digger, Smith.

The mildest criticism that can be passed upon Mr. Spaulding's fancy sketch is, that the interest is not well sustained, and that it indicates the languor and hectic of the physical decline of its author. But it is hardly fair to speak of the intellectual merits of a book which was, without question, grossly altered by Rigdon and Smith to adapt it to the code of the Latter Day Saints. When new commands were given by the angel, whether to institute the order of the priesthood of Melchizedek, or to engraft on the system permission for the polygamous or the spiritual marriage, Rigdon's pen was ever ready to issue the encyclical, simulating Mr. Spaulding's Hebraic idioms.

Mormonism fairly started, Smith prophesied, Rigdon and Pratt preached, Cowdery baptized, Harris paid. But no prophet is accepted in his own country. Converts came in tardily. The angel said, "Move forward to Kirtland, Ohio." This was near Rigdon's old parish. From this place they were soon expelled by the righteous indignation of an outraged people. Is there any significance in the fact that the Ohio Mormon encampment was located but a few miles from the home of our beloved President Garfield? Had their disgraceful career in his state anything to do with the manly words of the inaugural? Our President "knoweth of these things. We are persuaded that none of these things are hidden from him." God grant that he may have "come to the kingdom for such a time as this."

Those who originated Mormonism now stand before the tribunal of that Being who has threatened to "silence lying lips." In 1844, Joe Smith, when but thirty-six years old, was assassinated in Nauvoo, Ill. Parley P. Pratt died in the same manner in Arkansas in 1856 or 1857. After Smith's decease, Rigdon naturally aspired to the dictatorship. But he was defeated by Brigham Young, was expelled from the church and given over by Brigham to the buffetings of Satan. Rigdon has since died, as far as we know without penitence or confession.

An apology might be offered for the above puerile and revolting statements were they not connected with the beginning of the institution of Mormonism, which, as another has remarked, "presents a problem which the wisest politician has failed to solve, and whose outcome lies in the mystery of the future."

One thought more—and it is a solemn one—Mormonism may have risen from neglect on the part of Christian workers. We have no knowledge of the religious influences thrown around the Smith family when living in Vermont. At twelve years of age Joe came to Palmyra, and should have been immediately secured in one of its Sabbath schools. As far we can learn, not any of the family were invited cordially, heartily to the house of God. Some of them strolled in occasionally. But no persistent effort was made to induce them to become regular attendants. The children were not repeatedly visited, clothed or helped to clothe themselves that they might attend the Sabbath school. And this in a community distinguished for the godliness of its early settlers. Had they expressed to the visitor a preference for a denomination other than his own, he should promptly and honorably have given over their names and locality to the pastor of the church of their choice.

Depend upon it, there were redeeming traits somewhere even in this family. Joseph Smith's mother was not a malignant woman. She knew the virtues of remedial roots and herbs, and was ever ready to administer and assist when her lowly neighbors were sick or dying. But ladies of piety and culture never visited Mrs. Smith in her home in a sequestered neighborhood two or three miles from the village, never sat down by her side, and, in an unpatronizing manner, sympathized with her in her many cares and labors, wisely dropped a word of friendly advice, supplied the family with reading for the week days and the Sabbath days, and by all possible methods made them feel that they loved their souls. No male member of the church halted as he passed the door of the rude, unpainted house on a Sabbath morning, and found room in his capacious family carriage or sleigh for any of the little or big Smiths, that they might go up to the temple of the Lord, and learn to worship there. To the inquiry, "Why was not more done to win them to a better life," I received this reply,—“Oh, they were such an awful family. Nobody wanted to go there. Nobody could. Why, they were the torment and the terror of the neighborhood.” Our beloved Master “came to seek and to save that which was lost.” They said of Him, “He was gone to be guest with a man that is a sinner.” He was not ashamed or afraid to touch with His hand—mark, with His hand—the demoniac and the leper. Had His dear children in early day reached out theirs to this poor, outcast household, possibly this terrible ulcer of Mormonism might not now be corroding into the very vitals of the nation's purity and life.

The women of the Synods of Western New York are doing much for Utah. Aware that the poisonous virus went out from us, we feel that there is a relevancy, a fitness in our following it with the counteracting, neutralizing, healing antidote, the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. And in this work we are assured we have the co-operation of the women of our entire church.

This is of a kind, dear sisters, that goeth not out, but by prayer and fasting. Prof. Coyner, our missionary at Salt Lake City, thus analyzes it. "Mormonism is made up of twenty parts. Take eight parts diabolism, three parts of animalism from the Mohammedan system, one part bigotry from old Judaism, four parts cunning and treachery from Jesuitism, two parts Thugism from India and two parts Arnoldism, and then shake the mixture over the fires of animal passion and throw in 'the forms and ceremonies of the Christian religion and you will have this system in its true component elements." It numbers over 200,000. Its Book of Mormon is translated into many tongues. It has eighty two churches in Great Britain and 7000 converts in the Sandwich Islands. There are proselytes in every clime. Its representative has been honored in the halls of Congress and has a defence in the North American Review.

For the sake of our bewildered, deluded sisters, snared in an evil time, for the sake of the country we love, let us labor and pray and give for Utah.

We are encouraged to work for the speedy overthrow of this gigantic bulwark from the very nature of its origin. Its basis is not truth but falsehood. Every stone cries out of its wall "Deceit, deceit." Every beam out of its timber answers back, "deceit." May the words of a true prophet be fulfilled without blood, by the breath of Jehovah's mouth and the brightness of His coming.—"Because they have seen vanity and lying divination, saying, 'The Lord saith,' and they have made others to hope that they would confirm the word—therefore mine hand shall be against the prophets that see vanity and divine lies, because, even because they have seduced my people. And one built up a wall and others daubed it with untempered mortar. Therefore, saith the Lord God, I will even rend the wall with a stormy wind in my fury. So I will break down the wall and bring it down to the ground, so that the foundation thereof shall be discovered. And it shall fall. And I will say unto you, the wall is no more neither they that daubed it."

NOTE.—The above History was read by Mrs. Dr. Eaton at the Union Home Missionary Meeting, held at Buffalo, N. Y., May 27th, 1881, over which Mrs. J. L. Graham of New York presided. It is now published by the Woman's Executive Committee of Home Missions, of which Mrs. Ashbel Green is President.

The fact that in this 19th Century, a delusion as wicked as it is patent, should spread itself "like a green bay-tree," not alone through Utah, but into adjacent Territories, where already it begins to control the elections, shows what the power of Satan still is in the world.

Patriotism dies away under the shadow of Mormonism. On that sad day, July 2nd, 1881, when grief, elsewhere paralyzing and universal, welded us into a Nation, into a Union indeed, there were demonstrations of joy in Salt Lake City.

Is there not need of prompt, vigorous action in order to destroy, at its very roots, a tree, known by such fruit? Experience proves that let the minds and hearts of children be pre-empted by truth, error then cannot long maintain a foot-hold. To this end, let more christian schools be quickly and quietly established wherever Mormonism now prevails. This can be done by the Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church, so far as the women of the Church provide the means for such extension. An average outlay of $600 the first year, with salary of teacher, is needed at each station. This can be divided between several societies.

For information in detail as to the places where a chapel-school-room must be provided, and the support of a teacher assured, apply to Mrs. F. E. H. Haines, 23 Centre street, New York City, P. O. Introduction

The Lord admonished, "Wherefore, now let every man learn his duty, and to act in the office in which he is appointed, in all diligence" (D&C 107:99; see also D&C 105:10).

Church leaders should seek personal revelation to help them learn and fulfill the duties of their callings.

Studying the scriptures and the teachings of latter-day prophets will also help leaders learn and fulfill their duties. The Lord has admonished leaders to treasure up in their minds continually the words of God so they will be receptive to the influence of the Spirit (see D&C 84:85).

Leaders also learn their duties by studying the instructions in Church handbooks. These instructions can facilitate revelation if they are used to provide an understanding of principles, policies, and procedures to apply while seeking the guidance of the Spirit.

Introduction to the Church Handbook of Instructions

The Church Handbook of Instructions consists of two books:

- Book 1: Stake Presidencies and Bishoprics. For the most part, this book includes information that only stake presidencies and bishoprics need. However, other stake and ward leaders may have access to this information as needed for reference.
- Book 2: Priesthood and Auxiliary Leaders. This book provides instructions for administering priesthood quorums and auxiliaries. It also provides instructions on Church programs, activities, leadership, and selected policies. This publication is bound as a single book for stake presidencies, bishoprics, high priests group leaders, elders quorum presidents, and auxiliary presidents. Individual sections are published for leaders who do not need the entire book.

Updates and Supplements to Instructions

Occasionally the information in the Church Handbook of Instructions will be updated or supplemented through letters, notices, and other communication from the First Presidency, Quorum of the Twelve, and Presiding Bishopric. When this occurs, leaders should write the changes in their copies of the handbooks. Leaders should keep handbooks and these supplementary materials together.

Questions about Instructions

Leaders who have questions about information in the Church Handbook of Instructions or about issues that are not addressed should direct the questions to their immediate presiding authority.

Application in Branches, Districts, and Missions

Unless the context shows otherwise, the terms bishop and bishopric in the Church Handbook of Instructions refer also to branch presidents and branch presidencies. The terms stake president and stake presidency refer also to district presidents and district presidencies. References to wards and stakes usually apply also to branches, districts, and missions.

Distribution of Book 1

Book 1: Stake Presidencies and Bishoprics should be distributed as follows:

- General Authorities, Area Seventies, general Church department heads, general auxiliary presidencies, directors for temporal affairs (1 copy each)
- Temple presidency (4 copies)
- Stake presidency (5 copies)
- Bishopric (4 copies)
- Mission presidency (3 copies)
- District presidency (5 copies)
- Branch presidency (3 copies)

Book 1 has been prepared solely for use by general and local Church officers to administer the affairs of the Church. The entire book should not be duplicated. However, the stake president or bishop may authorize portions to be duplicated for high councilors and others as needed.

When Church officers who have a copy of Book 1 are released, they should give the copy promptly to their successor or to their presiding authority.

List of Items Referenced

The Church Handbook of Instructions refers to many other Church-produced materials. An alphabetical list of these materials is provided below. If item numbers have been assigned, they are included in this list rather than in the text of the handbook. Most of these materials are available through Church Distribution Services. 1. General, Area, and Regional Administration

General Church Administration

First Presidency

The President of the Church is the prophet, seer, and revelator. As the senior apostle and president of the Melchizedek Priesthood, he presides over the entire Church (see D&C 107:8, 65–67, 91–92). He is the only person on earth who may use (or authorize another person to use) the apostolic keys of the priesthood for governing the entire Church (see D&C 43:1–4; 81:2; 132:7). He is also the only person on earth who is authorized to receive revelation for the entire Church (see D&C 28:2; 132:7).

The President's counselors are also prophets, seers, and revelators. The President and his counselors form the Quorum of the First Presidency of the Church (see D&C 107:22).

Quorum of the Twelve Apostles

Members of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles are "special witnesses of the name of Christ in all the world" (D&C 107:23). They act under the direction of the First Presidency "to build up the church, and regulate all the affairs of the same in all nations" (D&C 107:33). They "open the door [to the nations] by the proclamation of the gospel of Jesus Christ" (D&C 107:35).

The Twelve direct the calling of stake patriarchs (see D&C 107:39). They also "ordain and set in order all the other officers of the church" (D&C 107:58).

Along with the First Presidency, the Twelve are prophets, seers, and revelators. They also hold the keys of the kingdom of God on earth (see D&C 27:12–13; 110:13–16; 112:30–32).

Quorums of the Seventy

Members of the Quorums of the Seventy are "called to preach the gospel, and to be especial witnesses unto the Gentiles and in all the world" (D&C 107:25). They work "under the direction of the Twelve . . . in building up the church and regulating all the affairs of the same in all nations" (D&C 107:34). In their quorums, the Seventy are presided over by the Presidents of the Seventy (see D&C 107:93–94).

Those who are called to the First and Second Quorums of the Seventy are designated General Authorities, with jurisdiction throughout the Church.

Those who are called to other Quorums of the Seventy are designated Area Seventies, with jurisdiction limited to the areas in which they are assigned. Area Seventies are assigned to quorums according to geographic location.

Members of the Quorums of the Seventy may be assigned to preside at stake conferences, create and reorganize stakes, set apart stake presidencies, and ordain and set apart bishops. In addition, they may be assigned to tour missions and assist with training in stakes, missions, and districts. They may be given other responsibilities as needed.

Presiding Bishopric

The Presiding Bishopric is the presidency of the Aaronic Priesthood of the Church (see D&C 107:15). Under the direction of the First Presidency, the Presiding Bishopric also administers the temporal affairs of the Church (see D&C 107:68).

Area Administration

The Church is divided into geographic areas for administrative purposes. An area is the largest geographic division of the Church.

Presidency of the Seventy

The First Presidency assigns the Presidency of the Seventy to supervise designated areas of the Church under the direction of the Quorum of the Twelve.

The Presidency of the Seventy holds the keys of presidency over the Quorums of the Seventy.

Area Presidencies

The First Presidency assigns Area Presidencies to preside over selected areas of the Church under the direction of the Quorum of the Twelve. Area Presidents are usually assigned from the First or Second Quorum of the Seventy. Their counselors may be assigned from any Quorum of the Seventy.

Area Seventies

Area Seventies serve under the direction of the Quorum of the Twelve, the Presidents of the Seventy, and the Area Presidency where they are assigned. Area Seventies are assigned to areas and quorums according to geographic location.

Regional Administration

Areas of the Church are divided into regions for welfare purposes only. When creating or restructuring welfare regions, a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency obtains the concurrence of the Presiding Bishopric and the Welfare Executive Committee.

A member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency organizes a regional welfare committee for each welfare region. The composition and responsibilities of this committee are outlined on pages 60–61.

2. Stake Administration

Purpose and Organization of a Stake

Most geographic areas of the Church are divided into stakes. A stake normally is composed of five to twelve wards and branches. The term stake comes from the prophecies of Isaiah, who described latter-day Zion as a tent or tabernacle that would be held secure by stakes (see Isaiah 33:20; 54:2). The stakes of Zion are places of security that protect all who enter.

The purpose of a stake is to be “a defense, and . . . a refuge from the storm, and from wrath when it shall be poured out . . . upon the whole earth” (D&C 115:6). Stakes are gathering places where Church members can serve and strengthen each other, become unified, and receive priesthood ordinances and gospel instruction.

Stake Presidency

The stake president holds the priesthood keys to preside over the stake and direct the work of the Church in the stake. He and his counselors minister to stake members in love, helping “bring to pass the immortality and eternal life of man” (Moses 1:39).

The stake president has four principal responsibilities in presiding over a stake:

1. He is the presiding high priest in the stake and president of the stake high priests quorum.
2. He is a common judge.
3. He directs the Church welfare program and operations.
4. He oversees finances, records, reports, and properties.

These responsibilities are outlined in this section. The stake president and his counselors should seek the Lord's guidance in fulfilling them.

The stake president should delegate many assignments to his counselors, high councilors, the stake clerk, the stake executive secretary, and assistant stake clerks. This allows him to concentrate on duties that he alone should ordinarily do.

If the stake president is absent, ill, or otherwise unable to perform his duties, a counselor may act in his place temporarily except as noted in this handbook. The counselor is to consult with a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area President if he has questions about acting for the stake president.

Presiding High Priest

The stake president has the following responsibilities as the presiding high priest in the stake. His counselors assist him.

Teach the Gospel

Members of the stake presidency are teachers. They teach the gospel in meetings, classes, and interviews. They should also bear their testimonies often.

The stake president and his counselors base their teaching on the scriptures and the words of the latter-day prophets (see D&C 42:12; 52:9). They teach by the power of the Spirit, strengthening members' faith in the Savior and their commitment to obey His commandments (see D&C 42:14; 43:15).

Members of the stake presidency oversee others who teach the gospel in the stake. They ensure that teaching is effective and doctrinally correct. They also encourage members to study, teach, and live the gospel at home.

For more information about teaching, see pages 300–306 in Book 2.

Instruct Leaders

Members of the stake presidency instruct leaders in doctrines, responsibilities, policies, and procedures. This instruction should inspire leaders to grow spiritually and seek the Lord's guidance in fulfilling their callings.

Resources for instructing leaders include the scriptures, teachings of the latter-day prophets, Church handbooks, and other Church-produced training materials.

Oversee Efforts to Accomplish the Mission of the Church

Missionary Work (Proclaiming the Gospel). Members of the stake presidency have the following responsibilities for missionary work:

They set an example in sharing the gospel and fellowshipping new members. They also encourage members to participate in these efforts.

They assign a high councilor to assist them in overseeing missionary work. He is an important resource to them in missionary matters. He may be assigned to coordinate and follow through on much of the administrative work. He may also be assigned to plan and conduct training for ward mission leaders, ward missionaries, and ward priesthood and auxiliary leaders, in coordination with bishops.

They ensure that priesthood leaders and others are instructed in their missionary responsibilities.

They ensure that the doctrines, principles, and blessings relating to missionary work are taught regularly in stake and ward meetings.

The stake president oversees bishops in their missionary, retention, and activation responsibilities. He ensures that each ward has an effective ward mission plan, that a capable ward mission leader and an appropriate number of ward missionaries have been called, and that missionary coordination meetings are being held in the ward.

In his monthly interviews with bishops, the stake president asks for a report on the progress of investigators, new members, and less-active members in the ward. He and the bishop discuss plans and goals for these individuals. The bishop should bring a copy of the Progress Record form, maintained by the full-time missionaries, for this discussion. The bishop should also bring copies of the New Member Report form and the ward mission plan to review as needed.

The stake president interviews and recommends prospective full-time missionaries. He also sets them apart before their missions and interviews and releases them at the completion of their missions. (See pages 91-102.)

The stake president meets regularly with the full-time mission president to share reports on the progress of the work and to coordinate the use of full-time missionaries in the stake as follows:

1. Number and location of missionaries. The mission president determines the placement of missionaries within the mission. In consultation with bishops, the stake president may recommend the number and location of full-time missionaries to be assigned within the stake. The mission president then assigns missionaries according to their availability and other considerations.
2. Assistance in activation efforts. The stake president and mission president work together to make full-time missionaries available to assist local leaders in their efforts with less-active members. The mission president informs the stake president of the missionary support that he can make available. The stake president, in consultation with bishops, determines how much missionary support is needed. For information about full-time missionaries helping with activation efforts, see page 310 in Book 2.

3. Assistance in training. The stake president may ask the mission president for help in training local leaders and members, including ward missionaries. The mission president may involve the full-time missionaries in this training.

4. Meals and housing for missionaries. The stake president and mission president determine whether and to what extent Church members should provide meals and housing for missionaries.

Where there are large numbers of stakes in one mission, coordinating council meetings may be used to coordinate these matters (see page 60).

When requested by the mission president, the stake president may interview or counsel individual missionaries.

The stake presidency's responsibility for new members and less-active members is outlined on page 308 in Book 2.

Spiritual and Temporal Welfare (Perfecting the Saints). Each member of the stake presidency should set an example in spiritual welfare by praying, serving, keeping covenants, and striving for virtue and holiness in his own life (see Moroni 10:32-33; D&C 38:24). The stake presidency sets the spiritual tone in the stake.

One of the stake presidency's most important responsibilities is helping members build spiritual strength. The stake presidency should pray continually for guidance in this effort. Suggestions include teaching and testifying of the gospel, teaching members to pray and study the scriptures, emphasizing the importance of the family, helping members prepare to receive all essential ordinances and keep the associated covenants, providing opportunities to serve, making meetings edifying, and showing love by ministering to members individually.

Members of the stake presidency set an example in temporal welfare by striving to become self-reliant and by caring for the poor and needy. They also encourage members in these efforts.

Members of the stake presidency teach stake, ward, and quorum leaders their welfare responsibilities. The stake president takes special care to instruct bishops in the principles and policies of administering welfare assistance. As part of his monthly interview with each bishop, the stake president inquires about the welfare of individual ward members and discusses the use of fast offerings and the welfare assistance given to members.

Members of the stake presidency ensure that the doctrines, principles, and blessings relating to welfare are taught regularly in stake and ward meetings.

For information about welfare doctrines and principles, see pages 255–58 in Book 2. For information about the stake presidency's responsibilities to direct the Church welfare program and operations, see pages 8–10 in this book. This information is also available in Providing in the Lord's Way: A Leader's Guide to Welfare.

Temple and Family History Work (Redeeming the Dead). Members of the stake presidency oversee temple and family history work in the stake. They also set an example in doing this work. This includes regularly attending the temple where circumstances allow, identifying their kindred dead, and providing temple ordinances for them.

Members of the stake presidency assign one or more high councilors to assist them in overseeing temple and family history work.

They ensure that the doctrines, principles, and blessings of temple and family history work are taught regularly in stake and ward meetings. To help encourage members to participate, they share their testimonies and experiences relating to this work.

They help members prepare to receive their own temple ordinances. They also encourage members to identify their kindred dead and provide temple ordinances for them.

They interview stake members for temple recommends as outlined on pages 75–79. They also teach bishoprics how to conduct these interviews and issue recommends. They encourage members to attend the temple regularly where circumstances allow.

They determine whether the stake should participate in family record extraction and whether the stake should request a family history center.

For more information, see pages 75–89 in this book and the “Temple and Family History Work” section of Book 2.

Preside over the Melchizedek Priesthood

Members of the stake presidency have the following responsibilities in presiding over the Melchizedek Priesthood in the stake:

1. Serve as the presidency of the stake high priests quorum; the stake president is the quorum president (see page 163 in Book 2).
2. Oversee elders quorums (see page 163 in Book 2).
3. Oversee ordinations to the offices of elder and high priest (see pages 39–41 in this book).
4. Preside over the stake priesthood executive committee and the stake Melchizedek Priesthood committee (see pages 315 and 316 in Book 2).

5. Oversee home teaching (see pages 168–70 in Book 2).
6. Oversee efforts to minister to new members and less-active members (see pages 307–10 in Book 2).

Oversee the Aaronic Priesthood and Young Women

Members of the stake presidency have the following responsibilities in overseeing Aaronic Priesthood holders and young women in the stake:

1. Preside over the stake Aaronic Priesthood committee and the stake Aaronic Priesthood–Young Women committee (see page 316 in Book 2).
2. Oversee the stake Young Men and Young Women organizations.
3. Instruct bishoprics in their responsibilities for Aaronic Priesthood holders and young women.

For more information, see pages 178–79 and 214–15 in Book 2.

Direct the High Council

See pages 10–11.

Preside over Stake Committees and Councils

The stake president presides over the stake priesthood executive committee, stake council, stake welfare committee, and stake Melchizedek Priesthood committee.

The stake president usually assigns one of his counselors to preside over the stake Aaronic Priesthood committee, stake Aaronic Priesthood–Young Women committee, and stake committee for single members. The stake president or an assigned counselor is chairman of the stake public affairs council.

For information about these committees and councils, see pages 315–17 in Book 2.

Conduct Stake Business

The stake president conducts stake business with General Authorities and Area Seventies and receives counsel and instructions from them. He also oversees the goals and plans for each part of stake activity. When needed, he recommends the creation, division, or changing of boundaries of stakes and wards (see pages 167–71).

See pages 45–58.

Oversee Stake Auxiliaries and Programs

The stake presidency oversees the stake auxiliary organizations:

Relief Society (see page 194 in Book 2)

Young Men (including Scouting, where authorized; see pages 178–79 in Book 2 and the Scouting Handbook)

Young Women (see pages 214–15 in Book 2)

Sunday School (see page 241 in Book 2)

The stake president oversees the stake Relief Society. He assigns his counselors to oversee the other auxiliaries under his direction. He also assigns a high councilor to be an adviser to each auxiliary presidency (assigning a high council adviser is optional for the Relief Society; if one is assigned, the stake president should continue to oversee the stake Relief Society personally with the high councilor's assistance).

The stake presidency ensures that the following Church programs are implemented in the stake and, if necessary, adapted to local circumstances. The stake president usually assigns primary responsibility for each program to one of his counselors. He also assigns a high councilor to help oversee each program (except military relations and except Church magazines if the stake executive secretary or someone else is assigned this responsibility).

Activities committee (see pages 271–76 in Book 2)

Church magazines and Church News (see pages 283 and 284 in Book 2)

Meetinghouse libraries (see pages 285–88 in Book 2)

Military relations (see pages 137–38 in this book)

Music (see pages 289–94 in Book 2)

Physical facilities (see pages 163–65 in this book)

Seminary and institute (see pages 129–34 in this book)

Single members (see pages 125–28 in this book)

Preside over Stake Meetings

The stake presidency plans the stake meetings listed on pages 61–63 in this book and pages 315–17 in Book 2. The stake president presides at these meetings unless a General Authority or Area Seventy attends. The stake president's counselors may conduct these meetings and may preside if the stake president is absent.

Oversee the Stake Patriarch

The stake president presides over the stake patriarch and should develop a close relationship with him. Guidelines for calling, ordaining, instructing, and overseeing the stake patriarch are provided in the following paragraphs. For information about patriarchal blessings, see pages 42–44 and the booklet Information and Suggestions for Patriarchs.

Calling, Sustaining, and Ordaining a Stake Patriarch. The Quorum of the Twelve directs the calling of stake patriarchs (see D&C 107:39). To recommend a man to be called as a stake patriarch, the stake president completes a New Patriarch Recommendation form and submits it to the Quorum of the Twelve. In making this recommendation, he should fast and pray for the Spirit to direct him. The recommendation should be approved by his counselors.

A man whom the stake president recommends as stake patriarch should be a worthy Melchizedek Priesthood holder. He should be mature in the gospel and the Church, a worthy husband and patriarch in his own home, and sensitive to guidance from the Spirit. He should have received his own patriarchal blessing, and normally he should be age 55 or older. He must be married.

If the Quorum of the Twelve approves the recommendation, the stake president may be authorized to interview and call the patriarch, present his name for a sustaining vote at the next stake conference or stake general priesthood meeting, and ordain him. Because the calling of patriarch is an office of the Melchizedek Priesthood, a patriarch is ordained, not set apart.

A stake president may not assign a counselor to ordain a patriarch. Nor should he invite others to stand with him during the ordination of a patriarch.

Calling a Second Stake Patriarch. The Quorum of the Twelve normally does not approve calling a second patriarch for a stake unless the present patriarch is unable to give the number of blessings requested or has been given nonfunctioning status (see page 7). Nor does the Quorum of the Twelve normally approve an additional patriarch simply because a stake is geographically large or includes members who do not speak the majority language. If a stake includes members who speak different languages, bishops and stake presidencies may authorize them to go to a patriarch in a nearby stake who can give the blessing in the member's own language.

Instructing a Newly Called Stake Patriarch. The stake president instructs a newly called patriarch in the sacred, revelatory nature of the office before the patriarch begins giving blessings. The stake president carefully reviews with him the instructions in Information and Suggestions for Patriarchs and Worldwide Leadership Training Meeting: The Patriarch.

Supervising the Work of the Stake Patriarch. The stake president supervises the work of the stake patriarch as outlined in Information and Suggestions for Patriarchs. He should not delegate this responsibility to one of his counselors. Patriarchs benefit from a close relationship with their stake president.

The stake president interviews the patriarch at least twice each year. He also reviews blessings the patriarch has given at least twice a year. As needed, the stake president may make general suggestions regarding the content of the patriarch's blessings. The stake president also discusses the patriarch's feelings about the work, the health and welfare of his family, and any other matters on which the patriarch seeks or needs counsel.

The stake president ensures that copies of transcribed blessings are given promptly to recipients. He also ensures that at least every two years the originals of all blessings are sent to Church headquarters at the following address:

Patriarchal Blessings
50 East North Temple Street, Room 215E
Salt Lake City, UT 84150-3421

Nonfunctioning Status for a Patriarch. The ordination of a patriarch is for a lifetime, so he is not released. However, he may be given nonfunctioning status, excusing him from giving blessings.

If a patriarch is incapacitated by age or illness, as determined by the stake president or the patriarch, the stake president writes a recommendation to the Quorum of the Twelve that the patriarch be given nonfunctioning status. If the recommendation is approved, the patriarch's name is not presented for a sustaining vote at the next stake conference when Church officers are sustained. The stake president notifies bishops not to send members to that patriarch. The stake president also ensures that all the blessings the patriarch has given are sent promptly to the recipients and to Church headquarters at the address given above.

A patriarch is also given nonfunctioning status if he leaves to serve a mission, is absent from his home for other reasons, moves to a different stake, or is approved to be called to a position of Church administration (see "Patriarchs Who Are Called to Another Church Position" in the next column). In such circumstances, the stake president sends written notication to the Quorum of the Twelve and follows the instructions in the previous paragraph.

A patriarch who has been given nonfunctioning status may continue to give patriarchal blessings to his lineal descendants (children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren) if the stake president determines that he is able to do so. The stake president should review these blessings and ensure that copies are sent to Church headquarters.

Returning a Patriarch to Functioning Status. To return a patriarch to functioning status, the stake president interviews him carefully and sends a written recommendation to the Quorum of the Twelve. If the recommendation is approved, the patriarch's name is presented for a sustaining vote at the next stake conference or stake general priesthood meeting.

Patriarchs Who Move to a Different Stake. If a patriarch moves to a different stake, his status becomes nonfunctioning. He should contact the president of the new stake as a courtesy to inform him of his residence there. If the stake president wants him to serve as a patriarch in the new stake, he contacts the patriarch's former stake president to confirm the patriarch's worthiness and past service. The new stake president then follows the procedure in the preceding paragraph.

If the stake president decides not to recommend having the patriarch serve in the new stake, the patriarch is given nonfunctioning status as explained in the previous column. However, the stake president should notify the Office of the Quorum of the Twelve of the patriarch's new address in the stake.

Patriarchs Who Are Called to Another Church Position. A patriarch may not be called to serve in a position of Church administration, such as bishop, high councilor, or stake president, unless the First Presidency and Quorum of the Twelve approve the call. Such a request is rarely approved. If it is approved, the patriarch is given nonfunctioning status as explained in the previous column.

Confidentiality of Patriarchal Blessings. To protect the confidentiality of patriarchal blessings, the stake president ensures that the patriarch understands that after the printed copies are prepared for the recipient and the blessing book, the audio recording of the blessing should be erased.

If there is an electronic copy of the text of the blessing, it should be deleted from all computer storage, including any storage devices to which it may have been copied.

If the computer is to be turned over to anyone else, either by sale, for salvage, or for use by others, the patriarch should ensure that previously deleted blessings cannot be recovered through any technical means. This should be done by either reformatting the hard drive or running a cleaning utility that will eliminate the possibility of recovering the text.

Direct the Perpetual Education Fund Program

In countries where Perpetual Education Fund (PEF) loans are approved, the stake president administers the program for his stake under the direction of the area PEF committee. He directs efforts to seek out worthy young adults, particularly returned missionaries, and encourages them to develop a plan for a career and schooling.

When a person requests a PEF loan, a member of the stake presidency interviews him or her for worthiness and need.

PEF efforts are coordinated with the Church Educational System, Church Employment Resource Services, and others who assist in the stake.

For more information about the PEF program, see page 135.

Direct Public Affairs Efforts

The stake presidency directs public affairs efforts in the stake. Members of the stake presidency also have primary responsibility for the Church's good standing in the community and for relationships with civic and community leaders. The stake president serves as the primary Church spokesman to the news media on matters that pertain to the stake.

The stake president or an assigned counselor organizes and oversees the stake public affairs council. The stake president may also be designated by a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency to be chairman of a multistake or national public affairs council.

For more information, see pages 295–98 in Book 2.

Perform Civil Marriages

The stake president may perform civil marriages where legally authorized by local government authority. For instructions, see "Civil Marriage" on pages 83–84. He may not assign this to a counselor.

Respond to Accidents and Other Serious Situations

The stake president should be notified promptly of any injuries, illnesses, accidents, and property damage that occur on Church property or are the result of something that happened during a Church-sponsored activity in the stake. In these situations he should follow the instructions on pages 164–65.

Common Judge

As a common judge, the stake president conducts worthiness interviews (see page 23), counsels stake members (see pages 25–27), and administers Church discipline (see pages 105–23). He may also be asked to certify the worthiness of Church employees (see page 174).

Direct the Church Welfare Program and Operations

Oversee Welfare Assistance in Special Circumstances

Welfare assistance is administered by bishops. However, in the following circumstances a bishop must receive special approval before providing welfare assistance.

Medical Expenses That Exceed $5,000. If the total Church payment of a needy member's medical expenses is expected to exceed $5,000, the stake president's approval is required before the bishop may commit to pay health care providers. The stake president may authorize the bishop to pay up to a total of $10,000. Outside the United States and Canada, Area Presidencies may decrease the $5,000 and $10,000 limits as circumstances warrant.

In the United States and Canada, the Presiding Bishopric's approval is required if the total Church payment of a needy member's medical expenses is expected to exceed $10,000. If the stake president feels that Church payment may be justified, he submits a recommendation for the Presiding Bishopric to consider. He submits this recommendation through Welfare Health Services (1-801-240-3635 or 1-800-453-3860, extension 2-3635).

Outside the United States and Canada, the stake president contacts the Area Presidency for instructions if Church payment of a needy member's medical expenses is expected to exceed the amount a stake president may authorize. The Area Presidency may authorize expenditures of up to $25,000. If the Area Presidency feels that expenditures exceeding this amount may be justified, they submit a recommendation for the Presiding Bishopric to consider. They submit this recommendation through Welfare Health Services (1-801-240-3635 or 1-800-453-3860, extension 2-3635).

When the Church provides assistance with medical expenses, the member or family should be designated as the party responsible for payment.

Other Special Medical Circumstances. Fast-offering funds may not be used to help pay for medical care that is beyond the usual and customary practice unless priesthood leaders have received approval in advance from the First Presidency in each case (see page 19 for principles about providing medical care).

Fast-offering funds may not be used to help pay for medical care that is received outside the administrative area of the Church where the member's ward is located unless priesthood leaders have received approval in advance from the Presiding Bishopric in each case (see page 19).

If the bishop feels that Church payment of medical expenses in either of these special circumstances may be justified, he counsels with the stake president. If the stake president agrees, he may submit a recommendation for the presiding councils to consider an exception. He submits this recommendation through Welfare Health Services (1-801-240-3635 or 1-800-453-3860, extension 2-3635).

Welfare Assistance for Bishops and Stake Presidents. When a bishop or members of his immediate family need welfare assistance, he reviews the needs and the proposed assistance with the stake president. The stake president's written approval is required before the bishop may sign a bishop's order for Church welfare assistance or expend fast-offering funds for himself or for immediate family members. If fast-offering funds are used, the stake president reviews the bills that the fast offerings will pay. A similar procedure is followed when obtaining help for the bishop or his immediate family through Church welfare operations.

When a stake president or members of his immediate family need welfare assistance, he contacts the bishop of the ward in which he resides. The bishop follows the principles and guidelines governing welfare assistance as he would for any other Church member.

Keep Needs and Assistance Confidential

The stake president should keep confidential the needs of members and the help that is provided.

Assist Bishops If Fast-Offering Expenditures Exceed Contributions

See page 20.

Preside over the Stake Welfare Committee

See pages 315-16 in Book 2.

Organize the Stake Bishops' Welfare Council

See page 63.

Participate in the Regional Welfare Committee

See pages 60-61.

Be the Agent Stake President for Welfare Operations

A member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency appoints an agent stake to each bishops' storehouse, cannery, home storage center, employment resource center, production project, Deseret Industries store, and other welfare operation or project in the area. The agent stake president is accountable to a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency. The agent stake assignment usually changes every three to five years.

All stakes that are served by a welfare operation, not just the agent stake, may be called on to provide volunteer labor for it. These efforts are coordinated in regional welfare committee meetings or coordinating council meetings (see pages 60-61).

Organize an Agent Stake Operating Committee

When a stake is assigned to oversee a Church welfare operation, the president of the agent stake organizes an agent stake operating committee. This committee is composed of the stake president or an assigned counselor, the stake bishops' welfare council chairman, the stake Relief Society president, the manager of the operation, and other specialists as needed. This committee meets regularly to provide priesthood guidance and support to the operation manager, to ensure that the operation serves needy members appropriately, and to coordinate volunteer labor.

Prepare for and Respond to Emergencies

The stake president directs the stake welfare committee in preparing a stake emergency response plan. This plan should be coordinated with similar plans in the welfare region and community. A member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency provides guidelines for preparing the plan.

The stake welfare committee makes assignments for carrying out the stake's emergency response plan. The committee periodically reviews and updates these assignments.

During an emergency, the stake presidency receives reports from the bishops on the condition of Church members and Church property. The stake presidency then reports to a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency.

During an emergency, Church leaders should make the services of the Church available to civil authorities. Church leaders should also take independent action in behalf of Church members as needed.

With approval from a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency, Church buildings, except temples, may be used as shelters, first-aid stations, feeding locations, and recreation centers during emergencies. Stake and ward welfare committees ensure that buildings are maintained and protected from destruction and vandalism. Committee members also ensure that those using the buildings observe Church standards of conduct, including the Word of Wisdom, while they are in the building.

During an emergency, the stake president oversees public information that is released locally by the Church, ensuring that it is accurate and timely. He may respond to questions from the media, or he may assign a stake public affairs director or assistant to do so. He also may serve as the local Church spokesman or may designate a spokesman. The stake president reviews and approves all news releases given by the spokesman. He also gives proper recognition to civil authorities and relief agencies.

Assign a Bishop to Assist Transients

Where there are two or more wards in the vicinity, the stake president may appoint one bishop to handle all requests from transients. This helps avoid duplication and confusion.

Where large numbers of transients are seeking assistance, a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency may request approval from the Presiding Bishopric to call a Church-service worker to handle such requests. When possible, the man who is called should have served as a bishop, be experienced in helping the needy, be familiar with the use of Church welfare resources, and serve under the direction of the bishops' storehouse manager. Exceptions to these guidelines must be approved by the Presiding Bishopric.

Provide Support to Members in Prisons, Hospitals, and Other Institutions

Stake presidents are encouraged to provide support to members in prisons, hospitals, and other institutions within their boundaries. They should do so within priesthood channels and according to the guidelines established by the Church and the institutions.

The stake president determines the support that is to be provided at each institution. He also supervises the support, assisted by other local priesthood leaders. If the stake needs help providing service to institutions within its boundaries, a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency may assign one or more nearby stakes to assist.

The stake president or an assigned bishop may call a priesthood holder to oversee the support that is given to members at these institutions. In prisons, men should be called to work with male inmates, and at least two men, two women, or a husband and wife should be called to work with female inmates.

Worship services for members in prisons, hospitals, and other institutions may be simplified as necessary to meet the needs of those involved. Services usually follow the same format as sacrament meeting except that the sacrament is not administered to inmates in prisons. As an exception to Church policy, when services are held in prisons, inmates may participate by offering prayers or giving talks regardless of their religious affiliation or standing in the Church.

Other support that may be given to members in these institutions includes counseling, home teaching, visiting teaching, Sunday School classes, family home evening, seminary or institute classes, and other special programs.

In collaboration with the Priesthood Department at Church headquarters, LDS Family Services is responsible for materials and professional resources to assist those in correctional institutions and their families. For assistance from LDS Family Services, call 1-801-240-3646 or contact a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency.

Oversee Finances, Records, Reports, and Properties

See pages 139-65.

High Council

The stake presidency calls twelve high priests to form the stake high council (see D&C 102:1). Elders may be considered to serve on the high council but must first be ordained high priests. (District councils may be composed of elders and high priests.) The stake presidency may call military chaplains who live in the stake to serve as high councilors.

Under the direction of the stake presidency, high councilors help oversee the work of the Church in the stake. They have the following advisory and administrative responsibilities:

1. Represent the stake presidency in high priests groups, elders quorums, wards, and branches.

2. Serve as advisers to stake auxiliary presidencies. Assist the stake presidency in fulfilling their responsibilities for missionary work in the stake. Help oversee temple and family history work and the Church programs listed on page 6.
 3. Serve on the stake priesthood executive committee, stake council, and stake welfare committee. Serve on the stake Melchizedek Priesthood committee or stake Aaronic Priesthood committee as assigned.
 4. Participate in stake disciplinary councils.
- These responsibilities are explained in detail on pages 163–64 in Book 2.

The high council does not meet unless a member of the stake presidency is present.

Clerks

Every stake should have a qualified, functioning stake clerk. One or more assistant stake clerks may also be called. If assistant stake clerks are called, the stake presidency may assign them to various parts of stake record keeping, such as financial records, reports on member participation, and historical records. Other assignments that are given to clerks include overseeing Church materials in the stake and serving as the stake technology specialist.

The stake clerk is called and set apart by the stake president. Assistant stake clerks are called and set apart by the stake president or an assigned counselor. Clerks are trained by the stake presidency and work under their direction. Assistant stake clerks also work under the direction of the stake clerk.

The stake clerk and assistant stake clerks should be Melchizedek Priesthood holders who are worthy to have a temple recommend.

All clerks should have unquestionable integrity and demonstrate a willingness to follow the Lord's commandments. They should be honest and careful record keepers. They should also be capable teachers and administrators. The clerk who is assigned to finances should be qualified to handle financial matters. Calling clerks who meet these qualifications will help ensure that they have the Spirit of the Lord with them as they work with Church finances and records.

The duration of clerks' service should be sufficient for them to learn their duties, magnify their callings, and preserve continuity in their work. They do not need to be released when a stake presidency is reorganized.

The stake clerk's responsibilities are outlined on pages 139–41 and 153. The responsibilities of assistant stake clerks are outlined on pages 141–42 and 153 in this book and page 284 in Book 2.

Stake Executive Secretary

The stake president or an assigned counselor calls and sets apart a stake executive secretary. The executive secretary should be a Melchizedek Priesthood holder who is worthy to have a temple recommend.

The executive secretary is an assistant to the stake presidency. He meets with the stake presidency and prepares meeting agendas as instructed. He also attends meetings of the stake priesthood executive committee, stake council, and stake welfare committee.

He coordinates stake business between the stake presidency and high council. He also schedules appointments for the stake presidency. He distributes copies of Church publications and correspondence promptly.

He reviews the status of home teaching in the stake with the stake presidency.

He coordinates the Church magazine subscription efforts in the stake unless the stake president assigns this responsibility to someone else (see page 284 in Book 2).

He advises the stake presidency of members who are entering the military or are already in military service. Under the direction of the stake presidency, he may help coordinate Church orientation for stake members who are entering the military (see page 138).

He instructs ward executive secretaries as requested by the stake president or by bishops.

3. Ward Administration

Purpose and Organization of a Ward

During His mortal ministry, the Savior organized His Church and established congregations of believers. Members of His Church met together to worship, learn the gospel, and serve and strengthen each other.

As in the ancient Church, members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints are organized into congregations. Large congregations are called wards. Small congregations are called branches. The purpose of these congregations is to help all people "come unto Christ, and be perfected in him" (Moroni 10:32).

Bishopric

The bishop holds the priesthood keys to preside over a ward and direct the work of the Church in the ward. He and his counselors minister to ward members in love, helping "bring to pass the immortality and eternal life of man" (Moses 1:39).

The bishop has five principal responsibilities in presiding over a ward:

1. He is president of the Aaronic Priesthood.
2. He is the presiding high priest.
3. He is a common judge.
4. He administers the Church welfare program.
5. He oversees finances, records, and the use and security of the meetinghouse.

These responsibilities are outlined in this section. The bishop and his counselors should seek the Lord's guidance in fulfilling them.

The bishop should delegate many assignments to his counselors, the ward clerk, the ward executive secretary, assistant ward clerks, and quorum and auxiliary leaders. This allows him to concentrate on duties that he alone should ordinarily do.

If the bishop is absent, ill, or otherwise unable to perform his duties, a counselor may act in his place temporarily except as noted in this handbook. The counselor is to consult with the stake president if he has questions about acting for the bishop.

The bishopric is the presidency of the Aaronic Priesthood in the ward (see D&C 107:15). The bishop is also president of the priests quorum in the ward (see D&C 107:87–88). The bishopric should study passages in the scriptures and instructions in the handbooks that pertain to the Aaronic Priesthood. The bishop and his counselors have similar responsibilities for young women in the ward as they have for Aaronic Priesthood holders.

Members of the bishopric watch over and nurture young men and young women in the ward. They help Aaronic Priesthood holders accomplish the purposes of the Aaronic Priesthood (see pages 177–78 in Book 2). They help young women live the Young Women values (see pages 211–12 in Book 2). They help all youth live the standards in For the Strength of Youth.

The bishopric oversees Aaronic Priesthood quorums and Young Women classes. The bishopric also oversees the ward Young Men and Young Women organizations. The bishop presides over the ward Aaronic Priesthood committee and bishopric youth committee.

For more information, see pages 180–81 and 216–17 in Book 2.

Presiding High Priest

The bishop has the following responsibilities as the presiding high priest in the ward. His counselors assist him.

Teach the Gospel

Members of the bishopric are teachers. They teach the gospel in meetings, classes, and interviews. They should also bear their testimonies often.

Members of the bishopric base their teaching on the scriptures and the words of the latter-day prophets (see D&C 42:12; 52:9). They teach by the power of the Spirit, strengthening members' faith in the Savior and their commitment to obey His commandments (see D&C 42:14; 43:15).

The bishop and his counselors oversee and support others who teach the gospel in the ward. They ensure that teaching is effective and doctrinally correct. They also encourage members to study, teach, and live the gospel at home.

For more information about teaching, see pages 300–306 in Book 2.

Instruct Leaders

Members of the bishopric instruct leaders in doctrines, responsibilities, policies, and procedures. This instruction should inspire leaders to grow spiritually and seek the Lord's guidance in fulfilling their callings.

Resources for instructing leaders include the scriptures, teachings of the latter-day prophets, Church handbooks, and other Church-produced training materials.

Oversee Efforts to Accomplish the Mission of the Church

Missionary Work (Proclaiming the Gospel). Efforts to share the gospel are most effective when they are ward centered and ward directed. As the presiding high priest, the bishop is responsible for the work of sharing the gospel, retention, and activation in the ward. His counselors, the ward mission leader, and others assist him, but his personal participation and leadership are essential.

Members of the bishopric set an example in sharing the gospel and fellowshipping new members. They encourage and oversee others in these efforts, giving direction as needed.

Members of the bishopric ensure that the doctrines, principles, and blessings relating to missionary work are taught regularly in ward meetings and classes. They plan spiritually uplifting sacrament meetings that members feel comfortable inviting others to attend.

The bishopric helps prospective full-time missionaries prepare to serve missions. The bishop interviews and recommends worthy ward members to serve as full-time missionaries (see pages 91-102).

The bishopric oversees the priesthood executive committee and ward council in developing and implementing a ward mission plan (see Preach My Gospel, page 220). Based on this plan, the bishopric coordinates the ward's missionary, retention, and activation efforts. The Progress Record form, which is maintained by the full-time missionaries, is a valuable resource for planning and coordinating this work. As needed, the bishopric makes assignments to help investigators, new members, and less-active members.

The bishop calls a ward mission leader, and the bishop or his counselors call ward missionaries. Members of the bishopric direct the efforts of the ward mission leader. He is an important resource to them in developing and implementing the ward mission plan and in following through on missionary matters.

The bishopric receives regular reports from the ward mission leader on the following efforts of ward members, ward missionaries, and full-time missionaries: sharing the gospel, teaching, fellowshipping, strengthening new members, and activation.

The bishop and his counselors get to know investigators and oversee efforts to fellowship them. The bishop meets with them personally before they are baptized, but he does not interview them for baptism or determine their worthiness.

A member of the bishopric usually presides at convert baptismal services in the ward. He or the ward mission leader usually conducts the services (see page 35).

The bishopric ensures that each new member is confirmed in a sacrament meeting of the ward as soon as reasonable after baptism (see page 36).

The bishopric oversees efforts to minister to new members and help them sustain their activity. These responsibilities are outlined on pages 308-9 in Book 2.

The bishopric oversees the assistance that full-time missionaries give priesthood leaders in activation efforts (see page 310 in Book 2).

In monthly interviews, the bishop reports to the stake president on the progress of investigators, new members, and less-active members in the ward. He and the stake president discuss plans and goals for these individuals. He should bring a copy of the Progress Record form, maintained by the full-time missionaries, for this discussion. He should also bring copies of the New Member Report form and the ward mission plan to review as needed.

Spiritual and Temporal Welfare (Perfecting the Saints). Each member of the bishopric should set an example in spiritual welfare by praying, serving, keeping covenants, and striving for virtue and holiness in his own life (see Moroni 10:32-33; D&C 38:24). The bishopric sets the spiritual tone in the ward.

One of the bishopric's most important responsibilities is helping members build spiritual strength. The bishopric should pray continually for guidance in this effort. Suggestions include teaching and testifying of the gospel, teaching members to pray and study the scriptures, emphasizing the importance of the family, helping members prepare to receive all essential ordinances and keep the associated covenants, providing opportunities to serve, making meetings edifying, and showing love by ministering to members individually.

Members of the bishopric set an example in temporal welfare by striving to become self-reliant and by caring for the poor and needy. They also encourage members in these efforts.

Members of the bishopric teach priesthood and auxiliary leaders their welfare responsibilities. They also ensure that the doctrines, principles, and blessings relating to welfare are taught regularly in ward meetings. For information about the bishopric's responsibilities to administer the Church welfare program, see pages 16–21 in this book. This information is also available in Providing in the Lord's Way: A Leader's Guide to Welfare.

Temple and Family History Work (Redeeming the Dead). Members of the bishopric oversee temple and family history work in the ward. They also oversee the high priests group leader, who coordinates this work in the ward. Where there is no high priests group leader, a member of the elders quorum presidency is assigned to fill this role.

Members of the bishopric set an example in doing temple and family history work. This includes regularly attending the temple where circumstances allow, identifying their kindred dead, and providing temple ordinances for them.

Members of the bishopric ensure that the doctrines, principles, and blessings of temple and family history work are taught regularly in stake and ward meetings. To help encourage members to participate, they share their testimonies and experiences relating to this work.

Members of the bishopric help members prepare to receive their own temple ordinances. They also encourage members to identify their kindred dead and provide temple ordinances for them.

Members of the bishopric ensure that a sufficient number of family history consultants are called to meet the needs of the ward. These consultants may be brethren or sisters. The bishopric works with the high priests group leader, the priesthood executive committee, and the ward council to identify people whom the consultants may assist in their family history work. The bishopric ensures that a family history consultant contacts new members soon after their baptism to help them gather information to provide baptisms for their deceased ancestors.

Members of the bishopric interview ward members for temple recommends as outlined on pages 75–79. They also help less-active members and endowed members who have not renewed their recommends for an extended time prepare to go to a temple. The bishop regularly organizes temple preparation seminars for these members (see page 75).

For more information, see pages 75–89 in this book and the "Temple and Family History Work" section of Book 2.

Coordinate the Work of the Melchizedek Priesthood

The bishop and his counselors work closely with the elders quorum president and high priests group leader in watching over quorum and group members, building strength in the quorum and group, and ensuring that the work of the priesthood is accomplished.

Members of the bishopric oversee home teaching in the ward (see pages 168–70 in Book 2). They also oversee efforts to minister to new members and less-active members (see pages 307–10 in Book 2).

At least quarterly the bishop holds priesthood interviews with the elders quorum president and high priests group leader.

Preside over Ward Committees and Councils

The bishop presides over the ward priesthood executive committee, ward council, ward welfare committee, ward Aaronic Priesthood committee, and bishopric youth committee. The bishop usually assigns one of his counselors to preside over the ward committee for single members. For information about these committees and councils, see pages 317–19 in Book 2.

Conduct Ward Business

The bishop conducts ward business with the stake presidency and receives counsel and instructions from presiding authorities. He also oversees the goals and plans for each part of ward activity.

See pages 45–58.

Oversee the Performance of Ordinances and Blessings

The bishop oversees the administration of the sacrament, blessing of children, baptism of eight-year-old members of record, confirmation, and ordination to Aaronic Priesthood offices.

The bishop usually initiates recommendations to the stake presidency for brethren to be ordained elders or high priests (see page 39). These ordinations are performed under the direction of the stake president.

Instructions for performing ordinances and blessings are outlined on pages 29–42.

Oversee Ward Auxiliaries and Programs

The bishopric oversees the ward auxiliary organizations:

Relief Society (see page 196 in Book 2)

Young Men (including Scouting, where authorized; see pages 180-81 in Book 2 and the Scouting Handbook)

Young Women (see pages 216-17 in Book 2)

Primary (see pages 230-31 in Book 2)

Sunday School (see pages 241-42 in Book 2)

The bishop oversees the ward Relief Society. He assigns his counselors to oversee the other auxiliaries under his direction.

The bishopric ensures that the following Church programs are implemented in the ward and, if necessary, adapted to local circumstances. The bishop usually assigns primary responsibility for each program to one of his counselors:

Activities committee (see pages 271-76 in Book 2)

Church magazines and Church News (see pages 283 and 284 in Book 2)

Meetinghouse library (see pages 285-88 in Book 2)

Military relations (see pages 137-38 in this book)

Music (see pages 289-94 in Book 2)

Physical facilities (see pages 163-65 in this book)

Seminary and institute (see pages 129-34 in this book)

Single members (see pages 125-28 in this book)

Preside over Ward Meetings

The bishopric plans the ward meetings listed on pages 63-67 in this book and pages 317-19 in Book 2. The bishop presides at these meetings unless a member of the stake presidency, a General Authority, or an Area Seventy attends. The bishop's counselors may conduct these meetings and may preside if the bishop is absent.

Perform Civil Marriages

The bishop may perform civil marriages where legally authorized by local government authority. For instructions, see "Civil Marriage" on pages 83-84. He may not assign this to a counselor.

Conduct Funeral and Burial Services

The bishop, or an assigned counselor in his absence, conducts funeral and burial services for ward members and for others as requested (see pages 68-69).

Respond to Accidents and Other Serious Situations

The bishop should be notified promptly of any injuries, illnesses, accidents, and property damage that occur on Church property or are the result of something that happened during a Church-sponsored activity in the ward. The bishop should notify the stake president. Additional instructions are provided on pages 164-65.

Common Judge

The bishop is "to be a judge in Israel, to do the business of the church, to sit in judgment upon transgressors upon testimony as it shall be laid before him according to the laws, by the assistance of his counselors, whom he has chosen or will choose among the elders of the church.

"This is the duty of a bishop. . . .

"Thus shall he be a judge, even a common judge among the inhabitants of Zion" (D&C 107:72-74).

As a common judge, the bishop conducts worthiness interviews (see pages 23-24), counsels ward members (see pages 25-27), and administers Church discipline (see pages 105-23). He may also be asked to certify the worthiness of Church employees (see page 174) and of applicants for Perpetual Education Fund loans.

Administer the Church Welfare Program

The office of bishop carries with it a special mandate to care for the poor and needy (see D&C 84:112; 107:68). The bishop's responsibilities for caring for the needy and administering the Church welfare program are outlined in this section. The bishop is assisted by his counselors; Melchizedek Priesthood, Aaronic Priesthood, and Relief Society leaders; and home teachers and visiting teachers.

Basic Welfare Principles in Caring for the Poor and Needy

Through the Church, the Lord has established a way to care for the poor and needy and help them regain their self-reliance. When Church members are doing all they can to provide for themselves but still cannot meet their basic needs, they should first turn to their families for help. When this is not sufficient, the Church stands ready to help.

The bishop is entrusted with the sacred responsibility of using Church funds and commodities to care for the poor and needy members of the ward. He determines who should receive such assistance and how it should be given. In making this determination, he should bear in mind that the temporal circumstances and needs of members vary from country to country. A family that might be considered needy in one location might not be considered so if they lived elsewhere. Also, members who are considered poor by some often do not view themselves as being poor.

In determining which Church members need help and what help to provide, the bishop should seek inspiration while applying the following basic welfare principles:

Strengthen Needy Members. The objectives of Church welfare assistance are to (1) help members become self-reliant and stand independent of all welfare assistance, regardless of its source; (2) help members become stronger spiritually and learn to provide for others; and (3) build integrity, self-respect, dignity, and soundness of character in each person who receives help.

Give Temporary Help. Church assistance is normally given to meet temporary needs as members strive to become self-reliant. It is intended to help people help themselves and develop independence, not dependence. Even the disabled, aged, and others who may require long-term assistance should be given opportunities to do all they can to help themselves.

Assist with Necessities. The Church helps needy members by providing the goods and services they need to sustain life. In general, needy members should be assisted with basic life-sustaining necessities common to most members of the ward.

The Church does not provide the means to maintain an affluent standard of living. Members who are temporarily unable to provide for themselves may need to alter their standard of living until they are self-reliant. They should not rely on Church welfare to insure them against temporary hardship or to allow them to continue their present standard of living without interruption.

Provide Opportunities to Work. Work is a spiritual and temporal necessity. When members receive Church welfare assistance, the bishop gives them opportunities to work to the extent of their ability for the assistance they receive. When they work for assistance, they remain industrious, maintain self-respect, and increase their ability to be self-reliant (see page 19).

Seek Out the Needy

The bishop should be aware of the temporal circumstances of needy ward members and ensure that those in need receive proper care. It is not enough to assist only when asked. The bishop should seek out the poor and the needy. He should also be aware of the conditions of single parents, the aged, the disabled, the fatherless, the widowed, and others who have special needs.

The bishop can identify needy ward members in many ways. One way is through promptings of the Spirit. He should listen for the Spirit to prompt him to inquire about members' well-being and to reveal undisclosed needs.

The New Testament teaches that "pure religion . . . is this, To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction" (James 1:27). Seeking out the poor and needy will often require bishops and those who assist them to visit ward members in their homes.

The bishop may also identify welfare needs during meetings of the ward priesthood executive committee, ward council, and ward welfare committee. Interviews with the elders quorum president, high priests group leader, and Relief Society president also help him identify welfare needs.

Home teachers and visiting teachers can also help identify welfare needs. They should inquire about the well-being of those whom they visit. They report any welfare needs to their priesthood or Relief Society leader, who reports them to the bishop.

Under the direction of the bishop, home teachers and visiting teachers can help members assess the causes of welfare needs, prepare plans to fulfill the needs, assess resources that could lead toward self-reliance, and provide encouragement. When possible, home teachers and visiting teachers also help meet these needs.

Determine What Assistance to Render

The bishop determines how much assistance to provide as Church welfare and when and how to provide it. Individual circumstances vary, so he should seek guidance from the Lord for each situation. He should also be guided by established welfare policies.

To determine what welfare assistance to provide, the bishop considers the causes of members' needs. He also evaluates what members have done and may do to provide for themselves and their families.

Completing a Needs and Resources Analysis form may help the bishop determine what assistance to provide. If the circumstances are complicated and additional information is needed, bishops in the United States and Canada may consider using the Needs and Resources Analysis Supplement form.

When appropriate and without breaking confidences, the bishop may include the Relief Society president in determining what assistance to provide. He may assign her to visit members to assess their needs and suggest how to respond to them. This may include preparing an itemized list of basic food and clothing needs. It may also include preparing a Bishop's Order for Commodities form for the bishop to review. The bishop's signature on this form authorizes service at a bishops' storehouse or purchases from a local vendor. The Relief Society president's role in making these visits is explained more fully on pages 208-9 in Book 2.

Generally, the bishop assists only those members who currently live within his own ward's boundaries.

Individuals who are not members of the Church are usually referred to local community resources if they need welfare assistance.

Render Assistance

The following guidelines will help the bishop provide appropriate welfare assistance.

Draw upon the Lord's Storehouse. The Lord's storehouse includes the time, talents, skills, compassion, consecrated materials, and financial resources of faithful Church members. The bishop is the Lord's agent in using these resources to assist the poor and needy (see D&C 42:34). As he uses these resources to care for the needy in the Lord's way, both givers and receivers are blessed (see D&C 104:16; Acts 20:35).

1. Fast offerings. Fast offerings are a primary resource of the Lord's storehouse. The bishop uses fast offerings to provide necessities to needy members. With these funds the bishop may provide food, clothing, shelter, medical assistance, or other life-sustaining aid. Following are some guidelines for how bishops should administer fast-offering assistance:

All payments of fast-offering funds are to be approved by the bishop.

It is preferred that the bishop provide members commodities rather than give them money or pay their bills. If necessary, fast offerings may be used to buy the commodities. Members then can use their own money to pay their obligations. If members do not have money to pay all of their immediate and essential obligations, the bishop normally makes payments directly to the provider of the goods or services, not to the person being assisted.

The bishop may not loan fast offerings to members, and members are not required to repay welfare assistance they receive from the Church. When members are again in a position to do so, they should be encouraged to contribute generously to the fast-offering fund.

The bishop may not use fast offerings to pay off members' consumer debt or obligations incurred in business failures or speculative ventures.

For information about using fast-offering funds to pay a needy member's medical expenses, see page 19.

Any fast-offering assistance to the bishop or his immediate family members must first be approved in writing by the stake president (see page 9).

Two authorized signers should always sign checks that are written for fast-offering assistance. The authorized signature card, where used, should be up-to-date and should be submitted to the Church administration office.

The payee of a check or the person being assisted should not be related to either of the persons who signs the check. Nor should the payee of the check or the person being assisted be one of the persons who signs the check.

For information about the law of the fast, see page 20. For information about gathering and accounting for fast offerings, see page 155.

2. Other ward resources. In caring for the needy, the bishop also directs the use of ward resources other than fast offerings, including the time, talents, skills, compassion, and consecrated materials of ward members. He does this by directing the ward welfare committee; by counseling, as appropriate, with high priests group, elders quorum, and Relief Society leaders; by asking families, home teachers, and visiting teachers to serve the needy in specific ways; and by using resources made available by the stake welfare committee.
3. Other Church welfare resources. In some parts of the world, the Church has established welfare operations. These include Church employment resource centers, Deseret Industries stores, bishops' storehouses, canneries, home storage centers, grain storage facilities, and a variety of commodity production projects. The Church also contracts with LDS Family Services to provide counseling, foster care, assistance to unwed parents, and adoption services to members.

Where these welfare operations and contracted services exist, they provide resources that bishops can use to help the poor and needy. If a bishop needs information about such resources in his area, he should contact the chairman of the stake bishops' welfare council or his stake president.

Use Appropriate Non-Church Resources. Members may use appropriate services in the community to meet their basic needs. These services may include hospitals, physicians, and other sources of medical care; job training and placement services; services for disabled persons; professional counselors or social workers; domestic violence centers; and alcohol or drug treatment services. The bishop and the ward welfare committee should become familiar with the resources that are available in the community. Members should be reminded to maintain gospel standards while using such services.

In some instances, members may decide to seek welfare assistance from the government. The bishop should advise members to comply with any laws that regulate the receipt of non-Church assistance, especially while receiving Church welfare assistance. Bishops should be careful not to duplicate welfare assistance.

Regardless of the source of assistance, members should avoid becoming dependent on these sources and strive to become self-reliant. Where possible, they should work in return for the assistance they receive.

Help Needy Members Obtain Medical Care. The bishop may help arrange and pay for medical care for needy ward members. In deciding whether the Church should help pay these expenses, the bishop determines whether the care is necessary based on sound medical advice. He also determines whether family members are able and willing to assist. In addition, he determines whether the member is fully using insurance, government assistance, and other available benefits.

If the bishop feels that the Church should help pay a needy member's medical expenses, he asks the health care providers if they will reduce their fees. He ensures that the Church promptly pays the expenses it has agreed to pay. When the Church provides assistance with medical expenses, the member or family should be designated as the party responsible for payment.

The bishop may not pay more than $5,000 of a needy member's medical expenses unless authorized by the stake president as outlined on page 8. Outside the United States and Canada, Area Presidencies may decrease the $5,000 limit as circumstances warrant. (In districts, when expenses exceed the limit of what the branch president may authorize, he normally refers the matter to the mission president, not the district president.)

When fast-offering funds are used to help pay for a needy member's medical care, the care should be consistent with what is normally provided in the local culture. Fast-offering funds may not be used to help pay for medical care that is beyond the usual and customary practice unless priesthood leaders have received approval in advance from the First Presidency in each case.

Any medical care that is paid for with fast-offering funds should be obtained at the nearest appropriate medical facility within the administrative area of the Church where the member's ward is located. Fast-offering funds may not be used to help pay for medical care that is received outside the administrative area unless priesthood leaders have received approval in advance from the Presiding Bishopric in each case.

If a bishop feels that a special medical circumstance may justify seeking approval for Church payment of medical expenses, he counsels with his stake president. If the stake president agrees, he may seek this approval as outlined on page 9.

Fast-offering funds may not be used to pay for medical or health care that is ethically or legally questionable. Another restriction on using fast-offering funds for medical care is outlined in "Self-Awareness Groups" on pages 184-85.

Give Work Assignments to Members Who Receive Assistance

The bishop strives to give work assignments that are meaningful. Ideally, needy members are given assignments that allow them to serve others. The bishop ensures that members are given the instruction they need to fulfill their assignments.

When giving a work assignment, the bishop asks the members to commit themselves to fulfilling it. If they are reluctant or refuse to work, he should help them understand that work assignments are given to bless them.

There are many creative ways to provide work opportunities. Bishops may include the ward welfare committee in compiling a list of such opportunities. Where local Church welfare operations exist, they may provide work opportunities and training for people who need Church assistance.

Administer Fast Offerings

Encourage Members to Live the Law of the Fast. The bishopric encourages ward members to fast each fast Sunday for two consecutive meals and to contribute a fast offering at least equal to the value of the food they would have eaten. If possible, members are encouraged to be generous and give much more than the value of two meals.

The bishopric teaches members that fasting and contributing fast offerings will bless their lives and the lives of the needy. These principles should be taught in priesthood meetings, Relief Society and other auxiliary meetings, home visits, and sacrament meetings. The bishop also teaches these principles in temple recommend interviews and tithing settlement interviews.

Consult with the Stake President in Special Circumstances

Fast-Offering Expenditures That Exceed Contributions. When fast-offering expenditures will exceed contributions in a ward, the stake president counsels with the bishop to make sure that he and ward members correctly understand and apply the principles of self-reliance and providing for the poor and needy. Procedures for obtaining additional fast offerings from the Church are outlined in instructions sent to stake and ward financial clerks.

Surplus Fast Offerings. Procedures for remitting surplus fast offerings to the Church are outlined in instructions sent to stake and ward financial clerks.

Special Medical Circumstances. See pages 8–9, 19.

Welfare Assistance for Bishops and Stake Presidents or Members of Their Immediate Families. See page 9.

Preside over the Ward Welfare Committee

See page 318 in Book 2.

Participate in the Stake Bishops' Welfare Council

See page 63.

Serve on the Stake Welfare Committee

The stake president assigns the bishop who is chairman of the stake bishops' welfare council to serve on the stake welfare committee. A suggested agenda for this committee's meetings is provided on pages 315–16 in Book 2.

Keep Needs and Assistance Confidential

The bishop should keep confidential the needs of members and the help that is provided. He should be careful not to embarrass members who need assistance. If he asks the Relief Society president or others to help, he shares only the information they need to fulfill their welfare duties. He also instructs them to maintain confidentiality. This helps safeguard the privacy and dignity of members who are being assisted.

The bishopric directs the ward welfare committee in preparing a ward emergency response plan. This plan should be coordinated with similar plans in the stake and community.

When emergencies arise, home teachers contact the families and individuals assigned to them and assess their condition and needs. Home teachers report to the elders quorum presidency and high priests group leadership, who report to the bishop. The bishop then reports to the stake presidency the condition of members and Church property. This system may also be used to communicate messages from the stake presidency or bishopric.

During an emergency, Church leaders should make the services of the Church available to civil authorities. Church leaders should also take independent action in behalf of Church members as needed. For information on using Church buildings during emergencies, see page 10.

Supplemental equipment, food, clothing, and services are available through bishops' storehouses, Deseret Industries, and LDS Family Services agencies where they are established. During emergencies, the bishop should request these commodities or services as needed.

Assist Transients

The bishop may assist members and others who are transients, but he should be discerning about the type and amount of assistance he gives. When possible, he contacts the bishop of the person's home ward before providing assistance.

Where there are two or more wards in the vicinity, the stake president may appoint one bishop to handle all requests from transients. This helps avoid duplication and confusion.

Individuals who are not members of the Church are usually referred to local community resources if they need welfare assistance.

Protect against Welfare Fraud and Abuse

Bishops should protect against welfare fraud and abuse. In the United States and Canada, bishops who have concerns about welfare fraud or abuse may call the bishops' help line (1-801-240-7887 or 1-800-453-3860, extension 2-7887). Bishops may also call the help line to verify a person's membership in the Church before giving welfare assistance. Outside the United States and Canada, bishops should contact the administration office.

Receive Humanitarian Aid Funds

The bishop receives members' contributions to the Church's humanitarian aid fund. Members make these contributions using the Tithing and Other Offerings form (see page 156). Members should contribute without designating how the funds should be used.

Oversee Finances, Records, and the Use and Security of the Meetinghouse

See pages 139-65.

Clerks

Every ward should have a qualified, functioning ward clerk. One or more assistant ward clerks may also be called as needed. If assistant ward clerks are called, the bishopric may assign them to various parts of ward record keeping, such as financial records, membership records, reports on member participation, and historical records. The bishopric also assigns a clerk to oversee Church materials in the ward.

Ward clerks and assistant ward clerks are recommended by the bishop and called and set apart by a member of the stake presidency. They are trained by the bishopric and by stake clerks. They work under the direction of the bishopric. Assistant ward clerks also work under the direction of the ward clerk.

The ward clerk and assistant ward clerks should be priesthood holders who are worthy to have a temple recommend. The ward clerk and the assistant ward clerk assigned to finances should hold the Melchizedek Priesthood.

All clerks should have unquestionable integrity and demonstrate a willingness to follow the Lord's commandments. They should be honest and careful record keepers. They should also be capable teachers and administrators. The clerk assigned to finances should be qualified to handle financial matters. Calling clerks who meet these qualifications will help ensure that they have the Spirit of the Lord with them as they work with Church finances and records.

The duration of clerks' service should be sufficient for them to learn their duties, magnify their callings, and preserve continuity in their work. They do not need to be released when a bishopric is reorganized.

The ward clerk's responsibilities are outlined on pages 142-43 and 154. The responsibilities of assistant ward clerks are outlined on pages 143 and 154 in this book and page 284 in Book 2.

Ward Executive Secretary

The ward executive secretary is recommended by the bishop and called and set apart by a member of the stake presidency or an assigned high councilor. He should be a Melchizedek Priesthood holder who is worthy to have a temple recommend.

The executive secretary is an assistant to the bishopric. He meets with the bishopric and prepares meeting agendas as instructed. He also attends meetings of the ward priesthood executive committee, ward council, and ward welfare committee.

He coordinates ward business between the bishopric and other leaders. He schedules appointments for the bishopric. He also distributes Church publications and correspondence promptly.

He reviews the status of home teaching in the ward with the bishopric.

He coordinates the Church magazine subscription efforts in the ward unless the bishop assigns this responsibility to someone else (see page 284 in Book 2).

He assists with matters pertaining to the Church Educational System, such as seminary and institute registration.

He keeps a current list of the names and addresses of ward members who are in the military and circulates this list to the ward welfare committee. He also informs the stake executive secretary when members plan to enter the military.

4. Interviews and Counseling

Interviews

Each stake president and bishop is “a judge in Israel” (D&C 107:72). By this authority he conducts worthiness interviews and priesthood interviews. He represents the Lord in conducting these interviews. Accordingly, he should seek to bless members and help them live the gospel of Jesus Christ.

General Instructions for Worthiness Interviews

Stake presidents, bishops, and (when authorized) their counselors conduct worthiness interviews as outlined in this section. They should prepare spiritually so they can be guided by the Spirit during these interviews. They should also seek the power of discernment. This is a spiritual gift that will help them discern truth, as well as a member’s needs (see D&C 46:27–28).

Worthiness interviews should be private. For example, a husband and wife are interviewed separately for temple recommends.

Careful listening is important during worthiness interviews. The member of the stake presidency or bishopric should give full and sincere attention to the person being interviewed. The interviewer also makes sure that the member understands the questions being asked. He sets aside enough time to conduct the interview in a dignified, unhurried manner.

General Instructions for Priesthood Interviews

Stake presidents, bishops, and their counselors regularly interview the priesthood leaders who report to them. One purpose of these interviews is to receive an accounting of the leader’s responsibilities. Another purpose is to help the leader set goals and make plans to accomplish them. Where applicable, budgets and expenditures are also reviewed during these interviews.

The person who conducts a priesthood interview should instruct, encourage, and inspire leaders in their efforts to fulfill their callings. He should also express gratitude and strengthen the leader in his personal and family life.

Interviews Conducted by the Stake President

The stake president conducts the following interviews with stake members:

1. For temple recommends (see pages 75–79).

2. For recommendation of full-time missionaries and for release of missionaries who have returned home (see pages 93, 100, and 101–2).
3. For callings to serve as counselors in the stake presidency, as patriarchs, and as bishops, when authorized.
4. For callings to serve as elders quorum presidents and stake clerks.

The stake president holds a monthly priesthood interview with each bishop. He also interviews the stake patriarch at least twice each year (see page 7).

Interviews Conducted by the Stake President or His Counselors

The stake president or an assigned counselor conducts the following interviews with stake members. Before interviewing a person for any of the purposes listed below, the member of the stake presidency ensures that the person has been interviewed or cleared by the bishop. If a counselor encounters serious matters, such as transgressions that require confession, he should refer the member to the stake president without delay.

1. For temple recommends (see pages 75–79).
2. For ordination to the offices of elder and high priest (see page 39).
3. For callings to serve in Church positions (see pages 45–58).
4. For an endorsement to enroll at a Church university or college (see page 133).
5. For an endorsement to participate in the Perpetual Education Fund loan program (where the program is approved).

Members of the stake presidency hold regular priesthood interviews with each elders quorum president and high priests group leader in the stake.

Interviews Conducted by the Bishop

The bishop conducts the following interviews with ward members:

1. For temple recommends (see pages 75–79).
2. For recommendation of full-time missionaries (see pages 93 and 101–2).
3. For ordination to the offices of elder and high priest when authorized by the stake presidency (see page 39).

4. For annual tithing settlement (see page 155).
5. For callings to serve as ward auxiliary presidents.
6. For baptism and confirmation of eight-year-old children who are members of record or who are not members of record but have at least one member parent or guardian (see pages 32–33).
7. For ordination to the office of priest.
8. For callings to serve as his assistants in the priests quorum.
9. For youth (see “Guidelines for Youth Interviews” on this page).
10. For an endorsement to enroll or continue enrollment at a Church university or college (see pages 133–34).
11. For patriarchal blessings (see pages 42–44).

At least quarterly the bishop holds priesthood interviews with the elders quorum president and high priests group leader.

Interviews Conducted by the Bishop or His Counselors

The bishop or an assigned counselor conducts the following interviews with ward members. Only the bishop resolves concerns about chastity and associated moral matters in these interviews. If a counselor encounters serious matters, such as transgressions that require confession, he should refer the member to the bishop without delay.

1. For temple recommends (see pages 75–79).
2. For callings to serve in the ward (see pages 45–58).
3. For callings to serve as deacons or teachers quorum president and counselors (however, only the bishop may set apart the deacons or teachers quorum president). For callings to serve as deacons, teachers, or priests quorum secretaries.
4. For 12-year-old children as they advance from Primary. (During this interview, the bishop or assigned counselor also interviews the boys to determine whether they are worthy and prepared to receive the Aaronic Priesthood. He interviews the girls in preparation for entering the Young Women program.)
5. For ordination to the offices of deacon and teacher.
6. For youth (see “Guidelines for Youth Interviews” on this page).
7. For young single adults, single adults, and students (usually annually; however, acting with inspiration and wisdom, the bishopric may adjust the frequency of these interviews).

8. For seminary or institute graduation (if the bishop feels that an interview may be necessary to determine the person’s worthiness for graduation).
9. For brethren who desire to act as voice in performing an ordinance in another ward but do not have a temple recommend. (If the person is worthy, the bishopric member fills out and signs a Recommend to Perform an Ordinance form.)
10. For members entering military service (see page 137).
11. For endorsement to participate in the Perpetual Education Fund loan program (where the program is approved).

Guidelines for Youth Interviews

The bishop interviews each young man and each young woman in the ward at least annually. If possible, he interviews each 16- and 17-year-old young man and young woman twice annually. In addition, six months after the annual interview with the bishop, counselors in the bishopric interview each young man and young woman who belongs to the Aaronic Priesthood quorum or Young Women class the bishop has assigned them to oversee.

Leaders should encourage parents to stay close to their children and to counsel them, allowing local Church leaders to act in a supporting role.

In large wards, bishops, acting with inspiration and wisdom, may adjust the frequency of interviews. Some youth may need added attention, while others may need less frequent interviews than are suggested, though all should be interviewed at least annually.

Interviews are excellent teaching opportunities and can be spiritual experiences for youth. Members of the bishopric should express love and listen carefully. They should encourage youth to talk rather than doing most of the talking themselves.

Matters for discussion should include the growth of the young person’s testimony of Heavenly Father, the mission and Atonement of Jesus Christ, and the restored gospel. The importance of sustaining the President of the Church and other general and local Church leaders should also be discussed.

Another matter for discussion should be the importance of obeying the commandments, particularly:

1. Praying regularly in private and with the family, studying the scriptures, honoring parents, and paying a full tithing.

2. Being modest in dress and action, refraining from any kind of sexual activity, and refraining from reading, listening to, or viewing pornographic material.
3. Obeying the Word of Wisdom and refraining from using illegal drugs and misusing other substances.
4. Refraining from using the name of the Lord in vain and from using vulgar expressions and other degrading language.
5. Attending priesthood and sacrament meetings, participating in other Church meetings and activities, and fulfilling assignments given by the priesthood quorum or Young Women class presidency.

The bishopric may want to refer to the scriptures, For the Strength of Youth, and True to the Faith during discussions about gospel principles and obeying the commandments.

While interviewing young men, the bishopric member gives special attention to their preparation for a full-time mission. He discusses being worthy, studying the gospel, building a testimony, and preparing financially, emotionally, physically, and spiritually. Bishopric members should be sensitive to the circumstances under which young men are honorably excused from full-time missionary service (see pages 94–95).

The bishop and his counselors encourage young women to support young men in accepting mission calls. Young women of eligible age who desire to serve a mission may do so, but they should not be pressured to serve (see page 92).

Members of the bishopric ensure that youth understand the blessings of temple covenants and temple marriage and the requirements for receiving these blessings.

When interviewing a young man for priesthood ordination, the bishop or his assigned counselor discusses the blessings of holding the Aaronic Priesthood and the duties of the office to which the young man will be ordained, as revealed in Doctrine and Covenants 20:46–60 (see also pages 175–76 in Book 2). In all interviews with young men, the bishopric member emphasizes the importance of accomplishing the purposes of the Aaronic Priesthood. He also emphasizes the importance of completing the Aaronic Priesthood Duty to God program. He evaluates each young man's progress and encourages him. During this part of the interview he may want to review the young man's Aaronic Priesthood: Fulfilling Our Duty to God booklet.

When interviewing a young woman, the bishopric member emphasizes the importance of incorporating the Young Women values and the standards in For the Strength of Youth in her daily living (see pages 211–12 in Book 2). He also emphasizes the importance of completing the Personal Progress program. He evaluates the young woman's progress and encourages her.

When interviewing youth of seminary age, the bishopric member emphasizes the importance of regular attendance at seminary and the blessings that come from active participation.

When discussing moral cleanliness, the bishop adapts the discussion to the understanding of the youth. He also ensures that the discussion does not arouse curiosity or experimentation.

Interviews of Persons to Be Readmitted by Baptism and Confirmation

For instructions on interviewing persons who have been excommunicated and want to be readmitted by baptism and confirmation, see page 119.

For instructions on interviewing persons who have had their names removed from Church records and want to be readmitted by baptism and confirmation, see pages 149–50.

Counseling

As judges in Israel, stake presidents and bishops counsel stake and ward members who seek spiritual guidance, who have weighty personal problems, or who have committed serious transgressions. The stake president or bishop may not delegate counseling of this kind to his counselors except in the most urgent cases when he is absent.

Church members should make a diligent effort, including earnest prayer and scripture study, to find solutions and answers themselves. If they still need help, they should counsel first with their bishop. If necessary, he refers them to the stake president. Local leaders should discourage members from calling, visiting, or writing to Church headquarters about personal matters (see pages 178–79).

The stake president and bishop are entitled to the discernment and inspiration necessary to be spiritual advisers and temporal counselors to ward members who need such help. They should prepare spiritually before counseling a member by seeking the power of discernment and the guidance of the Spirit. This guidance usually comes as impressions, thoughts, or feelings. The Spirit often prompts leaders to remember teachings from the scriptures and from latter-day prophets.

Leaders should frequently use the scriptures and the words of latter-day prophets as they counsel. These inspired words should be used with sensitivity, love, and warmth. They should be used to inspire and encourage, not to coerce or cause fear.

The stake president or bishop should schedule adequate time for appointments. Members should not feel that he is too busy and can devote only a few minutes to them. He should also help members feel comfortable as the appointment begins.

If the stake president or bishop does not feel prepared to counsel a member, he should schedule another appointment. Between appointments he should seek guidance through study, prayer, and, if necessary, fasting. He may also confer with his priesthood leader.

The stake president or bishop should counsel members privately in his office. When meeting with a woman, he should ask a priesthood holder to be in an adjoining room, foyer, or hall. He should avoid circumstances that might be misunderstood.

The stake president or bishop should avoid making decisions for those he counsels. Instead, he helps them make their own decisions with the Lord's guidance.

The stake president or bishop should also avoid immediately offering solutions to those he counsels. To the extent possible, he helps them analyze and resolve their own problems or questions in the context of the doctrines of the gospel and the plan of salvation. Ideally, he teaches members how to find solutions and strength from the scriptures on their own.

When counseling, the stake president or bishop asks questions to help him understand the member's situation, though he should avoid unnecessary probing. Questions usually should bring out feelings and thoughts rather than yes or no replies. Members should do most of the talking.

While members talk, the stake president or bishop should listen carefully, giving full and sincere attention. Listening is vital in establishing confidence and trust. People often need someone they trust to listen to them as they work through their challenges and problems.

If a member has transgressed, the stake president or bishop firmly and lovingly helps him or her repent. He teaches that repentance includes exercising faith in Jesus Christ, having a broken heart and contrite spirit, recognizing and forsaking sin, seeking forgiveness, making restitution, and demonstrating a renewed commitment to keep the commandments. If necessary, he imposes informal Church discipline or initiates formal discipline. He should be familiar with the circumstances that may necessitate Church discipline and the procedures for initiating it (see pages 105-23).

When counseling members, the stake president or bishop helps them take preventive action to resist temptations. For example, members who are courting, are having difficulty in their marriages, are separated or divorced, or are struggling with minor moral problems may be protected and strengthened by counseling designed to help them guard against transgression. Presiding officers need not wait for members to seek such help but may call them in for counseling.

If a member needs professional counseling or therapy, the stake president or bishop should select or recommend a professional who will work in harmony with gospel teachings and principles. Leaders may work through LDS Family Services where it is available.

No priesthood officer is to counsel a person whom to marry. Nor should he counsel a person to divorce his or her spouse. Those decisions must originate and remain with the individual.

When a marriage ends in divorce, or if a husband and wife separate, they should always receive counseling from Church leaders. One or both may also need Church discipline if they have committed serious transgressions in connection with the divorce or separation.

Members who are separated from their spouse or are going through a divorce should be counseled not to date until their divorce decree has become final according to law.

The stake president or bishop may give a priesthood blessing if the member who is being counseled sincerely wants one.

Keeping Confidences

During and after their term of service in a calling, leaders must keep confidences about matters discussed when interviewing and counseling. A breach of confidence can damage trust, testimonies, and faith. A leader must not discuss confidential matters with others, including his counselors and wife, unless he receives consent from the person he is interviewing or counseling.

If a counselor in the bishopric or stake presidency encounters matters that need to be discussed with the bishop or stake president, he should explain this to the member and refer the member to the bishop or stake president without delay.

If a person moves to a new ward or stake, the presiding officer of the unit from which he or she moved may need to share information about unresolved transgressions or concerns about worthiness with the person's new presiding officer. Doing so is not considered a violation of confidentiality.

Responding to Abuse

While interviewing or counseling a person, a priesthood leader may become aware of incidents of abuse of a child, spouse, or other person. Abuse cannot be tolerated in any form. Guidelines for responding to abuse are provided on page 186.

5. Ordinances and Blessings

General Instructions

An ordinance is a sacred act, such as baptism, that is performed by the authority of the priesthood. The ordinances of baptism, confirmation, Melchizedek Priesthood ordination (for men), and the temple endowment and sealing are required for exaltation for all accountable persons. These are called the saving ordinances. As part of each saving ordinance, the recipient makes covenants with God.

Priesthood blessings are important for the blessing, comfort, and encouragement of God's children.

Brethren who perform ordinances and blessings should prepare themselves by living worthily and striving to be guided by the Holy Spirit. They should perform each ordinance and blessing in a dignified manner, making sure it meets the following requirements:

1. It should be performed in the name of Jesus Christ.
2. It should be performed by the authority of the priesthood.
3. It should be performed with any necessary procedures, such as using specified words or using consecrated oil.
4. It should be authorized by the presiding authority who holds the proper keys (normally the bishop or stake president), if necessary according to the instructions in this section.

A priesthood leader who oversees an ordinance or blessing ensures that the person who performs it has the necessary priesthood authority, is worthy, and knows and follows the proper procedures. Leaders also seek to make the ordinance or blessing a reverent and spiritual experience.

When ordinances or blessings are performed in sacrament meeting, the bishop ensures that they are performed properly. To avoid embarrassing a priesthood holder, the bishop quietly corrects errors only if essential elements of the ordinance or blessing are incorrect.

Participation in Ordinances and Blessings

Only brethren who hold the necessary priesthood and are worthy may perform an ordinance or blessing or stand in the circle. Those who participate are usually limited to priesthood leaders, close family members, and close associates such as home teachers. For more detailed information about who may participate in a priesthood ordination, see pages 39 and 41.

When several brethren participate in an ordinance or blessing, each one places his right hand lightly on the person's head (or under the baby being blessed) and his left hand on the shoulder of the brother to his left. The practice of inviting large numbers of family, friends, and leaders to assist in an ordinance or blessing is discouraged. When too many participate, it can become cumbersome and detract from the spirit of the ordinance.

Family members are usually invited to attend when a person receives an ordinance or blessing.

Leaders encourage worthy fathers who hold the necessary priesthood to perform or participate in ordinances and blessings for their own children.

Performing an Ordinance or Blessing in Another Ward

To act as voice when naming and blessing a child, baptizing or confirming a person, ordaining a person to a priesthood office, or dedicating a grave, a priesthood holder who is outside his own ward should show the presiding officer a current temple recommend or a Recommend to Perform an Ordinance form (obtained from his bishopric).

Teaching How to Perform Ordinances and Blessings

Priesthood leaders teach brethren how to perform ordinances and blessings. Leaders also help fathers be prepared and worthy to perform ordinances and blessings for family members.

Priesthood leaders ensure that brethren have access to instructions on how to perform priesthood ordinances and blessings. Sources of these instructions are listed under the following heading.

Instructions for Ordinances and Blessings

In addition to this section, instructions for performing most ordinances and blessings are published in the "Melchizedek Priesthood" section of Book 2 (pages 171–74). Instructions for ordinances that Aaronic Priesthood holders may perform are also published in the "Aaronic Priesthood" section of Book 2 (pages 190–92).

Instructions for ordinances and blessings are also provided in the Family Guidebook (pages 18–25) and in Duties and Blessings of the Priesthood, Part B (pages 42–47). Priesthood leaders ensure that brethren have copies of one of these publications.

Priesthood leaders should not produce or use publications that give instructions for ordinances, blessings, or prayers unless the First Presidency has authorized such publications.

Interpreting and Translating Ordinances and Blessings

If necessary, a bishop may ask a worthy priesthood holder to interpret orally an ordinance or blessing into a language that the recipient understands. If a worthy priesthood holder is not available, the bishop may ask a worthy woman to do the interpretation.

The bishop may also ask a worthy priesthood holder to interpret an ordinance or blessing if the recipient is hearing impaired. If a worthy priesthood holder is not available, the bishop may ask a worthy woman to do the interpretation.

For information on translating patriarchal blessings, see page 44.

Records of Ordinances

When a person receives a saving ordinance or priesthood ordination, a clerk from the ward where the person's membership record is held should (1) obtain information about the ordinance or ordination and (2) ensure that this information is recorded on the person's membership record and certificate.

The complete date that the following ordinances were performed should be recorded on a person's membership record: baptism, confirmation, priesthood ordinations, temple endowment, and temple sealing. For Melchizedek Priesthood ordinations, the name of the person who performed each ordination should also be recorded.

Recording the Words of Ordinances and Blessings

Patriarchal blessings are recorded and transcribed. The exact wording of other ordinances and blessings is not recorded in writing or by recording device. However, a family may record father's blessings.

Photographs and Video Recordings of Ordinances and Blessings

No one should take photographs, motion pictures, or video recordings of priesthood ordinances or blessings or of baptismal services.

Ordinances for Adopted Children

After a legal adoption is final, adopted children receive ordinances in the surname of their adopting parents. An older child who is adopted and who has been baptized is not baptized again. The ward clerk changes the membership record to conform to the decree of adoption.

For information about the sealing of adopted or foster children, see pages 86-87.

Ordinances for Persons Who Have Mental Disabilities

When contemplating ordinances for a person who has a mental disability, priesthood leaders and parents prayerfully consider the person's wishes and degree of understanding. Ordinances should not be withheld if the person is worthy, wants to receive them, and demonstrates an appropriate degree of responsibility and accountability. Living persons whose disabilities cause them to have the mental capacity of little children may not be accountable (see D&C 29:46-50). The saving ordinances do not need to be performed for these individuals.

If leaders determine that a person should receive an ordinance, they help him or her understand and prepare for it in a private, appropriate setting.

For information about baptism for persons who have mental disabilities, see page 33. For information about priesthood ordination, see page 41. For information about patriarchal blessings, see page 43. For information about temple ordinances, see pages 77 (living members) and 88 (deceased persons). A bishop should consult with his stake president if he has questions about specific persons. The stake president may direct questions to the Office of the First Presidency if necessary.

Ordinances and Blessings Performed by and for Persons Who Have Physical Disabilities

Persons who have physical disabilities such as the loss of one or both arms, paraplegia, quadriplegia, or hearing impairment may perform and receive ordinances and blessings. Leaders make the necessary arrangements for these persons to participate in a way that their disabilities allow. If there are questions that local leaders cannot resolve, the stake president refers them to the Office of the First Presidency.

Persons who are hearing impaired may communicate through sign language when performing or receiving an ordinance or blessing. If an ordinance or blessing is performed under the direction of a presiding officer, he ensures that the recipient can understand it through an interpreter or by other means (see the previous column).

Procedure When an Ordinance Is Not Valid

Ordinances for Which There Is No Valid Record

For record-keeping purposes, an ordinance is not considered valid unless at least the correct year it was performed is recorded on the membership record. If the date is missing or incorrect, the ordinance can be validated by the member showing the bishop the original certificate that was issued when the ordinance was performed. The bishop then asks a clerk to record this information on the membership record.

If the member cannot provide the certificate, a ward clerk can ask for a search of Church records (available only for records submitted before 1984) by completing a Request for Ordinance Information form.

If the information cannot be found in Church records, the bishop or clerk may try to verify the ordinance by obtaining the testimony of two witnesses. The two witnesses should:

1. Have been 10 years of age or older when the ordinance was performed.
2. Have seen and heard the ordinance.
3. Be Church members of record at the time they give their testimony.
4. Give their testimony in writing, stating either (a) the complete date the ordinance was performed or (b) the year it was performed and the person who performed it.
5. Sign their written testimony in the presence of a member of a bishopric or a higher Church authority.

If this testimony is obtained, the bishop may authorize a clerk to record or correct the date on the membership record.

If the ordinance is not verified by an original certificate, a search of Church records, or the testimony of witnesses, it must be performed again to be considered valid.

If the member has received other ordinances after having received an invalid ordinance, they must be ratified by the First Presidency to be considered valid. The stake president (or the bishop under his direction) may request ratification by sending a letter to the Office of the First Presidency.

Ordinances That Were Received Out of Sequence

An ordinance is not valid if a person received it out of sequence. For example, the endowment of a male member is not valid if he received it before receiving the Melchizedek Priesthood. However, the

First Presidency may ratify such an ordinance. To request ratification, the stake president (or the bishop under his direction) sends a letter to the Office of the First Presidency.

Ordinances That Were Performed before the Appropriate Age

An ordinance is not valid if it was performed before the appropriate age. For example, a baptism is not valid if it was performed before the person was eight. If no other ordinances have been received based on the invalid ordinance, it should be performed again. If other ordinances, such as priesthood ordination, have been received based on the invalid ordinance, those ordinances and the invalid ordinance must be ratified by the First Presidency to be valid. To request ratification, the stake president (or the bishop under his direction) sends a letter to the Office of the First Presidency.

Records of Ordinances That Were Performed Again

If an ordinance was performed again to become valid, a clerk records the date it was performed again on the membership record even if it will appear out of sequence with the dates of other ordinances on the membership record.

Naming and Blessing Children

General Guidelines

"Every member of the church of Christ having children is to bring them unto the elders before the church, who are to lay their hands upon them in the name of Jesus Christ, and bless them in his name" (D&C 20:70). In conformity with this revelation, only worthy Melchizedek Priesthood holders may participate in naming and blessing children. Priesthood leaders should inform members of this instruction before their children are named and blessed. While preserving the sacred nature of the blessing, leaders should make every reasonable effort to avoid embarrassment or offense to individuals or families.

Children normally should be named and blessed during fast and testimony meeting in the ward where the parents are members of record.

Babies Who Were Born Out of Wedlock

Children who were born out of wedlock may be blessed during fast and testimony meeting. Or, if a family prefers, the bishop may authorize Melchizedek Priesthood holders to bless the child in the home, with a member of the bishopric presiding.

Babies Who Are Critically Ill

If a newborn infant is critically ill, a Melchizedek Priesthood holder may perform the naming and blessing in the hospital or at home without previous authorization from the bishop. A person who does this should notify the bishop promptly so necessary records can be made.

Babies with a Nonmember Parent

When either of a child's parents is not a member of the Church, the bishop should obtain verbal permission from both parents before the child is blessed. He explains that a membership record will be prepared for the child after the blessing. He should also tell them (1) that ward members will contact them periodically and (2) that when the child turns eight, the bishop or the ward missionaries will visit them and propose that the child be baptized.

Instructions for Naming and Blessing a Child

When blessing a baby, Melchizedek Priesthood holders gather in a circle and place their hands under the baby. When blessing an older child, brethren place their hands lightly on the child's head. The person who gives the blessing:

1. Addresses Heavenly Father.
2. States that the blessing is performed by the authority of the Melchizedek Priesthood.
3. Gives the child a name.
4. Gives a priesthood blessing as the Spirit directs.
5. Closes in the name of Jesus Christ.

Record and Certificate of Blessing

When a child is to be blessed, the ward clerk prepares a record and certificate of the blessing according to instructions on the form. After a child is blessed, the bishop and ward clerk ensure that the child's parents receive a certificate of the blessing.

If a baby is born out of wedlock, the name on the membership record and certificate of blessing should match the name on the birth certificate or civil birth registry. If a birth certificate or civil birth registry does not exist, the naming conventions of the local culture are used.

Baptism

Under the direction of the presiding authority, children should be baptized on or as soon after their eighth birthday as reasonable. Converts should be baptized when they have met the qualifications on pages 252–53 in Book 2.

Preparing Children for Baptism

Bishops give special attention to seven-year-old children in the ward, ensuring that their parents, Primary leaders and teachers, and home teachers help them prepare for baptism. Melchizedek Priesthood and Relief Society leaders also encourage parents to teach and prepare their children for this ordinance. When children reach age eight, the bishop makes sure they have every opportunity to accept the gospel and be baptized.

Baptismal Interviews

An authorized priesthood leader or missionary interviews each person before baptism as outlined in this section.

Eight-Year-Old Children

The bishop interviews each eight-year-old child who is a member of record. The bishop also interviews eight-year-old children who are not members of record if they have at least one member parent or guardian.

Converts

Convert baptisms are defined as baptisms of (1) persons ages nine and older who have never been baptized and confirmed and (2) children age eight whose parents are both nonmembers or whose parents are being baptized and confirmed at the same time as the child.

The full-time missionary district leader normally interviews these baptismal candidates. The zone leader conducts the interview if the person was taught by the district leader.

Former members who are readmitted by baptism and confirmation after excommunication or name removal are not considered converts. Missionaries may not interview them for baptism (see pages 119–21 and 149–50).

Authorization by the mission president is required before a prospective convert may be baptized if the person:

1. Has submitted to, performed, paid for, arranged for, or encouraged an abortion.
2. Has been convicted of a serious crime (note that baptism of a person who has committed murder, has been involved in the practice of plural marriage, or has undergone an elective transsexual operation requires the approval of the First Presidency, as explained on this page and page 34).

3. Has committed a homosexual transgression.

In these instances, the mission president conducts a searching interview and issues a baptism and confirmation record form if he determines that the person has repented and is worthy. If necessary, the mission president may authorize one of his counselors to conduct the interview in cases of abortion. A separate authorization from the mission president is required for each interview. When a counselor conducts one of these interviews, he reports to the mission president, who may then authorize or deny the baptism.

Each prospective convert should meet with the bishop before baptism. However, the bishop does not interview such candidates for baptism or determine their worthiness.

Instructions for Baptismal Interviews

The person conducting the baptismal interview should use the following questions, with the guidance of the Spirit, to determine whether the candidate meets the qualifications described in D&C 20:37 (see also Mosiah 18:8–10 and Moroni 6:1–4). These questions apply to all baptismal candidates but should be adapted to the age and maturity of the candidate. For example, because children are sinless and have no need to repent until the age of accountability, the bishop should adapt the questions accordingly.

1. Do you believe that God is our Eternal Father? Do you believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, the Savior and Redeemer of the world?
2. Do you believe the Church and gospel of Jesus Christ have been restored through the Prophet Joseph Smith? Do you believe that [current Church President] is a prophet of God? What does this mean to you?
3. What does it mean to you to repent? Do you feel that you have repented of your past transgressions?
4. Have you ever committed a serious crime? If so, are you now on probation or parole? Have you ever participated in an abortion? a homosexual relationship?
5. You have been taught that membership in The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints includes living gospel standards. What do you understand of the following standards? Are you willing to obey them?
 - a. The law of chastity, which prohibits any sexual relationship outside the bonds of a legal marriage between a man and a woman.

b. The law of tithing.

c. The Word of Wisdom.

d. Keeping the Sabbath day holy, including partaking of the sacrament weekly and rendering service to others.

6. When you are baptized, you covenant with God that you are willing to take upon yourself the name of Christ and keep His commandments throughout your life. Are you ready to make this covenant and strive to be faithful to it?

Persons Who May Not Be Accountable

Persons who have mental disabilities and cannot knowingly repent may be considered by the bishop as not accountable. These persons need not be baptized, regardless of their age. They are “saved in the celestial kingdom of heaven” (D&C 137:10; see also Moroni 8:8–12).

If a person later demonstrates an understanding of repentance and an appropriate degree of accountability and desire, he or she may be baptized. If a person was baptized but later becomes mentally disabled, the baptism is still valid.

For additional guidelines, see page 30. For information about the membership records of persons who may not be accountable, see page 147.

Minors

A minor child, as defined by local laws, may be baptized only with the consent of the custodial parent(s) or legal guardian(s), preferably in writing, and only if there is clear evidence that he or she understands the baptismal covenant and will make every effort to keep it through obeying the commandments, including faithfully attending Church meetings.

Children Whose Parents Are Divorced

A child whose parents are divorced may be baptized only with the permission of the parent(s) with legal custody. If the mother has custody and has remarried, and if the child is not formally adopted but has assumed the surname of the stepfather, the child may be baptized in the name by which he or she will be known. However, the child's legal name, as defined by local law or custom, should be recorded on the membership record and the baptism and confirmation certificate.

Adults Involved in Plural Marriage

Adults who have previously encouraged, taught, or been involved in the practice of plural marriage and who desire to be baptized must first receive clearance from the First Presidency. Mission or stake presidents should make such requests in writing to the Office of the First Presidency. The request should provide information about the individual's past involvement in plural marriage and his or her subsequent repentance and current family situation.

Children Whose Parents Have Practiced or Are Practicing Plural Marriage

Children of parents who have practiced or are practicing plural marriage must receive approval from the First Presidency to be baptized. The mission president or bishop may request this approval when he is satisfied that the children (1) accept the teachings and doctrines of the Church and (2) repudiate the teachings upon which their parents based their practice of plural marriage. The mission president submits the request through a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency. The bishop submits the request through the stake president.

Persons Who Are Married

A married person may not be baptized without the consent of his or her spouse.

Persons Who Have Been Excommunicated or Had Their Names Removed from Church Records

Persons who have been excommunicated may be readmitted into the Church by baptism and confirmation. Instructions are provided on pages 119–21.

Persons who have had their names removed from Church membership records may be readmitted by baptism and confirmation. Instructions are provided on pages 149–50.

Persons Who Have Been Involved in an Abortion

See pages 32–33.

Persons Who Have Been Convicted of Crimes

Persons who have been convicted of crimes and seek baptism for the first time or baptism for readmission into the Church are not baptized until they complete their terms of imprisonment. Those who have been convicted of felonies or any crimes of immoral character should not be baptized until they have also completed their terms of parole or probation resulting from their convictions (unless the First Presidency has granted an exception). They are encouraged to work closely with local priesthood leaders and to do everything they can to become worthy of baptism.

Full-time missionaries are not to teach people who are in prison or jail.

A person who has been convicted of murder, or who has confessed to it even in private confessions to a priesthood leader, may not be baptized unless the First Presidency gives permission. The request for permission must include all pertinent details as determined during a personal interview by the mission president (if the person is seeking baptism for the first time) or bishop (if a former member is seeking readmission). As used here, murder does not include police or military action in the line of duty. Abortion is not defined as murder for this purpose.

Persons Who Have HIV Infection or AIDS

Persons with HIV infection or AIDS are treated as anyone else who expresses faith in God, repents, requests baptism, and is living the gospel of Jesus Christ (see Articles of Faith 1:1 and 1:4).

Persons Who Are Considering or Have Undergone a Transsexual Operation

Persons who are considering an elective transsexual operation should not be baptized. Baptism of a person who has already undergone an elective transsexual operation requires the approval of the First Presidency. The mission president may request this approval if he has interviewed the person, found him or her to be otherwise worthy, and can recommend baptism. However, such persons may not receive the priesthood or a temple recommend.

Baptismal Fonts

Missionaries coordinate their use of a baptismal font with the agent bishop or another person designated by the stake presidency. The schedule for using a font should permit missionaries to baptize once a week or more often, if necessary. However, missionaries should not expect to use a font at unreasonable times. No charge is made for using a baptismal font.

A responsible adult should be present while the baptismal font is filling and remain until it is empty and secured. The font should be drained and cleaned immediately after each baptismal service. Appropriate safety precautions should be taken whenever water is in the font.

When the font is not in use, all access doors to it should be closed and locked.

When a baptismal font is not available, any body of water that is safe may be used for a baptism if it is large enough to immerse the person and to permit the priesthood holder who performs the baptism to stand in the water with the person. Water is not dedicated for baptisms.

Clothing for Baptism

A person who performs a baptism and a person who is baptized wear clean, white clothing that does not appear transparent when it is wet. An endowed person wears the temple garment under this clothing while performing a baptism.

Local units should have baptismal clothing available and should not charge for its use. This clothing is purchased with budget allowance funds. The bishop may ask members to clean and mend the clothing.

Baptismal Services

Baptismal services should be simple, brief, and spiritual. Normally, ward or stake leaders conduct monthly baptismal services for all eight-year-old children of record in the ward or stake. Members should not request special or individual times or prescribe the content of baptismal services.

Services That Involve Only One Ward

For Eight-Year-Old Children of Record. A member of the bishopric presides over baptismal services for eight-year-old children of record when the services involve only one ward.

A member of the bishopric oversees the planning of these baptismal services. A member of the bishopric may conduct the services or assign the ward mission leader to conduct. Primary leaders may help plan the services under the direction of the bishopric.

For Converts. Where possible, a member of the bishopric should attend each convert baptismal service. When the services involve only one ward, he presides unless a member of the stake presidency attends.

Under the direction of the bishopric, the ward mission leader usually works with the full-time missionaries to plan these baptismal services. A member of the bishopric or the ward mission leader usually conducts the services. If none of these ward leaders are available, full-time missionary district or zone leaders may plan and conduct the services with the approval of the mission president.

Services That Involve More Than One Ward

For Eight-Year-Old Children of Record. A member of the stake presidency presides over baptismal services for eight-year-old children of record when the services involve more than one ward. A member of the bishopric from each of the wards involved should attend.

The stake presidency may assign a high councilor to oversee the planning of services for eight-year-old children and to conduct the services. Primary leaders may help plan these services under the direction of the presiding officers.

For Converts. A member of the stake presidency usually presides over baptismal services for converts when the services involve more than one ward. However, the stake presidency may authorize a high councilor or bishop to preside. A member of the bishopric from each of the wards involved should attend.

When baptismal services for converts involve more than one ward, the stake presidency usually asks (1) the high councilor who is assigned to missionary work or (2) a bishop to work with the full-time missionaries in planning the services. This high councilor or bishop usually conducts the services.

Scheduling Baptismal Services for Converts

Baptismal services for converts should be scheduled when it is convenient for them and when they have committed to be baptized. Baptisms should not normally be delayed past this date unless the investigators are not yet prepared. Baptisms of family members should not be delayed so the father can receive the priesthood and perform the baptisms himself.

Baptismal services for converts should be scheduled through the ward mission leader. If a service is scheduled on a Sunday, it should be held at a time that minimizes interference with regular Sunday meetings. Baptismal services should not be scheduled on Monday evenings.

People who are invited to a baptismal service may include the person's family members, other close relatives, close friends, priesthood leaders, home teachers, visiting teachers, auxiliary officers and teachers who will be working with the new member, other ward members, and investigators who are being taught.

For further instructions about baptismal services, including an outline of what a service may include, see pages 253–54 in Book 2.

Witnesses of a Baptism

Two priests or Melchizedek Priesthood holders witness each baptism to make sure it is performed properly. The baptism must be repeated if the words are not spoken exactly as given in Doctrine and Covenants 20:73 or if part of a person's body or clothing is not immersed completely.

Instructions for Performing a Baptism

Under the direction of the presiding authority, a worthy priest or Melchizedek Priesthood holder may perform the ordinance of baptism. To do so, he:

1. Stands in the water with the person to be baptized.
2. Holds the person's right wrist with his left hand (for convenience and safety); the person being baptized holds the priesthood holder's left wrist with his or her left hand.
3. Raises his right arm to the square.
4. States the person's full name and says, "Having been commissioned of Jesus Christ, I baptize you in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen" (D&C 20:73).
5. Has the person hold his or her nose with the right hand (for convenience); then the priesthood holder places his right hand high on the person's back and immerses the person completely, including the person's clothing.
6. Helps the person come up out of the water.

Baptism and Confirmation Record

After determining that a candidate is prepared for baptism, the person who conducts the interview fills out the baptism and confirmation record according to instructions on the form. The confirmation information is completed at the time of confirmation (see "Baptism and Confirmation Record and Certificate" in the next column).

Confirmation

A person receives the ordinance of confirmation after he or she has been baptized (see D&C 20:41). A person becomes a member of the Church only after the ordinances of baptism and confirmation are both completed (see John 3:5; D&C 33:11).

The ordinance of confirmation is performed under the direction of the bishop. He ensures that the confirmation is performed as soon as reasonable after baptism. Eight-year-old members of record may be confirmed at the baptismal service or in a sacrament meeting of the ward in which they live, preferably a fast and testimony meeting. Converts are confirmed in any sacrament meeting of the ward in which they live, preferably the Sunday following their baptism. Converts are not confirmed at the baptismal service.

The bishop or one of his counselors participates in the confirmation. When missionary elders have taught a convert, the bishop may invite them to participate in the confirmation.

The bishop does not conduct a separate interview for confirmation.

Instructions for Performing a Confirmation

Under the direction of the bishopric, one or more Melchizedek Priesthood holders may participate in this ordinance. They place their hands lightly on the person's head. Then the person who performs the ordinance:

1. States the person's full name.
2. States that the ordinance is performed by the authority of the Melchizedek Priesthood.
3. Confirms the person a member of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.
4. Uses the wording "Receive the Holy Ghost."
5. Gives a priesthood blessing as the Spirit directs.
6. Closes in the name of Jesus Christ.

Welcoming New Members

See page 146.

Baptism and Confirmation Record and Certificate

Before a person is confirmed, the bishop or ward clerk completes the confirmation information on the baptism and confirmation record according to instructions on the form.

After a person is confirmed, the ward clerk distributes copies of the baptism and confirmation record as instructed. Proper distribution is essential for creating or updating membership records. The ward clerk also prepares the baptism and confirmation certificate. The bishop signs the certificate and gives it to the member (or to a parent or guardian if a child was confirmed).

For instructions on preparing a baptism and confirmation certificate for a child whose parents are divorced, see page 33.

If a child's parents are divorced, his or her legal name, as defined by local law or custom, should be recorded on the membership record and the certificate.

Sacrament

General Guidelines

Church members meet on the Sabbath to worship God and partake of the sacrament (see D&C 20:75; 59:9). During this holy ordinance, they partake of bread and water in remembrance of the Savior's flesh and blood and to renew their baptismal covenants (see Matthew 26:26-28; Joseph Smith Translation, Mark 14:20-25; Luke 22:15-20; 3 Nephi 18; Moroni 6:6).

Under the direction of the bishopric, priesthood holders bless the sacrament and pass it to members of the congregation during each sacrament meeting. Aaronic Priesthood holders usually perform these duties. Under the direction of the bishopric, the deacons quorum president has the privilege and responsibility to invite others to help pass the sacrament. When there are not enough deacons, he should counsel with a member of the bishopric to determine who may be asked to assist.

Generally, teachers and priests in the Aaronic Priesthood should be invited to pass the sacrament before Melchizedek Priesthood holders are invited to do so. Where there are sufficient numbers of Aaronic Priesthood holders, Melchizedek Priesthood holders should not be invited to bless and pass the sacrament on a regular schedule.

Every priesthood holder who participates in this ordinance should understand that he is acting on behalf of the Lord. The bishopric encourages priesthood holders to ponder the Savior's Atonement as they prepare, bless, and pass the sacrament. The bishopric also ensures that priesthood holders have a reverent, dignified manner as they participate in this ordinance.

Those who bless and pass the sacrament should dress modestly and be well groomed and clean. Clothing or jewelry should not call attention to itself or distract members during the sacrament. White shirts and ties are recommended because they add to the dignity of the ordinance. However, they should not be required as a mandatory prerequisite for a priesthood holder to participate. Nor should it be required that all be alike in dress and appearance. Bishops should use discretion when giving such guidance to young men, taking into account their financial circumstances and maturity in the Church.

The sacred nature of this ordinance justifies the greatest care and preparation to ensure order and reverence. Assignments to bless and pass the sacrament should be made in advance. Those who participate should be seated reverently before the meeting begins.

The passing of the sacrament should be natural and unobtrusive, not rigid or overly formal. Those who pass the sacrament should not be required to assume any particular posture or action, such as holding the left hand behind the back. The process of passing the sacrament should not call attention to itself or detract from the purpose of the ordinance.

Priesthood holders should wash their hands thoroughly with soap or a disposable towelette before preparing, blessing, or passing the sacrament.

A priesthood holder who has committed a serious transgression should not prepare, bless, or pass the sacrament until he has repented and resolved the matter with his bishop.

Although the sacrament is for Church members, the bishopric should not announce that it will be passed to members only, and nothing should be done to prevent nonmembers from partaking of it.

Preparing the Sacrament

Worthy teachers, priests, and Melchizedek Priesthood holders may prepare the sacrament. Before the meeting begins, those who prepare the sacrament should make sure that bread trays with unbroken bread, water trays with cups filled with fresh water, and clean tablecloths are in place.

Sacrament tablecloths should be white, nontransparent, clean, and pressed. Sacrament trays should be kept clean. Sacrament trays and cups are available from Church Distribution Services (see page xiv for contact information).

Blessing and Passing the Sacrament

Worthy priests and Melchizedek Priesthood holders may bless the sacrament. Worthy deacons, teachers, priests, and Melchizedek Priesthood holders may pass the sacrament.

As the congregation sings the sacrament hymn, the priesthood holders who will bless the sacrament reverently stand, remove the cloth that covers the bread trays, and break the bread into bite-sized pieces. When they finish breaking the bread, they should sit down and join in singing the remainder of the hymn. Vocal solos or instrumental selections may not replace this hymn.

Following the hymn, the person who blesses the bread kneels and offers the sacrament prayer for the bread. The sacrament prayers were revealed by the Lord (see D&C 20:77, 79; Moroni 4-5). The bishop makes sure they are spoken clearly, accurately, and with dignity. If the person who blesses the sacrament makes an error in the wording but corrects it himself, no further correction is required. If the person does not correct an error, the bishop indicates that he should repeat the prayer correctly. In doing so, the bishop should be careful to avoid causing embarrassment or distracting from the sacred nature of the ordinance.

After the prayer, deacons or other priesthood holders pass the bread to the congregation in a reverent and orderly manner. The presiding officer receives the sacrament first. The bishop (or a counselor in his absence) presides at the sacrament meeting unless a General Authority, Area Seventy, or member of the stake presidency is sitting on the stand. A high councilor does not preside and does not receive the sacrament first.

While the presiding officer is receiving the sacrament, others who are passing the sacrament may walk to their designated places.

After a priesthood holder hands a sacrament tray to a member, others may pass the tray from one to another for convenience.

When brethren finish passing the bread, they return the trays to the sacrament table. Those officiating at the sacrament table replace the cloth over the bread trays and uncover the water trays. The person who blesses the water then kneels and offers the sacrament prayer for the water (see D&C 20:79), substituting the word water for wine.

After the prayer, deacons or other priesthood holders pass the water to the congregation. When they finish, they return the trays to the sacrament table, wait for the officiators to cover the trays, then reverently take their seats.

Everyone who attends the meeting should be reverent during the entire ordinance of blessing and passing the sacrament. No music should be played during the prayer or while the sacrament is being passed.

Sacrament for Members Who Are Unable to Attend

See "Sacrament Services in Unusual Situations" on page 65.

Consecrating Oil

One or more Melchizedek Priesthood holders must consecrate olive oil before it is used to anoint the sick or afflicted. No other oil may be used. To consecrate oil, a priesthood holder:

1. Holds an open container of olive oil.
2. Addresses Heavenly Father.
3. States that he is acting by the authority of the Melchizedek Priesthood.
4. Consecrates the oil (not the container) and sets it apart for anointing and blessing the sick and afflicted.
5. Closes in the name of Jesus Christ.

Members should not take consecrated oil internally or apply it on afflicted parts of the body.

Administering to the Sick

Only Melchizedek Priesthood holders may administer to the sick or afflicted. Normally two or more priesthood holders administer to the sick, but one may perform both the anointing and the sealing alone if necessary. If consecrated oil is not available, a blessing may nevertheless be given by the authority of the priesthood without the anointing.

A worthy father who holds the Melchizedek Priesthood normally should administer to sick members of his family.

Brethren should administer to the sick at the request of the sick person or of those who are vitally concerned so the blessing will be according to their faith (see D&C 24:13-14; 42:43-44, 48-52). Melchizedek Priesthood holders who visit hospitals should not solicit opportunities to administer to the sick.

If a person requests more than one blessing for the same illness, the priesthood holder need not anoint with oil after the first blessing. Instead, he gives a blessing by the laying on of hands and the authority of the priesthood.

Administering to the sick has two parts: (1) anointing with oil and (2) sealing the anointing.

Anointing with Oil

The anointing is done by one Melchizedek Priesthood holder. He:

1. Puts a drop of consecrated oil on the person's head.
2. Places his hands lightly on the person's head and calls the person by his or her full name.
3. States that he is acting by the authority of the Melchizedek Priesthood.
4. States that he is anointing with oil that has been consecrated for anointing and blessing the sick and afflicted.
5. Closes in the name of Jesus Christ.

Sealing the Anointing

Normally, two or more Melchizedek Priesthood holders place their hands lightly on the head of the person. The one who seals the anointing:

1. Calls the person by his or her full name.
2. States that he is sealing the anointing by the authority of the Melchizedek Priesthood.
3. Gives a priesthood blessing as the Spirit directs.
4. Closes in the name of Jesus Christ.

Conferring the Priesthood and Ordaining to an Office

General Principles

To participate in an ordination, one must have equal or higher priesthood authority than is to be given in the ordinance. For instance, an elder should not stand in the circle when a high priest is ordained or when a man is set apart to an office that requires him to be a high priest.

An ordination is an opportunity to pronounce a blessing, not to give counsel or instruction. That is done afterward when a person is taught his duties.

An ordination need not be expanded into a formal meeting. It is not necessary to have prayers or testimonies or instruction when someone is ordained.

Melchizedek Priesthood Offices

Stake President's and Bishop's Responsibilities

The stake president oversees the conferral of the Melchizedek Priesthood and ordination to the offices of elder and high priest. However, the bishop usually initiates recommendations for these ordinations. With the approval of the stake presidency, the bishop interviews the member as instructed on the Melchizedek Priesthood record form. Before doing so, he should carefully review the person's membership record to verify that it does not include a comment about an ordinance restriction or unresolved Church discipline.

After the bishop interviews the member, the stake president or one of his counselors conducts a thorough, searching interview as instructed on the Melchizedek Priesthood record form. He also makes sure the member understands the oath and covenant of the priesthood and agrees to live by it (see D&C 84:33-44).

After the interview, the stake presidency asks the high council to sustain the decision to ordain the person. A member of the stake presidency then presents the person for a sustaining vote in a general session of stake conference or in a stake general priesthood meeting (see D&C 20:65, 67; 26:2; 42:11). The person should stand while the congregation gives a sustaining vote. The member of the stake presidency may say:

"We propose that [name] receive the Melchizedek Priesthood and be ordained an elder [or we propose that (name) be ordained a high priest]. Those in favor may manifest it by the uplifted hand. [Pause briefly for the sustaining vote.] Those opposed, if any, may manifest it. [Pause briefly to allow for a dissenting vote, if any.]"

The person who is being presented should participate in the sustaining vote. If more than one person is being presented, they usually may be sustained as a group.

If a member in good standing gives a dissenting vote, a member of the stake presidency confers with him or her in private after the meeting. The officer determines whether the dissenting vote was based on knowledge that the person is guilty of conduct that should disqualify him from being ordained to the priesthood office.

Some brethren may need to be ordained before they can be presented in a general stake meeting. When this occurs, they are presented in their ward sacrament meetings for a sustaining vote. Their names are then presented in the next stake conference or stake general priesthood meeting to ratify the ordination.

When the necessary interviews and approvals are completed, the ordination is performed according to the instructions on page 41.

Elders

Worthy brethren may receive the Melchizedek Priesthood and be ordained elders when they are at least 18 years old. However, because of individual circumstances, such as a young man's maturity, school graduation, and desire to continue with peer-group associates, the bishop may allow a worthy 18-year-old to remain a priest for a period of time. By age 19, all brethren should be affiliated with the elders quorum as elders or with the high priests group or elders quorum as prospective elders.

Before brethren ages 18 and older leave home for reasons such as school, employment, or military service, they should be ordained elders if they are worthy.

Recently baptized brethren ages 18 and older are ordained elders after they have served as priests, developed sufficient understanding of the gospel, and demonstrated their worthiness. No specific time as a member is required.

High Priests

Brethren are ordained high priests when they are called to a stake presidency, high council, or bishopric or when otherwise determined by the stake president. As an exception, bishops' counselors in student wards need not be ordained high priests.

Aaronic Priesthood Offices

Bishop's Responsibility

The bishop oversees the conferral of the Aaronic Priesthood and ordinations to the offices of deacon, teacher, and priest. Worthy brethren may be ordained at the following minimum ages:

Deacon, age 12

Teacher, age 14

Priest, age 16

The bishop or an assigned counselor interviews brethren who are to be ordained deacons or teachers to determine if they are worthy. The bishop interviews brethren who are to be ordained priests. Before interviewing a young man for priesthood ordination, a member of the bishopric obtains permission from the young man's parents or guardians.

If a member is found worthy in an interview, the person who conducts the interview completes the Aaronic Priesthood record form. The bishop or one of his counselors presents the member in sacrament meeting for the sustaining vote of members (see D&C 20:65). This should follow the pattern for presenting brethren for Melchizedek Priesthood ordination (see page 39). If a member in good standing gives a dissenting vote, a member of the bishopric confers with him or her in private after the meeting.

After the sustaining vote, the ordination is performed by or under the direction of the bishop according to the instructions on page 41.

Young Men Whose Parents Are Divorced

A young man whose parents are divorced may be ordained to Aaronic Priesthood offices only with the permission of the parent(s) with legal custody. If the mother has custody and has remarried, and if the young man is not formally adopted but has assumed the surname of the stepfather, he may be ordained in the name by which he is known. However, the young man's legal name, as defined by local law or custom, should be recorded on the ordination certificate.

Recently Baptized Brethren

Brethren ages 12 and older who have recently been baptized should receive the Aaronic Priesthood and be ordained to the appropriate office soon after they are confirmed. Before receiving the priesthood, they must be interviewed for worthiness and presented in sacrament meeting for a sustaining vote (see the previous column). Brethren ages 16 and older are ordained priests. Brethren ages 19 and older are also considered prospective elders (see the next heading).

Recently baptized brethren need to be interviewed by the bishop and sustained by a vote of ward members in a sacrament meeting before they are ordained to an Aaronic Priesthood office. Therefore, they are not ordained on the day they are baptized or confirmed.

Baptisms of family members should not be delayed so the father can receive the priesthood and perform the baptisms himself.

Prospective Elders

A prospective elder is a male Church member, age 19 or older, who does not hold the Melchizedek Priesthood. Married brethren who are younger than 19 and do not hold the Melchizedek Priesthood are also prospective elders.

The bishop interviews prospective elders regularly and works closely with other priesthood leaders in the ward to prepare them to receive the Melchizedek Priesthood. Where possible, high priests should be given primary responsibility for home teaching and working with prospective elders.

If a prospective elder is not already a priest, he should be ordained a priest as soon as he is worthy. He does not need to be ordained a deacon or teacher first. He may be ordained an elder when he has developed sufficient understanding of the gospel and demonstrated his worthiness.

For more information about prospective elders, see page 168 in Book 2.

Unusual Circumstances

Brethren Who Have Not Lived in the Same Ward for at Least One Year

If a male member has not lived in the same ward continuously for at least one year, the bishop contacts the prior bishop to certify the member's worthiness before approving him for Aaronic Priesthood ordination or recommending him for Melchizedek Priesthood ordination.

If a person is ordained while he is living away from home temporarily, and if his membership record is still in his home ward, the bishop of the ward where he is ordained advises the bishop of the home ward so the membership record can be updated. The certificate of ordination is prepared in the ward where the ordination is performed.

Brethren in Young Single Adult Wards, Single Adult Wards, and Student Wards

Worthy brethren ages 18 and older in young single adult wards, single adult wards, and student wards should be ordained elders. Brethren who are not ordained elders are affiliated with the elders quorum as prospective elders.

Military Servicemen in Isolated Areas

If a serviceman is at sea for an extended time, or if his duty station is in a war zone or is not within the boundaries of a stake or mission, usually he is ordained in the ward that has his membership record. In most cases this is the ward that supports the duty station.

As an exception, if it is not feasible for such a serviceman to be interviewed or ordained in the ward that has his membership record, his service member group leader may meet with him. If the group leader feels that the serviceman is ready to be ordained, he makes a written recommendation to the presiding officer of the Church unit that oversees the service member group. For ordination to Aaronic Priesthood offices, the presiding officer may authorize the group leader or a Latter-day Saint chaplain to interview the person and oversee the ordination. For ordination to the office of elder, the stake or mission president may authorize a Latter-day Saint chaplain to interview the person and oversee the ordination. All ordinations should be sustained or ratified as explained on pages 39 and 40.

Brethren Who Have Mental Disabilities

Priesthood leaders decide whether brethren who have mental disabilities should receive the priesthood. If the member lives with his parents or guardians, priesthood leaders consult with them. To be ordained, a member who has a mental disability should first demonstrate an appropriate degree of accountability and an understanding of responsibility. Priesthood holders who have such disabilities should be assisted so they can participate as fully as possible.

Brethren Who Have Been Readmitted by Baptism and Confirmation

For instructions about ordaining brethren who have been readmitted by baptism and confirmation after being excommunicated or having their names removed from the records of the Church, see "Ordination after Readmission" on page 121.

Members Who Have Undergone a Transsexual Operation

Members who have undergone an elective transsexual operation may not receive the priesthood.

Instructions for Performing an Ordination

When the necessary interviews and approvals are completed:

1. The stake president (or someone under his direction) may ordain the person to the office of elder, or he may authorize another worthy Melchizedek Priesthood holder to do so. Only Melchizedek Priesthood holders may stand in the circle.
2. The stake president (or someone under his direction) may ordain the person to the office of high priest, or he may authorize another worthy high priest to do so. Only high priests may stand in the circle.
3. The bishop (or a counselor under his direction) may ordain the person to the office of deacon, teacher, or priest, or he may authorize a worthy priest or Melchizedek Priesthood holder to do so. Only priests and Melchizedek Priesthood holders may stand in the circle.

To perform a priesthood ordination, one or more authorized priesthood holders place their hands lightly on the person's head. Then the priesthood holder who performs the ordination:

1. Calls the person by his full name.
2. States the authority by which the ordination is performed (Aaronic or Melchizedek Priesthood).
3. Confers the Aaronic or Melchizedek Priesthood, unless it has already been conferred.
4. Ordains the person to an office in the Aaronic or Melchizedek Priesthood and bestows the rights, powers, and authority of that office. (Priesthood keys are not bestowed in conferring the priesthood or ordaining to one of these offices.)
5. Gives a priesthood blessing as the Spirit directs.
6. Closes in the name of Jesus Christ.

Record and Certificate of Ordination

After a Melchizedek Priesthood ordination, the stake president and stake clerk ensure that the Melchizedek Priesthood ordination record and certificate are completed and distributed according to instructions on the form.

After an Aaronic Priesthood ordination, the bishop and ward clerk ensure that the Aaronic Priesthood ordination record and certificate are completed and distributed according to instructions on the form.

For instructions on preparing an Aaronic Priesthood ordination certificate for a young man whose parents are divorced, see page 40.

Father's Blessings and Other Blessings of Comfort and Counsel

Father's blessings and other priesthood blessings are given to provide direction and comfort as guided by the Spirit.

A father who holds the Melchizedek Priesthood may give father's blessings to his children. These blessings may be especially helpful when children go to school, go on missions, get married, enter military service, or face special challenges. A family may record a father's blessing for family records, but it is not preserved in Church records. Parents should encourage their children to seek father's blessings in times of need.

Worthy Melchizedek Priesthood holders may also give blessings of comfort and counsel to other family members and to others who request them.

To give a father's blessing or another blessing of comfort and counsel, one or more worthy Melchizedek Priesthood holders place their hands lightly on the person's head. Then the priesthood holder who gives the blessing:

1. Calls the person by his or her full name.
2. States that the blessing is performed by the authority of the Melchizedek Priesthood.
3. Blesses the person as the Spirit directs.
4. Closes in the name of Jesus Christ.

Dedicating Graves

A person who dedicates a grave should hold the Melchizedek Priesthood and be authorized by the priesthood officer who conducts the service. To dedicate a grave, he:

1. Addresses Heavenly Father.

2. States that he is acting by the authority of the Melchizedek Priesthood.
3. Dedicates and consecrates the burial plot as the resting place for the body of the deceased.
4. Prays that the place will be hallowed and protected until the Resurrection (where appropriate).
5. Asks the Lord to comfort the family and expresses thoughts as the Spirit directs.
6. Closes in the name of Jesus Christ.

If the family prefers, a graveside prayer rather than a dedicatory prayer may be offered, preferably by a Melchizedek Priesthood holder.

Setting Apart Officers and Teachers

See page 47.

Dedicating Homes

Church members may dedicate their homes as sacred edifices where the Holy Spirit can reside and where family members can worship, find safety from the world, grow spiritually, and prepare for eternal family relationships. Homes need not be free of debt to be dedicated. Unlike Church buildings, homes are not consecrated to the Lord.

To dedicate a home, a family might gather and offer a prayer that includes the elements mentioned above and other words as the Spirit directs.

Patriarchal Blessings

Information about patriarchal blessings is provided in the following paragraphs, on pages 6-8 in this book, in Information and Suggestions for Patriarchs, and in Worldwide Leadership Training Meeting: The Patriarch.

Preparing for the Blessing

Every worthy, baptized member of the Church is entitled to and should receive a patriarchal blessing, which provides inspired direction from the Lord. Church leaders and parents should encourage members to obtain their blessings.

The bishop interviews members who want to receive patriarchal blessings. If a member is worthy, the bishop issues and signs a Patriarchal Blessing Recommend. The recommend must also be signed by a member of the stake presidency if the blessing will be given by a patriarch who lives outside the member's stake (such authorization may be given only as outlined in "Giving Blessings to Members outside the Stake" in the next column). A member must take the signed recommend to the patriarch to receive a blessing.

When issuing a Patriarchal Blessing Recommend, the bishop ensures that the member is of sufficient age and maturity to understand the meaning and importance of the blessing. Ideally the member should be young enough that many important decisions in life are still ahead, though older adults should also be encouraged to receive their patriarchal blessings. Priesthood leaders should not establish a minimum age for a member to receive a patriarchal blessing.

The bishop helps members understand the sacred nature of this blessing. He emphasizes the importance of being spiritually prepared to receive it.

Where possible, a missionary should receive a patriarchal blessing before beginning missionary service. If this is not possible, the missionary should receive a recommend from his or her bishop and receive the blessing while at a missionary training center.

If a missionary arrives in the mission without having received a patriarchal blessing, the mission president is authorized to interview him or her and issue a Patriarchal Blessing Recommend. He then contacts the stake president in the nearest stake in which a patriarch can give a blessing in a language the missionary can understand. If this is not possible, the missionary may need to wait until he or she returns home to receive a patriarchal blessing.

A new convert should understand the basic doctrines of the Church before receiving a patriarchal blessing.

If a member has a mental disability, the bishop may issue a recommend only when, in consultation with the parents, he believes there is a sufficient level of understanding. Members should keep in mind that a patriarchal blessing is for the recipient and not for the parents.

Receiving the Blessing

Members should go to the patriarch with a prayerful attitude and in Sunday attire. They may fast, but fasting is not required.

Each patriarchal blessing is sacred, confidential, and personal. Therefore, it is given in private except that a limited number of family members may be present.

Church members should not compare blessings and should not share them except with close family members. Patriarchal blessings should not be read in Church meetings or other public gatherings.

If a patriarchal blessing does not include a declaration of lineage, the patriarch may later give an addendum to declare lineage. An addendum becomes part of the original blessing and should be attached to it.

Giving Blessings to Members outside the Stake

A stake patriarch normally gives patriarchal blessings only to members in his stake. However, he may give blessings to members outside of his stake in the following circumstances:

1. A patriarch may give patriarchal blessings to his own lineal descendants (children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren) regardless of where they live. The member must have a recommend signed by the bishop. If the member lives in a different stake than the patriarch, the recommend must also be signed by a member of the stake presidency.
2. A member who lives in a stake that does not have a patriarch or where the patriarch is unable to give blessings may go to a patriarch in a nearby stake. The member's recommend must be signed by the bishop and a member of the stake presidency. A member who lives in a mission district may also go to a patriarch in a nearby stake. The recommend should be signed by the branch or district president and the mission president.
3. A member who speaks a language that is different from the language of the stake patriarch may go to a patriarch in a nearby stake to receive a blessing in his or her own language. The member must have a recommend signed by the bishop and a member of the stake presidency.

Blessings for Members Entering the Military

When worthy members of the Church enter military service, priesthood leaders encourage them to receive their patriarchal blessing before reporting for active duty.

If it is not possible for a member to receive a patriarchal blessing before leaving, he or she can receive it from a patriarch where the temporary duty station is located. To do this, the member presents a recommend from the bishop of his or her home ward to a member of the stake presidency where the temporary duty station is located.

If a member entering the military does not have a recommend from the bishop of the home ward, he or she may receive a recommend from the bishop of the ward where the temporary duty station is located. That bishop interviews the member for worthiness and contacts the home-ward bishop before issuing a recommend.

After either of these bishops has signed a recommend, a member of the stake presidency interviews the person and signs the recommend if he or she is worthy.

Translation of Patriarchal Blessings

The Church does not provide translations of patriarchal blessings. Nor are members encouraged to translate patriarchal blessings, since it is difficult to convey the inspired depth of meaning and feeling of a blessing. Nevertheless, if a member desires to have a patriarchal blessing translated into another language, it is his or her responsibility to find a trusted and worthy member of the Church who can provide the translation. The translator should be carefully selected, skilled in the language, and capable of understanding the spiritual nature and confidentiality of the blessing.

Translated copies of blessings are not filed at Church headquarters.

Obtaining Copies of Patriarchal Blessings

A person who has received a patriarchal blessing should carefully safeguard the copy he or she receives. However, if it is lost or destroyed, another copy may be obtained from the patriarch if he still has the original in his binder of blessings. If the original has been sent to Church headquarters, a copy may be obtained from:

Patriarchal Blessings
50 East North Temple Street, Room 215E
Telephone: 1-801-240-3581

Those requesting copies should supply the full name and birth date of the person who received the blessing and their relationship to that person. If possible, the name of the patriarch and the approximate date of the blessing should also be included. A small fee to cover copying charges may apply within the United States and Canada.

6. Callings and Releases

This section outlines the doctrines and procedures relating to callings and releases. A Chart of Callings is provided on pages 49–58, listing each Church calling and specifying who recommends a person, who approves the recommendation, who sustains the person, and who calls and sets apart the person. Callings that are listed on the chart are filled according to local needs and as members are available.

Doctrines of Callings and Releases

A person must be called of God to serve in the Church (see Articles of Faith 1:5). These callings come as the Holy Ghost inspires presiding officers to issue them. Releases from Church callings should also come by inspiration, except when a person's change of residence necessitates a release or when a calling is for a specific time period, such as full-time missionary service.

Members who are called to most Church positions should receive a sustaining vote before they begin serving. In the scriptures this is called "common consent" or being "appointed by the voice of the church" (D&C 26:2; 28:13; 38:34; 41:9). Members who are called to most Church positions should also be set apart before they begin serving (see D&C 42:11).

The Lord has instructed each person to "labor in his [or her] own calling" (D&C 84:109). Members should magnify their callings by serving diligently (see D&C 84:33; 107:99).

Determining Whom to Call

General Guidelines

Church leaders call all willing members to Church positions. Members are richly blessed as they demonstrate their love for the Lord and for others by serving in Church callings.

Leaders seek the Spirit's guidance in determining whom to call. Leaders also consider the member's worthiness, ability, willingness to serve, and personal or family circumstances. Leaders try to ensure that the calling will benefit the people being served, the member, and the member's family.

Although service in Church callings requires sacrifice, it should not compromise a member's ability to fulfill family responsibilities. If possible, a member is called to serve in only one calling, in addition to assignments as a home teacher or visiting teacher.

Leaders should keep information about proposed callings and releases confidential. Only those who need to know, such as an auxiliary president who oversees the person, are informed before the person is presented for a sustaining vote. A person who is being considered for a calling is not notified until the calling is issued.

When a calling will be extended by or under the direction of the stake president, the bishop should be consulted to determine whether the member is worthy and whether the calling would be appropriate. The stake presidency then asks the high council to sustain the decision to issue the calling, if necessary according to the Chart of Callings on pages 49–58.

When a young man or young woman will be called to a Church position, the bishopric obtains approval from the parents or guardians before issuing the calling.

Leaders may extend a Church calling only after (1) a person's membership record is on file in the ward and has been carefully reviewed by the bishop or (2) the bishop has contacted the member's previous bishop to determine that the member is worthy and to verify that his or her membership record does not include an annotation or a comment about unresolved Church discipline.

New Church members should be given an appropriate calling or responsibility as soon as possible.

Nonmembers may be called to some positions, such as organist, music director, and assistant Scout leaders. Nonmembers may not be called to teaching or administrative positions.

Recommendations and Approvals for Callings

The Chart of Callings on pages 49–58 indicates who may make recommendations for each calling and who gives approval. In some cases, priesthood and auxiliary leaders are asked to make recommendations to their stake presidency or bishopric. They should approach this responsibility with prayerful consideration, knowing that they can receive guidance from the Lord about whom to recommend. However, they should remember that final responsibility to receive inspiration on whom to call rests with the stake presidency or the bishopric.

Stake presidents and bishops should carefully evaluate each recommendation, recognizing that it has been prayerfully considered. As needed, they may request another recommendation.

Stake Callings

The stake president is called by an assigned General Authority or Area Seventy. The stake president recommends brethren to be called or released as counselors in the stake presidency. Instructions are provided on the Recommendation for New Counselor to Stake President form. The stake president may interview, call, and set apart a counselor, or release a counselor, after receiving written approval from the First Presidency.

Guidelines for calling stake patriarchs are provided on page 6.

The stake president oversees the calling of members who serve in other stake positions (see pages 49–51 in the Chart of Callings).

Ward Callings

The stake presidency recommends brethren to be called or released as bishops. Instructions are provided on the Recommendation for New Bishop form. When recommending a person to serve as bishop, the stake presidency should carefully observe the principles set forth in 1 Timothy 3:2–7. It is not appropriate for the stake presidency to solicit recommendations or to conduct surveys among ward members with respect to who might be considered for a call to serve as bishop.

Before a new bishop may be interviewed, called, ordained, or set apart, his recommendation must be approved by the First Presidency. The stake president may extend the calling after he receives written approval from the First Presidency. With this approval, the stake president may also ordain and set apart a bishop after ward members have given a sustaining vote (see "Ordaining and Setting Apart Bishops" on pages 47–48). The approval of the First Presidency is also required before a stake president may release a bishop. The stake president may not assign these responsibilities to a counselor.

The stake president oversees the calling of counselors in the bishopric, ward executive secretaries, ward clerks, and assistant ward clerks.

The bishop oversees other callings in the ward as shown on pages 53–56 in the Chart of Callings.

Elders Quorum and High Priests Group Callings

The stake president oversees the calling of elders quorum presidents and their counselors and of high priests group leaders and their assistants (see page 52).

The elders quorum president and high priests group leader oversee the calling of quorum or group secretaries, instructors, and committee chairmen (see page 52). The bishop should give approval before brethren are called to these positions.

Extending a Calling

The Chart of Callings on pages 49–58 outlines who may extend each calling. After receiving the necessary approvals, an authorized leader conducts a personal interview to determine the member's worthiness and willingness to serve. If the member is worthy and willing, the leader extends the calling. The leader normally invites the spouse of a married person to be present and give support when the calling is extended.

A leader who extends a Church calling should explain its purpose, importance, and responsibilities. He also encourages the member to seek the Spirit of the Lord in fulfilling the calling.

A leader who extends a Church calling should tell the member the name of the person to whom he or she is directly accountable and should emphasize the need to support leaders. He also outlines the meetings the person should attend and describes the handbooks, manuals, and other resources that are available to help the member. He may identify special concerns or challenges of the calling and may invite the member to ask questions about it.

Leaders should ensure that the manner in which they extend a calling is consistent with its sacred nature. Callings should be extended in a dignified, formal manner, not in a casual setting or manner.

Sustaining Members in Church Callings

Members who are called to most Church positions should receive a sustaining vote before they begin serving. The Chart of Callings on pages 49–58 indicates whether a sustaining vote is needed and what congregation should give it.

The leader who oversaw the calling, or a priesthood officer he authorizes as outlined below, presents a person to the congregation for a sustaining vote:

1. A General Authority or Area Seventy presents the names of a new stake president and his counselors to stake members. A stake president may present his counselors' names when the First Presidency authorizes him to do so.

2. A member of the stake presidency or a priesthood officer under their direction presents names to stake members for changes in other stake callings.
3. A member of the stake presidency presents the names of a new bishop and his counselors to ward members. A member of the stake presidency or a priesthood officer under their direction presents names to ward members for changes in the ward executive secretary, ward clerk, and assistant ward clerks.
4. A member of the stake presidency or a priesthood officer under their direction presents names to elders quorum or high priests group members for changes in their leadership.
5. A member of the bishopric presents names to ward members for changes in ward organizations.
6. A member of the bishopric presents names to Aaronic Priesthood quorum members for changes in quorum leadership and to Young Women class members for changes in class presidencies.
7. A member of the elders quorum presidency or high priests group leadership presents names to quorum or group members for changes in secretaries, instructors, and committee chairmen.

The person who conducts the sustaining first announces who was released from the position and asks members to give an expression of thanks for the person's service (see page 48 for suggested language).

When presenting a person for a sustaining vote, an authorized priesthood officer asks him or her to stand. The officer may say:

"[Name] has been called as [position], and we propose that he [or she] be sustained. Those in favor may manifest it by the uplifted hand. [Pause briefly for the sustaining vote.] Those opposed, if any, may manifest it. [Pause briefly to allow for a dissenting vote, if any.]"

The person who is being presented should participate in the sustaining vote. If more than one person is being presented, they may usually be sustained as a group.

If a member in good standing gives a dissenting vote when someone is presented to be sustained, the presiding officer or another assigned priesthood officer confers with the dissenting member in private after the meeting. The officer determines whether the dissenting vote was based on knowledge that the person who was presented is guilty of conduct that should disqualify him or her from serving in the position. Dissenting votes from nonmembers need not be considered.

When, as an exception, new stake officers need to begin their service before the next stake conference or stake general priesthood meeting in which they would normally be sustained, they should be sustained in the sacrament meetings of the wards and branches of the stake. These sustainings should be kept to a minimum. When they are necessary, members of the stake presidency or high council usually need not travel to wards solely for that purpose. They may conduct the sustainings in their home wards or as part of other assignments.

Setting Apart Officers and Teachers

Members who are called to most Church positions should be set apart before they begin serving. The Chart of Callings on pages 49–58 indicates whether a setting apart is needed and who is authorized to perform it. Presidents are set apart before their counselors.

Under the direction of the presiding authority, one or more Melchizedek Priesthood holders, including a worthy father or husband, may participate in a setting apart. They place their hands lightly on the person's head. Then the priesthood holder who acts as voice:

1. Calls the person by his or her full name.
2. States that he is acting by the authority of the Melchizedek Priesthood.
3. Sets the person apart to the appropriate office in the stake, ward, quorum, high priests group, or class.
4. Confers keys on those who are entitled to receive them. (In stakes and wards, only stake presidents, bishops, and quorum presidents receive keys of presidency when they are set apart. The word keys should not be used when setting apart counselors, high councilors, high priests group leaders, presidents of auxiliary organizations, the bishop's priests quorum assistants, or teachers in an organization.)
5. Gives a priesthood blessing as the Spirit directs.
6. Closes in the name of Jesus Christ.

A setting apart need not be expanded into a formal meeting. It is not necessary to have prayers or testimonies or instruction when someone is set apart.

Ordaining and Setting Apart Bishops

If a man who is called as bishop is not a high priest, the stake president should see that he is ordained a high priest before ordaining him a bishop.

If the man was ordained a bishop previously, he needs only to be set apart as bishop of the ward.

After the First Presidency has approved the recommendation of a man to serve as bishop (see page 46), they authorize a General Authority, Area Seventy, or stake president to ordain him and set him apart. The authorized priesthood officer:

1. Calls the man by his full name.
2. States that he is acting by the authority of the Melchizedek Priesthood.
3. Ordains the man a bishop (unless he was previously ordained).
4. Sets him apart to preside over the ward and to be the president of the Aaronic Priesthood and the priests quorum, emphasizing his responsibilities for the Aaronic Priesthood and for young women in the ward.
5. Confers on him all the keys, rights, powers, and authority of the office of bishop, referring specifically to the bishop's duties as a common judge in Israel and as the presiding high priest in the ward.
6. Adds words of blessing as the Spirit directs.
7. Closes in the name of Jesus Christ.

Releasing Members from Church Callings

Releases from Church callings are made by the same level of authority that extended the callings. To issue a release, an authorized leader meets with the member personally, informs him or her of the release, and expresses appreciation for the service. The leader also asks the person to return any current, usable materials so they can be given to the successor. Only those who need to know are informed of a release before it is announced publicly.

The same congregation that sustained a person gives a vote of thanks when the person is released. An authorized priesthood officer may say:

"[Name] has been released as [position], and we propose that he [or she] be given a vote of thanks for his [or her] service. Those who wish to express their appreciation may manifest it by the uplifted hand." No dissenting vote is called for.

When a president, bishop, or high priests group leader is released, the counselors or assistants are released automatically. Others who hold positions in the organization, such as secretaries and teachers, are not released automatically.

7. Meetings

This section summarizes instructions on Church meetings. It describes (1) meetings that include a full congregation, (2) leadership meetings primarily for stake presidencies and bishoprics, and (3) funerals.

Meetings that are specific to an organization, such as quorum, Relief Society, Young Men, Young Women, Primary, and Sunday School meetings, are described in that organization's section of Book 2.

Meetings that include leaders of more than one organization are described on pages 315–19 in Book 2.

In addition to the meetings outlined in the handbooks, presiding authorities occasionally may call other meetings and define their composition and purpose.

Doctrines Relating to Church Meetings

The Savior has commanded His people to meet together often (see Mosiah 18:25; 3 Nephi 18:22). He promised, "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them" (Matthew 18:20).

Church meetings are held to worship, pray, renew covenants, perform ordinances, teach and exhort, learn, sing, conduct business, and strengthen associations as brothers and sisters in the gospel.

One of the most important meetings is sacrament meeting (see D&C 59:9). The scriptures also speak of conferences and other public meetings (see D&C 20:61; 46:3). Regular Sunday meetings and conferences of the Church are open to members and nonmembers (see 3 Nephi 18:22; D&C 46:3–5).

General Guidelines

Leaders plan and conduct meetings "as they are led by the Holy Ghost, according to the commandments and revelations of God" (D&C 20:45; see also D&C 46:2; Moroni 6:9). They should use an agenda to help them focus on each meeting's purposes and use time effectively, but they should remain open to promptings of the Holy Ghost and comments of those in attendance.

Leaders should ensure that Sunday meetings are not so numerous that there is little time for parents and children to be together on that day. Where possible, leaders should avoid scheduling Sunday meetings other than those in the standard three-hour schedule, leadership meetings in the early mornings, and occasional firesides in the evenings so parents may be with their children.

General guidelines for planning and conducting meetings are provided on pages 314–15 in Book 2.

Principles of Effective Church Council and Committee Meetings

When councils or committees meet, the presiding officer outlines the matters being discussed and then invites ideas and suggestions from others. He helps others participate fully in the discussions, decisions, and plans. He considers their suggestions carefully in making plans and giving assignments.

Council and committee meetings should focus on accomplishing the mission of the Church and planning how to strengthen individuals and families. Time spent on calendaring and other administrative business should be minimal.

General Meetings

General Conference

General conferences are held in April and October to refresh and renew the faith of members, to instruct and edify, and to conduct Church business.

General Relief Society Meeting and General Young Women Meeting

A general Relief Society meeting is held each year for Relief Society sisters. A general Young Women meeting is held each year for young women ages 12 to 18, their mothers, and their leaders.

Area Meetings

Area Council Meeting

Members of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency may hold area council meetings periodically to instruct Area Seventies and others as invited. These meetings are also used to correlate, plan, and resolve matters affecting an area. Agenda items include discussions on missionary work, spiritual and temporal welfare, and temple and family history work.

Coordinating Council Meeting

The Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency is responsible for coordinating councils. Normally they designate an Area Seventy to serve as chairman of each council. The Area Seventy convenes one coordinating council meeting after each general conference. When there is a clear need, one or two additional coordinating council meetings may be held each year.

Stake presidents and mission presidents should attend each of these meetings. A member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency may attend as needed. Temple presidents may also be invited to attend as needed. District presidents are not usually asked to attend unless they are nearby.

The purposes of these meetings are to (1) instruct and edify priesthood leaders, (2) coordinate the work of stakes and missions, and (3) coordinate multistake matters. Stake and mission presidents should counsel together as equal participants in these meetings.

The agenda for coordinating council meetings may include:

1. Instruction requested by the First Presidency and the Twelve.
2. Items submitted by stake and mission presidents.
3. Missionary matters, such as (a) coordinating efforts to find, teach, and baptize investigators and to retain new members; (b) increasing member participation in missionary work; and (c) coordinating the number and location of missionaries, their assistance in activation efforts, and their assistance in training local members.
4. Multistake matters, such as welfare, Church education, family history, temple work, public affairs, activities, travel practices, and other matters as needed. Separate multistake meetings should not be held to coordinate such matters.

Area Perpetual Education Fund Committee Meeting (Outside the United States and Canada)

In areas where Perpetual Education Fund (PEF) loans are approved, a member of the Area Presidency is designated to organize the area PEF committee and be its chairman. This committee consists of the chairman, the Church Educational System area director (who is vice-chairman of the committee), the area welfare manager, the employment resource service manager (where available), the director for temporal affairs, and the area controller. An area legal adviser may be invited to join the committee as needed.

This committee meets regularly to review the progress of the PEF initiative. These meetings are used to coordinate efforts to train and sustain PEF participants, service PEF loans, and expand efforts to seek out others who need assistance. This committee provides a semiannual report to the Area Committee of the Twelve and to the managing director of the PEF Department.

In areas with multiple countries that have been approved for the PEF program, a local country committee may be formed. The chairman is designated by the Area President. That committee meets periodically and makes reports to the area PEF committee to ensure that the country program is operating properly.

Multistake Meetings

In the past, stake presidents and other stake leaders in many areas have been required to attend multistake meetings in which welfare, Church education, family history, public affairs, and other matters have been coordinated. Except as noted below, such meetings should be discontinued. These matters should be covered in the coordinating council meetings that are conducted by Area Seventies, or through letters or other communication.

The following multistake meetings will continue:

Regional welfare committee (for stakes served by welfare operations; see the next heading).

Local Church board of education (where a released-time seminary serves more than one stake; see page 131).

Regional Welfare Committee Meeting

Areas of the Church are divided into welfare regions. A member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency obtains the concurrence of the Presiding Bishopric and the Welfare Executive Committee when creating or restructuring welfare regions.

A member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency organizes a regional welfare committee for each welfare region. Committee members include all stake presidents (or assigned counselors), all chairmen of the stake bishops' welfare councils, and all stake Relief Society presidents in the welfare region. A member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency appoints a stake president to be chairman of the committee. He also calls a regional welfare specialist to be the executive secretary of the committee.

This committee meets twice each year. The agenda may include the following items:

1. Receive instructions in welfare matters and plan how to implement instructions from the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency.
2. Coordinate welfare activities, such as balancing donated labor assignments among stakes and planning responses to emergencies.
3. Discuss other welfare matters, such as fostering self-reliance, caring for the needy, and encouraging fast-offering donations.
4. Review the services of Church welfare operations where they exist.
5. Review the status of stake emergency response plans. Ensure that an assigned priesthood leader has met with civil authorities in each community to coordinate emergency response plans of the Church and the community. Designate a director of public affairs to answer questions from the media and to review and approve news releases during emergencies.

Where travel is difficult or long, a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency may ask fewer stake bishops' welfare council chairmen and stake Relief Society presidents to attend this meeting.

Local Church Board of Education Meeting

See page 131.

Meeting with Stake Presidents or Other Key Leaders

In addition to coordinating council meetings (see page 60), a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency may occasionally gather stake presidents or other key leaders in small groups, as needed, to resolve specific issues or provide needed instruction. Care should be taken not to overburden stake presidents with unnecessary meetings.

Stake Meetings

The stake president oversees stake meetings. He presides at these meetings unless a General Authority or Area Seventy attends. His counselors may conduct stake meetings and may preside if he is absent. Stake meetings should not conflict with Sunday ward meetings.

Stake Conference

Each stake holds two stake conferences during the year as scheduled by the President of the Quorum of the Twelve. In most parts of the world, the stake president presides at one stake conference and an assigned General Authority or Area Seventy presides at the other.

In some stake conferences, a satellite broadcast may be incorporated into the Sunday general session. This broadcast will include instruction by General Authorities. When a satellite broadcast is used, that conference takes the place of the stake conference at which a General Authority or Area Seventy would have presided.

The primary purpose of stake conference is to help the Saints build faith and testimony. All talks and music should be planned with this purpose in mind.

Another purpose is to conduct stake business. In one stake conference each year, a member of the stake presidency presents general, area, and stake officers to be sustained, using the Officers Sustained form. He also presents the names of stake officers who have been released so the congregation can give an expression of thanks for their service. This sustaining is conducted in the first stake conference each year unless a satellite broadcast is incorporated into that conference. In that case, the sustaining is conducted in the second stake conference.

If stake officers are called or released between stake conferences, they should be presented for a sustaining vote or an expression of thanks in the next stake conference unless this has been done in ward sacrament meetings as outlined on page 47. Brethren who have been recommended for ordination to the offices of elder and high priest are presented for a sustaining vote in either stake conference. For instructions, see pages 39 and 46-47.

Each stake conference normally includes the following meetings:

1. A meeting of the General Authority or Area Seventy (if assigned), stake presidency, stake executive secretary, and stake clerk.
2. A priesthood leadership meeting, including the General Authority or Area Seventy (if assigned); stake presidency; high council; stake executive secretary; stake clerk (and assistant clerks as needed); stake Young Men presidency (and secretary as needed); bishoprics; ward executive secretaries; ward clerks (and assistant clerks as needed); high priests group leaders, assistants, and secretaries; elders quorum presidencies and secretaries; ward mission leaders; and ward Young Men presidencies (and secretaries and assistant advisers as needed).

3. A Saturday evening session for all members of the stake who are 18 years of age and older. Temple presidents, stake patriarchs, and full-time mission presidents or their representatives who attend should sit on the stand. Depending on local circumstances, this session may be held on Sunday if approved by the presiding authority.

Instruction is under the direction of the presiding authority. When a General Authority or Area Seventy will preside, the stake president may be invited to suggest topics to him. When the stake president will preside, he and his counselors select topics.

4. A general session held on Sunday for all members and interested nonmembers. Temple presidents, stake patriarchs, and full-time mission presidents or their representatives who attend should sit on the stand. More than one Sunday general session may be held if facilities are not adequate to seat everyone in the same session. Primary children attend this session with their families, not in a separate meeting.

If a satellite broadcast is incorporated into this session, it will be timed to allow approximately 15 minutes at the beginning of the meeting for an opening hymn, an invocation, and local Church business. After the broadcast, the congregation will have a closing hymn and a benediction.

Planning and Conducting Stake Conference

The presiding officer directs all conference planning. He approves all conference participants and all musical selections well before the conference weekend.

The stake president conducts the Sunday general session. His counselors may conduct other conference meetings.

The stake president speaks in the Sunday general session of the conference unless that session incorporates a satellite broadcast. His counselors speak in conference sessions as determined by the presiding authority.

Planning includes making arrangements for adequate seating, ushering, and parking. Stake leaders may assign priesthood quorums and groups, including prospective elders, to provide these services.

Music for Stake Conference

See pages 289-91 in Book 2.

Stake General Priesthood Meeting

The stake presidency convenes a stake general priesthood meeting twice a year, once in each half. All Aaronic and Melchizedek Priesthood holders in the stake are to attend.

The stake presidency uses these meetings to instruct and inspire priesthood holders. The presidency prayerfully selects the topics for these meetings to meet the needs of those who attend.

In these meetings the stake presidency also conducts stake priesthood business, such as:

1. Presenting the names of brethren who have been recommended for ordination to the offices of elder and high priest and asking for a sustaining vote (see page 39).
2. Presenting the names of newly called stake officers and asking for a sustaining vote (see the Chart of Callings, pages 49-51, for guidelines about who is to be presented for this vote).

Stake Priesthood Leadership Meeting

See page 315 in Book 2.

Stake High Priests Quorum Meeting

See page 167 in Book 2.

Stake Presidency Meeting

The stake presidency meets weekly. The stake executive secretary and stake clerk attend; the clerk records minutes. The stake president may invite others to attend as needed.

During this meeting, members of the stake presidency consider all matters affecting the stake. They also plan how to strengthen individuals and families. They evaluate wards, high priests groups, elders quorums, auxiliaries, programs, and activities. They also make plans to implement instructions from the scriptures, Church leaders, and handbooks.

During this meeting, members of the stake presidency identify members to call to Church positions (see pages 45-46). They also review bishops' recommendations of members to serve missions and of brethren to be ordained elders or high priests.

Other agenda items for this meeting could include reporting on assignments, planning meetings, reviewing the stake calendar, and reviewing the stake budget.

Meeting with Bishops

The stake presidency meets regularly with bishops to instruct them and to review directions and policies. The stake presidency, all bishops, the stake executive secretary, and the stake clerk attend this meeting. If desired, the stake president may limit the meeting to bishops only.

Stake Bishops' Welfare Council Meeting

The stake bishops' welfare council is composed of all bishops in the stake. The stake president appoints one bishop to be chairman of the council. In consultation with the stake president, the chairman arranges meetings, prepares agendas, leads discussions, and arranges for instruction. The stake president attends council meetings occasionally to give instruction. A stake clerk also attends and takes minutes. If needed, the regional welfare specialist may be invited to attend.

The council meets at least quarterly. During these meetings, council members receive instruction in welfare matters. They also exchange ideas and experiences relating to their welfare responsibilities.

Matters for discussion could include trends in fast-offering contributions, welfare needs and resources, and welfare assistance. Council members could also identify work opportunities for members who receive welfare assistance. In addition, they could identify ways for priesthood quorums and the Relief Society to help meet welfare needs in the stake. They also could identify agencies and services in the community that could be used to assist members. In addition, they review instructions received at regional welfare committee meetings.

In areas where there are Church welfare operations, such as an employment resource center, a home storage center, or a bishops' storehouse, the stake bishops' welfare council evaluates the services and management of the operations.

If the stake president has assigned one bishop to oversee assistance to transients, council members could discuss how to coordinate this assistance.

The stake bishops' welfare council does not make policy. However, the council may make recommendations to be considered by the stake presidency.

Ward Meetings

The bishop oversees ward meetings. He presides at these meetings unless a member of the stake presidency, a General Authority, or an Area Seventy attends. His counselors may conduct ward meetings and may preside if he is absent. Presiding authorities should be invited to sit on the stand.

Schedule for Sunday Meetings

Sunday meetings provide vitally important time for members to partake of the sacrament, worship, learn the gospel, learn their duties, and give service. Interested nonmembers may attend these meetings as appropriate.

Wards are to hold the following Sunday meetings in one three-hour period (for meeting schedule options, see the "Sunday Meeting Schedules" chart on page 74):

1. Sacrament meeting
2. Priesthood meeting (for all priesthood holders, prospective elders, and unordained young men of Aaronic Priesthood age; see page 66)
3. Relief Society (for all women ages 18 and older and for younger women who are married)
4. Young Women (for young women ages 12 to 18)

5. Primary (for children ages 3 through 11; also for children ages 18 months through 2 years if a nursery is organized and parents want their children to attend)
6. Sunday School (for those ages 12 and older)

Sacrament Meeting

Purposes of Sacrament Meeting

Each sacrament meeting should be a spiritual experience in which members of the Church renew their baptismal covenants by partaking of the sacrament. Other purposes of sacrament meeting are to worship, receive gospel instruction, perform ordinances, conduct ward business, and strengthen members spiritually.

Planning and Conducting Sacrament Meeting

Members of the bishopric plan sacrament meetings and conduct them in a reverent and dignified manner. They oversee the administration of the sacrament, select topics for talks and music, select and orient participants, and invite members to give opening and closing prayers.

A sample sacrament meeting agenda follows:

1. Prelude music (see page 289 in Book 2 for guidelines)
2. Greeting and welcome
3. Acknowledgment of presiding authorities or visiting high councilors who are attending
4. Announcements (if possible, most announcements should be printed so they do not take time in sacrament meeting; the bishopric may give essential announcements briefly before the opening hymn)
5. Opening hymn and prayer
6. Ward and stake business, such as:
 - a. Sustaining and releasing officers and teachers (see pages 46–47 and 48)
 - b. Recognizing eight-year-old children who have been baptized and confirmed
 - c. Recognizing children who advance from Primary (see page 231 in Book 2)
 - d. Presenting names of brethren to receive or advance in the Aaronic Priesthood (see page 40)
 - e. Presenting the Duty to God Award and the Young Womanhood Recognition (see pages 190 and 227 in Book 2)
 - f. Presenting names of new ward members (see page 146)

7. Naming and blessing children (usually in fast and testimony meeting) and performing confirmations
8. Sacrament hymn and administration of the sacrament
9. Gospel messages, congregational singing, and special musical selections
10. Closing hymn and prayer
11. Postlude music

The bishopric ensures that sacrament meetings begin and end on time and are not overprogrammed.

It is not necessary to hold a prayer meeting before sacrament meeting.

The bishopric and the speakers should be in their seats at least five minutes before the meeting begins so they can be spiritually prepared for a worshipful experience.

Leaders should set an example of reverence during the time before sacrament meeting. This is not a time for conversation or transmission of messages. Prelude music should be subdued, encouraging a spirit of worship. Members should be taught to make this a period of prayerful meditation as they prepare spiritually for the sacrament.

The bishopric encourages families to arrive on time, to sit together, and to be reverent during sacrament meeting.

Occasionally something unexpected may arise during the meeting that the presiding officer feels needs to be clarified. When this occurs, he should make any clarification that is needed, being careful not to cause embarrassment.

Blessing and Passing the Sacrament

The bishopric ensures that the sacrament is blessed and passed in a reverent and orderly manner. The sacrament table should be prepared before the meeting begins. Instructions for preparing, blessing, and passing the sacrament are on pages 37–38.

Selecting Topics for Talks and Music

The bishopric selects topics for talks and music in sacrament meetings. Talks and music should focus on gospel subjects that ward members most need to build faith and testimony.

Selecting and Orienting Participants

Selecting Participants. The bishopric selects members to participate in sacrament meetings. Most opportunities to participate should be given to ward members. If the bishopric invites members from outside the ward to speak, the guidelines on pages 177-78 should be followed.

Members of the bishopric regularly invite youth ages 12 to 18 to speak in sacrament meeting. Youth should speak briefly (about five minutes each) on assigned gospel subjects. They should prepare their own talks, though the bishopric may encourage parents to help. In addition, the bishopric may call a speech specialist to help youth learn to prepare talks and speak in public. The speech specialist is a member of the activities committee.

Missionaries are normally invited to speak in a sacrament meeting just before they depart and when they return (see pages 97 and 100-101). The bishopric plans these meetings. Sacrament meetings are not devoted to missionary farewells.

The bishopric schedules high councilors to speak as assigned by the stake president (usually once each month, though the stake president may adjust the frequency of such assignments according to the needs of the ward).

The bishopric schedules one sacrament meeting each year for the Primary children to take part in a Primary program (see page 237 in Book 2).

Occasionally the bishopric may invite the full-time missionaries who are serving in the area to speak.

The bishopric may not turn sacrament meetings over to auxiliaries or outside musical groups. However, auxiliaries may be invited to participate in the meeting under the bishopric's direction.

Members of the bishopric should extend invitations to speak in sacrament meeting well in advance of the meeting.

Orienting Participants. Members of the bishopric orient sacrament meeting participants. They review the purposes of sacrament meeting and explain that all talks and music should be in harmony with the sacred nature of the sacrament.

When inviting members to speak, a member of the bishopric explains clearly the topic and the length of time the person should speak. He counsels speakers to teach the doctrines of the gospel, relate faith-promoting experiences, bear witness of divinely revealed truths, and use the scriptures (see D&C 42:12; 52:9). Speakers should teach in a spirit of love after prayerful preparation. They should not speak on subjects that are speculative, controversial, or out of harmony with Church doctrine.

Members who participate in sacrament meeting should stay until the meeting ends.

Prayers

See page 67.

Music

Prelude and Postlude. See page 289 in Book 2.

During Sacrament Meeting. The bishopric selects or approves music for sacrament meetings. Music and musical texts are to be sacred, dignified, and otherwise suitable for sacrament meeting. Music in sacrament meeting is for worship, not for a performance that brings attention to itself. Guidelines for determining whether music is appropriate are provided on pages 289-90 in Book 2.

Opening and closing hymns are usually sung by the congregation. The sacrament hymn is always sung by the congregation.

Audiovisual Materials

Audiovisual materials such as prerecorded music, video recordings, overhead transparencies, computer presentations, and slides should not be used in sacrament meeting. An exception may be made to use appropriate recorded accompaniment if a piano, organ, or accompanist is not available.

Sacrament Service in Unusual Situations

Every member needs the spiritual blessings that come from partaking of the sacrament. Occasionally members may be unable to attend sacrament meeting because they are confined to a home, nursing home, or hospital. The bishop may assign priesthood holders to prepare, bless, and pass the sacrament to these members.

Occasionally members may be unable to attend sacrament meeting because of distance to the meetinghouse. Under unusual circumstances, the bishop may give authorization for a sacrament service to be held away from the meetinghouse. The priesthood holder whom the bishop authorizes to conduct the service must be a priest in the Aaronic Priesthood or hold the Melchizedek Priesthood. He also must be worthy to bless and pass the sacrament. The bishop's authorization is also required if the service will be attended by members of more than one family. The priesthood holder who directs the service reports to the bishop when the service has been held.

When members are traveling or temporarily residing away from their home wards, they should make an earnest effort to attend sacrament meeting and other Sunday meetings in a ward or branch of the Church.

Sacrament services should not be held in conjunction with family reunions or other outings.

Fast and Testimony Meeting

Usually on the first Sunday of each month, sacrament meeting is a fast and testimony meeting. General conference and stake conference may necessitate holding fast and testimony meeting on a different Sunday.

Under the bishop's direction, in this meeting children may be named and blessed and confirmations may be performed before the sacrament is blessed and passed.

After the sacrament, the bishopric member who is conducting bears a brief testimony. He then invites members to bear heartfelt testimonies and to relate faith-promoting experiences. The bishopric encourages members to keep their testimonies brief so more people may have the opportunity to participate.

It may be best to have younger children learn to share their testimonies in settings such as family home evening or when giving talks in Primary until they are old enough to do so unassisted in a fast and testimony meeting.

Priesthood Meeting Opening Exercises

All priesthood holders attend brief opening exercises together before separating for their quorum or group meetings. A member of the bishopric conducts. Opening exercises should include an opening hymn and prayer. They may also include priesthood business, instruction, brief announcements, introduction of new members, additional hymns, and special musical selections.

The elders quorum president and high priests group leader sit with the bishopric during opening exercises.

Priesthood Quorum and Group Meetings

After opening exercises, priesthood quorums and groups meet to conduct business, learn priesthood duties, and study the gospel. Bishopric members normally attend Aaronic Priesthood quorum meetings, though occasionally they attend Young Women classes. Sometimes the bishopric may combine the elders quorum and high priests group, Aaronic Priesthood quorums, or all priesthood holders for instruction during this time.

Other meetings should not be scheduled during priesthood quorum and group meetings.

For more information about these meetings, see pages 167-68 and 185 in Book 2.

Ward Conference

The stake presidency schedules and directs a ward conference once a year in each ward. Members of the stake presidency, high council, and stake auxiliaries take part in ward conference sessions as the stake president directs. The purposes of ward conference are to refresh the faith of ward members, provide instruction, conduct business, and evaluate activity.

The main session of ward conference is held during sacrament meeting. Normally the agenda for this sacrament meeting is similar to that of others. The stake president presides, and the stake presidency usually plans the meeting. A member of the bishopric usually conducts. Before the sacrament, a member of the stake presidency or a designated priesthood officer uses the Officers Sustained form (prepared by a ward clerk) to present the names of Church officers to ward members for their sustaining vote. After the sacrament, speakers normally include the bishop and stake president.

The ward usually holds regular priesthood and auxiliary meetings as part of ward conference. Stake leaders may give instruction and assistance during these meetings.

In connection with ward conference, the stake presidency meets with the bishopric to review the status of individuals and organizations in the ward and to plan for improvement. This meeting need not be held on ward conference Sunday.

Bishopric Meeting

The bishopric usually meets at least weekly. The ward executive secretary and ward clerk attend; the clerk records minutes. The bishop may invite others to attend as needed.

During this meeting, members of the bishopric consider all matters affecting the ward. They also plan how to strengthen individuals and families, especially young men and young women, the needy and the aged, unordained brethren, single parents, and children. They evaluate quorums, auxiliaries, programs, and activities. They also make plans to implement instructions from the scriptures, Church leaders, and handbooks.

During this meeting, members of the bishopric identify members to call to serve in the ward. They also identify which members are coming of age to be eligible for ordinances, including priesthood ordinations. In addition, they identify whom to recommend to the stake president to be ordained elders and high priests and to serve as missionaries.

Other agenda items for this meeting could include reporting on assignments, discussing how to improve gospel teaching and learning, planning meetings, reviewing the ward calendar, and reviewing the ward budget.

Missionary Coordination Meeting

The ward mission leader plans and conducts a weekly missionary coordination meeting. The purpose of this meeting is to coordinate the missionary, retention, and activation efforts of the full-time missionaries and ward members. Others who should attend this meeting include the full-time missionaries (where available), the ward missionaries, an assistant from the high priests group leadership, a counselor from the elders quorum presidency, and a counselor from the Relief Society presidency.

In this meeting the ward mission leader reviews in detail the progress of each person listed on the Progress Record form. He coordinates visits and teaching appointments with investigators, new members, and less-active members.

Support for full-time missionaries, including transportation and meals, is coordinated in this meeting.

This meeting is also used to plan baptismal services after consultation with the bishopric.

Prayers in Church Meetings

Men and women may offer prayers in Church meetings. Prayers should be brief and simple and should be spoken as directed by the Spirit. All members are encouraged to respond with an audible amen at the end of a prayer.

Members should express respect for Heavenly Father by using the special language of prayer that is appropriate for the language they are speaking. The language of prayer follows different forms in different languages. Some languages have intimate or familiar words that are used only in addressing family and very close friends. Other languages have forms of address that express great respect. The principle, however, is generally the same: members should pray in words that speakers of the language associate with love, respect, reverence, and closeness. In English, for example, members should use the pronouns Thee, Thy, Thine, and Thou when addressing Heavenly Father.

The bishopric should avoid the pattern of having a husband and wife pray in the same meeting. This may convey an unintentional message of exclusion to those who are single. Members who are not often called upon should be included among those who are invited to pray. If appropriate, bishops may want to caution those who pray not to sermonize or pray at great length.

In some areas, the person who offers a prayer has been asked to read a scripture aloud before the prayer. This practice should be discontinued.

Funerals

Preparation

When a Church member dies, the bishop visits the family to comfort them and offer assistance from the ward. He may ask his counselors to accompany him. The bishop offers help in notifying relatives, friends, and associates of the death. He also offers help in planning the funeral service, preparing a suitable obituary, and notifying newspapers of the death. In addition, he may offer to help make mortuary and cemetery arrangements according to local laws and customs. As needed, he may offer help from the ward in providing local transportation for the family.

The bishop notifies the Melchizedek Priesthood leader who is responsible for the family so he and other brethren (including home teachers) can assist the bereaved family. Such assistance could include dressing the body of a deceased male for burial, safeguarding the home during the funeral, and providing other support.

The bishop also notifies the Relief Society president so she and other sisters (including visiting teachers) can assist the family. Such assistance could include dressing the body of a deceased female for burial, helping with flowers, tending small children, safeguarding the home during the funeral, and preparing meals (see pages 207–8 in Book 2).

Temple Burial Clothing

Preparation of the Meetinghouse

Priesthood leaders are responsible for seeing that the meetinghouse is prepared for funerals. It should be open and available to funeral directors at least one hour before the scheduled times for the viewing and funeral. The meetinghouse needs to be clean and brought to appropriate temperature and light levels. The sound system should be activated and tested. Overflow chairs may need to be set up and arranged. At a time when feelings are very sensitive, a well-prepared meetinghouse may be a source of comfort and consolation to family members.

Funeral Services for Members

If a funeral for a member is held in a Church building, the bishop conducts it. If it is held in a home, at a mortuary, or at the graveside, the family may ask the bishop to conduct it. A funeral conducted by the bishop, whether in a meetinghouse or in another location, is a Church meeting and a religious service. It should be a spiritual occasion in addition to a family gathering. The bishop should urge members to maintain a spirit of reverence, dignity, and solemnity during a funeral service and at gatherings connected with funerals.

When a bishop conducts a funeral, he or one of his counselors oversees the planning of the funeral. He considers the wishes of the family as he works with them to plan the services. He ensures that the services are simple and dignified, with music and brief addresses and sermons centered on the gospel. Video recordings and slides should not be used as part of the service. For suggestions about music in funeral services, see page 290 in Book 2.

If a viewing is held immediately before the funeral service, the bishop should conclude it at least 20 minutes before the service begins. The obituary should include the times when the viewing will begin and end.

After the viewing, a family prayer may be offered if the family desires. This prayer should conclude before the funeral is scheduled to begin so it does not impose on the time of the congregation assembled in the chapel. The casket should be closed before it is moved to the chapel for the funeral service.

Funerals should start on time and, as a matter of courtesy to those who attend, should not be too long. Funerals that last more than one and one-half hours place an undue burden on those attending and participating.

It is appropriate for participants in a funeral to pay tribute to the deceased. However, such tributes should not dominate the funeral service. Funerals provide an important opportunity for speakers and music to teach the gospel and testify of the plan of salvation. Members of the family are not required to speak at funerals.

A member of the stake presidency, a General Authority, or an Area Seventy presides at funeral services he attends. The person conducting should consult him in advance and recognize him during the service. The presiding officer should be extended the opportunity of offering closing remarks if he desires.

Funeral services are not normally held on Sunday.

If the bishop is not able to attend, he may assign one of his counselors to conduct the funeral and graveside services.

Burial

At least one member of the bishopric should accompany the cortege to the cemetery. If the grave is to be dedicated, the bishopric member, after consulting with the family, asks a Melchizedek Priesthood holder to do so according to the instructions on page 42. If the family prefers, a graveside prayer rather than a dedicatory prayer may be offered, preferably by a Melchizedek Priesthood holder.

Financial Policies

Church members who conduct or take part in funeral services should not accept fees or contributions, whether the service is for a member or a nonmember.

In some cases, bishops can arrange with morticians to provide respectable burial services at cost when expenses are paid from Church last-offering funds.

Funeral Services for Nonmembers

Bishops may offer the use of Church meetinghouses for the funeral services of nonmembers. Such services generally may be held in the manner prescribed by the deceased person's church. However, rituals of other churches or of outside organizations may not be performed in a Church meetinghouse. If the family desires, the service may be conducted by a clergyman of the person's church, provided it is dignified and appropriate.

8. Temples and Marriage

A bishop should consult with his stake president if he has questions about temples and temple work that are not answered in this section. The stake president may direct questions to the Office of the First Presidency.

Preparing to Receive Temple Ordinances

Temple ordinances and covenants are sacred. Members who enter a temple should be worthy and should understand the purposes and eternal significance of temples. They should also understand the solemn and sacred responsibilities they assume as they participate in temple ordinances and make covenants.

Temple Preparation Seminars

The bishop organizes and oversees temple preparation seminars for new members, less-active members, and endowed members who have not renewed their recommends for an extended time. The purpose of these seminars is to help members prepare to receive the ordinances and blessings of the temple. The high priests group leader and elders quorum president assist the bishop. Instructions are provided in the "Temple and Family History Work" section of Book 2 and in Endowed from on High: Temple Preparation Seminar Teacher's Manual.

Temple Orientation

Members who are preparing to receive their temple endowment or who are preparing to be sealed should carefully read the booklet Preparing to Enter the Holy Temple. The bishop provides this booklet to members who receive a Recommend for Living Ordinances and encourages them to read it carefully before scheduling an interview with the stake or mission president. The stake or mission president should use the booklet as the basis for counsel and instruction when interviewing the members.

Making Plans to Go to a Temple

Each stake and mission is included in a temple district. Members may go to any temple, but leaders should encourage them to go to the temple in their own district. Group visits to temples outside the assigned temple district are discouraged.

Endowment, Marriage, or Sealing

Members who are planning to go to a temple for their own endowment, marriage, or sealing should contact temple officials in advance to schedule the ordinances.

Baptisms and Confirmations for the Dead

Before taking a group to a temple to be baptized and confirmed for the dead, the bishop or stake president (or someone under his direction) makes arrangements with temple officials. The bishop assigns at least one adult to accompany each group. These adults should have valid temple recommends and be the same gender as members of the group. If brethren are needed to officiate in the baptistry, they must be endowed. They do not need to be set apart as temple ordinance workers. Priests and unendowed elders may not officiate.

Quotas for Temple Attendance

Priesthood leaders encourage members to set personal goals for temple attendance and to go to the temple as often as circumstances allow. However, leaders should not set quotas for temple attendance for wards and stakes or for individual members. Nor should leaders establish reporting systems for temple attendance.

Translation Assistance

If members will need translation assistance in a temple, they should contact temple officials in advance to ensure that such assistance is available.

Child Care at Temples

Temples are equipped to care only for children who come to be sealed to parents or to witness sealings of living brothers and sisters. Other children should not be brought to a temple.

Recommends to Enter a Temple

A member who is eight or older must have a valid recommend to enter a temple. A valid recommend admits a member to all temples. The three types of temple recommends are listed below:

1. Temple Recommend for members receiving their own endowment and for previously endowed members. This recommend authorizes a member to participate in all temple ordinances.

2. Recommend for Living Ordinances for members receiving their own endowment, those being sealed to a spouse, and those being married in a temple for time only. This recommend may be used only with a valid temple recommend.
3. Limited-Use Recommend for unendowed members (see pages 78-79).

Children under eight who are to be sealed to their parents or are to observe the sealings of their living brothers and sisters to their parents do not need recommends. However, the family needs to take to the temple a family group record showing the relationship of the child to the family.

Safeguarding Temple Recommend Books

Priesthood leaders who have temple recommend books should safeguard them carefully. No unauthorized individuals should have access to these books.

Disposal of Outdated Temple Recommends

Stake, mission, and temple presidents (and their counselors who are authorized to conduct temple recommend interviews) should retrieve expired temple recommends when issuing new recommends to worthy Church members. These outdated recommends should be shredded.

General Guidelines for Issuing Recommends

Authorized Church officers conduct worthiness interviews for temple recommends as outlined in the temple recommend book. Church officers are responsible to see that no unworthy person enters the house of the Lord.

Temple recommend interviews must be private. They should not be rushed. Interviewers should not add any requirements to those that are outlined in the temple recommend book.

In Wards and Branches in Stakes

The bishop, his counselors as authorized by him, or the branch president interviews ward or branch members and issues temple recommends to those who are worthy. The bishop or branch president personally interviews members who (1) are preparing to receive their own endowment, (2) are planning to be married or sealed in a temple, or (3) have not lived in the ward or branch continuously for at least one year. Only in the most urgent cases when he is absent may the bishop authorize one of his counselors to issue recommends in these circumstances. Before a recommend is issued in any of these three circumstances, the bishop should carefully review the person's membership record to verify that it does not include a comment about a sealing or ordinance restriction or unresolved Church discipline.

Following the interview by a member of the bishopric or by the branch president, a member of the stake presidency interviews the person and signs the recommend if the person is worthy. The stake president personally interviews members who are receiving their own endowment and members who are planning to be married or sealed in a temple.

In Branches in Mission Districts

In mission districts, the branch president interviews branch members and issues temple recommends to those who are worthy. Before he issues a recommend to a member who is to receive the endowment or be married or sealed in a temple, he should carefully review the person's membership record to verify that it does not include a comment about a sealing or ordinance restriction or unresolved Church discipline.

Following the interview by the branch president, a member of the mission presidency interviews the person and signs the recommend if the person is worthy. The mission president personally interviews members who are receiving their own endowment and members who are planning to be married or sealed in a temple.

The district president does not interview members for temple recommends.

In Isolated Areas

A temple president may interview and sign a recommend for a member who lives in an isolated area that would require unusual travel expense or difficulty for the member to meet with a member of the stake or mission presidency. The temple president first confers with the stake or mission president. In these cases, the bishop or an authorized counselor already should have interviewed the member and signed the recommend. This policy applies also to members in the military who are in isolated areas and have been interviewed by the bishop of their home ward or the ward that supports their duty station.

A temple president may interview and sign a recommend for a member who lives outside an organized stake or mission. No other interview is needed.

Members Who Have Not Lived in the Same Ward for at Least One Year

If a member has not lived in the same ward continuously for at least one year, the bishop contacts the prior bishop to certify the member's worthiness before interviewing the member for a temple recommend. This includes members of young single adult wards, single adult wards, and student wards. It also applies to members who seek limited-use recommends (except new converts; see instructions on pages 78–79 for issuing limited-use recommends).

Newly Baptized Members

A waiting period of at least one full year after confirmation is required before a worthy adult may be endowed. When issuing temple recommends for new members to be endowed, priesthood leaders should ensure that the date the endowment will be received is at least one full year from the member's date of confirmation, not from the date of baptism. Only the First Presidency may authorize exceptions. During a person's first year of membership, the bishopric may issue a limited-use recommend according to the guidelines on pages 78–79.

Members Receiving Their Own Endowment

Instructions for issuing a recommend to a person who is receiving his or her own endowment are in the temple recommend book. A man must hold the Melchizedek Priesthood to receive his temple endowment.

Most single members will be interviewed for a recommend for their own endowment when they are called as missionaries or when they are to be married in a temple. Single members in their late teens or early twenties who have not received a mission call or who are not engaged to be married in a temple should not be recommended to receive their own endowment. However, they may receive limited-use recommends to perform baptisms for the dead (see pages 78–79). The desire to witness temple marriages of siblings or friends is not a sufficient reason for a young adult to be endowed.

Worthy single members who have not received their endowment in connection with a mission or marriage may become eligible to receive the endowment when the bishop and the stake president determine that they are sufficiently mature to understand and keep the sacred covenants made in a temple. Such eligibility should be determined individually for each person rather than using routine criteria such as reaching a certain age or leaving home for college or employment.

A worthy member who is married to an unendowed spouse, whether the spouse is a member or nonmember, may receive his or her own endowment when (1) the bishop receives the written consent of the spouse and (2) the bishop and stake president are satisfied that the responsibility assumed with the endowment will not impair marital harmony.

Unendowed Prospective Missionaries

Bishops should not issue temple recommends to young, unendowed prospective missionaries until they have received a mission call from the President of the Church.

Missionaries

See page 100 and the Mission President's Handbook.

Members Who Have Disabilities

Endowment. Members who have physical disabilities may receive their own endowment.

Melchizedek Priesthood holders and sisters who have mental disabilities may receive their own endowment if the bishop determines that they have gained sufficient mental capacity to understand it and to make and keep the associated covenants. The bishop should seek the direction of the Spirit in making this determination. If the member lives with his or her parents, the bishop counsels with them.

Sealing to Parents. Persons with mental disabilities who are eight or older and are sufficiently accountable must be baptized before being sealed to their parents. Those who are not accountable do not need to be baptized before being sealed. Bishops refer questions about specific cases to the stake president, who may refer the questions to the Office of the First Presidency.

Members older than 21 who do not have sufficient mental capacity to understand the endowment may be sealed to parents without being endowed.

Work for the Dead. Members who have disabilities may do temple work for the dead if they (1) have sufficient mental capacity to understand the ordinance and (2) can care for themselves without help or are accompanied by relatives or friends who can provide the help needed.

Blind Members. Blind members should have members of the same gender accompany and assist them. Guide dogs are not permitted in temples.

Issuing Recommends in Special Circumstances

After Divorce, Separation, or Annulment

If a member has been divorced or legally separated or has had a marriage annulled since last receiving a temple recommend, the bishop and stake president may feel impressed to carefully interview the member prior to the expiration of the recommend to ensure continued temple worthiness. Events leading to the breakdown of the marriage may be reviewed. If the member has not committed a serious transgression, a temple recommend may be retained or renewed according to the usual procedure.

Members Who Have Been Readmitted by Baptism and Confirmation after Excommunication or Name Removal

Members Who Were Not Previously Endowed. After baptism and confirmation, these members may be issued limited-use recommends to do baptisms and confirmations for the dead as outlined on this page and page 79. There is no waiting period. Brethren must be ordained to the priesthood before they may be issued limited-use recommends.

These members may not be issued recommends to receive their own endowment until one full year after their baptism and confirmation.

Members Who Were Previously Endowed. These members may not be issued recommends, including limited-use recommends, until their temple blessings are restored through the ordinance of restoration of blessings (see page 122).

Members Who Have Committed a Serious Transgression

A member who has committed a serious transgression may not receive a temple recommend until he or she has repented. The waiting period between the transgression and the issuing of a recommend is left to the bishop's discretion. It should be sufficient to determine that the person has genuinely repented.

Members Who Have Undergone a Transsexual Operation

A member who has undergone an elective transsexual operation may not receive a temple recommend.

Members Whose Close Relatives Belong to Apostate Groups

Bishops and their counselors must take exceptional care when issuing recommends to members whose parents or other close relatives belong to or sympathize with apostate groups. Such members must demonstrate clearly that they repudiate these apostate religious teachings before they may be issued a recommend.

Issuing Limited-Use Recommends

General Guidelines

The bishop, his counselors as authorized by him, or the branch president may issue limited-use recommends to worthy unendowed members as follows:

1. For members ages 12 and older to be baptized and confirmed for the dead.
2. For single members ages 8 through 20 to be sealed to their parents.
3. For single members ages 8 through 20 to observe sealings of their living brothers and sisters to their parents.

The same standards of worthiness apply to those who receive limited-use recommends as to those who receive other temple recommends. Male members ages 12 and older must hold the priesthood. It is not necessary to have been a member for one year to receive a limited-use recommend.

When issuing a limited-use recommend, a member of the bishopric or the branch president interviews the person individually. A member of the stake presidency or mission presidency does not interview the person if the recommend is being issued only for baptisms and confirmations for the dead.

The bishopric or the branch president may issue limited-use recommends for groups or individuals. Before a recommend is issued for a group, each person must be interviewed separately. When issuing a limited-use recommend, the member of the bishopric or the branch president crosses out or cuts away any blank lines on the recommend so other names cannot be added.

If a member has not lived in the same ward continuously for at least one year, the bishop contacts the prior bishop to certify the member's worthiness before interviewing the member for a limited-use recommend.

Limited-Use Recommends for Baptisms and Confirmations for the Dead

Members ages 12 through 20 are normally listed as a group on a limited-use recommend if they are going as a group to be baptized and confirmed for the dead. Group recommends are used for only one temple visit. They are left at the temple, where they are destroyed.

Members ages 12 through 20 may be issued individual limited-use recommends that they retain if they are frequently baptized and confirmed for the dead. If parents take children ages 12 through 20 to do baptisms for the dead, children in the same family may be listed on one recommend.

Limited-use recommends that are issued to unendowed members who are 21 or older or who are married must be individual recommends. These recommends may be used only to perform baptisms and confirmations for the dead.

For information about scheduling baptisms and confirmations for the dead, see page 75.

Limited-Use Recommends for Sealing Living Children to Parents

Single members ages 8 through 20 are issued limited-use recommends to be sealed to their parents or to observe the sealing of their living brothers and sisters to their parents. All children under the age of 21 must be born in the covenant or sealed to their parents in order to observe such sealings. Members who are married or are 21 or older must have been endowed before they can be sealed to their parents or observe the sealing of living brothers and sisters to their parents.

Recommends may be issued for individual children or for a group of children in the same family. The same recommend may be used to list children who are being sealed and children who are observing. Children under 8 do not need recommends for these purposes. However, the family needs to take to the temple a family group record showing the relationship of the child to the family.

The approval of the First Presidency is necessary to issue limited-use recommends to children who wish to observe the sealings of their brothers and sisters if the children who wish to observe the sealings do not live the majority of the time in the same home as the children who are to be sealed.

Lost or Stolen Recommends

The bishop should ask members to notify him promptly if a recommend is lost or stolen. Procedures for reporting lost or stolen recommends are in the temple recommend book.

Unworthy Recommend Holders

If the bishop determines that a member who has a valid recommend is unworthy, he immediately requests the recommend from the member. If the member refuses to return it, the bishop notifies the stake president at once. The stake president informs temple officials in his temple district (and in nearby districts if necessary) according to instructions in the temple recommend book.

Temple Clothing and Garments

Clothing to Wear to a Temple

Members who go to a temple should wear clothing that is suitable for the house of the Lord. They should avoid wearing casual clothes, sports attire, and ostentatious jewelry.

Obtaining Temple Clothing and Garments

Members change to white clothing in a temple to participate in the ordinances. Endowed members are encouraged to purchase their own temple clothing for use when performing temple ordinances. This sacred clothing may be purchased through Church Distribution Services (see page xiv for contact information). Some temples also have temple clothing available for rent. If a temple does not have rental clothing, members need to bring temple clothing with them.

Temples maintain a limited supply of temple clothing that full-time missionaries may use without charge when they receive their own endowment, while they are in missionary training centers, and when they are authorized to participate in temple ordinances while serving in the mission field.

The distribution and sale of garments requires the authorization of the First Presidency. Garments are available in a variety of styles and fabrics. They may be purchased through Distribution Services. Members who have special needs may contact Distribution Services about special orders (see page xiv for contact information).

When necessary, bishops and stake presidents should instruct members in how to purchase temple clothing and garments. Assistant stake and ward clerks may help provide this instruction and help members order the clothing.

Making Temple Clothing

Members may make their own temple aprons only if they use the approved apron embroidery and sewing kit that is available through Church Distribution Services. Temple garments and temple ceremonial clothing may not be made.

Clothing to Wear for a Temple Marriage

Wearing and Caring for the Garment

Church members who have been clothed with the garment in a temple are obligated to wear it according to the instructions given in the endowment. When issuing temple recommends, priesthood leaders should teach the importance of wearing the garment properly. Leaders also emphasize the blessings that are related to this sacred privilege. These blessings are conditioned on worthiness and faithfulness in keeping temple covenants.

The garment provides a constant reminder of the covenants made in a temple. When properly worn, it provides protection against temptation and evil. Wearing the garment is also an outward expression of an inward commitment to follow the Savior.

Endowed members should wear the temple garment both day and night. They should not remove it, either entirely or partially, to work in the yard or for other activities that can reasonably be done with the garment worn properly beneath the clothing. Nor should they remove it to lounge around the home in swimwear or immodest clothing. When they must remove the garment, such as for swimming, they should put it back on as soon as possible.

Members should not adjust the garment or wear it contrary to instructions in order to accommodate different styles of clothing. When two-piece garments are used, both pieces should always be worn.

The garment is sacred and should be treated with respect at all times. Members should keep their garments clean and mended. They should not alter the garment from its authorized design. Nor should they display it or expose it to the view of those who do not understand its significance.

As members carefully follow these principles, they will be guided by the Holy Spirit in considering their personal commitment to wear the garment.

Garments and Temple Clothing for Members Who Have Disabilities

For members who are bedfast or who have severe physical disabilities, necessary adjustments may be made in wearing the garment. If recommended by a member's bishop, a garment designed like a hospital gown is available by special order for those who are bedfast.

Shorter temple robes are available to meet the needs of members who are in wheelchairs.

Wearing the Garment in the Military

If members who enter military service have been endowed, bishops should make sure they understand the following guidelines.

When possible, endowed members in the military should wear the garment the same as any other member. However, members should avoid exposing the garment to the view of those who do not understand its significance. When conditions make this unavoidable, members should seek the guidance of the Spirit and use tact, discretion, and wisdom. It may be best to lay the garment aside temporarily and put it on again when conditions permit. However, mere inconvenience in wearing the garment does not justify laying it aside. Special colored garments that are compatible with some military uniforms are available (see "Ordering Special Garments" below).

When military regulations prevent a member from wearing the garment, the member's religious status is not affected, provided he or she remains worthy. If members in military service are unable to wear the garment because of military regulations or circumstances beyond their control, it is their privilege, right, and duty to wear it again as soon as circumstances permit.

Ordering Special Garments

Members in the military should consult with their individual services on requirements that garments must meet (such as one-piece or two-piece, color, or neckline style). To place special orders or receive assistance in selecting garments for special circumstances, members may contact Distribution Services (see page xiv for contact information).

A two-piece desert tan colored garment with a crew neck and T-shirt top that meets the specifications of the Church and the United States Army is available through Distribution Services. This special military garment should be worn with the battle dress uniform when required by military regulations.

A two-piece white cotton garment with a crew neck is also available.

Military services that require a different color of T-shirt than desert tan may purchase approved military T-shirts and send them to Distribution Services to be marked individually. White or desert tan garment bottoms may be worn with the service-specific colored tops.

Certain synthetic fibers worn next to the skin may create serious hazards for airmen and others who may be exposed to fire. All nylon and polyester blend materials fall into this category. Military authorities have indicated that cotton is a much safer fabric for these individuals to wear. A 100-percent cotton crew-neck garment is available for these members.

Questions about Wearing the Garment in the Military

If members in the military have questions about wearing the garment, they may write or call:

Military Relations Division
50 East North Temple Street, Room 2048
Salt Lake City, UT 84150-6080
Telephone: 1-801-240-2286
E-mail: pst-military@ldschurch.org

Disposing of Garments and Temple Clothing

To dispose of worn-out temple garments, members should cut out and destroy the marks. Members then cut up the remaining fabric so it cannot be identified as a garment. Once the marks are removed, the fabric is not considered sacred.

To dispose of worn-out temple clothing, members should destroy the clothing by cutting it up so the original use cannot be recognized.

Members may give garments and temple clothing that are in good condition to other worthy endowed members. The bishop can help identify those who might need such clothing. Under no circumstances should members give garments or temple clothing to Deseret Industries, bishops' storehouses, or charities.

Temple Burial Clothing

Where possible, endowed members should be buried in temple clothing when they die. Where cultural traditions or burial practices make this inappropriate or difficult, the clothing may be folded and placed next to the body in the casket.

Only members who have been endowed may be buried in temple clothing. An endowed person who stopped wearing the garment before his or her death may be buried in temple clothing if the family so requests. An endowed person who has committed suicide may be buried in temple clothing. However, persons whose blessings have not been restored after excommunication or name removal may not be buried in temple clothing.

Temple clothing that is used for burial need not be new, but it should be clean. The member's own temple clothing may be used.

Bishops and Relief Society presidents should know what temple clothing is available for burial and how to dress a deceased member in temple clothing.

A member who is to be buried in temple clothing may be dressed by an endowed family member of the same gender. If a family member is not available, the bishop assigns an endowed man to dress a deceased man. The bishop asks the Relief Society president to assign an endowed woman to dress a deceased woman. Guidelines for dressing deceased members are provided in Instructions for Clothing the Dead Who Have Received Their Endowments. Leaders may obtain these instructions from Church Distribution Services (see page xiv for contact information).

In some areas only a licensed funeral director or an employee of the director is allowed to handle a deceased body. In these cases, an endowed family member or an endowed person who is assigned by the bishop or Relief Society president should ensure that the clothing has been properly placed on the body.

Although the Church does not normally encourage cremation, the body of an endowed member who is being cremated should be dressed in temple clothing if possible.

In areas where temple clothing may be difficult to obtain in time for burial, stake presidents should keep on hand at least two complete sets of medium-sized clothing, one for a man and one for a woman.

If temple clothing is not available, a deceased endowed member is clothed for burial in the garment and other suitable clothing.

Marriage

Church leaders encourage members to qualify for temple marriage and to be married in a temple. Where temple marriage is not possible because of personal circumstances or legal requirements, leaders may perform civil marriages as outlined on pages 83–84.

A couple who are planning to be married must obtain a legal marriage license that is valid in the place where the marriage is to be performed.

Temple Marriage

The purpose of a temple marriage, referred to in the scriptures as "the new and everlasting covenant of marriage" (D&C 131:2), is to seal a husband and wife for time and eternity, depending on their faithfulness. Through this ordinance, a couple's children may also be part of their eternal family. Only a marriage that has been sealed in the temple and confirmed by the Holy Spirit of Promise can be eternal (see D&C 132:7).

A man and woman must each be endowed before they may be married and sealed in a temple. They must each have a valid Recommend for Living Ordinances and a valid temple recommend.

Who Performs a Temple Marriage

Bishops and stake presidents encourage members to have temple sealers perform their marriages rather than asking General Authorities.

Who May Attend a Temple Marriage

Only members who have received their own endowments and have valid recommends may attend a temple marriage. Couples should invite only family members and close friends to be present for a temple marriage.

Appropriate Dress for a Temple Marriage

The bishop should review the following guidelines with each bride and bridegroom well in advance of the wedding. It is especially important to review the guidelines for temple wedding dresses with each bride and her parents before they make or purchase the dress. The bishop should also make the following information about brides' dresses available to the Relief Society and Young Women presidencies so they can help members be informed of the expectations far in advance of the actual events.

Brides' Dresses. All dresses that are worn in the temple should be white, long-sleeved, modest in design and fabric, and free of elaborate ornamentation. Sheer fabric should be lined. Women's pants are not permitted in the temple. Brides' dresses should not have a train unless the train can be removed for the temple ceremony.

Formal Wear and Flowers. Tuxedos, dinner jackets, cummerbunds, formal headwear, and boutonnieres and other flowers are not appropriate in a sealing room or during a sealing ceremony. This applies not only to those who are being sealed, but also to their guests. If desired, formal wear and flowers may be worn outside for photographs after the ceremony.

Wedding Guests. Couples should not ask their wedding guests to dress in white unless the sealing room must be entered through the celestial room. Members who come to a wedding directly from an endowment session may wear ordinance clothing.

Exchanging Rings after a Temple Marriage

Exchanging rings is not part of the temple marriage ceremony. However, couples may exchange rings after the ceremony in the room where the ceremony takes place. To avoid confusion with the marriage ceremony, couples should not exchange rings at any other time or place in a temple or on temple grounds. However, after their temple marriage, a couple may exchange rings at locations other than the temple. If such an exchange is made, the circumstances should be consistent with the dignity of their temple marriage. The exchange should not appear to replicate any part of the marriage ceremony, and the couple should not exchange vows.

Special Meeting for Guests Who Do Not Have Temple Recommends

A couple may arrange with their bishop to hold a special meeting for relatives and friends who do not have temple recommends. This meeting provides an opportunity for those who cannot enter a temple to feel included in the marriage and to learn something of the eternal nature of the marriage covenant. The meeting may include a prayer and special music, followed by the remarks of a priesthood leader. No ceremony is performed, and no vows are exchanged.

No other marriage ceremony should be performed following a temple marriage.

Marriage of Members Who Need a Cancellation of Sealing or a Sealing Clearance

See "Applying for a Cancellation of Sealing or a Sealing Clearance" on page 85.

Marriage in a Temple for Time Only

Marriage in a temple for time only may be performed only when all of the following requirements are met:

1. The man and the woman are each already sealed to a spouse who is deceased.

2. Neither the man nor the woman has been involved in any divorce while a member of the Church.
3. Both the man and the woman have current temple recommends and have been issued a Recommend for Living Ordinances.
4. Temple marriages are legal marriages in the country where the temple is located and the couple has a valid marriage license.

Bishops should encourage such worthy couples to marry in a temple.

A marriage in the temple for time only will not be authorized for a woman who is in the process of seeking a cancellation of sealing.

For the policy on sealing a couple who were married in the temple for time only, see "Sealing after Temple Marriage for Time Only" on page 86.

Civil Marriage

When temple marriage is not possible because of personal circumstances or legal requirements, leaders may perform civil marriages as outlined below. A civil marriage does not endure beyond mortal life.

Civil marriages should be performed in accordance with the laws in the place where the marriage is performed.

Civil marriages and related religious ceremonies should not be performed on Sunday or at unusual hours.

Who May Perform a Civil Marriage

Members who are planning a civil marriage may invite any of the following presiding officers of their Church units to perform the marriage ceremony if civil law authorizes the officer to do so: stake president, mission president, bishop, or branch president. An LDS military chaplain on active duty may also perform the ceremony. Unless contrary to legal requirements, a Church officer may perform a marriage for a member of his unit outside the boundaries of that unit.

Those who have been released from these offices may not perform marriages. Other Church officers are not authorized to perform civil marriages.

Civil Marriage for Members from Other Units

Church officers, except LDS military chaplains who are on active duty, may not perform marriages for Church members when neither marriage partner belongs to the Church unit over which the officer presides. Any exceptions require the approval of the First Presidency in each case.

Civil Marriage for Nonmembers

Authorized Church officers may perform marriages for nonmembers without receiving special approval.

Where to Perform Civil Marriages

Civil marriages are preferably performed in the home of a family member or in a Church building rather than at a commercial wedding chapel or other public place. Marriages in a Church building may be performed in the chapel, the cultural hall, or another suitable room. The person who performs the ceremony determines the location.

Civil Marriages That Must Be Performed by a Public Official or in a Public Place

Some areas require that a marriage ceremony be performed by a public official. Some require that the ceremony be performed in a public building or another public place. In these cases, a temple sealing necessarily follows the civil marriage as soon as possible (see "Sealing of Living Members after Civil Marriage" on pages 84-85). If the couple will not be sealed, the bishop or stake president may conduct a brief religious ceremony after the civil marriage. In this ceremony he gives counsel to the couple and gives Church recognition to their marriage. The instructions in this section on the use of Church buildings and the simplicity of ceremonies should be followed.

Civil Marriage Ceremony

Civil marriage ceremonies should be simple, conservative, and in harmony with the sacredness of the marriage covenants. There should be no extravagance in decorations or pomp in the proceedings. Video recorders and cameras may not be used in the chapel. For suggestions about music for civil weddings, see page 290 in Book 2.

Before performing a civil marriage, a Church officer may counsel the couple on the sacred nature of the marriage covenant and may add other counsel as the Spirit directs.

To perform a civil marriage, a Church officer addresses the couple and says, "Please take each other by the right hand." He then says, "[Bridegroom's full name and bride's full name], you have taken one another by the right hand in token of the covenants you will now enter into in the presence of God and these witnesses." (The couple may choose or nominate these witnesses.)

The officer then addresses the bridegroom and asks, "[Bridegroom's full name], do you take [bride's full name] as your lawfully wedded wife, and do you of your own free will and choice covenant as her companion and lawfully wedded husband that you will cleave unto her and none else; that you will observe all the laws, covenants, and obligations pertaining to the holy state of matrimony; and that you will love, honor, and cherish her as long as you both shall live?"

The bridegroom answers, "Yes" or "I do."

The Church officer then addresses the bride and asks, "[Bride's full name], do you take [bridegroom's full name] as your lawfully wedded husband, and do you of your own free will and choice covenant as his companion and lawfully wedded wife that you will cleave unto him and none else; that you will observe all the laws, covenants, and obligations pertaining to the holy state of matrimony; and that you will love, honor, and cherish him as long as you both shall live?"

The bride answers, "Yes" or "I do."

The Church officer then addresses the couple and says, "By virtue of the legal authority vested in me as an elder of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, I pronounce you, [bridegroom's name] and [bride's name], husband and wife, legally and lawfully wedded for the period of your mortal lives.

"May God bless your union with joy in your posterity and a long life of happiness together, and may He enable you to keep sacred the covenants you have made. These blessings I invoke upon you in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, amen.

"You may kiss each other as husband and wife."

A Church officer who performs civil marriages in his Church capacity may not accept fees.

A Church officer who performs a civil marriage for members must send a letter to the bishop(s) of the home ward(s) of those he has married. This letter should include all information needed to update membership records. He also must comply fully with legal requirements for reporting and record keeping.

Marriage after a Spouse's Death or after a Divorce or Annulment

A member who has been sealed to a spouse may remarry after the spouse's death or following a divorce or annulment. A member's divorce proceedings must be final according to law before he or she may remarry.

Worthy members in these circumstances may also be sealed according to the guidelines under "Sealing Policies" on this page through page 86.

Wedding Receptions

A wedding reception may be held in a Church building if it does not disrupt the schedule of regular Church functions. However, these receptions may not be held in the chapel unless it is a multipurpose area. Receptions should not be held on Sundays or on Monday evenings.

Those in charge of the reception are responsible for cleaning the areas they use in the building.

Sealing Policies

Sealing ordinances include covenants that can bind families together for eternity. These ordinances include (1) sealing of a husband and wife and (2) sealing of children to parents.

Stake presidents should contact the Office of the First Presidency or the temple in their temple district for guidance in special circumstances related to sealings that are not covered in these instructions.

Sealing of a Husband and Wife

Sealing of Living Members after Civil Marriage

A husband and wife who were married outside a temple may be sealed after one full year from the date of the civil marriage. However, this one-year waiting period does not apply to worthy couples in the following cases:

1. The temple in which the couple will be sealed is in a country that requires a civil marriage and does not recognize a marriage in the temple.
2. The couple live in a country where there is not a temple and the laws of the country do not recognize a marriage performed outside the country.
3. An unchaperoned couple's travel to a temple will require one or more overnight stops because of distance.
4. A couple could not be married in a temple because one or both had not been a member of the Church for one year at the time of their civil marriage. They may receive their endowments and be sealed any time after both have been members for at least one year.

In the first three cases, worthy couples should receive their endowments and be sealed as soon as possible after their civil marriage.

If a civil marriage must be performed before the temple sealing for one of the reasons listed on page 84, the civil marriage should take place in the temple district of the temple in which the couple is to be sealed.

Worthy couples who were married in a civil ceremony and have been members of the Church for at least one year may receive their own endowments and participate in all other temple ordinances except their marriage sealing any time within the year following civil marriage.

Only the First Presidency may grant exceptions to the preceding policies. The stake president may seek an exception if it appears to be justified. The couple should not go to a temple to be sealed unless they are notified that the First Presidency has granted an exception. They should bring this notification with them.

When issuing recommends to a couple for sealing after a civil marriage, priesthood leaders should be sure the civil marriage was valid.

Sealing of Living Members after Divorce

Women. A living woman may be sealed to only one husband. If she is sealed to a husband and later divorced, she must receive a cancellation of that sealing from the First Presidency before she may be sealed to another man in her lifetime (see "Applying for a Cancellation of Sealing or a Sealing Clearance" in the next column).

Men. If a husband and wife have been sealed and later divorced, the man must receive a sealing clearance from the First Presidency before another woman may be sealed to him (see "Applying for a Cancellation of Sealing or a Sealing Clearance" in the next column). A sealing clearance is necessary even if (1) the previous sealing has been canceled or (2) the divorced wife is now deceased.

Sealing of Living Members after a Spouse's Death

Women. A living woman may be sealed to only one husband.

Men. If a husband and wife have been sealed and the wife dies, the man may have another woman sealed to him if she is not already sealed to another man. In this circumstance, the man does not need a sealing clearance from the First Presidency unless he was divorced from his former wife before she died (see the previous heading for the policy in cases of divorce).

Applying for a Cancellation of Sealing or a Sealing Clearance

A woman who has previously been sealed must receive a cancellation of that sealing from the First Presidency before she may be sealed to another man in her lifetime. A man who has been divorced from a woman who was sealed to him must receive a sealing clearance from the First Presidency before another woman may be sealed to him (see "Sealing of Living Members after Divorce" in the previous column).

If the bishop and stake president decide to recommend that a cancellation of sealing or a sealing clearance be granted, they submit an Application to the First Presidency form. This form is available from the Office of the First Presidency in the United States and Canada. It is available from the Area Presidency in other areas. Instructions are on the form. Before submitting the application, the stake president should be sure that the divorce is final and that the applicant is current in all legal requirements for child and spousal support related to the divorce.

If a member has requested a cancellation of sealing or a sealing clearance, he or she may not schedule an appointment for a temple marriage or sealing until receiving a letter from the First Presidency giving notice that the cancellation or clearance has been granted. The person should present this letter at the temple.

Removing a Restriction against Temple Sealing

If a person commits adultery while married to a spouse to whom he or she has been sealed, he or she may not be sealed to the partner in the adultery unless the sealing is authorized by the President of the Church. Such authorization may be requested after the couple have been married for at least five years. The request may be submitted with an application for cancellation of sealing or sealing clearance.

A couple who desire the lifting of a sealing restriction may seek an interview with their bishop and stake president. If these leaders feel to recommend removal of the restriction, they may write letters to the First Presidency summarizing their recommendations and commenting on the applicants' temple worthiness and the stability of their marriage for at least five years. The couple should also write a letter of request to the First Presidency. The stake president should submit all of these letters to the First Presidency.

Sealing after Temple Marriage for Time Only

Couples who are married in a temple for time only are usually not sealed at a later time. For such a sealing to occur, the woman must first receive from the First Presidency a cancellation of her previous sealing. Such requests are considered only in exceptional circumstances. If a bishop and stake president feel that a cancellation may be justified, they may submit an Application to the First Presidency form.

Sealing of Deceased Members

Deceased Women. A deceased woman may be sealed to all men to whom she was legally married during her life. However, if she was sealed to a husband during her life, all her husbands must be deceased before she may be sealed to a husband to whom she was not sealed during life.

Deceased Men. A deceased man may have sealed to him all women to whom he was legally married during his life if they are deceased or if they are living and not sealed to another man.

Deceased Couples Who Were Divorced. Deceased couples who were divorced may be sealed by proxy. These sealings often provide the only way for children of such couples to be sealed to parents. See page 88 for a restriction if either the husband or wife was excommunicated or had his or her name removed from Church membership records at the time of death.

Effects of Excommunication or Name Removal

After a husband and wife have been sealed in a temple, if one of them is excommunicated or has his or her name removed from Church membership records, his or her temple blessings are revoked. However, the sealing blessings of the innocent spouse and children are not affected.

Sealing Children to Parents

Children Who Are Born in the Covenant

Children who are born after their mother has been sealed to a husband in a temple are born in the covenant of that sealing. They do not need to receive the ordinance of sealing to parents. Being born in the covenant entitles children to an eternal parentage, depending on their faithfulness. However, it does not guarantee that children will be sealed to their natural parents if the parents or children are not faithful.

If a woman who has been sealed to a former husband remarries, the children of her later marriage are born in the covenant of the first marriage unless they were born after the sealing was canceled or after it was revoked due to excommunication or name removal.

Children Who Are Not Born in the Covenant

Children who are not born in the covenant can become part of an eternal family by being sealed to their natural or adoptive parents. These children receive the same right to blessings as if they had been born in the covenant.

A child may be sealed only to two parents—a husband and wife—and not to one parent only.

Members who are married or are 21 or older must have been endowed before they may be sealed to their parents or observe the sealing of living brothers and sisters to their parents.

Adopted or Foster Children Who Are Living

Living children who are born in the covenant or have been sealed to parents cannot be sealed to any other parents.

Living children who have been legally adopted and were neither born in the covenant nor sealed to former parents may be sealed to their adoptive parents after the adoption is final. A copy of the final adoption decree should be presented at the temple; a court decree granting legal custody is not sufficient clearance for a sealing. There is no obligation to identify the natural parents of these children.

First Presidency approval is necessary for a living member to be sealed to foster parents. This requirement applies even if the natural parents of the foster child are unknown and cannot be identified by reasonable effort. Priesthood leaders may assist members in making these requests.

Adopted or Foster Children Who Are Deceased

A deceased adopted person usually is sealed to his or her adoptive parents.

A deceased foster child usually is sealed to his or her natural parents.

Sealing of Living Children to One Natural Parent and a Stepparent

A living unmarried child under 21 who was not born in the covenant or sealed previously, and who has not been adopted, may be sealed to one natural parent and a stepparent if (1) the natural parent to whom the child is being sealed has legal custody of the child and (2) the other natural parent has given signed consent. A court decree granting legal custody is not sufficient clearance for a sealing. The signed consent must (1) name the child and the parents to whom the child will be sealed and (2) be presented at the temple.

If the other natural parent is deceased, or if that parent is missing and reasonable efforts to find him or her have failed, no consent is required. The temple president can approve the sealing to be completed subject to future review.

A living endowed member who is over 21 or is married and was not born in the covenant and has not been sealed to parents may be sealed to one natural parent and a stepparent if the natural mother and father are not sealed to each other.

Children Who Are Born Out of Wedlock

A living child who is born out of wedlock may be sealed to both natural parents without special approval after the parents have been sealed in a temple.

A living child who is born out of wedlock may be sealed to one natural parent and a stepparent when at least one of the following conditions applies:

1. The child marries.
2. The child reaches the age of 21.
3. The child's other natural parent is deceased.
4. The other natural parent has given signed consent for the sealing.
5. The rights of the natural father or mother have been terminated by legal process, such as an adoption proceeding.

If the child's other natural parent is missing, and if reasonable efforts to find the parent have failed, no consent is required. The temple president can approve the sealing to be completed subject to future review.

Children Conceived by Artificial Insemination or In Vitro Fertilization

Children conceived by artificial insemination or in vitro fertilization are born in the covenant if their parents are already sealed. If the children are born before their parents are sealed, they may be sealed to their parents after their parents are sealed to each other.

Status of Children When a Sealing Is Canceled or Revoked

Children who are born in the covenant or sealed to their parents remain so even if the sealing of the parents is later (1) canceled or (2) revoked by the excommunication or name removal of either parent. Children who are born after their parents' sealing is canceled or revoked are not born in the covenant. These children need to be sealed to their parents after their parents' blessings are restored (if applicable) and any other obstacles are removed.

Temple Ordinances for the Dead

General Guidelines

Generally, members may perform temple ordinances for deceased persons one year or more after the date of death without regard to the person's worthiness or cause of death. Bishops should explain this waiting period to members who plan to perform temple ordinances for deceased family members. Members who have questions should contact their bishop. He may direct questions to the stake president.

Ordinances that are performed for the dead are effective only if the deceased person chooses to accept them and becomes qualified to receive them (see D&C 138:19, 32-34).

For basic instructions on identifying ancestors and preparing their names for temple work, see A Member's Guide to Temple and Family History Work.

Members Unable to Go to a Temple before Death

The one-year waiting period for temple ordinances does not apply to worthy members who would have gone to a temple but were prevented from doing so in life for reasons beyond their control.

Members Who Died within One Year of Baptism or Civil Marriage

If a worthy member dies within the year after being baptized and confirmed, temple ordinances may be completed when one year has passed since these ordinances were received.

If a worthy member dies within one year of a civil marriage, the sealing of the couple may be performed when one year has passed since the marriage.

Stillborn Children (Children Who Die before Birth)

Temple ordinances are not performed for stillborn children, but no loss of eternal blessings or family unity is implied. The family may record the name of a stillborn child on the family group record followed by the word stillborn in parentheses. For more information about stillborn children, see page 185.

Children under Eight Who Died

No baptism or endowment is performed for a child who died before age eight. Only sealings to parents are performed for such children. If the child was sealed to parents while he or she was living, or if the child was born in the covenant, no vicarious ordinances are performed.

Deceased Persons Who Had Mental Disabilities

Temple ordinances for deceased persons who had mental disabilities are performed the same as for other deceased persons.

Persons Who Are Presumed Dead

Temple ordinances may be performed for a person who is presumed dead after 10 years have passed since the time of the presumed death. This policy applies to (1) persons who are missing in action, are lost at sea, or have been declared legally dead; and (2) persons who disappeared under circumstances where death is apparent but no body has been recovered.

In all other cases of missing persons, temple ordinances may not be performed until 110 years have passed from the time of the person's birth.

Persons Who Have Taken Their Own Lives

Unless they were excommunicated or had their names removed from Church membership records at the time of death, persons who have taken their own lives may have temple ordinances performed for them one year or more after the date of death.

Persons Who Were Excommunicated or Had Their Names Removed from Church Records

First Presidency approval is required to perform temple ordinances for deceased persons who, at the time of their death, were excommunicated or had their names removed from Church membership records.

Restoration of Temple Blessings (after Excommunication or Name Removal)

Endowed persons who were excommunicated (or who had their names removed from Church membership records) and were later readmitted by baptism and confirmation can receive their temple blessings only through the ordinance of restoration of blessings. Such persons are not endowed again, since these blessings are restored through the ordinance. For information about performing this ordinance for the living, see page 122.

First Presidency approval is required to perform this ordinance for the dead.

Verifying Ordinances Necessary to Receive the Endowment

For the Living

A living person whose baptism and confirmation are not recorded on Church membership records may not be endowed until the baptism and confirmation are verified, ratified, or performed again. Brethren whose Melchizedek Priesthood ordination is not recorded must also have it verified, ratified, or performed again. Procedures are outlined on page 31. That page also explains the procedure to follow if a living person is endowed without a valid record of baptism or if a male is endowed without a valid record of Melchizedek Priesthood ordination.

For the Dead

Sometimes a deceased person's baptism that was performed while he or she was living cannot be verified after a diligent search. If an unverified baptism was relied on to perform the person's endowment, the person must be baptized and confirmed by proxy. It is not necessary to perform the endowment and sealings again.

Temple Ordinance Workers

Process of Calling

Recommendations for prospective temple ordinance workers may come to a temple president from ward or stake leaders, ordinance workers, his personal knowledge and contacts, and the guidance of the Spirit.

When a temple president identifies a member whom he would like to consider calling as an ordinance worker, he sends a Confidential Report on Proposed Temple Ordinance Workers form to the member's bishop (one form for each couple or individual). If the bishop feels that the member is worthy and the calling would be suitable, he completes the form and sends it to the stake president. If the stake president concurs with the temple president and the bishop, he signs the form and sends it to the temple president.

After the temple president receives a completed form, a member of the temple presidency interviews the person. When so inspired, he calls those who are able to serve and sets them apart. He notifies the stake president of each calling.

The bishop and stake president must not inform members that they are being considered for this calling. Their first notification comes when a member of the temple presidency interviews them.

Qualifications

To be considered for callings as temple ordinance workers, members must:

1. Be endowed, comply with temple covenants, and qualify to hold a temple recommend.
2. Be experienced in living gospel principles.
3. Be mature in their knowledge of the restored gospel.
4. Have belonged to the Church for at least one year.
5. Not have received formal Church discipline or a restoration of blessings within the past five years.
6. Be in good health.

7. Be emotionally stable.
8. Be respected in the community.
9. Be married, if a male over 30 years old (widowers excepted).
10. Not have been divorced, after baptism, within the past five years.
11. Never have received formal Church discipline for sexual abuse or had their membership record annotated.

Restricted-Service Ordinance Workers

Mothers who have minor children living at home and brethren who are serving in bishoprics, branch presidencies, stake presidencies, or district presidencies, as well as brethren who are serving as Area Seventies, may not be called as regular temple ordinance workers. However, outside the United States and Canada they or any worthy members who meet the qualifications listed above may be called as restricted-service ordinance workers. They function in this assignment only when the need exists with organized groups from their own Church units. They may also function with groups that have special language needs. Any exceptions to these policies require the approval of the First Presidency.

Restricted-service ordinance workers are called and set apart the same as regular ordinance workers. No distinction of title is made when they are set apart, but the member of the temple presidency who extends the calling and sets them apart explains the restriction.

9. Missionary Service

For units in the United States and Canada, the term administration office in this section refers to Church headquarters in Salt Lake City.

For units outside the United States and Canada, the term administration office refers to the Presiding Bishopric administration office or service center that serves the unit.

The Call to Serve

Full-time missionary service is a privilege for members who are called through inspiration by the President of the Church. Missionary service is literally service to the Lord and His Church. Its objective is not primarily the personal development of a missionary, although righteous service invariably produces that result.

The calling to serve a full-time mission is extended to those who are worthy and able to accomplish it. Full-time missionary service is not an entitlement or a "rite of passage" in the Church. Nor are individuals sent on missions to be reactivated or reformed.

Missionaries who represent the Lord and His Church must be properly called and set apart (see D&C 42:11). They should meet the qualifications outlined in section 4 of the Doctrine and Covenants (see also D&C 88:121–26).

Missionary candidates must be living worthy, exemplary lives. They are required to be morally clean and otherwise worthy to be the Lord's representatives (see D&C 38:42).

Missionaries invite others to come unto Christ by helping them receive the restored gospel through faith in Jesus Christ and His Atonement, repentance, baptism, receiving the Holy Ghost, and enduring to the end (see Preach My Gospel, page 1).

Missionaries also work with Church leaders and members in the areas where they serve to help establish the Church. Missionaries are a valuable resource to local leaders in helping new members and less-active members enjoy the full blessings of membership in the Church.

Preparing Full-Time Missionaries

Preparation for missionary service should begin early. This preparation should be a high priority for parents, Church leaders, and teachers. Bishops and stake presidents have an especially important responsibility to help identify and prepare worthy, qualified members for full-time missionary service.

While leaders may help all eligible members prepare for missionary service, they should give special attention to preparing young men, particularly those who seem uncertain about serving. The Lord expects every able young man to prepare for full-time missionary service.

Church leaders should let young members know what will be expected of them when they serve missions. Leaders should also let parents know what will be expected so they can help their children prepare for service.

Church leaders and parents should ensure that prospective missionaries are prepared spiritually, physically, emotionally, and financially.

Preparation for missionary service should include studying the gospel and building a testimony. It is important that prospective missionaries study the scriptures, especially the Book of Mormon, to learn the doctrines of the gospel.

The bishopric should call youth leaders who love missionary work and who will help youth learn the gospel, have experiences that build faith, and cultivate a desire to serve the Lord. Leaders should teach young men about the joys and blessings of missionary service.

Exemplary returned missionaries should be invited to speak about missionary work in sacrament meetings and other meetings. Leaders should also encourage youth to attend seminary to assist with missionary preparation.

Leaders should provide opportunities for prospective missionaries to serve in the Church. Leaders should also encourage them to work with full-time missionaries and to share the gospel with friends and relatives. Young men should regularly be given opportunities to teach the gospel in their quorum meetings and in other settings.

Prospective missionaries should receive training through home teaching, the Teaching the Gospel course, and missionary preparation classes. The main resources for missionary preparation classes are the scriptures, the Missionary Handbook, and Preach My Gospel.

High priests group meetings, elders quorum meetings, and Relief Society meetings should occasionally be used to teach parents how to help their children prepare to serve as missionaries.

As part of preparing members for missionary service, stake presidents and bishops should ensure that prospective missionaries and their families understand the principles and policies in this section and are committed to following them. The bishop should also review the Missionary Handbook with prospective missionaries as outlined on page 95.

Age and Term of Service for Full-Time Missionaries

Men

All worthy single men ages 19 through 25 who are physically, mentally, and emotionally able should be encouraged to serve full-time missions. Full-time missionary service is a priesthood responsibility of these brethren. They are called to serve for 24 months.

Women

Worthy single women ages 21 and older who are physically, mentally, and emotionally able may be recommended to serve full-time missions.

Single women ages 21 through 39 are usually called to serve for 18 months. These sisters can make a valuable contribution in the mission field, but they should not be pressured to serve. Bishops should not recommend them for missionary service if it will interfere with imminent marriage prospects.

Single women ages 40 and older are usually called to serve for 12 or 18 months. If they receive assignments outside their country of residence, they are called for 18 months. Bishops and stake presidents should take special care to ensure that these sisters are in good enough health to serve effectively as full-time missionaries. Assignments are outlined on page 102.

Couples

Bishops and stake presidents should prayerfully consider which couples in their units could be called to serve as full-time missionaries. Bishops may interview them to determine availability, ask them to prepare for a full-time mission call, and help them complete and submit the recommendation forms.

Couples are usually called to serve for 12, 18, or 24 months. A 6-month term of service will be considered only for those in special situations such as seasonal occupations. Couples serving outside their country of residence are called for at least 18 months. Qualifications and assignments for couples are outlined on pages 101-2.

Members Who Are Not Eligible for Full-Time Missions

The following members are not eligible to serve full-time missions:

1. Those who are not worthy as outlined under "Worthiness" on pages 93-94.
2. Those who would have to leave dependent children in the care of someone else.
3. Young couples who are still in child-bearing years.
4. Those who have been members of the Church for less than one year.
5. Those who are in debt and have not made definite arrangements to meet their obligations.
6. Those who are on legal probation or parole. (If priesthood leaders have questions concerning this restriction, such as for a person who is on probation for a minor offense, they may contact the Missionary Department.)
7. Those couples who have serious unresolved marital problems.
8. Those who are HIV positive.
9. Those who have been convicted of sexual abuse.

In addition, the following members are not normally recommended to serve full-time missions:

1. Brethren ages 19 through 25 and sisters ages 21 through 39 who have been divorced.
2. Sisters who have submitted to an abortion, or brethren or sisters who have performed, encouraged, paid for, or arranged for an abortion. This policy does not apply to persons who were involved in an abortion before they were baptized or for one of the reasons outlined on page 185.
3. Brethren who have fathered or sisters who have given birth to a child out of wedlock, regardless of whether they have any current legal or financial responsibility for the child.
4. Members who are not physically, mentally, or emotionally able to withstand the rigors of full-time missionary service (see "Physical, Mental, and Emotional Challenges" on pages 94-95).

If priesthood leaders believe that unusual circumstances or situations may warrant an exception, and if they can recommend that an exception be made, the stake presidency may submit a request for the First Presidency to consider it. Such a request should be submitted through the Missionary Department and should include specific details of the situation. Bishops and stake presidents should not request exceptions that are unwarranted or that they do not endorse.

When members do not qualify for full-time missionary service, priesthood leaders should give them appropriate Church callings in their stake or ward, or recommend them as Church-service missionaries (see pages 102-3), to help them grow and experience the blessings of service.

Ensuring Worthiness and Ability to Serve

Bishops and stake presidents have the serious responsibility to identify worthy, qualified members who are spiritually, physically, and emotionally prepared for full-time missionary service and whom they can recommend without reservation.

Missionary service demands faith, desire, and consecration. Missionary candidates should have an eagerness and a desire to serve the Lord as His ambassadors. They should be filled with "faith, hope, charity and love" and have "an eye single to the glory of God" (D&C 4:5).

Missionary work is rigorous. It demands strength and vitality, mental sharpness and capacity. Missionary candidates must be physically, mentally, and emotionally capable of doing this work.

Missionary work demands clean hands and a pure heart. Missionary candidates must be morally worthy in every respect. If the life of a missionary candidate needs reforming, that must happen well before the person is recommended for missionary service. Because adequate repentance may take some time, some young men may need to wait until they are older than 19 to serve missions (see "Worthiness" on this page).

The bishop and stake president should not submit a recommendation until they are satisfied that the candidate is physically, mentally, and emotionally able to serve. However, these leaders must be careful not to place excessive requirements on missionary candidates. They should realize that the work of the Lord is done by ordinary people who work in an extraordinary way.

If the bishop and stake president have concerns about whether a person is able or worthy to serve a mission, they should counsel together and discuss the concerns with the individual and his or her parents. This will help avoid the devastating feelings that can result if a recommendation is returned or a missionary is sent home for failure to meet these standards.

Interviews

The bishop and stake president conduct thorough, searching interviews with each missionary candidate. If they have questions about a person's worthiness or ability to serve, the stake president may inquire of the Missionary Department (telephone 1-801-240-2179 or 1-800-453-3860, extension 2-2179) or the Area Presidency.

Only in the most urgent cases when the stake president or bishop is absent may either of them authorize a counselor to conduct a missionary recommendation interview.

Worthiness

Repentance of Serious Transgressions

A prospective missionary who has been guilty of adultery, fornication, heavy petting, homosexual activity, other sexual perversions, drug misuse, serious violation of civil law, or other serious transgressions must repent before he or she may be recommended for missionary service. The member must also be worthy to enter the temple before he or she may be recommended.

The bishop and stake president confirm that the member is free of transgression for a sufficient time to manifest genuine repentance and prepare spiritually for the temple and a sacred mission call. This period could be as long as three years for multiple serious transgressions and should not be less than one year from the most recent serious transgression. Mere confession and refraining from a sin for a period of time do not on their own constitute repentance. There must also be evidence of a broken heart and contrite spirit and of a lasting change of behavior.

Bishops and stake presidents teach prospective missionaries that to qualify for the needed guidance of the Spirit, they must resolve transgressions before entering the mission field. Unless there are unusual circumstances, missionaries who are found to have entered the mission field without resolving serious transgressions with the bishop will be released early and returned home (see "Belated Confessions" on page 94).

Extended Pattern of Serious Transgressions

Individuals who have been promiscuous with several partners or who have been with one partner over an extended period of time in either a heterosexual relationship outside of marriage or a homosexual relationship will not be considered for full-time missionary service. Stake presidents and bishops should help these individuals repent and should help provide other meaningful ways to serve the Lord.

In cases where priesthood leaders believe that unusual circumstances or situations may warrant an exception, the stake presidency may submit a request for the First Presidency to consider an exception. Such a request should be submitted through the Missionary Department and should include specific details of the situation and a letter from the candidate explaining the nature of his or her repentance. Bishops and stake presidents should not request exceptions that are unwarranted or that they do not endorse.

Homosexual Activity

A candidate who has participated in homosexual activity during or after the last three teenage years will not normally be considered for missionary service. In rare cases the stake president may submit a request that the First Presidency consider an exception if there is strong evidence of complete repentance and reformation and if the candidate has been free of transgression for a sufficient period of time. This period of repentance should be at least one year and may be as long as three years if the acts occurred several times or over an extended time or if the person was the aggressor. Such a request should be submitted through the Missionary Department for the consideration of the First Presidency.

A professional evaluation (normally arranged through LDS Family Services) and an HIV test will be required whenever a candidate has been involved in homosexual activity.

If a person was victimized or participated in early-age same-sex experimentation and has no current indication of homosexual tendencies, he or she may be considered for full-time missionary service. Submission of the missionary recommendation forms does not require any further clearance beyond that of the stake president.

Belated Confessions

Bishops and stake presidents should explain to missionary candidates that if a full-time missionary confesses a serious transgression that he or she committed before entering the mission field, the missionary will be released early and returned home.

Physical, Mental, and Emotional Challenges

Missionary work is demanding. Members who have physical, mental, or emotional challenges that would prevent them from serving effectively are not called to full-time missionary service. Experience indicates that those who, for example, suffer from serious emotional instability, are severely impaired visually, require a wheelchair or crutches, or are dependent on others to perform normal daily tasks should not be recommended for full-time missionary service.

Candidates for missionary service who have previously had significant emotional challenges must be stabilized and confirmed to be fully functional before being recommended. A candidate who is dependent on medication for emotional stability must have demonstrated that with the medication he or she can fully function in the demanding environment of a mission before being recommended. The candidate must also make a commitment to continue taking the medications unless otherwise authorized by a professional health care provider. A list of medications that are being taken should be included in the missionary recommendation forms.

Young missionaries who are significantly overweight experience difficulties dealing with the rigorous physical demands of a full-time mission. These difficulties also affect their companions. Stake presidents and bishops should be sensitive and wise in considering whether individuals should be recommended for full-time missions when their weight will adversely affect their service. If prospective missionaries are significantly overweight, local leaders should counsel with them about reducing their weight before the missionary recommendation forms are submitted. For weight guidelines, the bishop or stake president may contact the Missionary Department or the administration office.

If the bishop and stake president are unsure about recommending a member who has any of these challenges, they may consult with the Missionary Department (telephone 1-801-240-2179 or 1-800-453-3860, extension 2-2179). Bishops and stake presidents should not request exceptions that are unwarranted or that they do not endorse.

If a member who has serious challenges strongly desires to serve a full-time mission but does not qualify, the bishop and stake president express love and gratitude for the member's willingness to serve. They also explain that because of the circumstances, the member is honorably excused from full-time missionary service for his or her own benefit and to avoid placing undue demands on mission leaders and companions.

These members should be encouraged to pursue such important endeavors as education, career development, temple preparation, and temple marriage. For those who have a strong desire to provide additional service, the bishop may counsel with the stake president to identify local opportunities for Church or community service. See pages 102–3 for information about Church-service missionaries.

Medical Limitations

A prospective missionary who has a serious medical limitation, including limitations due to injury or illness, can be considered only with the recommendation and advice of a competent medical authority. Before submitting the recommendation forms, the stake president should consult with the Missionary Department (telephone 1-801-240-2179 or 1-800-453-3860, extension 2-2179).

Review by the Area Medical Adviser

Outside the United States and Canada, missionary recommendation forms are submitted through the Area Presidency. Under their direction, the area medical adviser reviews all recommendation forms and identifies any unresolved medical and dental conditions or immunization issues that could affect the candidate's ability to serve or the nature of the assignment.

If the area medical adviser feels that treatment is needed before a person is able to serve, he reviews the situation with the Area Presidency. They may return the missionary recommendation forms to the stake president, who ensures that the necessary treatment is arranged for. When the medical condition is resolved, the stake president may resubmit the forms.

Review of the Missionary Handbook

As part of ensuring that a missionary candidate is worthy and able to serve, the bishop should review the Missionary Handbook with him or her. The bishop should ensure that the candidate understands and is committed to abiding by the guidelines in that handbook, including those about conduct, language, dress and grooming, music and other media, computers, finances, staying together as companions, avoiding inappropriate contact with children and members of the opposite sex, obeying local laws and customs, and communicating with family members.

Financing Full-Time Missionary Service

The primary responsibility to provide financial support for a missionary is with the individual and the family. Generally, missionaries should not rely entirely on others outside of their family for financial support.

Missionaries and their families should make appropriate sacrifices to provide financial support for a mission. It is better for a person to delay a mission for a time and earn money toward his or her support than to rely entirely on others. However, worthy missionary candidates should not be prevented from serving missions solely for financial reasons when they and their families have sacrificed according to their capability.

The Ward Missionary Fund

The ward missionary fund is used solely for supporting full-time missionaries as outlined in this section. Ward missionary funds should not be sent directly to single full-time proselyting missionaries. Nor should ward missionary funds be used to fund any missionary activities in the ward or stake.

Stake presidents and bishops should inform missionaries and others who contribute to the ward missionary fund that these contributions, including those that are prepaid, cannot be refunded.

Church leaders and members should not ask those outside the boundaries of their own Church units to contribute missionary financial support, except for family members.

Financing Single Full-Time Proselyting Missionaries

Equalized Contribution

The Church has equalized the contribution required for the service-related expenses of missionaries whose home wards are in designated countries. The equalized contribution applies regardless of where these missionaries are called to serve.

The equalized contribution applies only to the following full-time proselyting missionaries:

1. Single men ages 19 through 25
2. Single women ages 21 through 39
3. Single women ages 40 and older who are serving in proselyting assignments or in mission offices

The equalized contribution does not apply to full-time missionary couples, nonproselyting missionaries, or Church-service missionaries.

The amount of the equalized contribution is identified in instructions from Church headquarters. For each single full-time proselyting missionary from his ward, the bishop ensures that the monthly contribution is available in the ward missionary fund. These contributions are made by missionaries or by their parents, other family members, and friends. If necessary, the stake president or bishop may ask members within the stake or ward boundaries to help support these missionaries by contributing to the ward missionary fund. Budget and fast-offering funds may not be used for missionary support.

Each month Church headquarters or the administration office withdraws the equalized contribution from the ward missionary fund.

Personal Funds

The service-related expenses of the missionaries who are listed under the previous heading are covered through equalized contributions, but additional expenses are paid with personal funds. These expenses include clothing purchases and repairs, bicycle purchases and repairs, medical costs not paid by the mission, and approved telephone calls home. Other personal expenses, which should be kept to a minimum, might include photo processing, souvenirs, gifts, fines, and damage to apartments or vehicles caused by missionaries' misconduct or negligence.

Assistance from the General Missionary Fund

Assistance from the General Missionary Fund may be requested to provide supplemental financial support for missionaries who are unable to provide the full support amount for their mission. For a missionary to qualify for such assistance, all of the following criteria must be met:

1. The missionary's home ward is not in a country designated by the Church to participate in the equalized contribution program.
2. The missionary is a single proselyting elder ages 19 through 25 or a single proselyting sister ages 21 through 39. This assistance is not available for couples or for sisters ages 40 and older.
3. The missionary, parents, other family members, and ward and stake members are contributing according to guidelines established by the Area Presidency. (Using these guidelines, stake presidents and bishops work with missionary candidates and their families to establish a specific financial support commitment, based on appropriate sacrifice by the missionary and the family.)
4. The missionary has his or her own scriptures and missionary clothing, including garments, and has resolved any medical and dental needs.

To request assistance for a missionary who meets these criteria, the bishop completes a Request for Supplemental Financial Assistance for Full-time Missionary form and submits it with the missionary's recommendation forms.

Financing Missionary Couples, Nonproselyting Missionaries, and Church-Service Missionaries

Expenses of the following missionaries are not financed through equalized contributions. These missionaries are responsible to pay their own expenses directly from their own resources:

1. Full-time missionary couples
2. Sisters ages 40 and older who are not in proselyting or mission office assignments
3. Church-service missionaries

These missionaries may not contribute to the ward missionary fund for their own use.

Although these missionaries may not contribute to the ward missionary fund for their own use, full-time missionary couples and sisters ages 40 and older who are not in proselyting assignments may receive financial assistance from the fund when all of the following criteria are met:

1. The missionary's home ward is in a country designated by the Church to participate in the equalized contribution program.
2. The missionary and his or her family do not have adequate means to provide support.
3. Funds are available in the ward missionary fund.

Medical Insurance

All missionaries are strongly encouraged to maintain any existing medical insurance during their missions. This conserves Church funds and helps missionaries avoid having to prove insurability after their missions.

Submitting Recommendation Forms for Full-Time Missionaries

The bishop and stake president ensure that all missionary recommendation forms are prepared completely and accurately. The bishop or stake president sends these forms to the Missionary Department 60 to 90 days before the missionary candidate is available to begin a mission. Recommendation forms for couples may be submitted up to six months before their availability date. Instructions are provided on the recommendation forms.

When recommending couples for full-time missions, leaders may confidentially recommend specific types of assignments for consideration. However, they should not make commitments about the assignment a member will receive. Missionary candidates should be willing to accept any assignment.

Missionaries are called from their home wards. However, the bishop of an away-from-home ward, such as a student ward, may process a missionary recommendation for the home ward. To do so, he must (1) obtain permission from the bishop of the home ward, (2) ask him about the candidate's worthiness, in preparation for conducting a worthiness interview, and (3) ask him for a letter endorsing the recommendation. The name of the home ward and stake, the names of the bishop and stake president of these units, and the unit number of the home ward should be included on the recommendation.

The procedure outlined above helps ensure that all issues pertaining to worthiness, physical and emotional health, financial support, and point of departure have been resolved before a recommendation is submitted to the Missionary Department. The president of the away-from-home stake ensures that this procedure is followed and that the letter from the home-ward bishop is submitted with the recommendation.

If the bishop of the home ward processes a recommendation for a missionary who has not lived in the ward continuously for at least one year, he should confer with the bishop of the other ward before proceeding.

Neither the stake president, the bishop, the missionary candidate, nor the family should make any announcement about a mission call before the call is received.

After Full-Time Missionaries Are Called

The bishop continues to monitor the missionary's progress after the mission call is received to ensure that he or she remains worthy of the sacred calling. Bishops and stake presidents must instruct missionary candidates plainly regarding the seriousness and the consequences of immorality after a missionary has received a call.

The bishop ensures that newly called missionaries continue to prepare to serve. He also ensures that they comply promptly with all instructions they receive from Church headquarters, such as securing passports, applying for visas, and acquiring appropriate clothing for the mission assignment. Newly called missionaries should also read or reread the Book of Mormon before beginning their missions.

Sacrament Meetings, Open Houses, and Publicity

The bishopric may invite newly called full-time missionaries to speak in sacrament meeting before they depart. However, the bishopric should make it clear that the meeting is a regular sacrament meeting and is not devoted to a missionary farewell. Family members and friends are not invited to speak. Other departing missionaries or other members may be invited to speak in the same sacrament meeting. The bishopric should ensure that each missionary has sufficient time to deliver a spiritual message.

The bishopric plans and conducts these meetings. As in all sacrament meetings, talks and music should be worshipful, faith promoting, and gospel oriented. The regular time of the sacrament meeting should not be extended.

Although it is valuable to have missionaries speak in sacrament meeting, such programs should not dominate the sacrament meeting schedule to the exclusion of other valuable subjects and speakers.

Members should avoid practices that may detract from the sacred nature of a mission call or create unnecessary expense. Such practices include holding open houses for missionaries (except for family gatherings), sending formal printed announcements or invitations, printing special sacrament meeting programs, and forming reception lines at the meeting-house after sacrament meeting.

Bishops review these guidelines with newly called missionaries and their families well before the departure date.

Personal Temple Endowment

Where possible, unendowed missionaries should receive their own temple endowment after they receive their mission call.

Setting Apart Missionaries

The stake president sets apart all full-time missionaries before they depart for a missionary training center (MTC) or directly to the field. Only in the most urgent cases when he is absent may the stake president assign one of his counselors to set apart a full-time missionary.

The mission president sets apart full-time missionaries who are called from districts in his mission. However, if it is not feasible for him to do so, he may assign one of his counselors to set apart a missionary. The district president does not set apart full-time missionaries.

A young man should have the Melchizedek Priesthood conferred upon him and be ordained an elder before he is set apart as a missionary. If he needs to be set apart before his ordination can be sustained in a stake conference or stake general priesthood meeting, he is presented for a sustaining vote in his ward sacrament meeting. His name is then presented in the next general stake meeting to ratify the ordination.

The missionary is set apart as near as possible to his or her departure date. Even if the missionary will be traveling for some time between departure from home and arrival at the MTC or in the field, the stake president should not expect MTC leaders or other priesthood leaders to set apart the missionary.

A day or two before the missionary is set apart, the stake president conducts an interview to determine whether he or she is still worthy. This interview is also a good time to review the missionary's current medical status. If the missionary is not worthy or if there are serious unresolved medical problems, he or she is not set apart. The stake president notifies the Missionary Department (telephone 1-801-240-2179 or 1-800-453-3860, extension 2-2179).

The setting apart should be a special occasion. The missionary's family and close friends may attend. The stake president speaks briefly to help them feel the sacredness and importance of the missionary's call.

The stake president follows the usual procedure for setting apart (see page 47). First he sets the person apart as a missionary of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints assigned to labor in the mission to which he or she has been assigned. Then he adds a priesthood blessing as the Spirit directs. He may invite worthy Melchizedek Priesthood holders, such as the missionary's father, to stand in the circle.

When a missionary is set apart, the blessing should not be recorded. However, the missionary is encouraged to record in a personal journal the date of the setting apart, the name of the stake president who officiated, and the words of blessing and counsel that were especially meaningful.

The stake president advises the missionary that after being set apart, he or she is a missionary and should live by missionary standards.

Transportation

The Church pays the expenses of full-time missionaries to travel to and from the field. For those who attend an MTC, the Church pays for their travel to the MTC and to the field. Travel arrangements are sent soon after the mission call.

When serving in their country of residence, couples and single women ages 40 and older may take their own vehicles with them. They are responsible for maintaining their vehicles, including insurance, repairs, and fuel. These missionaries will be given a travel allowance for the expense of driving their own vehicles to or from the field.

Missionary Departures

Immediate family members may go to the MTC with the missionary, but they are not expected to do so. Families who must travel long distances are discouraged from going to the MTC. Extended family, friends, and ward members should not go to the MTC.

Families are discouraged from going to airports for missionary departures when missionaries leave the MTC.

Transporting Items to a Mission

Missionaries should not transport personal belongings of others to the mission field. Occasionally members ask missionaries to take items such as medications or special eyeglasses to the mission field if they are not available there. If such requests are made, the bishop or stake president should direct them to the Missionary Department.

Full-Time Missionaries in the Mission Field

Meals and Housing

The stake president and mission president determine whether and to what extent Church members should provide meals and housing for missionaries.

Placement of Missionaries

The mission president determines the placement of missionaries within the mission. However, stake presidents, in consultation with bishops, should recommend the number and location of full-time missionaries to be assigned within the stake. The mission president then assigns missionaries according to available resources.

Full-Time Missionaries Working with Less-Active Members

Full-Time Missionaries in Branch Leadership Positions

With the approval of the mission president, missionary couples may on occasion serve in branch leadership positions. However, it is generally preferable for them to serve in a training capacity to help the local members fulfill these responsibilities.

In rare cases, younger full-time missionaries may serve in branch leadership positions. However, such assignments require the approval of the mission president and should be made only after thoughtful and prayerful consideration of all other options. If couples or younger missionaries are given such assignments, they should serve only until a suitable member can be called.

When full-time missionaries are assigned to leadership positions in branches, including branch president, they are not set apart. The authority to act in any position in the mission is inherent in their setting apart as a full-time missionary. If they perform a function that requires priesthood keys, such as conducting a baptismal interview or presiding over a branch, they do so by assignment and the delegation of authority.

Requests to Support Members Financially

Full-time missionaries and their families must not be asked to provide financial support for members who live in the area where the missionaries are serving.

Fasting

Missionaries should not ask friends, relatives, or members of their home wards to join them in special fasts for investigators.

Missionaries' Communication with Their Families

Telephone Calls

Under the direction of the mission president, missionaries may telephone their parents at Christmas and on one other occasion during the year, usually Mother's Day or another significant holiday. Mission presidents, stake presidents, and bishops should encourage missionaries and parents to keep these calls brief, preferably no longer than 30 or 40 minutes.

E-Mail

As an alternative to regular mail, missionaries may use e-mail to communicate with their families on preparation day, according to guidelines that have been approved in the mission.

Medical Disability

If a missionary in the field (including a missionary training center) suffers a physical or emotional disability that prevents effective missionary service, he or she is returned home for treatment. A representative of the Missionary Department will explain to the stake president whether the missionary has been released or placed on medical leave and what steps should be taken.

Death of a Family Member

If a member of a missionary's immediate family dies, the Church encourages the missionary to remain in the field. However, if the family insists that the missionary return home, the missionary may be allowed to return at the family's expense. The stake president may request such an exception through the Missionary Department.

Membership Records, Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, and Contributions

Missionaries Who Serve under the Direction of a Mission President

The home ward keeps the membership records, accepts any tithing contributions, and records the tithing status of full-time missionaries who serve under the direction of a mission president. Missionaries pay fast offerings through the ward in which they are serving.

Missionaries Who Serve under the Direction of a Temple President or Area President

Full-time missionaries who serve under the direction of a temple president or an Area President receive any needed ecclesiastical support, including temple recommends and counseling, from the temple president or Area President.

Missionaries at Church Headquarters Who Do Not Serve under the Direction of a Mission President

Membership records of full-time missionaries at Church headquarters who do not serve under the direction of a mission president should be in the ward where they live during their service. Normally they pay their tithing and other offerings through that ward. However, if they have moved from their home ward to serve at Church headquarters, they may pay tithing through their home ward if necessary. The bishop of the ward in which they live during their service interviews them for temple recommend renewals and provides any other needed ecclesiastical support.

Mission Presidents

See page 146.

Release of Full-Time Missionaries

Missionaries should complete the full term of service for which they are called. Under normal circumstances, neither they nor their parents should request early releases or extensions of service.

Missionaries should travel directly home from their missions. Any other travel is permitted only when the missionary is accompanied by at least one parent or guardian.

The Church discourages parents from picking up missionaries. However, if parents request this privilege, they should understand that:

1. Their plans must be based on the release date established by the mission president.
2. They should not request a change in the release date to accommodate other travel plans or commitments.
3. They should inform the mission president or the Church Travel Office at least three months in advance if they plan to travel with their missionary.
4. They are expected to make their own travel arrangements, including lodging and meals.

Missionaries must dress and conduct themselves according to missionary standards during travel from their missions because they are not released until they report to their stake presidents. They should not impose on members, missionaries, or other missions as they travel home.

Temple Recommends

All qualified, endowed missionaries should have a valid temple recommend when they are released. If a returning missionary's recommend is about to expire, the mission president conducts a temple recommend interview as part of the final interview and issues the recommend. Such recommends require only the interview of the mission president and the signatures of the president and the missionary.

If a missionary who is sent home early because of a belated confession or a disciplinary action holds a temple recommend, the mission president asks for the recommend. The bishop and stake president may issue a new temple recommend when the person is worthy.

Arrivals at Airports

Only immediate family members should go to the airport to pick up missionaries returning at the completion of their missions.

Interviews, Reports, and Callings

The stake president releases returning missionaries from missionary service and gives them the release certificate he has received from the mission president. He commends them for their service and invites them to report on their mission. He also inquires about their conduct while traveling home.

When the stake president releases missionaries, he also interviews them. This interview is an important opportunity to help missionaries build on their mission experiences and commit to continue on a lifelong path of spiritual growth and service. The stake president should devote enough time to these interviews to:

1. Discern missionaries' strengths and needs, then help them set goals and make plans that will build on the good habits they have developed and will have power in their daily lives.
2. Review the importance of doing what is necessary to continue feeling the Spirit daily.
3. Encourage missionaries to choose and prepare for their life's work.
4. Ask missionaries to commit to be full-tithe payers, be active in the Church, and serve faithfully in Church callings and assignments throughout their lives.
5. Encourage them to maintain high standards of conduct, including dress and grooming.

The stake president also encourages young returning missionaries to live worthy of and prepare for marriage in the temple. However, he should not suggest or imply that they should be married within a specified time.

Missionaries also report to the stake priesthood executive committee (stake presidency and high council). Soon after this report, the bishopric of the home ward schedules missionaries to speak in a sacrament meeting. They should be given sufficient time to share spiritual experiences and bear testimony. Their talks should build faith and encourage youth to serve missions. The stake presidency may also assign them to speak in other sacrament meetings as companions to high councilors.

The stake president counsels returning missionaries to teach the gospel in talks they give. As they speak in sacrament meetings, they should share experiences that strengthen faith in Jesus Christ, build testimonies, encourage members to live and share the gospel, and illustrate gospel principles. They should avoid travelogues, inappropriate stories about their companions or others, disparaging remarks about the areas in which they served, and other matters that would be inappropriate for a servant of the Lord to discuss in the sacred setting of a sacrament meeting.

Priesthood leaders should promptly call recently returned missionaries to Church positions. Elders quorum and Relief Society leaders should also assign every returned missionary as a home teacher or visiting teacher.

Tuberculosis Testing

Where testing is available, all returning missionaries should be tested for tuberculosis. A copy of the form for reporting the results of this test is sent, with the release certificate, by the mission president to the stake president. The missionary and the stake president should follow the instructions on the form.

Full-Time Missionary Assignments for Senior Couples and Sisters

This section applies to the following missionaries who serve full-time (at least 32 hours per week) away from home or at home:

1. Couples
2. Single women ages 40 and older

Identifying Prospective Senior Missionaries

Bishops and stake presidents prayerfully identify senior couples and sisters in their units who might be recommended for full-time missionary service. The bishop meets with these members and encourages them to serve missions. He helps them complete the missionary recommendation forms as outlined on pages 96–97.

Couples who are recommended for full-time missionary service must no longer be engaged in full-time employment. If the couple will be serving away from home, they must not have any dependent children living at home. Bishops and stake presidents should take special care to ensure that couples are in good enough health to serve effectively as full-time missionaries.

Information on missionary opportunities for full-time senior missionaries can be found on the Internet at LDS.org. Stake presidents and bishops can use this information to identify opportunities for members they are encouraging to serve. The bishop may confidentially recommend specific assignments for these members. However, he should not make commitments about the assignments a member will receive. Missionary candidates should be willing to accept any assignment.

General Authorities, mission presidents, temple presidents, and Church department heads may also identify senior couples and sisters who might be recommended for full-time missionary service. The names of these members should be submitted to the Missionary Department. Representatives of the Missionary Department will then contact the stake president. He confers with the bishop to consider each prospective missionary's health, the ability and willingness to serve, and other circumstances. The bishop then meets with the members and encourages them to complete their missionary recommendation forms. If the recommendation is approved, the President of the Church issues a letter of call.

Where there are large concentrations of members, a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency coordinates with stake presidents to identify senior couples and sisters who could fill local full-time missionary needs in mission offices, visitors' centers, employment centers, family history centers, temples, and Church Educational System offices. Senior missionaries for these assignments could include those who are not able to leave their homes but desire to serve at least 32 hours per week. These missionaries may receive live-at-home mission calls from the President of the Church. Recommendations for such missionaries are submitted in the normal manner.

Those who can serve fewer than 32 hours per week may still be given local assignments and are called by their stake president as specified under "Church-Service Missionaries" on pages 102–3.

Bishops, stake presidents, and others who are encouraging senior couples and sisters to serve missions should understand that these members may have some anxiety because of false preconceptions about what will be expected of them. Leaders can reassure prospective senior missionaries that they will not be asked to meet the same standards in work hours or other activities that are expected of younger missionaries. Senior missionaries will be allowed some flexibility in setting their own goals and schedules based on personal needs, the requirements of their assignments, and guidance from the person who presides over them.

Health Insurance for Senior Missionaries

Full-time missionary couples and sisters ages 40 and older are responsible for their own health care expenses and must have adequate health insurance for their mission assignments. If the insurance coverage of those living away from home is not adequate for their assignment, Deseret Mutual Benefits Administrators (DMBA) will send them information on additional insurance they may purchase. Missionaries who need additional coverage but do not enroll in the DMBA plan must provide proof of adequate coverage before their service begins.

Assignments for Senior Missionaries

To the extent possible, all full-time missionaries should participate in sharing the gospel. Senior missionaries may also be asked to help train leaders, fellowship new members, and work with less-active members. In addition to these basic assignments, full-time missionary couples and sisters ages 40 and older may receive in their call letter one or more of the following assignments. Some sisters under age 40 may also receive these assignments:

1. Leadership
2. Church Educational System
3. Family history
4. Humanitarian services
5. Mission offices
6. Area administration offices
7. Facilities management
8. Farm management
9. Public affairs
10. Temples
11. Visitors' centers and historic sites
12. Welfare services
13. Perpetual Education Fund

In response to local needs, these special assignments may be changed in consultation with the headquarters departments that supervise the original assignment.

For information about senior missionaries serving as officers in local units, see page 99.

Releases of Senior Missionaries

Release letters and certificates for senior missionaries are prepared under the direction of the person who oversees their assignment. As with all full-time missionaries, these missionaries are released by their stake president.

Church-Service Missionaries

Church-service missionaries are part-time missionaries. They serve at least 8 hours a week but fewer than 32 hours and live at home. They are called by their stake president as outlined in the following paragraphs. These callings are normally for 6 to 24 months. The use of Church-service missionaries is not intended to diminish emphasis on full-time missionary service.

Church-service missionaries work for Church departments at Church headquarters or at other locations throughout the world. Except for those serving in mission offices, Church-service missionaries do not usually serve under the direction of a full-time mission president.

Identifying Church-Service Missionary Opportunities

Church-service missions may be used as an alternative when worthy members are not able to serve full-time missions because of physical, mental, or emotional challenges (see pages 94–95). For those who have a strong desire to provide additional service, the bishop may counsel with the stake president to identify local Church-service missionary opportunities. Examples of possible assignments are listed below:

Church Educational System: receptionist, office work, or computer support at seminaries and institutes

Welfare: bishops' storehouses, canneries, Deseret Industries, and employment centers (additional opportunities in the Salt Lake City area: Deseret Manufacturing, Humanitarian Center, Welfare Square)

Farm management: Church-owned farms and ranches

Building maintenance for meetinghouses

Special projects: locally available resources

Church Office Building (Utah only): clerical, receptionist, family history center, data entry, mail room, print shop, distribution center, member locator, maintenance, computer support

Stake presidents, bishops, and members are encouraged to use the following resources to identify and obtain information about Church-service missionary opportunities:

In the United States and Canada:

Internet: www.lds.org/csm

Telephone: 1-801-240-4914

Outside the United States and Canada:

Internet: www.lds.org/csm

Telephone or write the administration office

As with full-time missionaries, the bishop and stake president ensure that each prospective Church-service missionary is worthy to hold a temple recommend. They also ensure that he or she is physically and emotionally able to perform the duties of the calling. Prospective missionaries should be able to support themselves financially, including all medical expenses.

Recommending Church-Service Missionaries

The bishop interviews members who may be interested in serving as Church-service missionaries. He and the member should identify a suitable Church-service opportunity on the Internet at LDS.org. Next, they contact a representative of the department or other entity that posted the position to determine whether it is still available and if the member is able to fulfill the requirements. This contact information is posted on the Web site with the position.

If the Church-service opportunity is still available and the member is eligible, the bishop and the member complete a Recommendation for Part-Time Church-Service Missionary form. The bishop notes the recommended service opportunity, signs the form, and forwards it to the stake president. The stake president then interviews the member for worthiness, signs the form if he approves, and sends it to the director of Church-service missionaries at Church headquarters or to the local coordinator for Church-service missionaries in his area.

Calling Church-Service Missionaries

Church-service missionaries are called by their stake president and set apart by their bishop. After the recommendation form has been processed at Church headquarters or with the local coordinator, the stake president is notified so he can extend the calling. The stake president advises the bishop of the calling and asks him to set the missionary apart.

After the calling is issued, the missionary contacts the Church department representative to work out pertinent details.

Bishops and stake presidents should give appropriate recognition to members who are called as Church-service missionaries. This includes communicating their callings to members of the ward or stake. It also could include inviting them to report on their service in appropriate meetings.

Transportation

Church-service missionaries provide their own transportation.

Training and Supervision

Church-service missionaries are supervised by and trained under the direction of the department in which they serve. Normally they are not trained at a missionary training center.

Medical Expenses

All Church-service missionaries are entirely responsible for their own medical needs, including dental and eye expenses and prescription drugs.

Extensions

Near the end of the assigned period, the term of service may be extended if the missionary wants to extend and the service is still needed. The extension may be for varying increments, not to exceed 30 months in total service. The department coordinator reviews the extension request with the stake president. If the stake president approves the request, he advises the missionary and notifies the missionary's bishop.

Release of Church-Service Missionaries

Toward the end of a Church-service mission, the department coordinator informs the stake president when the mission will end. At the conclusion of the mission, the stake president releases the missionary and advises the bishop.

At least six months should pass before those who are released receive another Church-service mission call. Exceptions must be approved by the stake president.

Church-Service Missionaries in Stake and Ward Callings

Church-service missionaries are encouraged to serve in stake or ward callings at the discretion of local leaders as long as these callings do not interfere with the Church-service missionary assignment.

Callings That Are Not Processed as Church-Service Missions

Callings to assist with activation efforts or to help strengthen members in wards should be made by local leaders. These callings should not be processed as Church-service mission calls. This guideline applies even if members will serve outside their home wards.

Volunteer Service

Many opportunities for Church service are available for members, including those who do not hold a current temple recommend, and for nonmembers. These individuals are volunteers rather than missionaries. They may serve in areas such as family history centers, family record extraction, welfare production projects or canneries, and Scouting if qualified for Scout registration.

10. Church Discipline

For units in the United States and Canada, the term administration office in this section refers to Church headquarters in Salt Lake City.

For units outside the United States and Canada, the term administration office refers to the Presiding Bishopric administration office or service center that serves the unit.

In this section, references to transgressors are in the masculine gender but also include the feminine.

Purposes of Church Discipline

The purposes of Church discipline are (1) to save the souls of transgressors, (2) to protect the innocent, and (3) to safeguard the purity, integrity, and good name of the Church. These purposes are accomplished through private counsel and caution, informal probation, formal probation, disfellowshipment, and excommunication (see pages 108–10).

Save the Souls of Transgressors

The first purpose of Church discipline is to save the souls of transgressors by helping them repent (see D&C 1:31–32; 19:13–20; 42:37; 64:12–13). When people do not repent, they are exposed to the demands of eternal justice (see Alma 34:16). When they exercise faith unto repentance, God forgives them, granting mercy through the Atonement of Jesus Christ (see Alma 42:23; D&C 58:42). Through this process they may once again become clean and worthy to inherit the kingdom of God (see 3 Nephi 27:19; Moses 6:57).

Church discipline can facilitate repentance by helping transgressors recognize and forsake sin, seek forgiveness, make restitution, and demonstrate a renewed commitment to keep the commandments. Informal Church discipline often is adequate for this purpose (see pages 108–9). However, in some instances the only way to encourage true repentance is to convene a disciplinary council (formerly called a Church court) and consider formal discipline (see pages 109–10). Without formal discipline, some transgressors may never experience the change of behavior and change of heart necessary to qualify them for redemption through the Atonement, for “none but the truly penitent are saved” (Alma 42:24).

Protect the Innocent

The second purpose of Church discipline is to protect the innocent. With inspiration, a priesthood leader should act to protect Church members when a transgressor poses a physical or spiritual threat to them, such as by physical harm, sexual abuse, drug misuse, fraud, or apostasy (see Alma 5:59–60).

Safeguard the Integrity of the Church

The third purpose of Church discipline is to safeguard the purity, integrity, and good name of the Church. Consequently, transgressions that significantly impair the good name or moral influence of the Church may require the action of a disciplinary council.

Responsibility for Church Discipline

God does not overlook sin, and His servants cannot ignore evidence of serious transgressions (see Mosiah 26:29; D&C 1:31). Stake presidents, bishops, mission presidents, district presidents, and branch presidents are called and set apart to be judges in Israel (see D&C 107:72–74). They are to “judge . . . by the testimony of the just . . . according to the laws of the kingdom which are given by the prophets of God” (D&C 58:18).

Church leaders are to help members avoid transgression. If a member commits a serious transgression, leaders administer Church discipline in a spirit of love so it can bless the life of the transgressor. To do this, leaders must be guided and inspired by the Lord.

Church discipline is administered in the ward or stake that has the transgressor's membership record (see “Jurisdiction in Special Circumstances” on page 106 for exceptions). Church leaders' responsibilities for initiating and administering Church discipline are outlined in the following paragraphs.

Stake President

The stake president has authority over the Church discipline of all members in a stake. However, bishops normally administer Church discipline unless evidence indicates that a person who holds the Melchizedek Priesthood is likely to be excommunicated. In that case, the stake president convenes a stake disciplinary council. When a stake president convenes a disciplinary council, the participation of the stake presidency and high council is required as outlined in “Stake Disciplinary Councils” on page 112.

High Council

The high council participates whenever a stake president convenes a disciplinary council (see pages 112, 114, and 120).

Bishop

The bishop administers most Church discipline. He has authority for the discipline of all members in his ward, except the excommunication of a member who holds the Melchizedek Priesthood.

The bishop must confer with the stake president and obtain his approval before convening a disciplinary council. If evidence indicates that a Melchizedek Priesthood holder is likely to be excommunicated, the bishop immediately transfers the matter to the stake president.

When a bishop convenes a disciplinary council, it must include all three members of the bishopric (see page 112).

Branch President in a Stake

A branch president in a stake may administer Church discipline as authorized by the stake president. He may receive general authorization to administer informal Church discipline. He must receive authorization in each case to convene a disciplinary council and administer formal discipline.

If evidence indicates that a Melchizedek Priesthood holder is likely to be excommunicated, the branch president immediately transfers the matter to the stake president. If a branch disciplinary council recommends excommunication of a member who does not hold the Melchizedek Priesthood, the stake president's approval is required before the decision is final.

When a branch president in a stake convenes a disciplinary council, it must include all three members of the branch presidency (see page 112).

Mission President

The mission president administers or oversees Church discipline of members in mission branches and districts. If time or distance prevents him from personally convening a disciplinary council for one of these members, he may authorize three Melchizedek Priesthood holders to convene it as outlined on page 112. If this disciplinary council recommends excommunication, the mission president's approval is required before the decision is final.

The mission president also administers Church discipline for full-time missionaries who commit serious transgressions in the mission field. Before convening a disciplinary council for a full-time missionary, the mission president reviews the matter with a General Authority in the Missionary Department (in the United States and Canada) or with the Area Presidency (outside the United States and Canada). The mission president may not convene the disciplinary council until he receives authorization from a General Authority in the Missionary Department.

District President and Branch President in a Mission

A district president or branch president in a mission may administer Church discipline as authorized by the mission president. He may receive general authorization to administer informal Church discipline. He must receive authorization in each case to convene a disciplinary council and administer formal discipline.

Jurisdiction in Special Circumstances

If a member who needs Church discipline moves to another ward before action is taken, the bishops of both wards consult to determine where the disciplinary action should be taken. They consider such matters as the accessibility of key witnesses and the need for continuing efforts to encourage repentance and restoration to full fellowship. If the bishops determine that the bishop of the former ward should take the disciplinary action, he retains the membership record until the action is taken. Otherwise he transfers the membership record and confidentially informs the bishop of the current ward of the circumstances that warrant Church discipline.

If a member is living away from home temporarily (attending school or serving in the military, for example), his bishop at the place of temporary residence may counsel him or place him on informal probation. However, this bishop should consult the bishop of the home ward before initiating formal disciplinary action.

If a full-time missionary commits a serious transgression that is not revealed until after he has been released, the bishop of his current ward confers with the stake president and mission president. If evidence indicates that a member who holds the Melchizedek Priesthood is likely to be excommunicated, the stake president convenes a disciplinary council. Otherwise he may authorize the bishop to convene a disciplinary council.

Confession

Repentance requires that all sins be confessed to the Lord. "By this ye may know if a man repenteth of his sins—behold, he will confess them and forsake them" (D&C 58:43). Members should also confess to their presiding officer if they have committed serious transgressions. Members who voluntarily and completely confess transgressions demonstrate that they have begun the process of repentance.

Presiding officers should respond to confessions with love and understanding. If a sin that is confessed may be serious enough to require formal Church discipline, the presiding officer explains this to the member.

Presiding officers should encourage members to seek the Lord's forgiveness, forsake the transgression, and make restitution.

Restitution

As part of the restitution required for repentance, transgressors should do all they can to restore what their transgression has taken from others. They should also seek forgiveness from the people they have wronged. The repentance of a married person who is involved in a sexual transgression usually should include confessing to and seeking forgiveness from his spouse. A young unmarried person who commits a sexual transgression should be encouraged to inform his parents.

Repentance may include disclosure to government authorities. If confidential information indicates that a member has violated applicable law, the bishop or stake president should urge him to report the matter to appropriate government authorities. However, the member should be counseled to seek competent legal advice before reporting. To obtain guidance on local laws that govern reporting abuse, see the instructions on page 186.

Disclosure of the identity of others who participated in a transgression should be encouraged as part of the repentance process, especially when this can help Church leaders encourage those participants to repent.

Disclosure of the identity of others who participated in a transgression may be required when it is necessary to restore or protect persons who have been or may be seriously injured as a result of the transgression. For example, a sexual transgressor who has been exposed or who has exposed others to a sexually transmitted disease must make the disclosures necessary to protect others. Predators may need to be identified to protect potential victims.

A transgressor who holds or has held a prominent position of trust may need to be identified to Church leaders for the spiritual protection of members.

Investigation

A bishop interviews any member of his ward who is accused of a serious transgression. If the member denies an accusation that the bishop has reliable evidence to support, the bishop (or the stake president if he will preside over the disciplinary council) gathers further evidence that would confirm or disprove the accusation. The presiding officer may conduct the investigation himself, or he may assign two reliable Melchizedek Priesthood holders to do so. However, leaders should not investigate individuals or matters while they are the subject of investigation by law enforcement authorities. For guidance in such circumstances, the stake president should confer with the Office of General Counsel as instructed in "Legal Matters" on page 178.

Priesthood leaders who conduct an investigation should not use methods that are unbecoming to priesthood holders or that could result in legal action. For example, they must not use electronic surveillance devices, hidden cameras, or tape recorders. They also must not maintain a watch on a member's home.

Communication with Aggrieved Victims

When there is an aggrieved victim (such as for incest, child abuse, or spouse abuse), the presiding officer of the upcoming disciplinary council should contact the victim's current bishop or stake president. If the victim's current bishop or stake president already knows about the situation, the two leaders determine whether it would be helpful and appropriate for the victim to be given an opportunity to provide a written or oral statement about the known or alleged misconduct and how it has affected the victim and his or her family.

Any interview with an aggrieved victim for this purpose should be conducted by his or her current bishop or stake president. Inquiries about a victim who is under 18 years of age should be made through the child's parent(s) or legal guardian(s). Great care must be taken to avoid causing further trauma, especially with a victim of sexual or physical abuse. In the United States, Canada, and selected other countries, the Church has established a help line for cases that involve abuse. Priesthood leaders should call the help line for guidance in such cases (see "Abuse and Cruelty" on page 186).

Confidentiality

Bishops, stake presidents, and their counselors have a solemn duty to keep confidential all information that members give them in confessions and interviews. The same duty of confidentiality applies to all who take part in Church disciplinary councils. It includes what is said in the presentation of evidence and in deliberations. Confidential information must not be shared with anyone except authorized ecclesiastical leaders.

Information received in a member's confession cannot be used as evidence in a disciplinary council without the member's consent. When necessary, a bishop attempts to persuade the member to give this consent. He explains that refusal reflects a lack of contrition and repentance, preventing justice and mercy from operating fully for the good of the transgressor. If consent is not given, the bishop can still impose informal discipline on the basis of the confession. A lack of consent to use a confession in evidence does not prevent a disciplinary council from proceeding on the basis of other evidence.

If a bishop learns that a Church member outside his ward may have been involved in a serious transgression, he informs that member's bishop confidentially. When members of different wards transgress together, and when one has disclosed to his bishop the identity of the other transgressor, the bishop to whom the disclosure was made consults with the bishop of the other member.

If civil authorities challenge the confidentiality required of a clergyman, the priesthood leader who is challenged should seek legal advice from the Office of General Counsel at Church headquarters (telephone 1-801-240-6301 or 1-800-453-3860, extension 2-6301) or from local legal counsel in Church area offices.

Informal Church Discipline

A bishop or branch president normally administers informal Church discipline. His counselors do not participate, and no disciplinary council is held. Except for the most serious transgressions, informal discipline may be sufficient for genuinely repentant persons (especially those who have confessed voluntarily), first offenders, those who have not violated temple covenants by their transgression, and those with significant mitigating circumstances (see D&C 42:25-26 and pages 117-18).

Informal Church discipline includes (1) private counsel and caution and (2) informal probation.

Private Counsel and Caution

Private counsel and caution may be sufficient discipline for members who have committed minor transgressions and are genuinely repentant.

Presiding officers counsel members to resist temptation and help them take preventive action to resist specific temptations. Such counseling often helps members who have committed minor moral transgressions guard against major transgressions. Such counseling also helps protect and strengthen those who are courting, are having difficulty in their marriages, or are separated or divorced. Presiding officers need not wait for members to seek such help, but may call them in for counseling.

For more information about counseling, see pages 25-27.

Informal Probation

Informal probation is a means for a presiding officer to restrict some of a transgressor's privileges of Church membership in ways that the officer specifies. Such restrictions may include suspending the right to partake of the sacrament, hold a Church position, exercise the priesthood, or enter a temple. If the privilege of entering a temple is suspended, a member should give his temple recommend to the presiding officer for the period of suspension. Wisely administered and humbly received, informal probation can be effective in helping a transgressor repent.

In less serious cases, a presiding officer may determine that a member needs a more active rather than a less active exercise of the privileges of Church membership. In these cases, informal probation may include positive conditions such as regular Church attendance, regular prayer, and reading selected scriptures or Church literature.

Informal probation is not an option when priesthood leaders administer Church discipline for a member who has been involved in any of the serious transgressions listed on page 120.

A bishop normally does not inform anyone of a decision to place a member on informal probation. No official record is made of such decisions, but the bishop may make private notes for his own use. He should keep these notes secure and destroy them after the probation concludes. If a bishop is released or if the member moves to a new ward before informal probation ends, the bishop may inform the new bishop to the extent necessary for the new bishop to supervise the remaining probation.

When a member on informal probation makes specified progress and meets prescribed conditions, the presiding officer may end the probation. If the member does not make this progress and meet the conditions, additional disciplinary action may be needed.

Formal Church Discipline

Formal Church discipline is administered in a disciplinary council (see "Disciplinary Councils" on pages 110-17). This discipline is ecclesiastical, not civil or criminal. It can affect only a member's standing in the Church (see D&C 134:10).

At times, formal discipline is the only way to help a transgressor repent, to protect the innocent, or to safeguard the purity and good name of the Church. A presiding officer who is unwilling to proceed in such cases is not fulfilling his responsibilities as a common judge. Presiding officers should approach formal discipline with a prayerful desire to help, not to condemn.

Formal Church discipline includes formal probation, disfellowshipment, and excommunication.

Formal Probation

Formal probation is an action taken by a disciplinary council to restrict or suspend some of a transgressor's privileges of Church membership in ways that the council specifies. These restrictions could include or go beyond those imposed by informal probation. Positive conditions similar to those imposed by informal probation could also be prescribed (see page 108).

Formal probation is not an option when priesthood leaders administer Church discipline for a member who has been involved in any of the serious transgressions listed on page 120.

When a member on formal probation makes specified progress and meets prescribed conditions, the presiding officer may convene another disciplinary council to consider ending the probation (see pages 119-21). If the member does not make this progress and meet the conditions, the disciplinary council may continue probation or take more severe disciplinary action.

Disfellowshipment

A person who is disfellowshipped is still a member of the Church but is no longer in good standing. Disfellowshipment is a severe action that may be adequate for all but the most serious transgressions.

A person who is disfellowshipped may not hold a temple recommend, serve in a Church position, or exercise the priesthood in any way. He should be encouraged to attend public Church meetings if his conduct is orderly, but he may not give a talk, offer a public prayer, partake of the sacrament, or participate in the sustaining of Church officers. The presiding officer may impose additional restrictions, such as staying away from pornographic materials and other evil influences. He may also impose positive conditions such as regular Church attendance, regular prayer, and reading selected scriptures or Church literature.

Disfellowshipped members are encouraged to pay tithes and offerings, to continue wearing temple garments if endowed, and to seek a return to fellowship in the Church through sincere repentance and righteous living.

Disfellowshipment is intended to be temporary but usually lasts at least one year. When a member shows true repentance and satisfies the conditions imposed, the presiding officer may convene another disciplinary council to consider restoring him to full fellowship (see pages 119-21). If a member does not repent, the disciplinary council may continue disfellowshipment or consider excommunication.

Excommunication

A person who is excommunicated is no longer a member of the Church. Excommunication is the most severe Church disciplinary action. As directed by the Spirit, it may be necessary for:

1. Members who have committed serious transgressions, especially violations of temple covenants (see "Considerations in Church Discipline" on pages 117-18).
2. Members who have been disfellowshipped and have not repented and for whom excommunication seems to offer the best hope for reformation.
3. Members whose conduct makes them a serious threat to others and whose Church membership facilitates their access to victims.
4. Church leaders or prominent members whose transgressions significantly impair the good name or moral influence of the Church in the community that is aware of the transgression.

Excommunication is mandatory for murder (as defined on page 110) and is almost always required for incest.

A person who is excommunicated does not enjoy any privileges of Church membership. He may not wear temple garments or pay tithes and offerings.

He may attend public Church meetings if his conduct is orderly, but his participation in such meetings is limited the same as for disfellowshipped members.

Excommunication almost always lasts at least one year. If a person shows true repentance and satisfies the conditions imposed while he is excommunicated, he may be readmitted by baptism and confirmation. The readmission process is explained on pages 119–21.

For information about the effects of excommunication on temple sealings, see pages 86 and 88.

Disciplinary Councils

Because formal Church discipline is ecclesiastical, not civil or criminal, court procedures of the state or nation do not apply. However, procedures in a Church disciplinary council must be fair and considerate of the feelings of all who participate.

When a Disciplinary Council Is Mandatory

A disciplinary council must be held when evidence suggests that a member may have committed any of the following transgressions.

Murder

As used here, murder refers to the deliberate and unjustified taking of human life. It requires excommunication. It does not include police or military action in the line of duty. Abortion is not defined as murder for this purpose. If death was caused by carelessness or by defense of self or others, or if mitigating circumstances prevail (such as deficient mental capacity), the taking of a human life might not be defined as murder. Bishops refer questions on specific cases to the stake president. He may direct questions to the Office of the First Presidency if necessary.

Incest

As used here, incest refers to sexual relations between a parent and a natural, adopted, or foster child or a stepchild. A grandparent is considered the same as a parent. Incest also refers to sexual relations between brothers and sisters. It almost always requires excommunication. Bishops refer questions on specific cases to the stake president. He may direct questions to the Office of the First Presidency if necessary.

Child Abuse

As used here, child abuse refers to a sexual offense against a child or physical abuse of a child. If priesthood leaders learn of or suspect child abuse, they should follow the instructions on page 186.

Apostasy

As used here, apostasy refers to members who:

1. Repeatedly act in clear, open, and deliberate public opposition to the Church or its leaders.
2. Persist in teaching as Church doctrine information that is not Church doctrine after they have been corrected by their bishop or a higher authority.
3. Continue to follow the teachings of apostate sects (such as those that advocate plural marriage) after being corrected by their bishop or a higher authority.
4. Formally join another church.

In such cases, excommunication may be necessary if repentance is not evident after counseling and encouragement.

Priesthood leaders must take disciplinary action against apostates to protect Church members. The Savior taught the Nephites that they should continue to minister to a transgressor, "but if he repent not he shall not be numbered among my people, that he may not destroy my people" (3 Nephi 18:31; see also Mosiah 26:36).

Total inactivity in the Church or attending another church does not constitute apostasy. However, if a member formally joins another church, excommunication or name removal may be necessary if formal membership is not ended after counseling and encouragement.

Serious Transgression While Holding a Prominent Church Position

A disciplinary council must be held for a member who commits a serious transgression while holding a prominent Church position, such as Area Seventy; temple, mission, or stake president; patriarch; or bishop. As used here, serious transgression is defined as a deliberate and major offense against morality. It includes (but is not limited to) attempted murder, rape, sexual abuse, spouse abuse, intentional serious physical injury of others, adultery, fornication, homosexual relations, deliberate abandonment of family responsibilities, robbery, burglary, theft, embezzlement, sale of illegal drugs, fraud, perjury, and false swearing.

Transgressor Who Is a Predator

A disciplinary council must be held for a member who commits a serious transgression that shows him to be a predator with tendencies that present any kind of serious threat to other persons.

Pattern of Serious Transgressions

A disciplinary council must be held for a member who demonstrates a pattern of serious transgressions, especially if prior transgressions have resulted in Church discipline.

Serious Transgression That Is Widely Known

A disciplinary council must be held for a member who commits a serious transgression (as defined under "Serious Transgression While Holding a Prominent Church Position" on page 110) that is widely known.

When a Disciplinary Council May Be Necessary

Serious Transgression

Formal Church discipline may be necessary for any member who commits a serious transgression as defined under "Serious Transgression While Holding a Prominent Church Position" on page 110.

Abortion

Presiding officers review carefully the circumstances of members involved in abortions. Formal Church discipline may be necessary for members who submit to, perform, encourage, pay for, or arrange for abortions. However, Church discipline should not be considered for members who were involved in an abortion before they were baptized or because (1) the pregnancy resulted from forcible rape or incest, (2) the life or health of the mother was in jeopardy, or (3) the fetus was known to have severe defects that would not allow the baby to survive beyond birth (see page 185). Bishops refer questions on specific cases to the stake president. He may direct questions to the Office of the First Presidency if necessary.

Transsexual Operation

Church leaders counsel against elective transsexual operations. If a member is contemplating such an operation, a presiding officer should inform him of this counsel and advise him that the operation may be cause for formal Church discipline. Bishops refer questions on specific cases to the stake president. He may direct questions to the Office of the First Presidency if necessary.

When a Disciplinary Council Is Not Necessary

A disciplinary council normally is not necessary in the following instances.

Failure to Comply with Some Church Standards

A disciplinary council should not be held to discipline or threaten members who do not comply with the Word of Wisdom or whose transgressions consist of omissions, such as failure to pay tithing, inactivity in the Church, or inattention to Church duties.

Business Failures or Nonpayment of Debts

Leaders or members should not use the threat of Church discipline as a form of harassment or as a device to settle business controversies. Business failures and nonpayment of debts are not reasons for convening a disciplinary council. However, a disciplinary council may be held for deceptive practices, false representations, or other forms of fraud or dishonesty in business transactions.

Civil Disputes

Disciplinary councils should not attempt to resolve disputes over property rights or other civil controversies. However, if such a dispute involves accusations that a member has committed acts that would justify Church discipline, the accusations should be treated like any other accusations of transgression.

If Church leaders are asked to help settle civil disputes, they should act as unofficial, private advisers and should not involve the Church.

Passage of Time

If a member voluntarily confesses a serious transgression that was committed long ago and his faithfulness and service in the intervening years have demonstrated full reformation and repentance, a disciplinary council often is unnecessary. See "Time between Transgression and Confession" on page 118.

Possible Decisions

A disciplinary council can reach any of the following decisions:

1. No action. A disciplinary council can reach this decision even if a transgression has been committed. As part of this decision, the member may be given cautionary counsel or referred to his bishop for an interview that might lead to informal discipline.

2. Formal probation (see page 109).
3. Disfellowshipment (see page 109).
4. Excommunication (see pages 109–10).

If discipline is imposed, the presiding officer interviews the person regularly. The officer counsels him in love, helps him repent, and encourages him to live so he may again enjoy the full blessings of Church membership.

Leaders Who Are to Participate

Stake Disciplinary Councils

All three members of the stake presidency and all twelve members of the high council participate in a stake disciplinary council. If a counselor in the stake presidency is unable to participate, the stake president calls a member of the high council to take the counselor's place. If a high councilor is unable to participate, the stake president calls a high priest in the stake to take the high councilor's place. If the stake president is unable to participate, the First Presidency may authorize one of his counselors to preside in his place. If filling one vacancy creates another, the presiding authority fills it as prescribed in this paragraph.

Ward Disciplinary Councils

All three members of the bishopric participate in a ward disciplinary council. If the bishop is unable to participate, he refers the case to the stake president, who convenes a stake disciplinary council. The bishop may not assign a counselor to convene or preside over a disciplinary council. If a counselor in the bishopric is unable to participate, the bishop may ask a high priest in the ward to take the counselor's place. If a high priest is unavailable, the bishop refers the case to the stake president, who convenes a stake disciplinary council. In these circumstances, as with other stake disciplinary councils, the participation of the stake presidency and high council is required as outlined above.

The bishop always consults with the stake president and obtains his approval before convening a disciplinary council.

Branch Disciplinary Councils in a Stake

A branch president in a stake may convene a disciplinary council when authorized by the stake president. All three members of the branch presidency participate in the disciplinary council.

Mission Disciplinary Councils

When a mission president holds a disciplinary council for members or full-time missionaries under his jurisdiction, he appoints two Melchizedek Priesthood holders to assist him. A disciplinary council in a mission follows the procedures and exercises the authority specified for a disciplinary council in a stake, except that a high council does not participate.

If time or distance prevents a mission president from personally holding a disciplinary council for a member under his jurisdiction, he may authorize three Melchizedek Priesthood holders to convene a mission disciplinary council. Normally the presiding officer is the member's district president or branch president (see "District and Branch Disciplinary Councils in a Mission" below).

A mission president must preside over disciplinary councils for full-time missionaries in his mission. Before doing so, he must receive authorization from a General Authority in the Missionary Department (see the Mission President's Handbook).

District and Branch Disciplinary Councils in a Mission

A district president or branch president in a mission may convene a disciplinary council when authorized by the mission president. District councils do not participate in disciplinary councils.

General Instructions about Participation

If a transgressor objects to the participation of a counselor in the bishopric or stake presidency, the presiding officer evaluates the objection. If the presiding officer concludes that the objection is reasonable in fact or appearance, the counselor should not participate. If the transgressor objects to the bishop, the disciplinary matter must be referred to the stake president. If the transgressor objects to the stake president, or if the stake president feels that he cannot be impartial in the matter, he consults the Office of the First Presidency.

If a member of a bishopric, stake presidency, or high council or a clerk has a legal duty because of his occupation (such as a law enforcement officer) to report to government authorities facts that are likely to be disclosed in a disciplinary council, he should not participate.

Notice and Scheduling

Presiding officers should not schedule a disciplinary council until (1) they have had adequate time to determine the relevant facts and (2) they and the transgressor and the aggrieved parties have had adequate time to give unhurried consideration to the consequences of the transgression.

Notice of a Disciplinary Council to Consider Imposing Church Discipline

The presiding officer gives a member written notice of a disciplinary council that will be held in his behalf. This notice should be addressed to the member by his full name and signed by the presiding officer. It should state:

1. That "the [stake presidency or bishopric] is considering formal disciplinary action in your behalf, including the possibility of disfellowshipment or excommunication, because you are reported to have [set forth the charge in general terms, such as 'been in apostasy' or 'participated in conduct unbecoming a member of the Church,' but do not give any details or evidence]."
2. That "you are invited to attend this disciplinary council to give your response and, if you wish, to provide witnesses and other evidence in your behalf."
3. That "the disciplinary council will be held on [date and time] at [place]."

Two Melchizedek Priesthood holders deliver the notice to the member personally and privately with courtesy and dignity. The members who deliver the notice must give the clerk of the disciplinary council a signed statement certifying that the member was notified and describing how he was notified.

If the notice cannot be delivered in person, it may be sent by registered or certified mail, with a return receipt requested.

A member who is incarcerated when the council is to be held is notified as specified in the preceding paragraphs, with one exception: since he will not be able to attend, he should not be invited. However, the letter should invite him to send evidence in his behalf, including a written response about the crime with which he has been charged and, if applicable, convicted. The letter may also invite him to tell how he feels about continued fellowship or membership in the Church.

Procedures of the Council

Councils to Consider Imposing Church Discipline

The stake president, bishop, mission president, district president, or branch president conducts the disciplinary council. He also rules on the procedures that are followed and the evidence that is presented.

A clerk records the proceedings of the council as a basis for completing the Report of Church Disciplinary Action form, but he does not participate in the discussion or decision.

The presiding officer helps the member prepare for the disciplinary council by explaining its purpose and procedures. If the member has confessed and given consent, the presiding officer explains that the confession will be used in the council. He also explains the consequences of the decisions the council may reach.

Immediately before the council begins, the presiding officer tells his counselors (and the high council if it is a stake disciplinary council) whom it is for and what the reported misconduct is. If necessary, he explains the procedures of the council to these leaders. The person is then invited into the meeting and introduced.

The council is opened with prayer. Then the presiding officer or someone designated by him states the reported misconduct and asks the member to respond by admitting or denying it.

If the member denies the reported misconduct, the presiding officer or someone designated by him presents the evidence of the misconduct. This evidence includes the written or oral statements of witnesses, reliable documents, and the substance of the member's confession (if he has confessed and given consent). (The member must be given an opportunity to question the witnesses against him. (If witnesses are unable to attend, see page 117.)

The member then presents his response. He may bring in witnesses one at a time, submit other relevant evidence, comment on the evidence, and make any other statements he wants to make.

Witnesses should be Church members unless the presiding officer has determined in advance that a nonmember witness will respect the purposes and procedures of a Church disciplinary council. Witnesses wait in a separate room until they give their evidence. The presiding officer asks them not to talk with each other about the matter either before or after they testify.

The presiding officer and his counselors may ask questions of the member or witnesses in an orderly, polite manner, avoiding argument. Questions are to be brief and limited to the essential facts of the case.

When all relevant matters have been presented, the presiding officer excuses the member and, with his counselors, prayerfully deliberates over what action to take. The presiding officer is the judge, and he makes the decision through inspiration. If his counselors have a different opinion, he listens and seeks to resolve the differences so the decision can be unanimous.

If there is not enough evidence to justify formal Church discipline but the presiding officer feels that the matter should not be concluded at that time by a decision of no action, he may adjourn the council temporarily to seek additional evidence.

After reaching a decision, the presiding officer may invite the person back into the council meeting to inform him of it. If the decision is formal probation, disfellowshipment, or excommunication, the presiding officer explains the terms and conditions imposed by the decision, tells the person in a spirit of love how to overcome those restrictions, and offers other appropriate instruction and counsel.

If the person holds a valid temple recommend and the right to enter the temple has been withdrawn, he gives the recommend to the presiding officer at this time, unless he has already done so.

The presiding officer explains the person's right to appeal (see page 115) and closes the meeting with prayer.

If the person does not attend the council, the presiding officer informs him of the decision and gives instruction and counsel by meeting with him or by other means if necessary.

Video or audio recordings of disciplinary councils should not be made.

Councils to Consider Ending Church Discipline

See pages 119-21.

High Council Participation

Stake disciplinary councils always include the high council. The basic principles governing the participation of the high council, including the casting of lots to determine the order of speaking, are stated in Doctrine and Covenants 102:12-23.

The following paragraphs provide additional instructions on questions that have arisen as stake presidencies and high councils have applied these principles. Except as stated in these paragraphs, up to the time of deliberation the procedures for a stake disciplinary council are the same as those prescribed for other disciplinary councils.

It should be remembered that a Church disciplinary council is not organized as a criminal trial and does not follow the procedures of such a trial. The high council is not a jury.

During the presentation of evidence, any member of the high council may ask questions in an orderly, polite manner, avoiding argument with the member or witnesses. Questions are to be brief and limited to the essential facts of the case.

After all the evidence has been presented, the appointed high councilors present their views of the matter. They are not prosecutors or defenders. They are councilors, responsible to see that the evidence is examined in its true light before the council. Each is to speak "according to equity and justice" (D&C 102:16). One-half of those appointed to speak are responsible "to stand up in behalf of the accused, and prevent insult and injustice" (D&C 102:17).

The accused member and the accuser (if any) are then given another opportunity to speak, after which they are excused from the council room.

After hearing any additional comments from the high council, the stake presidency withdraws from the council room to confer in private. After consultation and prayer, the stake president makes the decision and invites his counselors to sustain it.

The stake presidency then returns and announces the decision to the high council. The stake president asks the high councilors as a group to sustain his decision. The high council cannot veto the decision; it is binding even if it is not sustained unanimously. However, if one or more high councilors object to the decision, the stake president should make every effort to resolve the concerns and achieve unanimity. He may recall witnesses for further questioning. If necessary, the disciplinary council may again review the evidence, but not in the presence of the member.

Written Notice of the Decision

After a Council Has Imposed Church Discipline

The presiding officer ensures that a person who is placed on formal probation, disfellowshipped, or excommunicated by a disciplinary council receives prompt written notice of the decision and its effects, even if he has been advised orally. This notice should consist of a general statement that the person has been placed on formal probation, disfellowshipped, or excommunicated for conduct contrary to the laws and order of the Church. It also could include counsel to help the person come back into full fellowship in the Church. The presiding officer does not give the person a copy of the Report of Church Disciplinary Action.

After a Council Has Ended Church Discipline

See page 121.

Announcement of the Decision

When announcing Church discipline, leaders must consider the feelings of the transgressor's innocent family members and the needs of innocent potential victims.

A decision to place a member on informal probation is not announced.

A decision to place a member on formal probation may be announced to those who need to know as determined by the presiding officer.

A decision of disfellowshipment or excommunication is announced only to those who need to know. The principles and procedures in the following paragraphs govern such announcements.

No announcement is made if a decision is being appealed, unless the presiding officer of the disciplinary council concludes that an announcement pending appeal is necessary to protect potential victims, to support the healing of victims (although victims' names are not announced), or to safeguard the name of the Church.

The bishop announces the decision in confidence in ward priesthood executive committee meeting to guide priesthood officers who might otherwise consider the disciplined person for Church service, offering prayers, or giving talks or lessons.

The bishop advises the ward Relief Society president in confidence when a member of the Relief Society has been disciplined or was a victim.

If a case concerns (1) the preaching of false doctrine, (2) a transgressor whose predatory tendencies seriously threaten other persons, or (3) other flagrant transgressions (such as plural marriage, cultist teachings to attract a following, or ridicule of Church leaders), then, with the approval of the stake president, the bishop announces the decision in meetings of the elders quorum, high priests group, and Relief Society in his ward. In such cases the stake president may also need to authorize a broader announcement, such as in a stake priesthood meeting or to the Melchizedek Priesthood brethren and Relief Society sisters of other wards in the stake. In some cases the presiding officer may find it beneficial to notify some or all of the victims and, when necessary, their families that the transgressor has been the subject of a disciplinary council.

When an announcement of Church discipline is necessary, it is limited to a general statement that the person has been disfellowshipped or excommunicated for conduct contrary to the laws and order of the Church. The officer who makes the announcement asks those who hear it not to discuss it with anyone. Announcements of disfellowshipment or excommunication do not require a sustaining vote.

To dispel rumors, a bishop or stake president may need to announce that a disciplinary council considered charges against a member but that no action was taken.

Appeals

A person who has been excommunicated, disfellowshipped, or placed on formal probation by a disciplinary council may appeal the decision. An appeal of the action of a ward disciplinary council is to the stake presidency (and high council). An appeal of the action of a stake disciplinary council is to the First Presidency. An appeal of the action of a branch or district disciplinary council is to the mission president. An appeal of the action of a disciplinary council presided over by a mission president is to the First Presidency.

If a person who has been disciplined wants to appeal the decision, he should specify in writing the alleged errors or unfairness in the procedure or decision. The person should present the appeal within 30 days to the presiding officer of the disciplinary council that made the decision. If a bishop or branch president presided over the council, he forwards the appeal with the Report of Church Disciplinary Action and other relevant documents to the stake or mission president. If the stake or mission president presided over the council, he forwards the materials to the First Presidency.

The decision on the appeal may be to (1) let the initial decision stand, (2) modify the initial decision, or (3) direct the disciplinary council to rehear the matter. In addition, the First Presidency may refer an appeal to another priesthood officer or body for review (with or without receiving additional evidence) and resubmittal to the First Presidency with a recommendation.

Reports on Disciplinary Councils

The presiding officer asks a clerk to summarize the proceedings of the disciplinary council on a Report of Church Disciplinary Action form. The form provides instructions on how to complete it, whether to retain or submit it, and how to submit it.

Membership Records after Discipline Has Been Imposed

Members Placed on Formal Probation

Formal probation is not noted on a membership record.

Disfellowshipped Members

Disfellowshipment is noted on a person's membership record. The administration office makes this note and provides an updated record after receiving the Report of Church Disciplinary Action.

If a disfellowshipped member moves, the bishop transfers the membership record to the new ward. The record will notify the new bishop that the person has been disfellowshipped. The bishop may also contact the bishop of the new ward to communicate relevant information about the disciplinary action.

Excommunicated Members

When a person is excommunicated, his name is removed from the membership records of the Church. The administration office takes this action after receiving the Report of Church Disciplinary Action.

Although a person who is excommunicated no longer has a membership record, the presiding officer of the disciplinary council asks for his consent to retain his name and address so Church leaders can continue to assist him. The presiding officer does this with genuine love and concern at a time when the excommunicated person is most likely to consent. This may be immediately after the person is told of the excommunication decision or at a later time. If the person consents, this is noted on the Report of Church Disciplinary Action.

If an excommunicated person moves after consenting to have the Church maintain contact with him, the bishop contacts the bishop of the new ward, gives him the person's name and address, and communicates relevant information about the disciplinary action.

If an excommunicated person moves after not giving consent to have the Church maintain contact with him, the bishop contacts the bishop of the new ward, identifies the person involved, and indicates that a disciplinary council has been held and that the person has requested that no further information be shared and no contact be made. The request of the excommunicated person should be respected until there is a change of mind.

Records with Annotations

See page 147.

Procedures in Exceptional Circumstances

Conduct Examined in Criminal or Civil Courts

Normally a disciplinary council is not held to consider conduct being examined by a criminal trial court until the court has reached a final judgment. In some cases it may also be appropriate to delay disciplinary proceedings until the period of appeal has expired or the appeal has been rejected.

Criminal charges may or may not necessitate Church discipline. Acts that constitute serious crimes under local law normally would be considered serious transgressions. However, minor offenses under local law, such as traffic violations or unintentional failure to comply with technical government regulations, normally would not. Criminal charges that have serious moral overtones may warrant Church discipline even if a criminal court dismisses these charges for technical reasons. Acts such as fornication, adultery, or abortion are serious transgressions though they may not be crimes under local law.

When a member is convicted of a crime or found guilty in a civil action for fraud or other dishonest or immoral conduct, the judgment of the criminal or civil court is a sufficient basis for holding a Church disciplinary council. A finding of guilt in a court may be considered as evidence of guilt for purposes of Church discipline. Reliable evidence submitted to a court may also be considered in a Church disciplinary council.

To avoid implicating the Church in legal matters to which it is not a party, leaders should avoid testifying in civil or criminal cases reviewing the conduct of members over whom they preside. For specific guidelines, see "Legal Matters" on page 178.

Church leaders should not try to persuade alleged victims or other witnesses either to testify or not to testify in criminal or civil court proceedings.

Notice of Criminal Court Conviction

If a member has been convicted of a crime involving conduct that might threaten the well-being of other persons or of the Church, the presiding officer of the Church disciplinary council should promptly send to the Office of the First Presidency a written statement about the nature of the offense and the sentence imposed by the criminal court, even if a disciplinary council does not impose formal discipline.

Reporting Embezzlement of Church Funds

If a person is disciplined for embezzling Church funds, the presiding officer should report it as outlined on pages 161–62.

Party or Witness Unable to Attend

If a party or essential witness is unable to attend a disciplinary council, the presiding officer invites him to submit a written statement. Such a statement may be considered as evidence. When necessary, the party or witness may be questioned further, in writing or orally.

Preserving Evidence

If a witness will not likely be available for a possible future disciplinary council, the presiding officer invites him to write his testimony for use when needed.

Evidence When Adultery Is Charged

If a person who is accused of adultery denies the charge and the matter is being considered in a disciplinary council, revelation requires that “every word shall be established against him or her by two witnesses of the church” (D&C 42:80). “Two witnesses” means two separate sources of evidence. This could include the personal evidence of a participant and some other source of evidence of the member’s guilt.

Questions about Procedure

If a bishop is unsure of the procedures to follow in administering Church discipline, he consults his stake president. If a branch president is unsure of procedures, he consults his stake or mission president. A stake or mission president should refer unresolved procedural questions to the Office of the First Presidency.

Questions about Decisions

Local presiding officers should not expect General Authorities to tell them how to decide difficult matters. Decisions on Church discipline are within the discretion and authority of local presiding officers as they prayerfully seek guidance from the Lord.

First Presidency Authority

The First Presidency has ultimate authority over all Church discipline. Decisions of the First Presidency take precedence despite any rules or procedures to the contrary.

Considerations in Church Discipline

The following paragraphs list some of the factors that leaders may need to consider in reaching decisions on formal and informal Church discipline. These factors are listed in order from those that suggest stern discipline to those that suggest more lenient discipline. None of these factors dictates any particular decision. They are only aids to a decision that must be pursued prayerfully and guided by the Spirit of the Lord.

Violation of Covenants

If a transgressor has been endowed, he has made covenants to live a higher standard of behavior than applies to those who have not been endowed. Violating these covenants magnifies the seriousness of the transgression. Therefore, endowed persons who commit adultery or fornication (including homosexual relations) are subject to stern Church discipline.

Adultery is a more serious sexual transgression than fornication because adultery involves a violation of marriage covenants. See also “Removing a Restriction against Temple Sealing” on page 85.

Position of Trust or Authority

If a transgressor occupied a position of trust or authority (such as parent, bishop, or teacher) that was violated by the transgression, the seriousness of the transgression is magnified. For example, incest is a most serious form of sexual transgression for a parent because it violates the sacred trust of parental authority. Embezzlement is a most serious form of theft because the transgressor has been trusted with funds; it is a particularly serious offense when it involves Church funds. See also “Serious Transgression While Holding a Prominent Church Position” on page 110.

Repetition

If a transgression that was previously confessed and seemingly forsaken is repeated, the repetition may be viewed as part of a pattern of conduct, even though the earlier transgression had been resolved with Church authorities. As the Lord warned those

He had forgiven, "Go your ways and sin no more; but unto that soul who sinneth shall the former sins return" (D&C 82:7).

Magnitude

The seriousness of a transgression is measured in part by the number of sinful acts and the number of persons injured. The number of persons who are aware of the transgression also affects its seriousness.

Age, Maturity, and Experience

Presiding officers should consider a transgressor's age, maturity, and experience when administering Church discipline. The Lord revealed, "For of him unto whom much is given much is required; and he who sins against the greater light shall receive the greater condemnation" (D&C 82:3).

Leniency is often appropriate for those who are immature in the gospel. Leniency may also be appropriate for young members who are involved in a moral transgression if they forsake the sin and manifest sincere repentance. However, young members who persist in immoral conduct may require formal disciplinary action.

Interests of the Innocent

When administering and announcing discipline, presiding officers should consider the interests of innocent victims and the transgressor's innocent family members.

Time between Transgression and Confession

If a transgression occurred many years before it was confessed, the presiding officer carefully considers the intervening circumstances. If the sin was not repeated and the member has lived righteously in the interim, his conduct during the intervening time can show that he has forsaken the sin. In this instance, confession may complete rather than start the process of repentance.

Voluntary Confession

Voluntary and complete confession demonstrates a repentant attitude, which may favor leniency. An admission of guilt after a person has been accused of or interviewed about a transgression is less indicative of repentance. A person who admits guilt when interviewed by a bishop shows greater repentance than one who tries to deceive and admits guilt only when confronted with evidence.

Evidence of Repentance

Normally, evidence of repentance is the most important single factor in determining how to accomplish the first purpose of Church discipline: saving the soul of the transgressor. Genuine repentance is demonstrated more reliably by righteous actions over a period of time than by intense sorrow during a single interview. Judgments about the adequacy of repentance require spiritual discernment. Factors to consider include the nature of the confession, depth of sorrow for the sin, success in forsaking the sin, strength of faith in Jesus Christ, faithfulness in obeying other commandments, truthful communications to Church officers, restitution to injured persons, obedience to legal requirements, and willingness to follow the direction of Church authorities.

Fellowshipping

The bishop's role as a common judge does not end when a member has been disciplined. It continues until the person returns to full fellowship and, when necessary, receives a restoration of blessings. Disciplinary action should be the first step on the way back to the full blessings of Church membership. Church leaders and members should be anxious to help a person who has been disciplined to repent so he can enjoy these blessings. The bishop oversees these efforts.

The time just after a person has been disciplined is difficult and critical for the person and his family. During this time, priesthood leaders and other Church members should be patient and sensitive to the needs of those involved and should give special encouragement and assistance. The bishop should frequently interview the person and, if necessary, his spouse.

The bishop sees that mature, caring home teachers and visiting teachers are assigned to a person who has been disfellowshipped or excommunicated and to his immediate family members. In some cases, couples may be assigned. Home teachers and visiting teachers should make regular contacts and see that the person, his spouse, and other family members receive the counsel and fellowship they need during this critical period of anguish, repentance, and healing.

If a person who has been disciplined moves from the ward before he has returned to full fellowship and received a restoration of blessings, the bishop informs the person's new bishop of the discipline and what remains to bring the member back to full fellowship and blessings. The bishop makes this same contact for excommunicated persons who have consented to be assisted by Church leaders (see page 116 for guidelines in such situations).

Ending Formal Probation, Disfellowshipment, or Excommunication

Determine Jurisdiction and Participation

To consider ending formal probation, disfellowshipment, or excommunication, a presiding officer where the person currently lives must convene a disciplinary council. The council should have the same (or higher) level of ecclesiastical authority as the council that took the initial disciplinary action. For example:

1. If a bishop presided over the disciplinary council that administered the discipline, the person's current bishop normally presides over another council to consider changing the person's status.
2. If a stake or mission president presided over the disciplinary council, a stake or mission president presides over another council to consider changing the person's status. Any exceptions to this policy require the approval of the First Presidency.
3. If a branch president in a mission presided over the disciplinary council and the disciplined person later lives in a stake, the person's current bishop normally presides over another council to consider changing the person's status (see paragraph 5 below for an exception).
4. If a district president in a mission presided over the disciplinary council and the disciplined person later lives in a stake, the stake president presides over another council to consider changing the person's status. Any exceptions to this policy require the approval of the First Presidency (see also paragraph 5 below).
5. If a district or branch president in a mission presided over a disciplinary council that excommunicated a Melchizedek Priesthood holder (with authorization from the mission president), and the excommunicated person later lives in a stake, the stake president presides over another council to consider readmitting the person into the Church. Any exceptions to this policy require the approval of the First Presidency.

A bishop needs the approval of the stake president to convene a disciplinary council to consider changing a person's status. In a mission, a branch or district president needs the approval of the mission president to convene such a disciplinary council.

Review the Proceedings of the Initial Council

The current presiding officer reviews the proceedings of the initial disciplinary council. These proceedings are summarized on the Report of Church Disciplinary Action form.

For disfellowshipped or excommunicated persons, the presiding officer requests a copy of the original report from the Office of the First Presidency.

For members on formal probation, the presiding officer obtains a copy of the report from the presiding officer of the unit where the initial disciplinary action was taken.

Interview the Person

The presiding officer interviews the person thoroughly to determine the strength of his faith in Jesus Christ, the extent of his repentance, and whether the conditions specified in the initial disciplinary action have been met.

Determine Status of Civil or Criminal Court Action (If Necessary)

If a person who has had Church discipline has been convicted of a crime or found guilty in a civil action of fraud or other dishonest or immoral conduct, a disciplinary council should not be held to consider changing his Church status until he has fulfilled all terms and conditions of any sentence imposed by legal authorities. These conditions may include imprisonment, probation, parole, and fines or restitution. Exceptions require the approval of the First Presidency.

Contact the Presiding Officer Where Action Was Taken

If the presiding officer has questions or concerns as he reviews the report of the initial disciplinary council, he may consult with the current presiding officer of the unit where the council was held to see if he knows the circumstances and can provide clarification.

When there is an aggrieved victim (such as for incest, child abuse, or spouse abuse), the presiding officer of the disciplined person must contact the current presiding officer of the unit where the initial disciplinary action was taken. If that officer already knows about the situation, the disciplined person's presiding officer should seek his opinion on the advisability of a proposed change of status for the disciplined person. This discussion must take place before a disciplinary council is held to consider reinstating the disciplined person to full fellowship or readmitting him into the Church.

Contact the Priesthood Leaders of Aggrieved Victims

The presiding officer of the upcoming disciplinary council should contact the current bishop or stake president of any aggrieved victim. If the victim's current bishop or stake president already knows about the situation, the two leaders determine whether it would be helpful and appropriate for the victim to be given an opportunity to provide a written or oral statement about how the disciplined person's misconduct has affected the victim and his or her family. A victim may also comment on evidence of the person's repentance since the disciplinary action was taken.

Any interview with an aggrieved victim for this purpose should be conducted by his or her current bishop or stake president. Inquiries about a victim who is under 18 years of age should be made through the child's parent(s) or legal guardian(s). Great care must be taken to avoid causing further trauma, especially with a victim of sexual or physical abuse. In the United States, Canada, and selected other countries, the Church has established a help line for cases that involve abuse. Priesthood leaders should call the help line for guidance in such cases (see "Abuse and Cruelty" on page 186).

Give Notice of the Disciplinary Council

The presiding officer notifies the person of the date, time, and place of the disciplinary council where his change of Church status will be considered so he can attend or submit a written statement if he desires.

Convene and Conduct the Disciplinary Council

The presiding officer convenes and conducts the disciplinary council. The person is invited into the room, the council is opened with prayer, and the presiding officer or someone designated by him states the purpose of the council. The presiding officer then asks the member questions about what he has done to repent and about his commitment to the Church and the strength of his testimony.

In a stake disciplinary council that is convened to consider ending Church discipline, the role of the high council is much the same as outlined on page 114, but it is not necessary for high councilors to draw lots or to speak before the council.

When all relevant matters have been presented, the presiding officer excuses the member and, with his counselors, prayerfully deliberates over what action to take. See pages 113-14 for instructions about these deliberations and about informing the member of the council's decision.

A disciplinary council may either end or continue Church discipline, but it cannot place a disfellowshipped member on formal probation.

If First Presidency approval is not necessary to end the discipline prescribed in the case, the presiding officer may end it himself. If First Presidency approval is necessary (as outlined below), the conclusion of the council can be only a recommendation to the First Presidency and not a final decision.

Complete and Submit a Report

See page 116.

Apply for First Presidency Approval (If Necessary)

If the person was disfellowshipped or excommunicated for any of the following reasons, or if he committed any of these transgressions after being disfellowshipped or excommunicated, the approval of the First Presidency is required before he may be reinstated to full fellowship or readmitted by baptism and confirmation:

1. Murder (as defined on page 110).
2. Incest (as defined on page 110).
3. Sexual offense against a child or serious physical abuse of a child by an adult or by a youth who is several years older than the child.
4. Apostasy (as defined on page 110).
5. Committing a serious transgression while holding a prominent Church position (as defined on page 110).
6. An elective transsexual operation.
7. Embezzlement of Church funds or property.

In these circumstances, the disciplinary council is conducted as stated previously. No preauthorization from the First Presidency is required. If the disciplinary council recommends a change in status, the presiding officer may notify the person of this recommendation. He should explain that the person's status cannot be changed until the First Presidency gives written approval of the recommendation.

To submit a recommendation to the First Presidency, the presiding officer completes each step on the Application to the First Presidency form. In the United States and Canada, this form is available from the Office of the First Presidency. In other areas it is available from the Area Presidency.

The stake or mission president sends (1) the completed application form, (2) the Report of Church Disciplinary Action form, and (3) any necessary attachments (such as letters that are required on the application form) to the Office of the First Presidency or to the Area Presidency if the unit is outside the United States and Canada. The Office of the First Presidency will notify the stake or mission president of the decision.

Give Written Notice of the Decision

The presiding officer ensures that after the disciplinary council, the person receives prompt written notice of the decision and its effects, even if he has been advised orally.

Readmitting Excommunicated Persons by Baptism and Confirmation

When all approvals have been received, a person who was excommunicated may be readmitted into the Church. After baptism, the person is confirmed a member of the Church as in any other confirmation. The bishop prepares a Baptism and Confirmation Record, noting on the form that the ordinances are for readmission.

Church Activity after Readmission

Members Who Were Not Previously Endowed. From the time of their baptism and confirmation, these members may participate in Church activity just as a new convert would.

Members Who Were Previously Endowed. From the time of their baptism and confirmation until their blessings are restored as outlined on page 122, these members may participate in any Church activity that is permissible for an unendowed member who does not hold the priesthood. However, they may not wear temple garments, receive a temple recommend, or participate in vicarious baptisms for the dead until their blessings are restored.

Ordination after Readmission

Brethren Who Previously Held the Priesthood but Were Not Endowed. Immediately after baptism and confirmation, these brethren have the priesthood conferred upon them and are ordained to the priesthood office they held at the time of excommunication (see "Instructions for Performing an Ordination," page 41). In this circumstance, a sustaining vote of members is not required. The bishop records the ordination information in the spaces provided on the Baptism and Confirmation Record so it can be properly recorded at Church headquarters. See also "Membership Records after Discipline Has Ended" below.

Brethren Who Previously Held the Priesthood and Were Endowed. After baptism and confirmation, these brethren are not ordained to any priesthood office and may not perform ordinances until their priesthood and temple blessings are restored. See "Restoration of Blessings" on page 122.

No change is made to the membership record because formal probation is not recorded on it.

After Disfellowshipment Has Ended

After a person has been reinstated to full fellowship, the administration office removes the notice of disfellowshipment and provides an updated membership record.

After Excommunication Has Ended

After a person is readmitted by baptism and confirmation, the stake president or bishop submits a copy of the baptism and confirmation record, usually with the Report of Church Disciplinary Action form.

If the member was not endowed before excommunication, the administration office provides the ward a membership record that shows the member's original baptism and other ordinance dates, with no reference to excommunication.

If the member was endowed before excommunication, the administration office provides the ward a membership record that shows the new baptism date and includes the message "Restoration of Blessings Required." After the member's blessings are restored, the administration office provides another updated membership record that shows the member's original baptism and other ordinance dates, including endowment (and current priesthood, if applicable), with no reference to excommunication.

Annotations

Although membership records do not mention formal probation and do not mention disfellowshipment or excommunication after discipline has ended, they may include annotations until the First Presidency authorizes their removal (see page 147).

Restoration of Blessings

Endowed persons who were excommunicated and later readmitted by baptism and confirmation can receive their priesthood and temple blessings only through the ordinance of restoration of blessings. Such persons are not ordained to priesthood offices or endowed again, since all priesthood and temple blessings held at the time of excommunication are restored through the ordinance. Brethren are restored to their former priesthood office, except the office of seventy, bishop, or patriarch.

Only the First Presidency can approve the performance of the ordinance of restoration of blessings. The First Presidency will not consider an application for this ordinance sooner than one year after the person is readmitted by baptism and confirmation.

To submit a recommendation to the First Presidency, the presiding officer completes each step on the Application to the First Presidency form. In the United States and Canada, this form is available from the Office of the First Presidency. In other areas it is available from the Area Presidency.

The stake or mission president sends the completed application form and any necessary attachments (such as letters that are required on the form) to the Office of the First Presidency or, if the unit is outside the United States and Canada, to the Area Presidency. The Office of the First Presidency will notify the stake or mission president of the decision.

Performance of the Ordinance

If the First Presidency authorizes the restoration of blessings, they assign a General Authority or stake president to interview the applicant. If the applicant is found worthy, the assigned General Authority or stake president performs the ordinance to restore the person's blessings.

In designated areas, when an Area President receives authorization from the First Presidency to conduct an interview for restoration of blessings, he may delegate the authority to an Area Seventy who is serving as one of his counselors. When assigned, this Area Seventy may then conduct the interview and perform the ordinance if the applicant is worthy.

Retention of Records

The presiding officer should destroy copies of paper and electronic records relating to a disciplinary action after the ward receives an updated membership record or other notification of action on the record. When such notification is received, the clerk immediately informs the bishop and stake president. If a disciplinary council has imposed formal probation, the presiding officer retains the records of the council until the matter is resolved.

The stake or mission president should destroy copies of records relating to the submission of an Application to the First Presidency form after he receives notification that Church headquarters has received the application.

11. Single Members and Students

Single Members in the Church

The family is central to our Heavenly Father's plan of salvation. Temple marriage—the sealing of husband and wife for time and eternity by the authority of the priesthood—is a sacred privilege and obligation that every able member of the Church should have as a goal. The Church strongly counsels members, especially men, not to put off or avoid marriage.

Faithful members who do not have the opportunity of marrying in this life will have every opportunity for the blessings, exaltation, and glory that will come to those who enter into and honor the covenant of eternal marriage.

Church members who have never married or are divorced or widowed make up a significant portion of Church membership. Priesthood leaders should be aware of the needs of these members and provide each person with opportunities for growth and service.

Single members in the Church comprise two groups: young single adults (ages 18 through 30) and single adults (ages 31 and older). This section of the handbook is intended to guide Church leaders in ministering to these members. While single members may, at times in their lives, feel a need to participate in wards or special activities for single members, all members of the Church should associate together as "fellowcitizens with the saints, and of the household of God" (Ephesians 2:19).

Conventional Stakes and Wards

Single members are encouraged to participate in the regular activities and programs of their conventional stakes and wards. These units provide a full range of Church experience and offer opportunities to serve, teach, lead, and associate with people of all ages. They also reinforce the important role of the family and the home in the gospel plan.

Stake Leaders' Responsibilities for Single Members

The stake presidency and other stake leaders consult with single members to determine their needs and make plans to help meet them. The stake president assigns a high councilor to help oversee stake activities and programs for single members.

The stake presidency organizes a stake committee for single members, with a member of the stake presidency as chairman. For information about this committee's meetings, see page 316 in Book 2.

Where enough single members reside in a stake, one or more stake single member representatives may be called by the stake presidency or another priesthood officer under their direction. These representatives serve on the stake committee for single members.

Ward Leaders' Responsibilities for Single Members

The bishopric, other priesthood leaders, and Relief Society leaders consult with single members to determine their needs and make plans to help meet them. Ward leaders should consider the needs and interests of single members regularly in leadership meetings. Ward leaders should also include single members in meaningful callings, assignments, and activities. In addition, leaders should prayerfully assign home teachers and visiting teachers who will faithfully visit and care for single members.

If needed, the bishop may organize a ward committee for single members, with a member of the bishopric as chairman. For information about this committee's meetings, see page 319 in Book 2.

Where enough single members reside in a ward, the bishopric calls one or more ward single member representatives. These representatives serve on the stake and ward committees for single members.

Meetings and Activities

Priesthood and Relief Society Meetings

Quorum and Relief Society leaders should be sensitive to the needs of single members, particularly when lessons include topics such as marriage and children. Occasionally single members may meet in special quorum and Relief Society classes that focus on pertinent topics such as preparation for missionary service, the temple endowment, and temple marriage.

Home Evening Groups

The bishopric may organize one or more home evening groups for single members who do not have children in the home and do not live with their parents. If possible, the bishopric appoints a single priesthood holder to lead each group. If a ward has few single members, the stake presidency may authorize bishoprics to organize home evening groups that cross ward boundaries. Resources for home evening lessons include the scriptures, the Family Home Evening Resource Book, Gospel Principles, True to the Faith, and other approved Church materials.

Sunday School Classes

Each ward that has enough young single adults may have a separate class for them during Sunday School (see page 244 in Book 2).

Institutes of Religion

Young single adults are invited to participate in institute of religion classes and activities. Some institute classes may be taught in the stake by volunteer teachers who are recommended by the stake presidency and appointed and supervised by the local Church Educational System (CES) representative. Classes are held at institutes or other Church facilities. For more information, see pages 132–33.

Gospel Study Classes for Young Single Adults

The stake presidency or bishopric may organize gospel study classes for young single adults. These classes may be held at times other than Monday evening or the regular Sunday meeting schedule. They are not considered institute of religion classes.

Special Stake and Ward Activities

Single members should be offered stake and ward activities such as firesides, dances, choirs, priesthood preparation seminars, temple preparation seminars, temple visits, cultural events, and sports.

In stakes, the stake committee for single members normally plans and conducts these activities, obtaining the stake presidency's approval for each one. In wards, the ward committee for single members normally plans and conducts these activities, obtaining the bishopric's approval for each one.

Only single members, assigned Church officers, and single nonmembers who are willing to abide by Church standards may participate in these activities. A person who is separated from his or her spouse or is seeking a divorce may not participate until the divorce decree has become final according to law.

Activities for single members are to comply with the policies and guidelines on pages 276–80 in Book 2.

Multistake Activities

With the approval of a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency, multistake activities may be held to allow single members opportunities to meet together, socialize, and serve without leaving the ecclesiastical care of their bishop. A member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency appoints a priesthood leader to preside over a multistake committee that plans these activities. The committee may include stake and ward single member representatives.

Funding

Normally, funding for stake and ward activities for single members comes from the local unit budget allowance. This funding should be consistent with the policies outlined on pages 159–61.

Minimal fees may be assessed for optional activities if necessary to cover costs. However, leaders should ensure that all single members have the opportunity to participate in approved activities without incurring unnecessary costs.

Single Member Wards

Creation and Membership

Most single members are best served as members of conventional wards. However, in some exceptional situations, units for single members may be organized. After prayerful consideration, priesthood leaders may recommend creating a young single adult ward or (more exceptional) a single adult ward. Guidelines and procedures for making these recommendations are provided on pages 167–70. Those pages also provide guidelines about who may be members of these wards.

Leadership

Bishops of young single adult wards and single adult wards should be married men of mature judgment who live in the stake. Their counselors should be married high priests; normally they should live in the stake. Other ward officers and teachers are called from among the single members of the ward.

Student Stakes and Wards

Creation and Membership

A stake president may recommend creating student stakes and wards as outlined on pages 167–70.

These pages also provide guidelines about who may be members of these wards.

Leadership

Stake presidencies, high councilors, and bishops of student units should be married men of mature judgment who are established residents of the community. In student wards, a bishop's counselors should be mature, married students who hold the Melchizedek Priesthood. They do not need to be high priests. As an exception, brethren who are not students may be recommended to serve as counselors if necessary.

Other ward officers and teachers are called from among the students in the ward. These callings give them opportunities to develop leadership skills and give service. However, students should not be given Church responsibilities that would unduly interfere with their studies.

Policies for Young Single Adult, Single Adult, and Student Units

Church Organization and Program

Young single adult, single adult, and student units should use the regular program of the Church as much as possible.

Temple Recommends

See pages 75–79.

Priesthood Ordinations

See pages 39–41.

Missionary Recommendations

See pages 96–97.

Leaders' Membership Records

Membership records of the following brethren and their families normally remain in the home ward:

1. Brethren who are called to serve in the bishopric of a young single adult or single adult ward.
2. Brethren who are called to serve in the stake presidency, on the high council, or in the bishopric of a student ward or stake.

The home ward is responsible for the tithing, other offerings, and temple recommends of these leaders and their families.

Tenure of Service

Normally brethren serve no more than three to five years in assignments that keep them away from their home wards. This limitation includes cumulative service in different assignments.

Cooperation

Officers of conventional stakes and wards should cooperate fully when members are requested to serve in units for students and single members. The following guidelines apply:

1. A member who is requested to serve in the stake presidency of a student stake usually should be made available.
2. A member who is requested to serve on the high council of a student stake usually should be made available unless he is presently serving in a stake presidency or as a bishop.
3. A member who is requested to serve as bishop of a young single adult, single adult, or student ward should be made available unless he is presently serving in a stake presidency or as a bishop. A member who is requested to serve as a bishop's counselor should be made available unless he is serving in a stake presidency or bishopric.

Supervision by Stake Leaders

Members of the stake presidency supervise leaders of young single adult, single adult, and student wards the same way they supervise leaders of conventional wards. High councilors and stake auxiliary leaders also work with leaders of these wards in the same way they work with leaders of conventional wards.

Welfare Assistance

Occasionally a bishop may find it necessary to meet the temporary welfare needs of single members and students in his ward. To do so he follows the principles on pages 16–21 in this book and on pages 255–58 in Book 2.

Students who face prolonged financial difficulties may need to leave school temporarily to resolve them.

Finances and Budgets

The bishopric encourages members to pay a full tithing and contribute generous fast offerings. Bishoprics should follow current financial policies and procedures as directed by the stake presidency, the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency, and Church headquarters.

Home Teaching and Visiting Teaching

See pages 168–70 and 202–4 in Book 2.

Records and Reports

Single members and students should make sure their membership records are moved to the ward where they are members. Leaders and clerks should take special care to keep records current. For additional information, see pages 139–51.

Activities

See pages 276–80 in Book 2.

Home Evening Groups

The bishopric may organize home evening groups similar to the way they are organized for single members in conventional wards (see pages 125–26).

School Breaks

If possible, student wards should function during school breaks. A student ward that has few members during school breaks may meet with an adjacent student ward. The wards keep separate records, reports of attendance, and finances.

Dating or Get-Acquainted Businesses for Single Members

See page 177.

12. Church Educational System

Programs of the Church Educational System

The Church Educational System (CES) consists of four programs:

1. Religious education (seminaries and institutes of religion)
2. Institutions of higher education (in the United States only)
3. Elementary and secondary education (in some areas outside the United States)
4. Continuing education (in the United States and Canada only)

In addition, CES assists priesthood and Relief Society leaders in the Church's literacy effort.

General Administration of the Church Educational System

Church Board of Education

The Church Board of Education oversees and provides direction for the operation of seminaries, institutes of religion, elementary and secondary education, and continuing education.

Boards of Trustees

A Board of Trustees is established for each Church university and college: Brigham Young University, Brigham Young University-Hawaii, Brigham Young University-Idaho, and LDS Business College.

The Church Board of Education and each Board of Trustees is composed of the First Presidency, other General Authorities, and general Church officers but functions separately in guiding each CES entity.

Commissioner of the Church Educational System

Under the direction of the Church Board of Education and Boards of Trustees, the Commissioner of the Church Educational System supervises all CES programs.

Responsibilities of Priesthood Leaders

Presidency of the Seventy or Area Presidency

Members of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency ensure that priesthood leaders fulfill their responsibilities in relation to Church education as outlined in this section. When a member of the Presidency of the Seventy oversees an area, he may personally coordinate Church education matters with CES administrators or assign an Area Seventy to do so. In other areas, the Area Presidency coordinates Church education matters with CES administrators.

Where a released-time seminary serves more than one stake, a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the assigned Area Seventy may designate a stake to be responsible for the released-time seminary local Church board of education (see page 131).

Where an institute of religion serves more than one stake, a member of the Presidency of the Seventy, the assigned Area Seventy, or the Area Presidency may designate a stake to be responsible for the institute of religion advisory council (see page 132).

Stake Presidency

The stake presidency encourages and monitors the participation of eligible stake members in CES programs. High councilors and the stake executive secretary can assist.

The stake presidency regularly includes Church education matters on the agendas of stake leadership meetings. The CES representative may be invited to attend the Church education part of these meetings.

The stake president verifies the worthiness of each CES employee and volunteer in his stake as outlined on page 130.

A member of the stake presidency presides at seminary and institute graduation exercises (see page 133).

The stake president or one of his counselors interviews stake members who seek approval to enroll at Church universities or colleges (see page 133).

Where a seminary or institute serves only one stake, the stake president oversees all aspects of Church education.

Where a released-time seminary serves more than one stake, one of those stakes may be designated by a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the assigned Area Seventy to be responsible for the released-time seminary local Church board of education. The president of the assigned stake designates a member of the stake presidency to serve as chairman (see page 131). Each of the other stakes that is served by the released-time seminary may be represented by a member of the stake presidency or a high councilor. Local Church board of education meetings may be held once or twice a year. Attendance of stake presidents is not required.

Where an institute of religion serves more than one stake, one of those stakes may be designated by a member of the Presidency of the Seventy, the assigned Area Seventy, or the Area Presidency to be responsible for the institute of religion advisory council (see page 132). The stake president of the assigned stake designates a member of the stake presidency to serve as chairman.

Where there are no separate CES facilities, the stake presidency ensures that facilities are available for seminary and institute classes (see page 133).

High Councilors

The stake president may assign high councilors as seminary and institute of religion advisers. They encourage enrollment, assist with recommendations for CES volunteers, arrange for CES meeting facilities, publicize CES firesides, help plan seminary and institute graduation exercises, and act as liaisons between the stake president and the CES representative. The stake president may also assign a high councilor to attend meetings of the released-time seminary local Church board of education or institute of religion advisory council.

Bishopric

The bishop and his counselors personally encourage (1) all youth of the appropriate age to participate in seminary and (2) all single postsecondary students to participate in institute. Married postsecondary students and their spouses may be invited to participate in institute as their time and circumstances allow. Young single adults of the appropriate age (generally 18-30) may also be invited to participate in institute as their needs and interests may be served.

Members of the bishopric are responsible for the enrollment of those who are eligible for seminary and institute. The CES representative should provide enrollment information and attendance reports to priesthood leaders.

The bishopric regularly includes Church education matters on the agendas of ward leadership meetings.

The bishop recommends members to be appointed as volunteer seminary and institute teachers (see "Volunteers" in the next column).

The bishop or an assigned counselor determines whether a person is worthy to graduate from seminary or institute (see page 133).

The bishop interviews and recommends ward members who seek approval to enroll or continue enrollment at Church universities or colleges (see pages 133-34).

Volunteers

CES volunteers include teachers and stake supervisors. Volunteer teachers are an integral part of CES. Stake supervisors may be appointed where needed to help administer CES programs within the stake.

The bishop consults with the stake presidency to recommend members to be appointed as volunteers. In consultation with priesthood leaders, CES representatives appoint, supervise, provide inservice, and release volunteers.

Each volunteer of the Church Educational System must be worthy to hold a temple recommend. The stake president verifies this before the beginning of CES service and annually thereafter.

Religious Education

Under the direction of the Church Board of Education and the Commissioner of the Church Educational System, CES religious education programs are supervised by a full-time administrator. Under his direction, full-time CES representatives are assigned for each ecclesiastical area throughout the world. Priesthood leaders should direct requests or questions about CES programs to their CES representative.

Objective

The objective of religious education in the Church Educational System is to assist individuals, families, and priesthood leaders in accomplishing the mission of the Church by:

1. Teaching students the gospel of Jesus Christ as found in the standard works and the words of the latter-day prophets.
2. Teaching students by precept and example so they will be encouraged, assisted, and protected as they strive to live the gospel of Jesus Christ.
3. Providing a spiritual and social climate where students can associate together.
4. Preparing youth for effective Church service.

Enrollment

Enrollment of youth and young adults in seminary and institute programs is the responsibility of priesthood leaders, with assistance from CES representatives.

CES personnel are authorized to request appropriate information about potential seminary and institute students from ward records.

There is no fee for either seminary or institute enrollment.

Seminaries

The seminary program offers weekday religious instruction for youth who attend public, private, or home schools. Seminary also assists parents and priesthood leaders in encouraging youth to serve missions and marry in the temple.

Types of Seminary Programs

Daily Seminary. Daily seminary classes are held outside of school hours. Students in daily seminary meet each day school is in session.

Released-Time Seminary. With the approval of the Church Board of Education, released-time seminary, which holds classes during school hours, can be established in some areas of the United States and Canada.

When justified by the needs of the students and under the discretion of the released-time seminary local Church board of education, a released-time seminary class could be offered before or after school.

Home-Study Seminary. Home-study seminary can be organized where students cannot attend a daily class because of distance or other factors. It is usually organized within the ward. CES-prepared materials are provided for weekday study at home. Students attend one or more classes each week under the direction of a volunteer teacher to discuss their studies.

Home-study students from several wards can meet together occasionally for instruction under the direction of the CES representative. Under the direction of stake Young Men and Young Women leaders, an activity could be held in conjunction with this instruction.

Classes should not be held on Sunday.

Released-Time Seminary Local Church Board of Education

Where a released-time seminary serves more than one stake, a released-time seminary local Church board of education is organized under the direction of the stake assigned by a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or an Area Seventy (see pages 129–30). This board consists of the chairman (a member of the stake presidency of the assigned stake), the seminary principal, and a member of the stake presidency or a high councilor from each of the other stakes served by the seminary.

The released-time seminary local Church board of education meetings may be held once or twice a year. Attendance of stake presidents is not required. Members of the council approve and correlate seminary calendar items, make plans for enrolling youth in seminary, report on enrollment and attendance trends, coordinate graduations, and discuss any challenges facing the seminary.

Members of the released-time seminary local Church board of education approve seminary council officers and members, clear them for worthiness, and see that they are properly called and set apart.

Courses of Study

The courses of study for seminary are Old Testament, New Testament, Book of Mormon, and Doctrine and Covenants and Church History.

Class Materials

The CES representative provides class materials for seminary teachers and students. These include teacher and student manuals, audiovisual materials, bookmarks, and so forth. Teachers and students are responsible to obtain their own scriptures.

Classroom Materials

If a meetinghouse library is available, volunteer teachers should be aware of its resources and be encouraged to use them. These resources may include chalk and eraser (or whiteboard markers and eraser), paper, pencils, tape, tacks, pictures, and Church-produced audiovisual materials.

Activities

Seminary activities should be limited. Any activities that are held are generally conducted on seminary class premises and during normal seminary class hours. Any request for exceptions should be approved well in advance by the local priesthood leaders and the released-time seminary local Church board of education.

Seminary activities must comply with the policies and guidelines on pages 276–80 in Book 2. No money should be collected from students for activities.

Institutes of Religion

Institutes of religion provide weekday religious instruction for single and married postsecondary students. Young single adults of the appropriate age (generally 18–30) are also welcome to attend. In addition to religious instruction, institutes provide students with opportunities to grow spiritually through service, social interaction, and leadership training. Institutes also assist parents and priesthood leaders in encouraging youth to serve missions and marry in the temple.

Institute of religion programs are established under the direction of priesthood leaders and CES when there are sufficient numbers of LDS postsecondary students. With appropriate approval, priesthood leaders and CES representatives may also organize institute classes in local Church units.

Institute classes generally meet twice a week for 50 minutes or once a week for 100 minutes. At the discretion of the institute director, independent study courses can be made available for students who are unable to attend institute classes.

In countries where Perpetual Education Fund loans are approved, institutes assist in the process according to established guidelines. Applicants must enroll in and attend institute to be eligible for PEF loans.

Location and contact information about institute programs worldwide is available on the Internet at www.ldscs.org or through the local CES representative.

Institute of Religion Advisory Council

Where an institute of religion serves more than one stake, an institute of religion advisory council is organized under the direction of the stake assigned by a member of the Presidency of the Seventy, the assigned Area Seventy, or the Area Presidency (see page 130). This advisory council consists of the chairman (a member of the stake presidency of the assigned stake), the institute director, and the student council presidency.

The institute of religion advisory council organizes and directs the institute of religion student council. It also approves and correlates the annual student activity calendar (including any travel) and approves the expenditure of funds for student activities. No money should be collected from students for activities.

In the United States and Canada, the Institute Men's Association (IMA) and the Institute Women's Association (IWA) can be organized to meet local needs. The institute advisory council approves all chapters and chapter advisers for these organizations. Chapter presidencies are called, set apart, and released by or under the direction of the chairman of the advisory council. Additional information about IMA and IWA is available from the institute director.

Institute of Religion Student Council

The institute of religion student council may consist of a president, vice president(s), a secretary, and (if needed) a limited number of council members. Members of the council are called, set apart, and released by or under the direction of the chairman of the advisory council.

Members of the student council encourage enrollment and attendance in institute classes. They also plan and implement all institute activities approved by the advisory council. The student council coordinates activities with the stake young single adults.

Latter-day Saint Student Association (LDSSA)

The Latter-day Saint Student Association (LDSSA) can be organized where it will give Latter-day Saint college students formal recognition and an organization to provide service on campus.

Officers for LDSSA are called and set apart in the same way as the institute of religion student council members.

Class Materials and Credit

Institute classes must use approved CES course materials and teachers. The CES representative provides class materials for institute teachers. In some areas, manuals are also made available for institute students. Teachers and students are responsible to obtain their own scriptures.

Credit earned for institute classes may be transferred to other institutes. Under certain circumstances, credit may also be transferred to Church universities and colleges.

Activities

Institute activities are planned by the institute of religion student council and must be approved by the advisory council. Institute activities must comply with the policies and guidelines on pages 276–80 in Book 2.

Funding for institute activities comes from CES budgeted funds. The institute advisory council approves the expenditure of funds for student activities and coordinates the activities with the stake young single adults. No money should be collected from students for activities.

Facilities

Wherever possible, CES sites and facilities are to be shared with other Church units or departments. Where there are no CES facilities, the stake presidency ensures that facilities such as meetinghouses or members' homes are provided for seminary and institute classes. The rental of facilities for daily or home-study seminary classes is not authorized.

Audiovisual Materials

When CES classes are held in a meetinghouse, audiovisual curriculum materials are stored in the meetinghouse library. The meetinghouse library also supplies the audiovisual equipment needed for these classes.

Materials for Those with Disabilities

Special religious education materials for students who have reading problems or other disabilities are available to assist seminary and institute students. The CES representative can provide information about ordering these materials.

Graduation

Students must complete certain academic requirements and have a priesthood worthiness clearance in order to graduate from seminary or institute. Worthiness determination is made by the bishop or an assigned counselor (see page 24). CES verifies that the student has met the academic and attendance requirements.

A member of a stake presidency presides at seminary and institute graduation exercises. A member of a stake presidency or a high councilor, assisted by a CES representative, should plan these exercises. For additional information, see A Guide to Seminary and Institute Graduation Exercises.

Institutions of Higher Education

The Church sponsors four institutions of higher education: Brigham Young University, Brigham Young University-Hawaii, Brigham Young University-Idaho, and LDS Business College. Under the direction of a Board of Trustees and the Commissioner of the Church Educational System, they are supervised by a full-time university or college president. Information about admissions and academic programs can be obtained from the local CES representative, from the Internet at www.ldscs.edu, or from the schools' admissions offices:

Endorsement to Enroll at Church Universities and Colleges

Church universities and colleges are centers of higher education, but more important they are communities of faith and commitment where students develop and nurture firm testimonies of the restored gospel. To help ensure that those who attend Church institutions of higher education are living by Church standards and will continue to do so, prospective and continuing students must receive endorsements from priesthood leaders as outlined in the following paragraphs.

Endorsement to Enroll at a Church University or College

Students who plan to enroll at Brigham Young University, Brigham Young University-Hawaii, Brigham Young University-Idaho, or LDS Business College must receive endorsements from their bishop and a member of their stake presidency to be eligible for admission.

Non-LDS students who wish to apply must receive this endorsement from clergy of their own faith or from an LDS bishop.

Endorsement to Continue Enrollment at a Church University or College

After being admitted to a Church institution of higher education, students must receive an annual endorsement from the bishop of the ward they attend while in school. A non-LDS student must receive an annual endorsement from (1) the local ecclesiastical leader if the student is an active member of the congregation, (2) the bishop of the LDS ward in which the student currently resides, or (3) the nondenominational BYU chaplain. Students who do not have this endorsement may not register for the next academic year.

Instructions for Endorsement Interviews

The bishop or member of the stake presidency conducts a private interview with each student. Instructions for these interviews are on the application provided by the school.

Leaders should not endorse those who are less active, unworthy, or under Church discipline. Leaders should work with these members to help them qualify for an endorsement in the future.

Elementary and Secondary Education (in Some Areas outside the United States)

The Church provides elementary or secondary education at a few long-established locations in Mexico and the Pacific Islands. No new programs are anticipated.

Under the direction of the Church Board of Education and the Commissioner of the Church Educational System, these schools are supervised by full-time CES administrators and provide both secular and religious instruction. Students who attend these schools must receive an ecclesiastical endorsement to enroll and to continue attendance each year.

Continuing Education (in the United States and Canada Only)

Some of the continuing education programs that are available through CES in the United States and Canada are listed below:

1. Campus Education Week
2. Adult Religion Classes

5. Youth and Family Programs

Continuing education programs are not funded by Church budgets and must be financially self-sustaining. Therefore, fees are assessed to participants. Information about these programs can be obtained from the Internet at www.ce.byu.edu or from the local CES representative.

13. Perpetual Education Fund

Introduction

The Perpetual Education Fund (PEF) and the Church's Perpetual Education Fund Department have been established to assist worthy young adults with educational needs. In approved areas of the Church, this initiative provides these members with the support and resources necessary to improve their lives through additional education and improved employment. The PEF embraces eternal principles, including the importance of education, integrity, hard work, and self-reliance. It encourages members to become "one," as all are invited to give of their means to build the fund. In this way, an ever-increasing number of youth may be served. (See D&C 38:24–27; 104:15–18.)

Opportunities for Participants

Through the PEF program, returned missionaries and other young adults—men and women, married and single—are inspired to expand the vision of their possibilities and choose promising careers that are needed in their own communities. They learn to select nearby schools that will help qualify them for their chosen occupations. They also discover how best to use their own finances and other local resources to attend those schools. If additional help is needed, a student may apply for a PEF loan to pay a portion of the educational costs. The student commits to repay the loan so others may be blessed through the fund.

Organization and Coordination

The PEF works through the existing organization of the Church. In areas where the program is approved, an area PEF committee, chaired by a member of the Area Presidency, directs it. Participants are interviewed and encouraged by their local priesthood leaders. In addition, participants receive specific instruction, guidance, and support through their local institute of religion and the Church's Employment Resource Services where available. Details of the training and application process, as well as specific requirements and policies, are available from the Area Presidency.

For information about the stake president's responsibilities for the PEF program, see "Direct the Perpetual Education Fund Program" on page 8.

Questions about the PEF program may be directed to the Perpetual Education Fund office:

14. Military Relations

Purpose of the Military Relations Program

Stake presidents and bishops help make the blessings of Church participation available to members who serve in the military. The military relations program consists of (1) support from stakes and wards, (2) Church orientation for members who enter military service, and (3) organization of wards, branches, or Latter-day Saint service member groups as outlined in this section.

Stake Military Relations Leadership

If military installations or members serving in the military are located in a stake, the stake presidency has the responsibilities outlined below. If such installations are located in a mission rather than a stake, the mission president fulfills these responsibilities.

A member of the stake presidency oversees pre-military service Church orientation in the stake. He makes sure it is offered to all members who are entering military service. The stake executive secretary may help coordinate this orientation.

Where needed, the president of a stake where a military installation is located organizes a ward, branch, or service member group for military personnel and their families. Guidelines are provided on page 138. For each of these units, the stake president also calls, sets apart, and oversees a bishopric (when authorized by the First Presidency), branch presidency, or service member group leader and assistants. The stake president may designate a ward to support each service member group as needed.

The stake president should provide each bishop, branch president, or group leader with a Certificate of Appointment and a letter that outlines his responsibilities and authorizes him to preside over the unit and to conduct meetings. The stake president may contact the Church's Military Relations Division for sample letters (see page 138).

The stake president should provide contact information for bishops, branch presidents, and group leaders to the Church's Military Relations Division.

A member of the stake presidency should develop a working relationship with the senior chaplain at each military installation in the stake. The chaplain should be given the names and telephone numbers of stake and ward leaders so he can provide this information to newly arriving members and use it if there is an emergency, such as illness or death of a Church member at the installation.

The stake president conducts an annual interview with each LDS chaplain who lives within his stake boundaries. The purpose of this interview is to determine the chaplain's well-being and worthiness to serve. The stake president also interviews each chaplain's spouse annually.

The stake president may call an active-duty LDS chaplain to serve as a high counselor or in another appropriate calling in the stake in which he is stationed. If a chaplain is not called as a high counselor, the stake president should invite him to attend stake priesthood executive committee meetings regularly to report on the activities of Church units and on activation efforts at the military installation. Stake presidents should not call chaplains to preside over wards, branches, or service member groups if such callings would conflict with the chaplains' military duties. Chaplains should not be called to positions that require proselyting.

Ward Military Relations Leadership

A member of the bishopric interviews ward members before they leave for military service. He ensures that they have an opportunity to attend pre-military service Church orientation (see page 138). He calls an instructor, preferably someone with recent military experience, to provide the orientation. Resource materials for the orientation may be obtained from Church Distribution Services.

When a member enters military service or is transferred to a new location, a member of the bishopric helps him or her identify the Church unit nearest the new duty station. Information on meeting times and locations for LDS Church services on military installations is available from the Church's Military Relations Division (see page 138).

Priesthood leaders in the home ward should correspond regularly with each ward member who is away in military service. They should also encourage families to ensure that family members in the military receive the Ensign or Liahona. The Church News is also available for those who read English.

Each bishop is responsible for Church members who are assigned to a military installation within the boundaries of his ward. He notifies the senior chaplain of the ward's meeting schedule, meeting location, and contact person so the chaplain can give this information to Church members at the installation.

Pre-Military Service Church Orientation

As resources are available, the pre-military service Church orientation may include viewing the Serving Your Country and Let Not Your Heart Be Troubled video recordings. As part of this orientation the member should also receive a military scripture set, an LDS identification tag, and the Serving Your Country brochure. If a member did not receive the pre-military service Church orientation before arriving at basic training, the bishop, branch president, or service member group leader who is responsible for those in training should provide it as soon as possible after the member arrives on base.

Organizing Wards, Branches, or Service Member Groups

Members in military service should participate in the wards or branches at or near their military installations. When that is not feasible, the president of the stake or mission where the military installation is located organizes a ward, branch, or Latter-day Saint service member group for military personnel and their families at the installation. When organizing a ward or branch, the stake president should follow the instructions in "Creating, Changing, and Naming Church Units" on pages 167-70.

A ward, branch, or service member group should be established in any of the following circumstances:

1. There is not an organized Church unit within a reasonable distance of a military installation to which members are assigned.
2. Attendance at local ward meetings is not feasible because members are participating in training or other military exercises where they are restricted to the installation.
3. The members' military unit is deployed or will be deployed for contingency operations to a location where the Church is not organized, where the local Church unit cannot accommodate the members because of a different language, or where attendance at local meetings is not feasible.

For those deploying on contingency operations, a group leader's kit containing resource materials may be ordered from Church Distribution Services. Deployed group leaders should contact the Church's Military Relations Division to order additional Church materials.

4. Members belong to Reserve or National Guard units and participate in weekend drills or annual training exercises.

Generally, a ward or branch rather than a service member group is established if there is a need to support both military members and their families. A ward or branch may also be established if there is a long-term need to provide Church services and programs for military members who are attending basic or advanced training or who are on a remote assignment without their families. Depending on the need, Church programs may be limited in scope and complexity.

Coordination with the senior installation chaplain is necessary to arrange for meeting times and use of base facilities. If there is not an installation chaplain assigned to the base, the stake president should consult with the commanding officer.

Service Member Group Leadership and Chaplains

For information about responsibilities of service member group leaders and chaplains, see the Serving in the Church section of LDS.org and the Principles of the Gospel book for members in military service.

Missionary Service and Military Obligation

In countries that have mandatory military conscription (draft), bishops and stake presidents must consider how these laws apply to individuals who desire to serve a mission. In the United States military, a person who joins the active-duty military before serving a mission must complete his enlistment obligation before he can serve a mission. Those in the Reserves or National Guard may be able to serve a mission following the completion of basic and advanced training. For additional information, leaders may contact the Church's Military Relations Division (see contact information below).

15. Records and Reports

For units in the United States and Canada, the term administration office in this section refers to Church headquarters in Salt Lake City.

For units outside the United States and Canada, the term administration office refers to the Presiding Bishopric administration office or service center that serves the unit.

Purposes of Church Record Keeping

The Lord places great importance on record keeping in the Church. One of the first commandments He gave Joseph Smith when the Church was organized was, "There shall be a record kept among you" (D&C 21:1). Keeping records has been a commandment in all dispensations, and this important work continues in our time.

Accurate records help leaders get to know members and identify their needs. For example, records can help leaders identify who may need special care in becoming more active in the Church or becoming worthy of temple blessings. Accurate records also help leaders evaluate progress in accomplishing the mission of the Church. This evaluation can help leaders make plans for improvement.

These purposes of record keeping are similar to the purposes that Moroni suggested: "And after they had been received unto baptism, and were wrought upon and cleansed by the power of the Holy Ghost, they were numbered among the people of the church of Christ; and their names were taken, that they might be remembered and nourished by the good word of God" (Moroni 6:4).

Another important purpose of record keeping in the Church is to maintain a record of the saving ordinances that each person receives.

Leaders should provide instruction on how to use Church records to help accomplish the purposes outlined above.

Types of Records

The following types of records are kept in Church units:

Reports on member participation. These reports include information about meeting attendance, visits to members, activity and priesthood office of new members, and temple recommend status of endowed members (see pages 143–45).

Membership records. These include the name and address of each member, as well as information about the member's birth, parentage, and ordinances (see pages 145–48).

Historical records. These include information about officers who are serving, accomplishments, challenges, faith-building experiences, and other notable events (see page 150).

Financial records. These include information about tithes and other offerings and costs for activities and supplies (see pages 153–62).

Stake Record-Keeping Leadership

Stake President

The stake president oversees stake record keeping. He may assign his counselors and clerks to do much of this work under his direction.

The stake president ensures that stake clerks and stake and ward leaders are taught their record-keeping responsibilities. He also ensures that they follow Church policies and procedures in completing their assignments.

The stake president oversees stake clerks in preparing records and reports. He meets with the clerks to review these materials; to ensure that they are accurate, complete, and on time; and to sign those that require his signature. A counselor may review and sign reports in the stake president's absence.

The stake president assigns clerks to follow up on all audit concerns within 30 days of the audit.

He oversees the preparation of the Annual History for Stakes and Districts (see page 150).

He ensures that people who have access to records and reports protect the privacy of individuals (see pages 150–51).

Stake Clerk

A stake clerk is called as outlined on page 11. The stake president may assign him responsibilities such as those outlined below. Assistant stake clerks may be called to help (see page 141).

Record-Keeping Responsibilities

The stake clerk provides administrative support to the stake presidency. He records minutes of stake leadership meetings. He also reminds the stake presidency of items that need follow-up or further consideration.

The stake clerk (and assistant stake clerks as assigned) prepares stake records and reports. These include financial records (see pages 153–62), membership information (see pages 145–48), and historical records (see page 150). He ensures that records and reports are accurate, complete, and on time.

The stake clerk (and assistant stake clerks as assigned) meets with the stake president to review records and reports. He provides information from these materials to help leaders identify (1) the needs of members and organizations, (2) the availability of resources, such as finances and priesthood strength, and (3) trends, strengths, and weaknesses.

The stake clerk should become familiar with the record-keeping programs on Church computers where they are available. He also grants access rights to family history computer programs, when required, to high councilors assigned to oversee temple and family history work.

The stake clerk (and assistant stake clerks as assigned) may design and print boundary models to use in proposing realignment of stake and ward boundaries. He may also complete forms for proposed boundary changes.

When a new ward is created, a ward is discontinued, or a bishop is released, the stake clerk oversees the transfer of ward records, correspondence, and accounts.

The stake clerk or an assistant stake clerk prepares the Officers Sustained form for the first stake conference of each year, unless that conference is a satellite broadcast. In that case, he prepares the form for the second stake conference. The completed form is included in the stake's annual history.

The stake clerk or an assistant stake clerk ensures that certificates for Melchizedek Priesthood ordination are prepared and distributed properly.

The stake clerk helps the stake president record information for stake disciplinary councils (see pages 113 and 116).

The stake clerk should carefully follow current policies and procedures to safeguard Church funds and to ensure that Church records are current and accurate. He should immediately notify appropriate priesthood leadership of any improprieties affecting Church funds or records.

If the stake has a Church-approved Web site, the stake clerk, an assistant stake clerk, or another member may be assigned by the stake presidency to maintain and update the site. For information about approved Web sites for local units, see page 175.

Review of Ward Records

The stake clerk (and assistant stake clerks as assigned) reviews ward records and reports to ensure that they are accurate and complete. He resolves record-keeping problems before giving reports to the stake president. He works directly with ward clerks and assistant ward clerks to resolve minor problems. He discusses serious problems with the stake president or, at the stake president's request, the bishop.

The stake clerk meets with each ward clerk twice each year. The stake clerk or assistant stake clerks may also meet with assistant ward clerks as needed. These meetings are held to ensure that (1) membership records are updated promptly and accurately, (2) certificates of blessing, baptism and confirmation, and priesthood ordination are given to ward members, and (3) the ward's annual history is kept current and is submitted to the stake at the end of each year (see "Historical Records" on page 150).

Record-Keeping Instruction

As requested by the stake president or a bishop, the stake clerk instructs assistant stake clerks, ward clerks, and assistant ward clerks to ensure that they receive all the training they need to accomplish their record-keeping responsibilities. Assistant stake clerks may also help instruct ward clerks and assistant ward clerks.

Instruction on record keeping is especially important when clerks are newly called, when a Church record-keeping program is introduced or updated, and when records are not completed properly. New ward clerks and assistant ward clerks should be instructed within 30 days of when they are called.

Stake clerks and assistant stake clerks may help priesthood and auxiliary leaders instruct secretaries.

Record-keeping instruction can be given individually and during priesthood leadership meetings, ward conferences, and other times as necessary.

When instructing clerks or secretaries, stake clerks help them understand how information from records and reports can help leaders.

Stake clerks ensure that other clerks and secretaries obtain the materials they need to fulfill their responsibilities.

Audits

The stake clerk should be knowledgeable of audit procedures and reports. Assistant stake clerks should also be knowledgeable of audit procedures and reports for their area of responsibility. These clerks work with ward clerks and assistant ward clerks to ensure that any membership, financial, or historical record-keeping problems are resolved.

For information about audits of Church finances, see pages 161–62.

Each year the stake clerk or an assistant stake clerk conducts an audit of membership records in each ward. For information about these audits, see “Audits of Membership Records” on page 148 and the Stake and District Audit of Membership Records form.

Stake Historical Records

The stake president assigns the stake clerk or an assistant stake clerk to prepare the Annual History for Stakes and Districts. For more information, see “Ward Historical Records” on page 143 and “Historical Records” on page 150.

Assistant Stake Clerks

Record Keeping

Assistant stake clerks may be called as outlined on page 11. The stake presidency may assign these clerks to each part of stake record keeping, such as financial records (see pages 153–62) and historical records (see page 150). The stake presidency may also assign assistant stake clerks to share most other record-keeping responsibilities of stake clerks as outlined earlier in this section. Assistant stake clerks work under the direction of the stake presidency and the stake clerk.

Assistant stake clerks should carefully follow current policies and procedures to safeguard Church funds and to ensure that Church records are current and accurate. These clerks should immediately notify appropriate priesthood leadership of any improprieties affecting Church funds or records.

Church Materials

The stake presidency assigns an assistant stake clerk to become familiar with Church-produced resource materials and know how to order them from Church Distribution Services (the stake clerk could be given this assignment if necessary). This clerk should also know how to order garments and temple clothing. He instructs clerks who have similar responsibilities in wards. He also coordinates efforts to help stake members be informed about these materials and know how to obtain them. For more information about this clerk’s responsibilities, see page 284 in Book 2.

Computers

The stake presidency assigns an assistant stake clerk to be the stake technology specialist (the stake clerk could be given this assignment if necessary). This clerk has the following responsibilities for managing Church computers in the stake, including those in family history centers:

He takes direction from the stake presidency about acquiring, placing, sharing, reassigning, scheduling, and disposing of all stake computer hardware and software.

He supports the stake presidency, bishoprics, auxiliary leaders, family history consultants, seminary and institute instructors, and others who use computers in Church meetinghouses.

He serves as the primary contact for technology services and electronic devices in all Church meetinghouses in the stake.

He serves as the primary contact with Church headquarters concerning computer hardware, software, and guidelines.

He supervises and instructs others who help manage Church computers.

He orders, installs, supports, and arranges for repairs to Church computers. He should have appropriate passwords to all Church computers and software in the stake.

He provides support for the initial setup of computer workstations and printers; for maintenance of computer hardware, operating systems, and software; and for Internet connections (where authorized).

He maintains a current inventory of all computer hardware, with serial numbers, models, capacities, and physical locations.

He ensures that (1) computers, software, and confidential Church information are secure, (2) data files are backed up regularly, and (3) backup files are stored away from the building (see pages 150–51 for more information about protecting confidential information). He should not access the confidential records of membership or financial systems except as requested by the bishop or stake president.

He ensures that Church computers are protected from viruses and improper use. Church computers should not be used for private purposes; nor should privately owned software be installed on them.

He ensures that software installed on Church computers complies in every way with licensing agreements.

He ensures that data is completely destroyed on computers that are retired from Church units. He runs special software furnished by the administration office for this purpose.

He should be familiar with the general policies for Church computers on page 175. He should also be familiar with guidelines for obtaining and managing Church computers. These guidelines are available from the administration office. They provide information about matters such as computer hardware and software, donated computers, Internet and on-line networks, repairs, disposal of computers, stolen or damaged computers, security, and scheduling.

In some cases, ward clerks may be asked to help the clerk who is assigned to be the stake technology specialist.

Ward Record-Keeping Leadership

Bishop

The bishop oversees ward record keeping. He may assign his counselors and clerks to do much of this work under his direction.

The bishop ensures that ward clerks and quorum, group, and auxiliary leaders are taught their record-keeping responsibilities. He also ensures that they follow Church policies and procedures in fulfilling these responsibilities.

The bishop oversees ward clerks in preparing records and reports. He meets with the clerks to review these materials; to ensure that they are accurate, complete, and on time; and to sign those that require his signature. A counselor may review and sign reports in the bishop's absence.

The bishop oversees the preparation of the ward's annual history (see pages 143 and 150).

He ensures that people who have access to records and reports protect the privacy of individuals (see pages 150–51).

Ward Clerk

A ward clerk is called as outlined on page 21. The bishop may assign him responsibilities such as those outlined below. Assistant ward clerks may be called to help (see page 143).

Record-Keeping Responsibilities

The ward clerk provides administrative support to the bishopric. He records minutes of ward leadership meetings. He also reminds the bishopric of items that need follow-up or further consideration.

The ward clerk (and assistant ward clerks as assigned) prepares ward records and reports. These include reports on member participation (see pages 143–45), financial records (see pages 153–62), membership records (see pages 145–48), and historical records (see page 150). He ensures that records and reports are accurate, complete, and on time.

The ward clerk (and assistant ward clerks as assigned) meets regularly with the bishop to review records and reports. He provides information from these materials to help leaders identify (1) the needs of members and organizations, (2) the availability of resources, such as finances and priesthood strength, and (3) trends, strengths, and weaknesses.

When compiling reports on member participation, the clerk reviews information submitted by ward organizations to ensure that it is accurate and complete. He resolves record-keeping problems before giving the report to the bishop. He works directly with secretaries to resolve minor problems. He discusses serious problems with the bishop or, at the bishop's request, the organization leader.

The ward clerk should become familiar with the record-keeping programs on Church computers where they are available. He or an assistant ward clerk provides membership directories, lists, and rolls received from the administration office or produced by Church record-keeping software to the bishopric, to other priesthood leaders, and to auxiliary leaders. He may also be asked to help the clerk who is assigned to be the stake technology specialist (see "Computers" on pages 141–42).

The ward clerk or an assistant ward clerk provides members copies of their Individual Ordinance Summary for their personal records and for help in accessing family history and other Church services, as requested. He prints these summaries using Church record-keeping software. In areas that do not have Church record-keeping software, he may request copies from the administration office.

The ward clerk or an assistant ward clerk prepares the Officers Sustained form for ward conference and includes the completed form in the ward's annual history.

The ward clerk or an assistant ward clerk ensures that certificates of blessing, baptism and confirmation, and priesthood ordination are given to ward members.

The ward clerk helps the bishop record information for ward disciplinary councils (see pages 113 and 116).

The ward clerk should carefully follow current policies and procedures to safeguard Church funds and to ensure that Church records are current and accurate. He should immediately notify appropriate priesthood leadership of any improprieties affecting Church funds or records.

If the ward has a Church-approved Web site, the ward clerk, an assistant ward clerk, or another member may be assigned by the bishopric to maintain and update the site. For information about approved Web sites for local units, see page 175.

Record-Keeping Instruction

The ward clerk coordinates record-keeping instruction for assistant ward clerks and for quorum, group, and auxiliary secretaries. He ensures that they receive instruction when they are newly called, when a Church record-keeping program is introduced or updated, and when records are not completed properly.

When instructing assistant clerks or secretaries, the ward clerk helps them understand how information from records and reports can help leaders.

The ward clerk ensures that assistant clerks and secretaries have the materials they need to fulfill their responsibilities.

Ward Historical Records

The bishop assigns the ward clerk or an assistant ward clerk to prepare the ward's annual history. This clerk prepares the history under the direction of the bishopric. The stake clerk provides additional instructions to ensure that accurate and meaningful histories are recorded. For more information, see page 150.

Assistant Ward Clerks

Record Keeping

Assistant ward clerks may be called as outlined on page 21. The bishopric may assign these clerks to each part of ward record keeping, such as financial records (see pages 153–62), membership records (see pages 143–48), reports on member participation (see pages 143–45), and historical records (see page 150). The bishopric may also assign assistant ward clerks to share most other record-keeping responsibilities of ward clerks as outlined earlier in this section. Assistant ward clerks work under the direction of the bishopric and the ward clerk.

Assistant ward clerks should carefully follow current policies and procedures to safeguard Church funds and to ensure that Church records are current and accurate. These clerks should immediately notify appropriate priesthood leadership of any improprieties affecting Church funds or records.

Church Materials

The bishopric assigns an assistant ward clerk to become familiar with Church-produced resource materials and know how to order them from Church Distribution Services (the ward clerk could be given this assignment if necessary). This clerk should also know how to order garments and temple clothing. He coordinates efforts to help ward members be informed about these materials and know how to obtain them. For more information about this clerk's responsibilities, see page 284 in Book 2.

Priesthood and Auxiliary Leaders

Priesthood and auxiliary leaders oversee record keeping in their organizations. They may assign secretaries to do much of this work under their direction. They meet regularly with secretaries to ensure that records are accurate, complete, and on time.

Priesthood and Auxiliary Secretaries

See pages 166, 182, 197–98, 217, 232, and 242 in Book 2.

Reports on Member Participation

Reports on member participation consist of weekly, monthly, and quarterly information that helps leaders focus on the progress and needs of members. All members of record (as defined on page 145) are included in these reports.

Components of Reports

Attendance Reports

Sacrament Meeting. Attendance at sacrament meeting is recorded by the ward clerk or an assistant ward clerk. The attendance count is the number physically present in the meeting.

Sunday Priesthood and Auxiliary Meetings. Attendance at high priests group, elders quorum, and Relief Society meetings is recorded by the group, quorum, or Relief Society secretary. Attendance at Aaronic Priesthood quorum meetings and Young Women classes is recorded by quorum and class secretaries and compiled by the ward Young Men and Young Women secretaries. Attendance at Primary is recorded by the teachers and compiled by the Primary secretary.

Only those for whom the unit has membership records are counted as attending. Unlike sacrament meeting, those who are unable to attend because of another Church assignment are recorded as attending these meetings. Full-time missionaries serving from the ward are counted as attending priesthood or Relief Society meetings. For more information, see pages 170, 189–90, 207, 226, 238, and 244 in Book 2.

Home Teaching and Visiting Teaching Reports

See pages 170 and 207 in Book 2.

Quarterly Report

The Quarterly Report is submitted to the administration office each quarter. It includes information for only the last month of each quarter. However, the stake president or bishop may request this information monthly.

The ward clerk or an assistant ward clerk prepares the report under the direction of the bishop. By the 10th of the month following the end of each quarter, quorum and auxiliary leaders or secretaries give attendance information for the previous month to the clerk so he can include it on the report. The elders quorum and high priests group also give home teaching information for the previous month, and the Relief Society gives visiting teaching information. The bishop reviews the report for accuracy and makes sure the clerk submits it on time.

Information about submitting the report is outlined below.

Stakes Where All Wards Use Church Record-Keeping Software. In these stakes, a clerk from each ward prepares the report on the computer and transmits it electronically to the administration office according to instructions on the report. Clerks should print, distribute, and retain copies as needed.

Stakes Where One or More Wards Do Not Use Church Record-Keeping Software. In these stakes, each ward that uses Church record-keeping software follows the instructions in the previous paragraph. Each ward that does not use Church record-keeping software receives a paper copy of the Quarterly Report from the administration office at the end of each quarter. This copy has membership and enrollment numbers preprinted on it. A clerk from each ward fills in the blank spaces and sends the completed report to the administration office according to the instructions on the report. Clerks should distribute and retain copies as needed.

Stakes Where None of the Wards Uses Church Record-Keeping Software. In these stakes, each ward receives a paper copy of the Quarterly Report from the administration office at the end of each quarter. This copy has membership and enrollment numbers preprinted on it. A clerk from each ward fills in the blank spaces and sends the completed report to the stake according to the instructions on the report. Clerks should distribute and retain copies as needed.

The stake also receives a paper copy of the Quarterly Report from the administration office. This copy has the membership and enrollment numbers preprinted on it for each ward in the stake. After receiving reports from the wards, the stake clerk or an assistant stake clerk completes the stake report, reviews it with the stake president, and sends it to the administration office within 30 days of the end of the quarter.

Membership Lists

Membership lists provide important supplemental information to reports on member participation. These lists are produced by the administration office or by ward computers. They include information about members of the ward who are of age for ordinances. They also identify young men of missionary age. In addition, the lists identify which men hold the Melchizedek Priesthood and which members are endowed. Lists for the bishopric's youth interviews are also available.

Using the Information

Leaders should serve and nurture all members, but reports on member participation can help identify which individuals and families need the most care. Every number and statistic in a report represents an individual member who has unique needs. Leaders should seek direction from the Lord as they consider whom to reach out to and what help to provide.

Using information from participation reports, leaders can identify attendance patterns that help them focus attention on those who need help and those who are most likely to respond to activation efforts.

Information from participation reports also helps leaders determine which members are missed regularly by home teachers or visiting teachers. Leaders can then take steps to make sure these members are visited.

Participation reports can help leaders identify which members should be considered for priesthood ordinances and full-time missionary service. These reports also help leaders determine which recent adult male converts have not been ordained, which adult converts did not attend priesthood or Relief Society meetings during the month, and which adult members have not been endowed. With this information, leaders can plan how to help members prepare to receive ordinances and how to encourage attendance.

Participation reports also help leaders focus attention on endowed members who do not have current temple recommends.

Percentages in participation reports may be used to show trends, such as whether activity is increasing or decreasing. However, percentages should not be used to compare one ward with another, one quorum with another, or one person with another. Ward and individual circumstances are unique.

When monitoring attendance, leaders should consider that some members may be on Church assignments outside the ward. Other members may be required to work on Sunday or may be away for vacations and other reasons. Leaders should also keep in mind members who are ill, members who are confined to their homes or to health-care facilities, and members who are giving care on Sunday to those who are confined.

Membership Records

Membership records include members' names and addresses, as well as ordinance and other vital information. The ward should have a membership record for each member living within the ward boundaries. Membership records are to be kept in the ward in which the member lives. Exceptions, which should be few, require the consent of the bishops and stake presidents involved and the approval of the Office of the First Presidency.

Membership records are the only means of recording ordinances and other official actions in the permanent records of the Church. Therefore, the bishop makes sure that clerks keep accurate records and send updated information promptly to the administration office. It is especially important to record ordinance information, promptly request records of members who move into the ward, and promptly transfer records of members who move from the ward.

Before a member is interviewed for a Church calling, ordination to a Melchizedek Priesthood office, or a temple recommend, the bishop should carefully review the person's membership record to verify that it does not include an annotation, a comment about a sealing or ordinance restriction, or a comment about unresolved Church discipline.

Members may not have copies of membership records. Under no circumstances may membership records be given to anyone other than the bishop or a clerk.

Although members may not have copies of their membership records, they are encouraged to have copies of the Individual Ordinance Summary for themselves and for any dependent children living at home. Each year, clerks or bishopric members review these summaries with members in accordance with the data privacy policy on pages 150–51. This review could be done as part of annual tithing settlement. If errors are found, a clerk ensures that they are corrected on the membership records.

In areas where units have Church record-keeping software, clerks can print each member's Individual Ordinance Summary. In other areas, leaders or clerks may request copies of these summaries from the administration office.

The administration office provides handbooks or other detailed instructions for creating and updating membership records. Some general principles are outlined in the following paragraphs.

Names Used in Church Records

A person's full legal name, as defined by local law or custom, should be used on membership records and ordinance certificates. Initials and nicknames should not be used on membership records.

Members of Record

For statistical and reporting purposes, the following individuals are members of record. Each of them should have a membership record:

1. Those who have been baptized and confirmed.
2. Those under age nine who have been blessed but not baptized.
3. Those who are not accountable because of mental disabilities, regardless of age.
4. Unblessed children under age eight when (a) at least one parent is a member of the Church and (b) both parents give permission for a record to be created. This includes children of converts. (If one parent does not have the appropriate legal rights for the child, the permission of the parent who has those rights is sufficient.)

After a person is baptized and confirmed, the administration office sends a new or updated membership record to the unit.

A person age nine or older who has a membership record but has not been baptized and confirmed is not considered a member of record. However, the bishop keeps the membership record until the person is 18. At that time, if the person chooses not to be baptized despite being given every opportunity, the bishop, with written permission from the stake president, cancels the membership record. However, records of unbaptized members who are considered not accountable because of mental disabilities are not canceled.

Records of New Ward Members

When membership records are received in a ward and when converts are baptized and confirmed, a member of the bishopric introduces and welcomes the new members in the next sacrament meeting. He reads each person's name, invites the person to stand, and asks members of the congregation to show by the uplifted hand that they accept the members in full fellowship in the ward. Records of family members are read together. If a member knows any reason why a person may not be entitled to full fellowship, he or she should talk to the bishop privately.

After children who are members of record are baptized and confirmed, a member of the bishopric announces each child's baptism and confirmation in sacrament meeting. These children are not presented for acceptance into the ward because they are already members.

The ward clerk or an assistant ward clerk meets with new ward members soon after they arrive to review the Individual Ordinance Summary for accuracy. If errors are found, a clerk ensures that they are corrected on the membership records.

Records of Members Who Move or Are Temporarily Away from Home

Ward leaders, home teachers, or clerks obtain the forwarding addresses of members as soon as they become aware that members intend to move. Leaders of the new ward should contact members as soon as possible after they move in.

If a clerk cannot find out where members have moved, he sends the membership records to the administration office, where efforts to locate the members will continue.

When a person moves from a ward for more than three months, a clerk normally moves the membership record to the new ward. As an exception, the record is not moved if the member intends to return after leaving for temporary seasonal or employment purposes that may last longer than three months.

When a person moves from the ward for less than three months and intends to return, the membership record is kept in the home ward. The home ward also maintains the member's financial records.

If local leaders are uncertain about where a membership record should be (such as for a member in prison), they should keep the record in the ward that can best meet the member's needs.

Records of Members Serving outside Their Home Ward

Mission and Temple Presidents

The membership records of mission presidents and their wives should stay in their home ward unless their children accompany them in the assignment. If children accompany them, the records of the mission president, his wife, and his children should be sent to the ward where they live during their mission.

The membership records of temple presidents and their wives should stay in their home ward.

Other Church Assignments

If members have Church assignments outside their home ward, their membership and financial records are kept in the home ward. If assignments require members to move from their home ward for three months or more, and if their children accompany them, their membership records are moved to the new ward.

Full-Time Missionaries

See pages 99-100.

Records of Members Who Live in Hospitals or Homes for the Aged

The records of members who live in hospitals or homes for the aged and infirm are kept in the ward that can best serve them. In most cases this is the ward where the hospital or home is located. Ward leaders make sure these members receive the full program of the Church to the extent possible.

Records of Members in Military Service

When a member enters military service for training, the membership record is kept in the home ward until the member is assigned to a more long-term duty station. At that time the member should contact the home ward and provide the name and address of the new ward so a clerk can move the membership record.

If a member is at sea for an extended time, is deployed in a war zone, or is not within the boundaries of a stake or mission, the membership record is usually kept in the ward that supports the duty station.

Records of Members Who Do Not Have a Permanent Address

Members who travel extensively and do not have a permanent address should consult with the bishop at their place of primary residence and designate a home ward. That ward keeps the membership records, and ward leaders should maintain contact with the members. Financial contributions and tithing declarations should be made to that ward.

Records of Members Who Have Mental Disabilities

If the bishop determines that a person who is at least eight years old is not accountable, he instructs a clerk to indicate Not Accountable in the baptism section of the person's membership record (see also page 33). The clerk sends the update to the administration office. The record should not be canceled.

Records of Members Who Have Hearing Impairments

Members who use sign language and their families may choose to have their Church membership records in one of the following places: (1) their home ward, (2) a designated host ward within a geographic area to which a group for the hearing impaired is assigned, or (3) a ward or branch organized for members who are hearing impaired.

Records of Adopted Children

Records of adopted children and their adoptive parents may be created or updated only after the adoption is final. The name on the membership record should conform to the decree of adoption.

Records of Babies Who Were Born Out of Wedlock

See "Record and Certificate of Blessing" on page 32.

Records of Children of Divorced Parents

If a child's parents are divorced, his or her legal name, as defined by local law or custom, should be recorded on the membership record and on certificates of priesthood ordinances and blessings.

Records with Special Comments

The bishop and a clerk review the records of new ward members for special comments that the administration office may have added. When records include such comments, the bishop contacts the administration office as needed and takes appropriate action.

Records with Annotations

In areas where the First Presidency has given authorization, an annotation may be placed on the record of a member whose conduct has threatened the well-being of other persons or of the Church. An annotation helps the bishop protect Church members and others from such individuals. When a bishop receives an annotated membership record, he should follow the instructions in the annotation.

Church headquarters will automatically annotate a person's membership record in any of the following situations:

1. The stake president or bishop submits a Report of Church Disciplinary Action showing that the person was disciplined for incest, sexual offense against or serious physical abuse of a child, plural marriage, an elective transsexual operation, repeated homosexual activities (by adults), predatory conduct, or embezzlement of Church funds or property.
2. The stake president or bishop submits written notification that the person has been criminally convicted for one of these transgressions.
3. The stake president and bishop jointly submit written notification that the person has committed one of these transgressions before or after excommunication or name removal.

In addition, the stake president and bishop may jointly recommend that a person's membership be annotated for other conduct that threatens the well-being of other persons or of the Church.

In all cases, annotation of membership records is removed only with First Presidency approval upon request of the stake president.

Requests for Contact on Membership Records

If a member moves and the bishop feels a need to share information with the member's new bishop, he instructs a clerk to place a request for contact on the record before sending it to the new ward. When a bishop receives a membership record with such a request, he should contact the previous bishop as soon as feasible.

Records from the "Address Unknown" File

When a member's record has been in the "address unknown" file and the member is subsequently located, a message will be included with the membership record when it is sent to the ward. The bishopric and quorum leaders are encouraged to visit these members as soon as possible and to provide additional fellowshiping. Full-time missionaries may also be asked to visit and fellowship these members.

Move Restrictions on Membership Records

If a member moves while Church disciplinary action or another serious concern is pending, the bishop or another authorized priesthood leader may contact the administration office and ask for a move restriction on the membership record. A move restriction may also be requested in cases of welfare abuse.

A record that has a move restriction will not be moved to a new unit until the priesthood leader who requested the restriction authorizes it to be removed.

Recording and Correcting Ordinance Information

The ward clerk or an assistant ward clerk ensures that accurate information about saving ordinances and priesthood ordinations is recorded on membership records. Instructions are provided on pages 32, 36-37, and 42.

Preparing Certificates for Ordinances and Blessings

Priesthood leaders ensure that certificates are prepared and distributed as soon as possible after the blessing of a child, baptism and confirmation, and priesthood ordination. These certificates are a member's only Church source for the names of those who performed the ordinance or blessing. Leaders encourage members to safeguard these certificates, explaining that they may be irreplaceable if they are lost or destroyed.

Recording and Correcting Civil Information

Civil information (name, parents' names, date of birth, marriage information, date of divorce, and places where these events occurred) is recorded on membership records. If members see that this information is incorrect on their Individual Ordinance Summary, they may ask the clerk to have it corrected on their membership records. If official documents are available, a bishop may want to review them to verify the accuracy of a requested correction.

Special Situations

For special situations that are not addressed in this section, such as records for common-law marriages, leaders should see membership records instructions or contact the administration office.

Audits of Membership Records

Each year the stake clerk or an assistant stake clerk conducts an audit of membership records in each ward. The stake president may call others who are experienced in membership record keeping to assist with these audits. A stake representative should contact the administration office to obtain audit materials. Audits should be completed by June 30 of each year.

In addition to these audits, the bishop should assign one or more clerks in the ward to conduct an annual review of Individual Ordinance Summaries with members as explained on page 145. If errors are found, a clerk ensures that they are corrected on the membership records.

Removing Names from Church Membership Records

An adult member who wishes to have his or her name removed from the membership records of the Church must send the bishop a written, signed request (not a form letter). A request that Church representatives not visit a member is not sufficient to initiate this action.

The bishop makes sure that a member who requests name removal understands the consequences: it cancels the effects of baptism and confirmation, withdraws the priesthood held by a male member, and revokes temple blessings. The bishop also explains that a person can be readmitted to the Church by baptism and confirmation only after a thorough interview (see "Readmission after Name Removal" on pages 149-50).

If the bishop is satisfied that the member understands these consequences and is not likely to be dissuaded, he completes a Report of Administrative Action form and forwards it to the stake president. The bishop forwards the member's written request and membership record with the form.

If members of the stake presidency determine that the bishop has followed established procedures, they ask him to send the member a letter stating that his or her name is being removed from the records of the Church as requested. The letter should state the consequences of name removal. It should also state that the request for name removal can be rescinded only if the member sends the stake president a written request for rescission within 30 days (the stake president's name and address should be included). If a member demands that his or her name be removed immediately from Church records, the 30-day waiting period may be eliminated.

If a member demands immediate name removal or does not request a rescission within 30 days, the stake president submits the completed Report of Administrative Action form and other documents requested on the form. Instructions for submittal are on the form. The person's name is then removed from the membership records of the Church.

A minor who wishes to have his or her name removed from the records of the Church must follow the same procedure as an adult with one exception: the written request must be signed by the minor (if over the age of eight) and by the parent(s) or guardian(s) who have legal custody of the minor.

If two or more family members want their names removed from the records of the Church, they need to prepare only one written request. However, a Report of Administrative Action form should be completed and signed for each person who has requested name removal.

If a member requesting name removal threatens legal action against the Church or Church leaders, the stake president should follow the instructions on page 178.

Requests for name removal should be acted on promptly as outlined above. The Report of Administrative Action form and all supporting documentation should be submitted in a timely manner.

Name Removal and Suspected Transgression

A request for name removal should be acted upon whether or not priesthood leaders suspect or have evidence of transgression. Any allegations or evidence of unresolved transgressions should be noted on the Report of Administrative Action form so priesthood leaders may resolve such matters in the future if the individual applies for readmission into the Church.

Effects of Name Removal on Temple Sealings

See pages 86 and 88.

Announcement of Name Removal

In some cases a bishop may need to announce that a person's name has been removed from the membership records of the Church. The announcement merely states that the action was taken at the person's request. The announcement should not use the word excommunication. The guidelines under "Announcement of the Decision" on page 115 apply.

Readmission after Name Removal

After name removal, a person must be baptized and confirmed to be readmitted into the Church. If the person was an adult when his or her name was removed from Church membership records, readmission is usually not approved until at least one year later.

When a person requests readmission, the bishop or stake president requests a copy of the Report of Administrative Action form that accompanied the request for name removal. This copy is available from the Office of the First Presidency. After reviewing the form, the bishop interviews the person thoroughly. He inquires about the reasons for the name removal request and the desire for readmission. He also determines whether any unresolved transgressions may have been committed before or after name removal.

If the person was on formal probation or was disfellowshipped at the time of name removal, a disciplinary council is held to consider the request for readmission.

If the bishop finds that before name removal the person committed transgressions that warranted disciplinary action but were not resolved, he should not approve a request for readmission until he is satisfied that the person has repented of those and any subsequent transgressions. No disciplinary council is held.

If the person committed any of the transgressions listed under "Apply for First Presidency Approval" (see page 120), either before or after name removal, the approval of the First Presidency is required for readmission. If the person is readmitted after committing any of the transgressions listed under "Records with Annotations" (see page 147), either before or after name removal, an annotation will be made on the new membership record.

A person who requests readmission must meet the same qualifications as others who are baptized (see the Baptism and Confirmation Record book). When the bishop is satisfied that the person is worthy and sincere in wanting to be readmitted, he prepares a baptism and confirmation record, noting on the form that the baptism is for readmission. After baptism, the person is confirmed a member of the Church. The confirmation may be performed during the baptismal service or during a sacrament meeting.

Priesthood ordination, temple recommends, membership records, and the ordinance of restoration of blessings are handled the same as for an excommunicated person who has been readmitted by baptism and confirmation (see pages 121–22).

Historical Records

The stake president is responsible to see that a meaningful and accurate annual history is submitted to the administration office each year. Instructions are provided on the Annual History for Stakes and Districts form.

The stake presidency oversees the stake clerk or an assistant stake clerk in preparing the annual history. The bishopric oversees the ward clerk or an assistant ward clerk in preparing the ward's annual history.

Annual histories should include faith-promoting events that take place in the lives of members and in Church units. These histories should also include other important events, meetings, challenges, and accomplishments of members and of the stake or ward. In addition, the histories should include copies of the Officers Sustained forms from the stake and ward conferences held during the year.

Those who prepare these histories should provide enough detail to give a clear understanding of events and their effects on those who are involved. The histories should be compiled throughout the year to ensure that they contain accurate information.

Annual histories should not include any private or confidential information. For example, they should not include:

1. Minutes from presidency or bishopric meetings.
2. Any mention of Church discipline.
3. Financial information, such as unit budgets, financial statements, and tithing reports.
4. Private information about unit members, such as birth dates, street addresses, telephone numbers, and e-mail addresses.
5. Names of unit members receiving welfare assistance.

Ward histories should be submitted to the stake clerk or the assistant stake clerk who is preparing the stake's annual history by January 15. The completed ward histories should be included in the annual stake history.

The clerk reviews the completed annual history with the stake president and submits it as indicated on the Annual History for Stakes and Districts form.

Area or country histories of the Church are optional. If Church members have the desire and qualifications to write such histories, Church leaders might encourage them to do so on their own initiative.

If a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency decides to have a history of an area or country prepared at a significant time, such as part of a special historical event, they may call members to assist. A member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency may contact the Family and Church History Department for written guidelines for developing area or country histories. A member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency provides that department two copies of such histories.

Other historical records are selectively retained by the Church Archives, "for the good of the church, and for the rising generations" (D&C 69:8). Questions about the historical value of records may be addressed to:

Confidentiality of Records

The records of the Church are confidential, whether they exist on paper, in computers, or in other electronic media. These include membership records, financial records, minutes of meetings, official forms and documents (including records of disciplinary councils), and notes made from private interviews.

Leaders and clerks are to safeguard Church records by handling, storing, and disposing of them in a way that protects the privacy of individuals. Leaders ensure that information that is gathered from members is (1) limited to what the Church requires and (2) used only for approved Church purposes.

Leaders should provide information from Church records and reports only to those who are authorized to use it. Information that is stored electronically should be kept secure and protected by a password (see "Protection" on page 151). Leaders ensure that such data is not used for personal, political, or commercial purposes. Information from Church records, including historical information, may not be given to individuals or agencies conducting research or surveys.

Membership directories that are distributed to members should include only names, addresses, and telephone numbers, and, if members give permission, e-mail addresses (see "Directories" on page 177). Membership lists that have more information, such as age and membership status, may be given only to authorized stake and ward leaders.

For additional guidelines, see "Records Management" below.

Records Management

Stake and ward leaders should make effective records management a part of their record-keeping procedures. Three important areas of records management are outlined in the following paragraphs.

Protection

All information should be protected against unauthorized access, change, destruction, or disclosure. Church records, reports, and backup copies of computer software programs and data should be kept in a safe place. Highly sensitive records, including computer printouts and electronic storage media, should be kept in a locked drawer or cabinet in the leader's office when they are not being used.

To protect confidential membership and financial information on computers, leaders should use the password features of Church record-keeping systems. Passwords should be written down and kept in locked files away from the computer. They should be changed periodically and always when leaders and clerks are released. If members use stake and ward computers for family history work, they should not have access to membership or financial information.

Many countries have enacted data protection laws. These laws regulate the processing of personal data, such as the information contained in membership records or other records that identify individuals. To determine the extent to which such laws govern local management of Church records or to obtain direction in specific instances, local Church leaders should consult either (1) membership records personnel at the administration office or (2) the data privacy officer at the following e-mail address:

dataprivacyofficer@ldschurch.org

Retention

Records should be kept only as long as they are needed for administrative and legal purposes. Leaders who have specific questions about how long to keep records should consult record-keeping instructions or the administration office.

Disposition

Records that are outdated or no longer needed should be destroyed in such a way that the information cannot be retrieved or reconstructed. Diskettes and any other electronic storage devices that contain membership or financial information should be destroyed rather than erased and used for other purposes.

Records that have potential historical value should not be discarded, destroyed, or placed in the meetinghouse library. Questions about the historical value of records may be addressed to the Church Archives (see contact information on page 150).

16. Finances

For units in the United States and Canada, the term administration office in this section refers to Church headquarters in Salt Lake City.

For units outside the United States and Canada, the term administration office refers to the Presiding Bishopric administration office or service center that serves the unit.

General Church Financial Leadership

The Council on the Disposition of the Tithes, composed of the First Presidency, Quorum of the Twelve, and Presiding Bishopric, oversees all finances and property of the Church and determines the disposition of tithes and other offerings (see D&C 120; Conference Report, Apr. 1991, 74).

Stake Financial Leadership

Stake President

The stake president oversees stake finances. He may delegate much of this work to his counselors and clerks. He should read all instructions from the administration office about Church finances.

The stake president ensures that stake funds are properly handled and accounted for (see pages 156–58). He ensures that Church funds are never mixed with personal funds.

The stake president ensures that all clerks in the stake and all stake and ward leaders are taught their responsibilities for finances. He also ensures that they follow Church policies and procedures in fulfilling these responsibilities. He regularly counsels with leaders and clerks concerning their personal temporal circumstances and their responsibilities for the sacred funds of the Church.

The stake president teaches members to pay a full tithe and give generous offerings (see pages 154–56).

The stake president manages the stake budget and expenditures (see pages 159–60). He regularly reviews budgets and expenditures with bishops, stake clerks, and stake leaders. He ensures that budget allowance guidelines are followed in the stake (see pages 159–60).

The stake president ensures that the stake and wards follow any applicable tax regulations to preserve the Church's tax-exempt status (see page 162).

The stake president ensures that the stake audit committee is organized and functioning properly. He also reviews audits of stake and ward financial records. The stake president ensures that audit concerns are resolved (see pages 161–62).

Stake Clerk (or Assistant Stake Clerk)

The stake president assigns the stake clerk or an assistant stake clerk to help with stake financial record keeping. This is an important calling to help account for and protect the sacred funds of the Church. The financial record-keeping duties of this clerk are outlined below and explained further in instructions from the administration office.

With a member of the stake presidency, a stake clerk receipts income properly (such as funds collected from members for optional enrichment activities or from other stakes for multistake activities). Any funds received should be given to a member of the stake presidency for safekeeping until the funds are receipted. A stake clerk also accompanies the member of the stake presidency who deposits the income.

This clerk prepares checks or disbursement approval forms and makes sure stake financial obligations are paid promptly. Each month he reconciles the checking account and the local deposit bank account, if any, and funds in the "Other" category. If necessary, he helps wards reconcile their checking accounts and funds in the "Other" category.

He helps the stake presidency prepare the annual stake budget and keep track of the stake budget allowance (see pages 159–60). He also helps the stake president keep track of missionary funds in the stake.

He makes sure the stake is complying with all applicable tax laws (see page 162). He also participates in periodic audits by stake auditors and takes corrective actions as needed (see pages 161–62).

Ward Financial Leadership

Bishop

The bishop oversees ward finances. He may delegate much of this work to his counselors and clerks. He should read all instructions from the administration office about Church finances.

The bishop ensures that ward funds are properly handled and accounted for (see pages 156–58). He ensures that Church funds are never mixed with personal funds.

The bishop ensures that all clerks in the ward and all ward leaders are taught their responsibilities for finances. He also ensures that they follow Church policies and procedures in fulfilling these responsibilities. He regularly counsels with leaders and clerks concerning their personal temporal circumstances and their responsibilities for the sacred funds of the Church.

The bishop teaches members to pay a full tithe and give generous offerings (see this page through page 156).

The bishop manages the ward budget and expenditures (see pages 159–60). He regularly reviews budgets and expenditures with ward clerks and ward leaders. He ensures that budget allowance guidelines are followed in the ward (see pages 159–60).

The bishop ensures that the ward follows applicable tax regulations to preserve the Church's tax-exempt status (see page 162).

The bishop should be available to answer questions during audits of ward financial records (see pages 161–62).

Ward Clerk (or Assistant Ward Clerk)

The bishop assigns the ward clerk or an assistant ward clerk to assist with ward financial record keeping. This is an important calling to help account for and protect the sacred funds of the Church. The financial record-keeping duties of this clerk are outlined below and explained further in instructions from the administration office.

Each week a clerk helps a member of the bishopric account for all tithes and other offerings. He accompanies the member of the bishopric who deposits these funds in a bank. He also submits or transmits the related donation reports to the administration office.

The clerk assigned to assist with financial record keeping prepares checks or disbursement approval forms and makes sure ward financial obligations are paid promptly. This clerk also helps prepare the annual ward budget (see page 159).

Each month this clerk reconciles the ward checking account, funds in the "Other" category, and any other financial records required. He also informs the bishop of (1) the status of ward expenditures in relation to the budget allowance and (2) the amount of funds in the ward "Missionary" and "Other" categories.

Each year this clerk prepares and organizes records to help the bishop conduct tithing settlement. He also helps the bishop prepare the Tithing Declaration Report. In addition, he produces and distributes Year-to-Date Tithing and Offerings Statements and year-end summaries to members.

This clerk should participate in financial audits by stake auditors and take corrective actions as needed (see pages 161–62).

Contributions by Members

Church leaders should teach members the principles of tithes and other offerings and encourage members to live these principles. Nonmembers may also make contributions to the Church. Tithes, other offerings, and other contributions are described in the following paragraphs.

Tithing

Definition of Tithing

The First Presidency has written: "The simplest statement we know of is the statement of the Lord himself, namely, that the members of the Church should pay 'one-tenth of all their interest annually,' which is understood to mean income. No one is justified in making any other statement than this" (First Presidency letter, Mar. 19, 1970; see also D&C 119:4).

Who Should Pay Tithing

All Church members who have income should pay tithing, with the following exceptions:

1. Members who are entirely dependent on Church welfare assistance.
2. Full-time missionaries. (However, missionaries should pay tithing on personal income beyond the amount they receive for their support.)

A person who has been excommunicated may not pay tithing or other offerings to the Church.

If mission presidents have income that should be tithed, they normally pay tithing in the ward where their membership records are located (see page 146). However, if they are serving outside their own country and their membership records are in the ward where they are residing, they should generally make tithing contributions directly to Church headquarters.

When and How to Pay Tithing

Local leaders should encourage members to pay tithing as they receive their income. However, members who wish to pay annually may do so.

Members give their tithing and a completed Tithing and Other Offerings form to a member of the bishopric. See also "In-Kind Donations, Including Tithing" in the next column.

Use of Tithing Funds

Bishops may not use tithing funds for any purpose. All tithing funds must be remitted to the administration office (see D&C 170).

Tithing Settlement

The bishop holds tithing settlement near the end of each year. In urgent cases when the bishop is absent, the stake president may authorize one of the bishop's counselors to conduct tithing settlement.

All members should attend tithing settlement to make sure their contribution records are correct and to declare to the bishop their status as tithe payers. All members of a family should attend tithing settlement. In addition to reviewing records of members' tithing, fast offerings, and other donations, during tithing settlement the bishop can discuss the principle of tithing with them, encourage them to give a generous fast offering, and discuss other relevant matters. At the time of tithing settlement, a clerk or a member of the bishopric could also review the Individual Ordinance Summary with members (see page 145).

Instructions for tithing settlement are provided by the administration office.

Fast Offerings

Each month members should contribute fast offerings that are at least the equivalent value of the two consecutive meals not eaten during the fast. When possible, members are encouraged to be generous and contribute much more than this amount.

To contribute fast offerings, members give the offering and a completed Tithing and Other Offerings form to a member of the bishopric. Members may also give the offering and form to Aaronic Priesthood holders who are assigned to collect fast offerings each month and who take the offerings to the bishopric. Members should not give other contributions to these Aaronic Priesthood holders.

When Aaronic Priesthood holders are assigned to collect fast offerings, they should do so in pairs when possible. If distance or other circumstances make it necessary, Melchizedek Priesthood holders may assist them. For more information about Aaronic Priesthood holders collecting fast offerings, see page 186 in Book 2.

Members should contribute fast offerings without designating how the funds should be used. Bishops may not enter into arrangements or make commitments to give a member's fast-offering contribution to an individual or family or to use it for a special purpose that the donor designates.

Mission and temple presidents contribute fast offerings to the ward where their membership records are located.

Guidelines for using fast-offering funds are provided on pages 16–20.

In-Kind Donations, Including Tithing

The Church normally discourages paying tithing in kind. It is preferable for members to dispose of the property themselves and then pay tithing in cash. However, the payment of tithing in kind may be accepted in certain cases and may be a common practice in some areas of the world.

The Church accepts (1) stocks, bonds, or other securities that are marketable immediately and (2) some marketable real estate. Before accepting these contributions, local leaders should receive approval from the administration office. If members want to contribute any other items, the bishop should clear it with the stake president. The stake president should contact the administration office for approval before authorizing the bishop to accept the items.

Missionary Funds

Financing Missionary Service

See pages 95–96.

Contributing to Missionary Funds

Members may use the Tithing and Other Offerings form to contribute to Church missionary funds.

Contributions to the ward missionary fund are used solely to support full-time missionaries from the ward or stake as outlined on pages 95–96. Stake presidents and bishops should inform missionaries and others who contribute to the ward missionary fund that these contributions, including those that are prepaid, cannot be refunded (see page 156).

Contributions to the General Missionary Fund help spread the gospel in ways such as providing partial financial support for missionaries who need it to supplement contributions from themselves, their families, and the ward missionary fund. For more information about the General Missionary Fund, see page 96.

Contributions to the General Book of Mormon Fund are used to provide copies of the Book of Mormon for full-time missionaries as needed.

Stake presidents and bishops should send missionary funds and other funds that exceed reasonable stake and ward needs to the General Missionary Fund at the administration office. Bishops or individuals may contact the administration office for further information about contributions to the General Missionary Fund.

Humanitarian Aid

Church humanitarian work assists people in dire need throughout the world. Those who desire to contribute to the Church's humanitarian aid fund may use the Tithing and Other Offerings form. The ward remits these contributions according to instructions provided by the administration office. Donations may also be sent directly to Church headquarters at the following address:

Humanitarian Services
50 East North Temple Street, Room 701
Salt Lake City, UT 84150-6800

LDS Philanthropies

LDS Philanthropies is a department of the Office of the Presiding Bishopric that correlates, encourages, facilitates, and accepts voluntary philanthropic contributions to the Church and its related organizations and activities. Assistance in making contributions may be obtained by contacting LDS Philanthropies at Church headquarters at the following address:

LDS Philanthropies
15 East South Temple Street, Room 200E
Salt Lake City, UT 84150-6911

Perpetual Education Fund

The Perpetual Education Fund (PEF) assists worthy young adults who need help in qualifying for employment opportunities in their own countries by providing career training and educational loans in approved countries. Those who desire to contribute to this fund may use the Tithing and Other Offerings form. The ward remits these contributions according to instructions provided by the administration office. Donations may also be sent directly to Church headquarters at the following address:

Perpetual Education Fund Department
50 East North Temple Street, Room 832
Salt Lake City, UT 84150-1501

Applications for PEF loans are available through institutes of religion in approved countries (see page 135).

Contributions Not to Be Refunded

When tithes and other offerings are given to the Church, they belong to the Lord, to whom they are consecrated. These offerings include all contributions to the ward and general missionary funds. The essence of all such contributions is that they are free-will offerings, made without reservation of purpose, retention of control, ownership in any form, or expectation of any benefit by the donor other than the Lord's blessings.

It is therefore improper to refund missionary or other contributions to contributors. To do so not only violates the spirit of freewill offerings but may also cause legal and income tax complications in some countries for both the contributor and the Church.

Confidentiality of Tithing and Other Offerings

The amount of tithing and other offerings paid by a member is confidential. Only the bishop and those who are authorized to handle such contributions should know the amount. Stake presidents and bishops are not to announce the total amount of tithing received.

If necessary, the bishop may tell the elders quorum president or high priests group leader whether individual members of their quorum or group are full-tithe payers, contributors to the tithing funds, or exempt. Quorum presidents and group leaders must keep this information confidential.

Handling and Accounting for Funds

The stake president and bishop ensure that all Church funds are properly handled and accounted for according to current financial instructions. General principles are outlined in the following paragraphs.

Receiving Tithing and Other Offerings

The Lord has given bishops the sacred trust of receiving and accounting for the tithes and other offerings of the Saints (see D&C 119; 42:30-33).

Only the bishop and his counselors may receive tithes and other offerings. Under no circumstances should their wives, other members of their families, clerks, or other ward members receive these contributions. The only exception is when Aaronic Priesthood holders are assigned to collect fast offerings. These brethren give the fast-offering envelopes directly to a member of the bishopric.

Ward members should give contributions to a member of the bishopric in a sealed envelope with a properly completed Tithing and Other Offerings form enclosed. Church members should not place their tithes and other offerings in a contribution box. Checks should be made payable to the ward, not to the bishop or the Church.

Verifying Tithing and Other Offerings

Contribution envelopes should be opened and verified on Sunday, except during tithing settlement, when they are opened and verified on the day they are received. Two persons—a member of the bishopric and a clerk, or two members of the bishopric—should open each envelope together to verify that the funds enclosed are the same as the amount written on the Tithing and Other Offerings form. If the funds and the written amount differ, the contributor should be contacted as soon as possible to resolve the difference.

Depositing Tithing and Other Offerings

A member of the bishopric and another priesthood holder, usually the clerk who helped verify the donations, prepare the deposit.

Those who deposit funds should use, where available, (1) deposit bags that are locked when funds are counted and are opened only by the bank or (2) other tamper-resistant deposit bags. A clerk or member of the bishopric should check with the administration office or the local bank for availability of such deposit bags.

Where a 24-hour bank depository is available, the bishopric member, accompanied by the other priesthood holder, deposits the funds in the bank on the same day the funds are opened and verified.

Where a 24-hour bank depository is not available and the bank is closed on Sunday, the bishop designates a Melchizedek Priesthood holder, normally a bishopric member, to make the deposit at the bank the next business day. The person who makes the deposit is accountable for these funds. He should:

1. Ensure that the funds are kept secure until they are deposited at the bank.
2. Obtain, when the deposit is made, a bank-certified deposit receipt showing the date and the amount of the deposit.

Where a 24-hour bank depository is not available, the bishopric member and a clerk should complete the following procedure on the next Sunday before processing any donations for that day:

1. Compare the bank-certified deposit receipt to the previous week's deposit records to verify that the correct amount was deposited.
2. Sign the deposit slip and file it with the other donation information.

Stake presidents and bishops must be certain that Church funds are not deposited to the account of an individual or mixed with personal funds.

Safeguarding Church Funds

Members who are responsible for Church funds must never leave them in the meetinghouse overnight or leave them unattended at any time, such as during meetings and activities.

Receipting Tithing and Other Offerings

The administration office sends stakes and wards instructions for issuing receipts for tithing and other offerings.

Receipts to members who donate in kind (non-cash tithing and other offerings) are issued only by the administration office. These receipts show no monetary value for the items contributed.

Receiving and Managing Budget Allowance Funds

See pages 159-60.

Managing Stake and Ward Checking Accounts

Each stake normally has one general checking account. The stake president manages this account, though his counselors and clerks may assist him. If the stake has a physical facilities account, the administration office will provide instructions for using it.

All ward funds are handled through one checking account. The bishop manages this account, though his counselors and clerks may assist him.

Each check must have two authorized signatures. Usually the stake president, his counselors, and the clerk assigned to finances are authorized to sign checks for the stake account. Usually the bishop, his counselors, and the clerk assigned to finances are authorized to sign checks for the ward account.

Although counselors may be authorized to sign checks, they should not do so unless the stake president or bishop has approved the expenditure.

A check should not be signed until it is filled out completely.

The stake president or bishop should make sure the bank statement for the stake or ward checking account is mailed directly to his home, not to the meetinghouse or a clerk's home. He should open each statement promptly, review it, and give it to the clerk to be reconciled. The clerk should sign the reconciliation. The stake president or bishop then reviews and signs the reconciliation. Finally, he reviews the monthly financial statement or report and ensures that it is reconciled.

Checkbooks and blank checks should be stored in a locked file or cabinet. They must not be left unattended when they are not locked securely. If any blank checks are missing, the stake president or bishop immediately reports the numbers of these checks to the administration office. He also requests a stop payment on the missing checks.

Stakes and wards that have checking accounts may not have savings accounts. Quorums, auxiliaries, and Scout organizations may not have checking accounts, savings accounts, or petty cash funds. Their budgeted expenses are all paid through the stake or ward checking account.

The instructions that apply to the use of checks also apply to the use of other financial payment methods.

Managing Stake and Ward Funds Not Held in a Checking Account

This section applies to units outside the United States and Canada that do not manage their funds through a checking account. Instead, these units have cash working funds, savings accounts, or bank accounts accessed by a debit card.

The administration office provides specific guidelines for these units to follow. Some basic control principles are outlined below:

1. A unit should have only one cash working fund, savings account, or debit card bank account.
2. The funds should be controlled by the stake president or bishop.
3. Money from cash working funds, savings accounts, or debit cards should not be used until two authorized people have signed a cash disbursement approval form. This form should not be signed until it is filled out completely.

Supporting documents such as invoices, bills, or receipts should be attached to the cash disbursement approval form. If funds are advanced to a member, he or she should also sign the form, acknowledging the receipt of the money and noting the date and the amount. The member should then provide supporting documentation for the funds spent and return any unspent funds.

4. If there is a bank statement, it should be delivered directly to the stake president or bishop, not to the meetinghouse or a clerk. He should open each bank statement promptly, review it, and give it to the clerk to be reconciled. The clerk should sign the reconciliation. The stake president or bishop then reviews and signs the reconciliation.
5. The stake president or bishop reviews financial reports and ensures that they are reconciled.
6. The stake president or bishop maintains custody of cash working funds.
7. Cash working funds should be stored in a wallet, pouch, or other container that is separate from personal funds. Such storage containers must be physically safeguarded at all times. Church funds and personal funds should never be mixed.
8. Cash working funds should be counted monthly by two authorized signers. The counts and signatures should be documented on forms provided by the administration office. Any fund shortages should be reported immediately to the area controller.
9. Church funds are never to be borrowed or used for personal purposes.
10. All disbursements should be recorded promptly, and all bills, receipts, or other documents supporting the disbursements should be retained.

Keeping Financial Records

Stakes and wards should keep current, accurate financial records. These records can help stake presidents and bishops account for and protect the sacred funds of the Church. These records are also necessary for preparing budgets, managing the budget allowance, and providing information to members on their financial contributions.

For information about the use and retention of records and reports, clerks should refer to instructions from the administration office. Financial records should be retained for at least three years plus the current year. However, local laws may require longer retention periods.

Budget and Expenditures

Stake and Ward Budgets

Every stake and ward prepares and operates on a budget. The stake president manages the stake budget, and the bishop manages the ward budget, though each may assign a counselor to supervise it under his direction.

No stake or ward expenses may be incurred or paid without the presiding officer's authorization. Stake presidents regularly review ward expenditures with each bishop as part of the monthly priesthood interview.

Stake presidencies and bishoprics should begin preparing budgets well before the beginning of each calendar year as follows:

1. Review the amounts spent during the previous year to be sure recurring expenses are considered.
2. Ask organizations to estimate their budget needs in detail.
3. Compile the budget, using wise budgeting practices, being equitable, and ensuring that projected expenses do not exceed anticipated budget allowance funds.

It is not necessary to call for a sustaining vote to accept the budget.

Budget Allowance

The budget allowance provides general Church funds to pay for the activities and programs of stakes and wards. It eliminates the need to receive budget contributions from members. Faithful payment of tithes has made the budget allowance possible.

Allocation of Budget Allowance Funds

The administration office allocates budget funds based on attendance in the following categories:

1. Sacrament meeting
2. Young men
3. Young women
4. Primary children ages 8–11
5. Young single adults

The stake president determines how much of the funds are allocated to the stake and to the wards. He ensures that the stake and wards are funded fairly and adequately as permitted within these guidelines.

The stake president works with bishops in a unified, cooperative manner. If unforeseen changes occur that may necessitate altering original budget allowances, he makes sure that fair adjustments are made.

The bishop oversees the allocation of budget allowance funds in the ward. He ensures that ward organizations are funded fairly and adequately.

Priesthood leaders make every effort to ensure that the level of budget allocations and activities for the Young Men and Young Women organizations are equitable.

General Principles and Guidelines

Most questions about the budget allowance can be answered by applying the basic principles that are outlined below. The stake presidency and bishopric should teach these principles to priesthood and auxiliary leaders.

The budget allowance was created to reduce the financial and time burdens on members. If necessary, priesthood and auxiliary leaders should reduce and simplify activities to stay within the allowance. Activities should have little or no cost, should build testimonies, and should provide meaningful service to others.

Stake or ward budget allowance funds should be used to pay for all Church activities, programs, and supplies. Members should not pay fees to participate (exceptions may be made for annual camps and enrichment activities as explained on page 160). Nor should they provide materials, supplies, rental or admission fees, or long-distance transportation at their own expense. In addition, members should not be charged for class manuals. Activities in which many members provide food may be held if doing so does not place undue burdens on members.

Members who want to contribute additional funds to the Church may not designate them for the stake or ward budget. Instead, leaders should encourage them to contribute the funds to fast offerings, missionary funds, or other authorized donation categories.

Stake presidents and bishops make sure budget allowance funds are spent wisely. Funds should be used to bless people and to further gospel purposes. Leaders also ensure that all expenditures are within the allowance. The success of the budget allowance depends on the efforts of local priesthood leaders to monitor and control Church finances and expenses.

Unneeded budget allowance funds should not be spent. Unused ward funds are returned to the stake. Unused stake funds are returned to the administration office. Some unspent funds may be retained if they are needed for specific activities that are planned for the next year.

For the budget allowance to succeed, it is important that quarterly reports are accurate and on time. Also, each ward's Tithing Declaration Report for the previous year should be (1) reconciled to deposits made by the ward and (2) sent to the administration office each year as instructed by that office.

The budget allowance does not include expenses for building construction, maintenance, telephones, utilities, or computers. These expenses are paid from general Church funds according to current guidelines.

For more details about the budget allowance, see the current budget allowance instructions, which are available from the administration office.

Funding Special Activities and Equipment

Special Stake and Multistake Activities

Local leaders are encouraged to hold stake and multistake activities that provide opportunities to develop unity and friendships, especially among youth and young adults. A broad scope of such activities may be held, including cultural activities, athletic programs and events, dances and socials, and camps.

Local leaders should ensure that they budget adequate funds to support an appropriate number of stake and multistake activities. These funds should come from the local unit budget allowance.

For more information about activities, see pages 271–80 in Book 2.

Travel for Activities

Long-distance travel for Church activities is discouraged. Units should not carry over significant portions of the budget allowance from one year to the next to be used for travel expenses. For Church travel policies, see pages 279–80 in Book 2.

Youth Conferences

Youth conferences should be funded from the budget allowance. Members should not be asked for more money.

Annual Camps or Similar Activities

The Church encourages one annual extended Scout camp or similar activity for young men ages 12 to 18 and one annual camp or similar activity for young women ages 12 to 18. The Church also encourages one annual day camp for Scouts ages 8 through 11 (see the Scouting Handbook, page 4).

If there are not sufficient stake and ward budget funds, leaders may ask participants to pay for part or all of this one annual camp or similar activity by individually earning their own money. If funds from participants are insufficient, the stake president or bishop may authorize group fund-raising activities that comply with the guidelines on page 161.

In no case should the expenses or travel for these camps or activities be excessive. Nor should the lack of personal funds prohibit a member from participating.

Equipment for Annual Camps

If possible, equipment that the unit needs for annual camps is purchased with budget allowance funds. If these funds are insufficient, the stake president or bishop may authorize group fund-raising activities that comply with the guidelines on page 161. Such activities may not be used to purchase equipment or uniforms for individuals. Nor may they be used to fund other activities.

Scouting

Scouting activities and awards for young men ages 8 through 17 are funded from the budget allowance. If necessary, an exception may be made for one annual Scout camp or similar activity as explained in "Annual Camps or Similar Activities" on this page.

Where Scouting is authorized, the Church pays all or part of the following registration fees:

1. For boys and young men ages 8 through 17.
2. For Scout leaders.
3. For unit chartering.

Registration and chartering expenses are paid from the stake general checking account. The Church provides these funds in addition to the budget allowance.

Optional Enrichment Activities

Units may sponsor optional enrichment activities that are presented by Church-related entities. Such activities include Church university performance groups and periodic major cultural events. Members may be charged a modest fee to defray the costs of such events if the program is entirely optional, the cost is not burdensome, and the event is not used to raise funds. Budget funds may be used to help those who want to attend but are unable to pay.

Fund-Raising

Fund-raising activities are not normally approved because expenses for stake and ward activities are paid with budget allowance funds. As an exception, a stake president or bishop may authorize group fund-raising activities only when necessary to help pay for annual camps and equipment as outlined on page 160.

If a fund-raising activity is held, it should provide a meaningful value or service. It should be a positive experience that builds unity.

Contributions to fund-raising activities should be voluntary. Priesthood leaders should take special care to ensure that members do not feel obligated to contribute.

Stakes and wards that sponsor fund-raising activities should not advertise or solicit beyond their boundaries. Nor should they sell products or services door-to-door.

Examples of fund-raising activities that are not approved include:

1. Activities that would be taxable.
2. Activities completed with paid labor, either by employees or by contract.
3. Entertainment for which the stake or ward pays an orchestra, entertainers, or others for their services; when admission is charged; and when the intent of the activity is to raise funds.
4. The sale of commercial goods or services, including food storage items.
5. Games of chance, such as raffles and bingo.

Any exceptions to these instructions must be approved by the administration office.

The Friends of Scouting fund drive in the United States will continue as a separate, voluntary solicitation.

Audits

Stake Audit Committee

The stake president appoints a stake audit committee consisting of one of his counselors as chairman and two other stake members who understand financial matters. The counselor who serves as chairman generally should not sign checks or otherwise be involved in stake financial record keeping. Committee members should not be stake auditors and should not perform stake or ward financial record keeping.

Stake Auditors

The chairman of the stake audit committee calls at least two stake auditors. The stake auditors should be trustworthy Church members who are experienced, if possible, in accounting or auditing. They should be approved by the stake presidency and high council, but they are not sustained and usually are not set apart.

The Auditing Process

Stake auditors audit financial records of the stake, wards, branches, and family history centers twice each year. Auditors ensure that tithing and other contributions are properly recorded, Church funds are properly accounted for and protected, and financial records are complete and accurate. The unit's presiding officer and clerk assigned to finances should be available to answer questions during audits.

The stake president, stake audit committee, and stake clerk assigned to finances review finished audits. They sign the audit reports and ensure that the originals are sent to the administration office to arrive by the due date. They also ensure that any exceptions disclosed by an audit are promptly corrected.

Local Unit Area Auditor/Trainer

A member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency calls a local unit area auditor/trainer for each area. In the United States and Canada, he reports to the Church Auditing Department. Outside the United States and Canada, he reports to the member and statistical records manager. A member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency may also call assistant auditor/trainers.

The primary responsibility of local unit area auditor/trainers (and their assistants where called) is to provide training on audits and financial policies to priesthood leaders, clerks, audit committees, and stake auditors. They also follow up on missing audits and high-risk audit exceptions and perform special audits as assigned.

Embezzlement of Church Funds

If a person has embezzled Church funds, the stake president or the chairman of the stake audit committee should be notified promptly. He notifies the Church Auditing Department (or the area financial controller if the unit is outside the United States and Canada). The Auditing Department (or area financial controller) sends a loss report form to the stake president or the chairman of the audit committee. He makes sure the form is properly completed and submitted.

If a major misuse of funds is discovered, the stake president or chairman of the audit committee also notifies a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency.

Stake Clerk or Assistant Stake Clerk Assigned to Finances

The stake clerk or the assistant stake clerk assigned to finances ensures that other clerks in the stake and wards are properly instructed in financial record keeping. He should be aware of audit findings. He also helps clerks promptly resolve any problems disclosed by audits.

For More Information

More information on audit committees, auditors, and audit procedures is included on the stake and ward audit report forms and instructions. Stake audit committees and auditors may direct questions to the Church Auditing Department (or area financial controller):

Church Auditing Department
50 East North Temple Street, Room 1687B
Salt Lake City, UT 84150-2200
Telephone: 1-801-240-4018 or 1-800-453-3860, extension 2-4018

Taxes

The tax information in this section applies only in the United States and Canada. If priesthood leaders in the United States and Canada need additional information, they should contact:

Tax Administration
50 East North Temple Street, Room 2223
Salt Lake City, UT 84150-3620
Telephone: 1-801-240-3003 or 1-800-453-3860,
extension 2-3003

Priesthood leaders outside the United States and Canada should contact the administration office to resolve questions on taxes.

Tax-Exempt Status

The Church normally is exempt from paying sales, property, income, and other taxes because it is a religious organization. Church buildings and other property are to be used for the purposes of worship, religious instruction, and other Church-related activities. Facilities are not to be used for political, business, or investment purposes as outlined on page 181. To do so violates laws that permit tax exemption of Church property.

It is important that stake and ward leaders follow these guidelines to preserve the Church's tax-exempt status. If one stake or ward misuses the Church's tax-exempt status, other Church units could be affected.

Sales and Use Tax

Sales and use tax laws and how they apply to the Church vary from state to state. Leaders should check local tax laws to see whether the Church is exempt or must pay such taxes.

Property Tax

The Tax Administration Division files all property tax exemptions and pays all required property taxes. No action is required by local leaders.

17. Physical Facilities

For units in the United States and Canada, the term administration office in this section refers to Church headquarters in Salt Lake City.

For units outside the United States and Canada, the term administration office refers to the Presiding Bishopric administration office or service center that serves the unit.

Purpose

Church physical facilities programs provide and maintain meetinghouses to help the Church fulfill its mission. Meetinghouses should (1) provide a spiritual setting for members to worship and (2) present an image of reverence and dignity in the community.

Organization

Physical Facilities Department

The Physical Facilities Department of the Church oversees the maintenance of existing meetinghouses and the construction or acquisition of new meetinghouses.

Administration Offices

Administration offices are extensions of the Physical Facilities Department. Professional staffs help local Church leaders with physical facilities matters as needed.

Multistake facilities management groups have been established to do physical facilities work under the direction of the administration office.

Stake Presidency

Members of the stake presidency ensure that Church facilities are appropriately used, cared for, and protected. They teach leaders and members their responsibilities for using and caring for these facilities. They assign a high councilor to be the stake physical facilities representative. They meet with him as needed to review needs and projects.

Stake Physical Facilities Representative

The stake physical facilities representative (a high councilor) assists the stake presidency in physical facilities matters as follows:

He helps teach and implement meetinghouse use and care standards.

He coordinates the distribution and control of keys.

He coordinates the instruction of ward building representatives in their duties.

He participates in annual meetinghouse inspections conducted by representatives of the administration office, unless the stake presidency designates an alternate to participate.

Stake Building Specialist for Water Conservation

As needed, the stake presidency or an assigned high councilor may call a stake building specialist for water conservation for each meetinghouse and recreational property in the stake. These specialists work under the direction of the stake physical facilities representative. This could be an opportunity for the participation of prospective elders, less-active members, and responsible Aaronic Priesthood youth.

These specialists assist the local facilities management group in watering lawns, trees, and shrubs. They test and operate irrigation controls and other water fixtures according to training provided by the facilities manager. They follow guidelines from the facilities manager on the frequency and duration of watering periods. They monitor the lawn at each property and adjust the irrigation system based on current weather conditions and watering needs.

Agent Bishop

If more than one ward meets in a building, the stake presidency assigns one bishop to be the agent bishop. He coordinates assignments for member participation in meetinghouse care and maintenance. He also coordinates safety and security procedures for the meetinghouse. In addition, he coordinates scheduling of the building with the stake and other wards that use it, though he may assign another member to do the scheduling.

Bishopric

Members of the bishopric are responsible for the use, care, and security of the meetinghouse. They teach ward members how to use and care for it. They organize member participation in meetinghouse care and maintenance, making assignments as needed. They also distribute meetinghouse keys.

Members of the bishopric ensure that appropriate safety precautions are taken in the meetinghouse and on the grounds (see page 164).

Ward Building Representative

Each ward should have a ward building representative. The bishop may appoint a member of the bishopric to serve in this position, or the bishopric may call another member to do so.

The ward building representative helps the bishopric with meetinghouse responsibilities such as energy conservation, safety, security, snow removal (if applicable), and member participation in cleaning and maintenance. He takes care of building-related needs during meetings, activities, and emergencies. If needed, he receives instruction from the stake physical facilities representative in operating sound, heating, air conditioning, and other building systems.

Members

Priesthood leaders should emphasize that member participation is a key factor in meetinghouse care and maintenance. Members are encouraged to provide individual or group services, depending on their skills and abilities.

Administration of Stake Physical Facilities

Use and Care of Meetinghouses

With help from the administration office, stake and ward programs for physical facilities ensure that meetinghouses and grounds are always neat, clean, attractive, and in good repair. Church facilities should reflect proper care and respect in every way.

Meetinghouse Maintenance and Inspection

Representatives of the administration office inspect each meetinghouse annually. The stake physical facilities representative, or an alternate who is designated by the stake president, participates in these inspections. He should have full authorization to act on behalf of the stake presidency in this capacity. Those who participate in these inspections identify building maintenance needs and make plans for repairing or renewing its systems and components and for making other needed improvements.

Meetinghouse Planning

The stake presidency provides information to help the administration office prepare and update a master plan of projected needs for future building sites and new or additional meetinghouse space.

Energy and Water Conservation

The Church incurs substantial utility costs for meetinghouses. Although stakes and wards do not bear these costs directly, leaders should ensure that lighting, heating, air conditioning, equipment, and water are used as economically as possible. Leaders should encourage those who use the meetinghouses to turn off lights and equipment when they are not needed and to follow other energy and water conservation practices.

In addition, leaders are encouraged to follow the energy and water conservation initiatives of local governments.

As needed, a stake building specialist for water conservation may be called for each meetinghouse and recreational property in the stake (see "Stake Building Specialist for Water Conservation" on page 163).

Safety, Security, Emergencies, and Loss Prevention

Priesthood leaders should instruct members, especially women and youth, not to be alone in an unlocked Church building.

Leaders should take reasonable measures to keep hallways, stairs, stairwells, exit doors, utility rooms, and sidewalks free of obstructions and other hazards. Leaders also ensure that hazardous materials or flammable items such as equipment fuel, hay, straw, and cornstalks are not used or stored in meetinghouses (see also "Decorations" on page 182).

Leaders control key distribution and establish effective building lockup procedures. They also see that interior classrooms and other rooms that do not contain valuable items are left unlocked.

Leaders ensure that local emergency telephone numbers for the police, fire department, and ambulance are posted on or near each telephone with brief instructions. They report intruders to the police immediately.

Accidents

The bishop and stake president should be notified promptly of:

1. An accident, injury, or illness that occurs on Church property or is the result of an occurrence during a Church-sponsored activity.
2. A missing person who was participating in a Church-sponsored activity.

3. Serious damage to private, public, or Church property that occurs during a Church-sponsored activity.

In these situations, leaders should observe the applicable guidelines listed below:

1. Render first aid. If a person needs medical care beyond simple first aid, contact emergency medical services, the bishop or stake president, and the parent, guardian, or other next of kin. In case of a missing person or fatality, immediately notify local law enforcement authorities and cooperate fully with them.
2. Provide emotional support and show empathy and concern.
3. Do not encourage or discourage legal action against the Church, and do not make commitments on behalf of the Church.

If a person has been seriously injured, if private or public property has been seriously damaged, or if legal action is threatened, the stake president (or the bishop under his direction) promptly:

1. Notifies the Risk Management Division at Church headquarters if the unit is in the United States or Canada (telephone 1-801-240-4049 or 1-800-453-3860, extension 2-4049; after business hours or on weekends, call 1-801-240-1000 or 1-800-453-3860, and the operator will contact someone immediately).

2. Notifies the administration office if the unit is not in the United States or Canada.

The stake president (or the bishop under his direction) should refer questions about claims against the Church to the Risk Management Division or the administration office.

Damage to Church Property

If Church property is seriously damaged, leaders should notify the facilities management group or the administration office.

Policies on Using Church Buildings and Other Property

See pages 181–83 and Facilities Management Guidelines for Meetinghouses and Other Church Property.

18. Creating, Changing, and Naming Church Units

For units in the United States and Canada, the term administration office in this section refers to Church headquarters in Salt Lake City.

For units outside the United States and Canada, the term administration office refers to the Presiding Bishopric administration office or service center that serves the unit.

Creating, Changing, or Discontinuing Church Units

Church units include stakes, districts, wards, and branches. They are created, changed, or discontinued only when the need is clearly demonstrated.

The following guidelines are intended to help ensure that units are divided only when they are sufficiently strong. Dividing a unit prematurely can weaken it before it becomes a center of strength. Premature divisions can also overburden members.

Stakes and Districts

Stakes are created from mission districts or by dividing existing stakes. In the United States and Canada, stakes generally should have a minimum of 3,000 members and five wards. In all other countries, stakes generally should have a minimum of 1,900 members and five wards. There is no fixed minimum number of members or branches needed to create a district.

All new stakes must have at least 24 active, full-tithe paying Melchizedek Priesthood holders, in addition to the required minimum of 15 such brethren in each ward in the stake.

To propose creating a stake or district, changing its boundaries, changing its name, or discontinuing it, the stake or mission president completes a Stake and District Organization Application form and marks any proposed boundary changes on a map. In the United States and Canada, stake and mission presidents can obtain an application form and a unit map from the Boundary and Leadership Change Committee support staff at Church headquarters (telephone 1-801-240-3500 or 1-800-453-3860, extension 2-3500). In other countries, stake and mission presidents can obtain application forms and unit maps from their administration office. If unit maps are not available from that office, leaders should obtain two standard, detailed maps with street or town indexes and use them to clearly identify unit boundaries.

A stake president who is proposing a stake change or a mission president who is proposing the creation of a stake from a mission district gives the completed application and maps to a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency. The proposal must have the written endorsement of the presidents of each affected stake or mission.

A member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency reviews all applications to ensure that instructions and guidelines have been followed. Before endorsing a proposal for a district to be made a stake, a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency ensures that the unit is well above the minimum guidelines and has been functioning at the desired level of maturity and strength. If the member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency endorses the proposal, the application and maps are submitted to the Boundary and Leadership Change Committee. Approval is given only by the First Presidency and the Quorum of the Twelve.

Wards and Branches in Stakes

Wards and branches in stakes are created from existing wards or from branches in stakes or missions. The stake president uses the same procedures for creating a branch as he does for a ward.

In the United States and Canada, wards generally should have at least 300 members. In all other countries, wards generally should have at least 150 members. There is no fixed minimum number of members needed to create a branch.

All new wards must have at least 15 Melchizedek Priesthood holders who are active in the Church, full-tithe payers, and capable of serving in a priesthood or auxiliary position. Normally all new wards must have at least one active, full-tithe paying Melchizedek Priesthood holder per 20 members. Requests for exceptions may be submitted in areas where this may not be possible.

To propose creating a ward or branch in a stake, changing its boundaries, changing its name, or discontinuing it, the stake president completes a Ward and Branch Organization Application form and marks any proposed boundary changes on a map. Instructions for obtaining the application form and maps are provided under "Stakes and Districts" on this page.

The stake president gives the completed application and maps to a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency. The proposal must have the written endorsement of the presidents of each affected stake or mission.

A member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency reviews all applications to ensure that instructions and guidelines have been followed. Before endorsing a proposal for a branch to be made a ward, a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency ensures that the unit is well above the minimum guidelines and has been functioning at the desired level of maturity and strength. If the member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency endorses the proposal, the application and maps are submitted to the Boundary and Leadership Change Committee. Approval is given only by the First Presidency.

When new wards are created, the stake president should also complete a Recommendation for New Bishop form for each bishop being recommended. This form should be submitted with the proposal. In the United States and Canada, this form can be obtained from the Office of the First Presidency. In other countries, it can be obtained from the administration office.

Branches in Missions

To propose creating a branch in a mission, changing its boundaries, changing its name, transferring it, or discontinuing it, the mission president completes a Ward and Branch Organization Application form and marks any proposed boundary changes on a map. Instructions for obtaining the application form and maps are provided under "Stakes and Districts" on page 167. The mission president gives the completed application and maps to a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency.

A member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency may give final approval or denial of a proposal to (1) create a branch in a mission, (2) discontinue it, or (3) change its boundaries if the change does not affect an adjacent district, mission, or stake. A member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency must send copies of approved applications and maps to the Boundary and Leadership Change Committee at Church headquarters before a unit number can be assigned.

A member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency may endorse but not give final approval of a proposal to (1) change the name of a branch in a mission, (2) transfer it to another district, mission, or stake, or (3) change its boundaries if the change would affect an adjacent district, mission, or stake. If the member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency endorses the proposal, the application and maps are submitted to the Boundary and Leadership Change Committee. Approval is given only by the First Presidency.

A member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency may endorse but not give final approval of a proposal to create or change a mission branch for young single adults, single adults, students, members who speak nonnative languages, members who have special needs, or members in the military. If the member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency endorses the proposal, the application and maps are submitted to the Boundary and Leadership Change Committee. Approval is given only by the First Presidency.

Nonnative Language Wards and Branches

Priesthood leaders should carefully foster the welfare of members within their boundaries who do not speak the predominant language. In circumstances where the conventional ward cannot provide for the needs of a nonnative language group, and when a language barrier exists among a sufficient number of members in a stake, the stake president may recommend that a nonnative language ward or branch be created. Such a ward generally should have at least 250 members. There is no fixed minimum number of members needed to create a branch.

Nonnative language units are created or changed using the procedures that are outlined in "Wards and Branches in Stakes" on pages 167-68. Approval is given only by the First Presidency.

Single Member Wards and Branches

Young Single Adult Wards and Branches

Creation. Most young single adults are best served as members of conventional wards. In some exceptional situations, units for young single adults may be created. If a stake includes 125 or more single members ages 21 through 30 who want to attend a young single adult ward, the stake president may recommend that such a ward be created. He may recommend that a young single adult branch be created if 50 or more unmarried members ages 21 through 30 live in the stake and want to attend.

If there are too few members to create a young single adult ward in one stake, stake presidents may recommend creating a young single adult ward with membership from more than one stake. If the First Presidency approves the recommendation, the ward may include young single adults who are members of two or more (usually limited to four) stakes. These stakes must be contiguous to the stake where the young single adult ward is located. The ward will be the responsibility of one of the participating stakes, as assigned by a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency.

Young single adult units are created or changed using the procedures that are outlined in "Wards and Branches in Stakes" on pages 167-68. Approval is given only by the First Presidency.

Membership. Generally, young single adult wards should not have more than 250 members. Membership is restricted to those who live within the stake(s) authorized to participate in the ward.

Members who are eligible to attend a young single adult ward may choose to be members of that ward or remain in their conventional ward. Membership records should be in the ward the person is attending.

Membership in a young single adult ward should be viewed as a temporary preparation for serving in a conventional ward. Members of young single adult wards normally should return to a conventional ward when they are married, when they reach the age of 31, or when warranted by other circumstances.

Single parents with children at home normally remain in their conventional ward so the children will have the benefit of Primary and youth programs. However, the parents may attend the activities of the young single adult ward.

Unmarried members ages 18 through 20 who live with their parents normally remain in their conventional ward. If they live away from home, they may attend a young single adult ward.

Single Adult Wards

Creation. In the exceptional circumstance that a stake includes 150 or more single adults ages 31 and older who want to be members of a single adult ward, the stake president may recommend that such a ward be created. Single adult wards are created or changed using the procedures outlined in "Wards and Branches in Stakes" on pages 167-68. Approval is given only by the First Presidency.

Membership. Members who are eligible to attend a single adult ward may choose to be members of that ward or remain in their conventional ward. Membership records should be in the ward the person is attending.

Single parents with children at home normally remain in their conventional ward so the children will have the benefit of Primary and youth programs. However, the parents may attend the activities of the single adult ward.

Student Stakes, Wards, and Branches

Creation. A stake president may recommend that a student stake be created when 1,500 or more members, married or single, attend a college or university located in his stake.

A stake president may recommend that a student ward be created when 125 or more members, married or single, attend a college or university located in his stake and want to attend a student ward.

Student units are created or changed using the procedures outlined on pages 167-68. Approval is given only by the First Presidency.

Membership. Single students who live in housing that is located on campus or owned by a university should be members of a student ward if one exists at the institution. Single students who live away from home but off campus may choose to be members of a student ward or of the conventional ward where they reside. If there is more than one student ward in the area, and if students choose to attend a student ward, they should be members of the ward that includes their living quarters in its boundaries.

Unmarried students who live with their parents normally remain in their conventional ward.

Unmarried members who are not students do not normally attend student wards. Exceptions may be made in stakes that do not have a single member ward if the bishop of the home ward feels that it would be in the member's best interest to belong to a student ward. Such exceptions must be approved by the parents (where appropriate), by both bishops, and by both stake presidents.

Married students may choose to be members of a student ward or of the conventional ward where they reside.

Special Needs Wards and Branches

Wards or branches may be created for groups of members who have special needs, such as hearing-impaired members or members in care centers, residential treatment programs, or prisons. These units are created or changed using the procedures outlined in "Wards and Branches in Stakes" on pages 167-68. Approval is given only by the First Presidency.

Military Wards and Branches

Members in military service normally participate in the wards or branches near their military installation. However, a military ward or branch may be organized when there are sufficient numbers of military personnel in an area and when at least one of the following statements applies:

1. The military personnel are in a foreign country where they do not understand the language spoken in the local ward or branch.
2. The military personnel are unable to leave the military installation because of training requirements or other restrictions.

Military wards and branches are created or changed using the procedures outlined in "Wards and Branches in Stakes" on pages 167–68. Approval is given only by the First Presidency.

When a stake or mission president organizes a military ward or branch that meets on a military installation, he should be aware that members who are not associated with the military will probably not be allowed to attend on the installation.

If the number of Latter-day Saints on a military installation does not warrant the creation of a military branch, local leaders should establish a service member group. For information on service member groups, see page 138.

Naming Church Units

When necessary as new units are created, local leaders are invited to submit unit names to a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency. They review all proposed unit names to ensure that the instructions and guidelines have been followed. If they endorse the proposal, it is submitted to the Boundary and Leadership Change Committee for review. All final decisions for naming Church units are made by the First Presidency.

Stakes and Districts

The name of a stake or district should uniquely identify it from other stakes or districts. Generally, names of existing stakes and districts should not be changed.

The first word of the stake or district name is the name of the city where the headquarters of the stake or district is located.

In the United States and Canada, the second word is usually the state or province in which the stake or district is located. In other countries the second word is usually the name of the country. Any exceptions to this policy must be approved by the Office of the First Presidency. (One such exception is that stakes in Salt Lake City do not include the word Utah.)

When the name of a city is repeated in the name of its state, province, or country, the name of the state, province, or country is not used as part of the stake or district name. Examples are shown below:

Colorado Springs East Stake, not Colorado Springs Colorado East Stake

Guatemala City Central Stake, not Guatemala City Guatemala Central Stake

Idaho Falls Eagle Rock Stake, not Idaho Falls Idaho Eagle Rock Stake

Mexico City Azteca Stake, not Mexico City Mexico Azteca Stake

When more than one stake or district is in the same city, the third word is an identifying characteristic, such as a compass direction (North, South, East, or West), the name of a community, or the name of a geographical feature that is within or adjacent to unit boundaries. Other directional terms (such as Southwest), names of people, numbers, or segregating terms (such as Spanish or Hearing Impaired) should not be used.

Wards and Branches

The name of a ward or branch should uniquely identify it so that people in the community can recognize and locate it. The name should be chosen carefully so it will not need to be changed later. Generally, names of existing wards and branches should not be changed.

The ward or branch should be named after a city, subdivision, neighborhood, street, or geographical feature that is within or adjacent to unit boundaries. The name of only one city, subdivision, neighborhood, street, or geographical feature should be used in the unit name. If there is more than one ward or branch with the same name, a number should be added as part of the name, such as Montevideo First Ward, Montevideo Second Ward, and Montevideo Third Ward. The name of the ward or branch should be in the language of the area. If the language does not use the Roman alphabet, a translation using Roman characters should be included. Compass directions (such as East or Northwest), names of people, and segregating terms (such as Spanish or Hearing Impaired) should not be included in the name.

Basic Unit Program

Units of the Church are at different stages of development and have different needs. As authorized by the Area Presidency, the Basic Unit Program may be used for establishing and organizing the Church where any of the following conditions apply:

1. The Church is in its beginning stages.
2. Members are scattered.
3. The number of members is small, and leadership is just beginning to develop.
4. Wards and stakes are not yet organized.
5. Members have special language needs or other special needs.

Units in the Basic Unit Program are typically small branches. These branches may be created when there are two or more families in an area and at least one of the members is a worthy priest in the Aaronic Priesthood or a worthy Melchizedek Priesthood holder.

Guidelines for the Basic Unit Program are provided in the Basic Unit Program Guidebook. Other helpful information for all branch leaders is provided in the Branch Guidebook, Priesthood and Auxiliary Leaders' Guidebook, Family Guidebook, and Teaching Guidebook.

Growth of Church Units

The organization, auxiliaries, and programs of a Church unit should grow only as fast as the size and maturity of the unit permits. Leaders should not try to organize all the programs outlined in this handbook unless they have the strength of leadership and the number of members needed to do so. Trying to develop the full program of the Church prematurely can overburden members and may lead them to withdraw from Church activity.

19. Church Policies

For units in the United States and Canada, the term administration office in this section refers to Church headquarters in Salt Lake City.

For units outside the United States and Canada, the term administration office refers to the Presiding Bishopric administration office or service center that serves the unit.

This section consists of five parts, each of which includes subtopics in alphabetical order:

1. General Authority and Area Seventy policies
2. Administrative policies
3. Policies on using Church buildings and other property
4. Medical and health policies
5. Policies on moral issues

General Authority and Area Seventy Policies

Autographs and Photographs

Church members should not seek the autographs of General Authorities or Area Seventies, including signing in their scriptures, hymnals, or programs. Doing so detracts from their sacred callings and the spirit of meetings. It also could prevent them from greeting other members.

Members should not take photographs of General Authorities or Area Seventies in chapels.

Privately Published Writings

Members should not ask General Authorities or Area Seventies to coauthor or endorse Church books or other Church writings.

Recording Talks or Addresses

Church members should not record talks or addresses that General Authorities and Area Seventies give at stake conferences, missionary meetings, or other meetings. Members may record broadcasts of general conference on home equipment for personal, noncommercial use.

Statements Attributed to Church Leaders

From time to time, statements are circulated that are inaccurately attributed to leaders of the Church. Many such statements distort current Church teachings and are based on rumors and innuendos. They are never transmitted officially, but by word of mouth, e-mail, or other informal means. Church members are encouraged never to teach or pass on such statements without verifying that they are from approved Church sources, such as official statements, communications, and publications.

Any notes made when General Authorities, Area Seventies, or other general Church officers speak at stake conferences or other meetings should not be distributed without the consent of the speaker. Personal notes are for individual use only.

Administrative Policies

Accidents and Other Serious Situations

See pages 164–65.

Activities

See pages 276–80 in Book 2.

Adopted Children and Their Natural Parents

Local Church leaders should discourage adopted children and their adoptive parents from seeking to identify the children's natural parents. When adopted children have genetic or medical problems, the family may seek medical information about the natural parents but should be discouraged from seeking their identities.

Adoption and Foster Care

Members who are seeking to adopt children or provide foster care should strictly observe all legal requirements of the countries (and their governmental subdivisions) that are involved. They are encouraged to work through licensed, authorized agencies. Leaders should not become involved in bypassing such agencies to help place children privately or independently. Such placements are not sanctioned by the Church and may violate local laws.

For information about placing children for adoption, see "Unwed Parents" on pages 188–89.

Audiovisual Materials

Members may use audiovisual materials such as compact discs, audiocassettes, DVDs, videocassettes, and slides in Church settings with the following restrictions:

1. They may not be used during sacrament meetings (although appropriate recorded musical accompaniment may be used if a piano, organ, or accompanist is not available).
2. They may not be used if such use is restricted by copyright (see pages 175–77).
3. They may not be used if they contain material that is not suitable for Church settings.

Audiovisual materials that meet these criteria may be used in the chapel during meetings other than sacrament meeting if they are an important part of the meeting.

Bible

The Church uses the King James Version of the Bible for English-speaking members. The First Presidency has stated:

“Many versions of the Bible are available today. . . . The most reliable way to measure the accuracy of any biblical passage is not by comparing different texts, but by comparison with the Book of Mormon and modern-day revelations.

“While other Bible versions may be easier to read than the King James Version, in doctrinal matters latter-day revelation supports the King James Version in preference to other English translations” (First Presidency letter, May 22, 1992).

Ideally, English-speaking members should use the LDS edition of the King James Bible. This edition includes the Topical Guide; footnotes; excerpts from the Joseph Smith Translation; cross-references to the Book of Mormon, Doctrine and Covenants, and Pearl of Great Price; and other study aids.

The First Presidency and Quorum of the Twelve have selected an edition of the Bible for preferred use in many non-English languages. Members should use this edition of the Bible. It is available through Church Distribution Services.

Book of Mormon

The Church discourages rewriting the Book of Mormon into familiar or modern English. The First Presidency has said:

“When a sacred text is translated into another language or rewritten into more familiar language, there are substantial risks that this process may introduce doctrinal errors or obscure evidence of its ancient origin. To guard against these risks, the First Presidency and Council of the Twelve give close personal supervision to the translation of scriptures from English into other languages and have not authorized efforts to express the doctrinal content of the Book of Mormon in familiar or modern English. (These concerns do not pertain to publications by the Church for children.)” (First Presidency statement, Ensign, Apr. 1993, page 74).

Church Employees

Church employees are to uphold Church standards at all times. To begin or continue employment, they must be worthy to have a temple recommend. This includes employees of the Church Educational System and Church universities and colleges.

Periodically representatives of the Church Human Resource Department will contact stake presidents or bishops to verify the temple worthiness of current or potential Church employees. These requests may be written or made by telephone and should be responded to promptly.

Church employees must comply with employment laws. Local leaders should contact their administration office for information on applicable laws.

Church Name and Logotype

The Church’s name and logotype are registered trademarks and should be used according to the following guidelines.

The written name of the Church (not the logotype) may be used in local units when all of the conditions listed below are met:

1. The activity or function with which the name is associated (for example, a sacrament meeting program) is officially sponsored by the unit.
2. The name of the local Church unit is used as a prelude to the name of the Church (for example, Canyon View Ward of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints).
3. The typeface does not imitate or resemble the official logotype.

The Church’s logotype is to be used only for official Church applications. Local units may use it only on publications and materials they officially sponsor.

Only the official logotype should be used (see the front cover of this handbook). Members should not re-create the logotype with fonts from their computers. Copies of the logotype that may be photocopied or scanned are provided in Church Name and Logotype Guidelines for Local Units.

The name of the local unit should always accompany the logotype, but the logotype should not be used as part of a phrase or sentence. For example, the following phrase shows inappropriate use of the logotype: "Presented by the Canyon View Ward of [logotype]."

The logotype should be large enough to be easily read but not so large that it dominates an item. It should be surrounded by sufficient open space so it can be seen clearly. It should not be mixed, overlapped, or placed close to other patterns, symbols, logos, or competing elements.

The logotype should not be used as a decorative element or a computer screen saver.

The logotype should be displayed with good contrast. It should not be shaded or printed in a bright color.

The logotype should not be used in any personal, commercial, or promotional way, such as on family history books, T-shirts, buttons, or banners.

Examples of acceptable and unacceptable uses are provided in Church Name and Logotype Guidelines for Local Units.

Church Web Sites

The Church has established a number of global Web sites and e-mail networks. There may also be Church-sponsored country or area Web sites, stake and ward Web sites on LDS.org, and e-mail services for priesthood leaders and missionaries. Church Web sites and other network services contain approved content, meet the legal requirements of copyrights and privacy, and can be recognized by the presence of the Church logo. No other Church Web sites are authorized. This restriction includes but is not limited to temples, missions, visitors' centers, auxiliaries, quorums, classes, Scout units, and committees for special events.

The Church has developed an approved Web-site format that can be tailored by each stake and ward where approved. This system is the only authorized way for local Church units to have a presence on the Internet. It includes news and announcements, calendars, leadership and membership directories, and facilities scheduling. Only these approved items are available on the site. No other information should be added. Participation is voluntary.

Stake presidents who want their stakes to participate should obtain a form from the Member and Statistical Records Division at Church headquarters:

Member and Statistical Records Division
Attn: Local Unit Web Sites
50 East North Temple Street, Room 1320
Salt Lake City, UT 84150-5300

Telephone: 1-801-240-3500 or 1-800-453-3860,
extension 2-3500
E-mail: msrmail@ldsmail.net

Computers

As authorized by the Church's presiding councils, some Church units are provided computers for purposes such as record keeping and family history. The stake president oversees the placement and use of computers in the stake. Guidelines for obtaining and managing Church computers are available from the administration office. These guidelines provide information about matters such as computer hardware and software, donated computers, Internet and on-line networks, repairs, disposal of computers, stolen or damaged computers, security, and use by ward members.

Where necessary, stake presidents should arrange to make ward and stake computers available for members to use family history software programs. Ward and stake computers are not authorized for other personal uses.

Since these computers are used for confidential Church records, Church record-keeping programs should be password protected to prevent unauthorized access when the computers are being used for other purposes (see pages 150–51 for more instructions about protecting confidential information). Computers should be placed so bishopric members and clerks can process members' weekly contributions in privacy.

For restrictions on duplicating computer software, see page 176.

The stake presidency assigns an assistant stake clerk (or the stake clerk if necessary) to be the stake technology specialist. He manages Church computers in the stake, including those in family history centers. These responsibilities are outlined on pages 141–42.

Copyrighted Materials

Copyright is protection given by law to the owners of original works of authorship that are expressed in a tangible form, including:

1. Literary, musical, dramatic, and choreographic works.
2. Works of art, photography, and sculpture.
3. Audiovisual works (such as movies and videos, CDs, and DVDs).
4. Computer programs or games.
5. Internet and other electronic databases.

Only copyright owners may authorize duplication (copying), distribution, public performance, public display, or derivatives of their work. Using a work in any of these ways without authorization from the copyright owner is illegal and dishonest.

A user of a work should assume that it is protected by copyright. Published works usually include a copyright notice such as "© 1959 by John Doe." (For sound recordings, the symbol is ®.) However, even works that do not have this notice may be protected by copyright. Furthermore, the fact that a publication is out of print does not nullify its copyright or justify duplicating, distributing, performing, displaying, or making derivatives of it without permission.

The Church's Intellectual Property Office (IPO) assists in processing requests to use copyrighted information in Church materials or programs, including materials that are copyrighted by Intellectual Reserve, Inc. (IRI). IRI is a separate, nonprofit corporation that owns the intellectual property of the Church.

The following questions and answers may help members understand and abide by copyright laws when using copyrighted materials at church and at home. If members have questions that are not answered in these guidelines, they may contact:

Intellectual Property Office
50 East North Temple Street, Room 1888
Salt Lake City, UT 84150-3011
Telephone: 1-801-240-3959 or 1-800-453-3860,
extension 2-3959
Fax: 1-801-240-1187
E-mail: cor-intellectualproperty@ldschurch.org

Can I copy pictures from Church magazines? Pictures in Church publications may usually be copied for Church, home, and family use. However, they may not be copied for commercial purposes without specific written permission from the IPO. If a picture is restricted from being copied, words such as "may not be copied" will appear in the credits for the image. Internet use follows the same general guidelines.

Can I copy published Church materials? Church publications may usually be copied for Church, home, and family use. However, no commercial use may be made of Church materials without specific written permission from the IPO.

Can I copy music? Special copyright laws apply to music. Generally, a person may copy music from Hymns and the Children's Songbook for Church, home, and family use except where a restriction against copying is expressly noted on the hymn or song. Members should never copy music that has been purchased from commercial sources unless they receive written permission from copyright owners.

Can I alter, copy, or segment Church-produced audiovisual materials? No. Church-produced audiovisual materials should be used in accordance with prescribed instructions in the manuals and on the packaging materials.

Can I copy materials not owned by the Church? No. Copyright laws govern the use of privately owned materials. Most often there are restrictions giving the conditions the public must follow before copying intellectual property. These restrictions are usually listed near the beginning of a publication. Church members should carefully follow all local laws and not violate national or international copyright laws.

Can I show commercial audiovisual products at Church functions? Generally not. Church members should not violate warnings and restrictions placed on commercial audiovisual products. Using commercial audiovisual products at Church functions would be considered a public performance and would require a public performance license.

Can I download or duplicate computer software and other programs for Church use? Generally not. Computer programs and other software may not be duplicated or downloaded unless all licenses have been appropriately purchased. As an exception, Church family history programs may be downloaded at no charge.

Can I download or distribute materials that I find on Church Web sites? The Church has created several Web sites, such as LDS.org, Mormon.org, and FamilySearch.org. All material found on Church-owned Web sites, including visuals, text, icons, displays, databases, and general information, may be viewed, downloaded, and printed only for personal, family, and Church use unless otherwise indicated. Material from these sites may not be posted, transcribed, or distributed to other Web sites or computer networks without permission from the IPO. Church-owned sites and any information on these sites, including the names and addresses of those who have submitted information, may not be used for selling or promoting products or services, soliciting clients, or any other commercial purpose.

For additional information, see the rights and use information associated with the Web sites.

What permission is needed to present musical and theatrical productions? Productions that are owned by the Church or IRI may be performed in Church settings without permission from Church headquarters. If a copyrighted production is not owned by the Church, members must obtain the copyright owner's permission to perform all or part of it in a Church setting. Usually the copyright owner requires fees or royalties even if no charge is made for the performances. All presentations should have the approval of local priesthood leaders.

Counseling

See pages 25–27.

Dating or Get-Acquainted Businesses for Single Members

Dating and get-acquainted businesses often promote their services to single members of the Church. Church meetinghouses, classes, or programs may not be used to promote private business ventures, including dating and get-acquainted businesses or services. Lists of Church groups or other information about members should not be given to such businesses.

Directories

Stake and ward directories may be published according to the following instructions:

Names, addresses, and phone numbers may be included in a directory only if they are listed in a commercial telephone directory or, if they are unlisted, if the member gives permission. E-mail addresses may be included only with the member's permission.

Stake or ward budget funds are used to pay for directories. Directories may not contain advertising.

Leaders should not distribute directories outside the stake or ward boundaries or permit their use for commercial or political purposes.

The beginning of each directory should include a statement that it is to be used only for Church purposes and should not be copied without permission of the bishop or stake president.

E-Mail for Priesthood Leaders

The Church has established an e-mail system for communicating with priesthood leaders and for them to communicate with each other. Priesthood leaders will be notified when this system is available to them.

Emigration of Members

Generally, Church members are encouraged to remain in their native lands to build up and strengthen the Church. Opportunities for Church activity and for receiving and sharing the blessings of the gospel are increasing greatly throughout the world. Missionaries should not ask their parents, relatives, or others to sponsor members who wish to emigrate to other countries.

Experience has shown that those who emigrate often encounter language, cultural, and economic challenges, resulting in disappointment and personal and family difficulties.

As members throughout the world remain in their homelands, working to build the Church there, great blessings will come to them personally and to the Church. Stakes and wards throughout the world will be strengthened, making it possible to share the blessings of the gospel with an even greater number of Heavenly Father's children.

Members who emigrate to any country should comply with applicable laws.

When coming to the United States or other countries on student or tourist visas, members should not expect to find jobs or obtain permanent visas after entering that country.

To be considered for Church employment in any country, a person must meet all conditions of immigration and naturalization laws. The Church does not sponsor immigration through Church employment. Any exceptions require advance approval from the First Presidency.

Fast Day

A proper fast day observance includes abstaining from food and drink for two consecutive meals, attending fast and testimony meeting, and giving a generous fast offering to help care for those in need.

Fund-Raising

See page 161.

Gambling

The Church opposes gambling in any form, including government-sponsored lotteries. Members are urged to join with others who have similar concerns in opposing the legalization and government sponsorship of any form of gambling.

Guest Speakers or Instructors

The bishop's approval is required before guest speakers or instructors may participate in any ward meeting, including auxiliary meetings. The stake president's approval is required for such participation in stake meetings.

The bishop or stake president should carefully screen guest speakers or instructors and the subjects of their presentations (this may include contacting the person's bishop). He ensures that:

1. Presentations are in harmony with Church doctrine.
2. Guest speakers or instructors are not paid a fee, do not recruit participants, and do not solicit customers or clients.
3. The travel expenses of guest speakers or instructors are not paid either with local unit budget funds or by private contributions.
4. Presentations comply with the guidelines for using Church facilities (see "Policies on Using Church Buildings and Other Property" on pages 181-83).

Income Taxes

Church members are obligated by the twelfth article of faith to obey the tax laws of the nation where they reside (see also D&C 134:5). Members who disapprove of tax laws may try to have them changed by legislation or constitutional amendment. Members who have well-founded legal objections may challenge tax laws in the courts.

Church members who refuse to file a tax return, pay required income taxes, or comply with a final judgment in a tax case are in direct conflict with the law and with the teachings of the Church. Such members may be ineligible for a temple recommend and should not be called to positions of principal responsibility in the Church. Members who are convicted of willfully violating tax laws are subject to Church discipline to the extent warranted by the circumstances.

Laws of the Land

Church members should obey, honor, and sustain the laws in any country where they reside or travel (see D&C 58:21-22; Articles of Faith 1:12). This includes laws that prohibit proselyting.

Legal Matters

When legal help is needed for Church matters in the United States and Canada, the stake president should contact the Office of General Counsel at Church headquarters (telephone 1-801-240-6301 or 1-800-453-3860, extension 2-6301). Outside the United States and Canada, stake presidents should contact the administration office to obtain local legal counsel.

To avoid implicating the Church in legal matters to which it is not a party, Church leaders should avoid testifying in civil or criminal cases reviewing the conduct of members over whom they preside. In the United States and Canada, a leader should confer with the Church's Office of General Counsel if he is subpoenaed, is considering testifying in a lawsuit, is asked to communicate with attorneys or civil authorities regarding legal proceedings, or is asked to offer verbal or written testimony. Outside the United States and Canada, leaders should contact the administration office to obtain local legal counsel in these situations.

Church leaders should not try to persuade alleged victims or other witnesses either to testify or not to testify in criminal or civil court proceedings.

Lotteries

See "Gambling" on page 177.

Mail from Church Headquarters

Some businesses and individuals send local leaders promotional items that might appear to be official Church correspondence. To distinguish official Church correspondence from other correspondence, it is always conveyed personally by Church leaders, in a letter from Church leaders on Church letterhead stationery, or by announcement in a Church publication. Only these items require Church leaders' attention and action.

Mail Sent to Church Headquarters

Local leaders should place a return address on all letters and other items of correspondence sent to Church headquarters, in addition to the return address on the envelope in which the item is sent.

Members' Communication with Church Headquarters

Members of the Church are discouraged from making telephone calls or writing letters to General Authorities about doctrinal issues or personal matters. With an ever-increasing Church membership, responding personally to these inquiries presents an almost insurmountable task and would make it difficult for General Authorities to fulfill the duties for which they alone are responsible. The General Authorities love the members of the Church and do not want them to feel that they are without the support and guidance they need. However, all things need to be done with wisdom and order.

The Lord has organized His Church so there is accessible to every member a bishop or branch president and a stake, district, or mission president who serve as spiritual advisers and temporal counselors. By reason of their callings, these local leaders are entitled to the spirit of discernment and inspiration to enable them to counsel members within their jurisdiction (see the "Interviews and Counseling" section on pages 23–27).

Members are encouraged to turn to these leaders when they need counsel or have doctrinal questions. Members and local leaders will be blessed as they pray and counsel together to resolve matters of concern to them. Members should also be encouraged to seek guidance from the Holy Ghost to help them in their personal lives and in their family and Church responsibilities.

In most cases, any correspondence from members to General Authorities will be referred back to their local leaders. Priesthood leaders who need further clarification about doctrinal issues may write in behalf of their members to the First Presidency.

Members' Occupations, Professions, and Affiliations

Baptism into the Church, priesthood ordinations, and the issuing of temple recommends are based on the personal worthiness of each individual as established by a careful interview. Members of the Church should endeavor to be involved in activities and employment upon which they can conscientiously ask the blessings of the Lord and which are consistent with the principles of the gospel and the teachings of the Savior.

Other Faiths

Much that is inspiring, noble, and worthy of the highest respect is found in many other faiths. Missionaries and other Church members must be sensitive and respectful toward the beliefs of others and avoid giving offense. Mission presidents and other priesthood leaders who have questions about relationships with non-Christian faiths should contact a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency.

Overnight Activities

See page 278 in Book 2.

Political and Civic Activity

While affirming the right of expression on political and social issues, the Church is neutral regarding political parties, political platforms, and candidates for political office. It does not endorse any political party, political platform, or candidate. Nor does it advise its members how to vote. However, in some exceptional instances the Church does take a position on specific legislation.

Candidates for public office should not imply that their candidacy is endorsed by the Church or its leaders. Church leaders and members should avoid statements or conduct that might be interpreted as Church endorsement of any political party, platform, or candidate.

As citizens of their countries and communities, Church members are urged to be full participants in political and governmental affairs, including involvement in the political party of their choice. Members are also urged to be actively engaged in worthy causes to improve their communities and make them wholesome places in which to live and rear families.

Members are encouraged to register to vote, to study issues and candidates carefully and prayerfully, and to vote for individuals whom they believe will act with integrity and will most nearly carry out their ideas of good government. Latter-day Saints have a special obligation to seek out, vote for, and uphold leaders who are honest, good, and wise (see D&C 98:10).

Church members are urged to be willing to serve in elected and appointed public offices in local and national government.

Members are encouraged to participate as responsible citizens in supporting measures and candidates that strengthen society morally, economically, and culturally. They are also encouraged to support measures that are designed to maintain and strengthen the family as the fundamental unit of society.

Church members, including those who hold public office, should not imply or give the impression that they represent the Church as they work for solutions to social or community problems.

Church records, directories, mailing lists, and similar materials may not be used for political purposes. Church facilities may not be used for political purposes except for voter registration or polling where there is no reasonable alternative (see page 181).

Postal Regulations

In the United States and some other countries, it is a violation of postal regulations to place any material without postage in or on mailboxes. This includes ward or stake newsletters, announcements, flyers, and other Church-related materials. Church leaders should instruct members and missionaries not to place such items in or on mailboxes and encourage them to find appropriate ways to distribute these materials.

Privacy of Members

Church leaders are obligated to protect the privacy of members. Church records, reports, directories, and similar materials may not be used for personal, commercial, or political purposes (see also pages 150–51).

Referring to the Church and Its Members

As the Church grows across boundaries, cultures, and languages, the use of its revealed name, The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (see D&C 115:4), is increasingly important in our responsibility to proclaim the name of the Savior throughout all the world. Accordingly, references to the Church should include its full name whenever possible. Following an initial reference to the full name of the Church, the contractions “the Church” or “the Church of Jesus Christ” are acceptable.

Referring to the Church as “the Mormon Church,” “the Latter-day Saints Church,” or “the LDS Church” is discouraged.

When referring to Church members, it is preferable to use the phrase “members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.” As a shortened reference, “Latter-day Saints” is preferred and “Mormons” is acceptable.

The word Mormon will continue to be used in proper names like the Book of Mormon or the Mormon Tabernacle Choir. It will also continue to be used as an adjective in phrases such as “Mormon pioneers.” In addition, it may be necessary to use the word Mormon to identify the Church as it is commonly known in some countries.

Research Studies in the Church

The Church’s only authorized research agency is the Research Information Division of the Correlation Department. Representatives of this department use questionnaires and interviews to obtain information on issues of concern to General Authorities. When Church-authorized researchers contact members by mail or phone, they provide the Church’s toll-free number and a contact name at headquarters. In addition, they always allow the respondent the option of not answering any or all of the questions on the survey.

Church meetings may not be used for collecting information by unauthorized persons or agencies. Nor should the names of Church members be made available to such persons or agencies. If local leaders want to verify the authorization of questionnaires or interviews, they should contact the Research Information Division (telephone 1-801-240-2727 or 1-800-453-3860, extension 2-2727).

Safety in Church Welfare Operations

Many Church welfare operations have equipment and machinery that can cause injury if it is not used properly. Agent stake operating committees and managers of welfare operations should ensure the safety of the employees and volunteers. Workers should be instructed regularly in safety practices. The work environment should be inspected periodically with health and safety hazards corrected. Adequate supervision should always be provided to ensure that workers follow instructions, use tools and equipment properly, and avoid hazardous behavior.

Normally those who work at welfare operations should be 16 or older. Those who operate equipment should be mature, adequately trained, and experienced in using the equipment. Only adults may operate power equipment.

The operations manager should report accidents to Welfare Services (1-801-240-3001 or 1-800-453-3860, extension 2-3001) and the Risk Management Division at Church headquarters (see page 165 for contact information).

Sales Agents

Local leaders should not accept the claims of sales agents that the Church or a Church leader has authorized them to call on local leaders or members to sell their products.

Satellite and Video Equipment

Church satellite and video equipment may be used only for noncommercial, Church-related purposes as authorized by the stake presidency or bishopric. This equipment may not be used to record television, cable, or satellite programs that are not sponsored by the Church. Nor may Church satellite equipment be used to view non-Church programs. Members may not direct the antenna from one satellite or transponder to another without authorization from Church headquarters.

Only people who are trained to operate the equipment may do so. Youth may help operate it only if they are supervised.

All equipment is to be locked securely when not in use. It may not be removed from the building for home or personal use.

Solicitation of Funds

The established programs of the Church provide financial assistance for worthy individuals and appropriate causes. Church assistance is administered by bishops, who are familiar with the circumstances and can prevent duplicate assistance and abuses. Therefore, members should not solicit additional financial assistance from Church headquarters or from local leaders or members.

If members receive a request for funds, they could respond by saying that they have contributed in their own wards to provide funds for assistance according to established principles of Church welfare.

Symposia and Similar Gatherings

The Church warns its members against symposia and similar gatherings that include presentations that (1) disparage, ridicule, make light of, or are otherwise inappropriate in their treatment of sacred matters or (2) could injure the Church, detract from its mission, or jeopardize its members' well-being. Members should not allow their position or standing in the Church to be used to promote or imply endorsement of such gatherings.

Taxable Activities

Ward and stake leaders should ensure that local Church activities do not jeopardize the Church's tax-exempt status. For guidelines, see "Fund-Raising" on page 161 and "Policies on Using Church Buildings and Other Property" on this page.

Travel of Men and Women Together

A man and a woman may travel as a pair to Church meetings or assignments only if they are married to each other or are both single. For other Church travel policies, see pages 279-80 in Book 2.

Policies on Using Church Buildings and Other Property

Church buildings and other property are to be used for worship, religious instruction, and other Church-related activities. Church property should not be used for commercial or political purposes, which would violate laws that permit its tax exemption. Nor may property be used for other purposes that would violate these laws. Examples of uses that are not approved are listed below:

1. Renting or leasing Church facilities for commercial purposes.
2. Promoting business ventures or investment enterprises, including posting commercial advertising or sponsoring commercial entertainment.
3. Buying, selling, or promoting products, services, publications, or creative works or demonstrating wares.
4. Holding unauthorized fund-raising projects (see page 161).
5. Hosting speakers or instructors who are paid a fee, who recruit participants, or who solicit customers or clients while giving seminars, lessons, aerobics classes, and so on. Exceptions may be made to use meetinghouse pianos and organs for paid private instruction (see page 294 in Book 2).
6. Holding athletic events that are not sponsored by the Church, including practices.
7. Holding political meetings or campaigns. As an exception, Church facilities may be used for voter registration and as polling places at the request of voting officials if:
 - a. There is no reasonable alternative.
 - b. The officials and voters maintain Church standards in the building.
 - c. The event will not pose physical danger to the building.
 - d. The event will not harm the image of the Church.

Use of Church property should not pose significant risk of harm to participants or to the property. Nor should it unduly expose the Church to liability or disturb surrounding neighbors.

For more detailed instructions on using and caring for Church buildings and other property, see Facilities Management Guidelines for Meetinghouses and Other Church Property or contact the administration office.

Artwork

Artwork in Church buildings should be of high quality and depict subjects that are appropriate in a house of worship. It should also be properly framed. Church-approved pictures can be obtained through the facilities management group or from Church Distribution Services.

Pictures and other artwork may be placed in appropriate locations in the meetinghouse. However, they may not be placed in the chapel or near the baptismal font. Statues, murals, or mosaics are not authorized. This policy does not apply to works of art that have been on display for many years in the chapels of existing meetinghouses.

If artwork of poor quality is offered, local leaders should tactfully decline accepting it for display in meetinghouses.

Decorations

Decorations for Christmas, other holidays, and other similar occasions may be placed temporarily in the foyer or cultural hall of a meetinghouse, as approved under the direction of the stake presidency. With the exception of flowers, decorations may not be placed in the chapel area of the meetinghouse. Nor should the exterior of the meetinghouse or the grounds be decorated.

Decorations must be modest and inexpensive and must not be a fire hazard. Hay, straw, palm fronds, other dehydrated materials, and candles may not be used. If Christmas trees are used, they should be artificial or properly fireproofed and displayed without electric lights or candles. Local fire and safety codes and ordinances should be observed.

Dedicating Buildings

All new meetinghouses, as well as major additions that contain a chapel, a cultural hall, or an area larger than the existing structure, should be dedicated as soon as possible after the project is completed.

Smaller buildings such as mission homes, institutes, seminaries, and classroom or office additions to meetinghouses may also be dedicated if local leaders desire.

Final approval for dedication is given by a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency in coordination with the administration office. A member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency works with the stake or mission president and indicates who is responsible for dedicating the building.

The program for a dedicatory service should be in keeping with the purpose of the event. It should not be lengthy or include extensive musical presentations. Sufficient time should be provided for the assigned leader to speak and to dedicate the building. Following the dedicatory prayer, there should be an appropriate hymn or musical selection and a short prayer to close the service.

Dedicatory prayers of buildings may be recorded with permission from the presiding authority.

Emergencies

During an emergency, the stake presidency determines whether or not to hold regular ward meetings.

In a community-wide emergency or disaster, the stake president may assist legitimate disaster relief agencies by allowing meetinghouses to be used as emergency shelters. The Church retains control, and those who use a meetinghouse under these conditions should maintain Church standards. For more information, see page 10.

See page 164.

Firearms

Churches are dedicated for the worship of God and as havens from the cares and concerns of the world. The carrying of lethal weapons, concealed or otherwise, within their walls is inappropriate except as required by officers of the law.

Fires and Candles

Open flames and lighted candles may not be used in Church buildings.

Flags

The national flag may be flown on the grounds of Church property at any time as long as it conforms to local custom and convention. The national flag may be displayed inside Church buildings on special occasions, such as patriotic programs. Genuine patriotism does not require displaying the national flag continuously in places of worship.

Groundbreaking Services

After a new building project is approved, local leaders may conduct a groundbreaking service in preparation for the construction. This service is not to be held on Sunday.

Historic Preservation

All questions about placing Church-owned property or buildings on national or local historic preservation lists or registries should be directed to Church headquarters through a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency. For questions about marking, commemorating, or preserving other sites, artifacts, works of art, or documents, contact the Family and Church History Department at 1-801-240-4648 or 1-800-453-3860, extension 2-4648.

Meetinghouse Construction, Rental, or Purchase

For policies about construction, rental, or purchase of meetinghouses, see Facilities Management Guidelines for Meetinghouses and Other Church Property.

Meetinghouse Plans

The Church has prepared a variety of standard meetinghouse plans to fit the circumstances and needs of members throughout the world. When a new meetinghouse is to be constructed, a suitable standard plan is selected. That plan outlines the policy for the rooms, features, and equipment that are included in the meetinghouse.

Monday Nights

See page 278 in Book 2.

Overnight Lodging or Camping

Church meetinghouse properties may not be used for overnight lodging, camping, or slumber parties.

Parking Lots

Use of Church parking lots should comply with the guidelines on page 181. In addition, Church parking lots should not be used for commuter parking without permission from the administration office.

Photographs and Video Recordings in Chapels

Taking photographs or making video recordings in chapels is not permitted.

Property Rights and Ownership

All property assigned to or held for the benefit of local units belongs to the Church, not to the units. Nevertheless, local units have broad autonomy in using Church-owned property, including buildings, land, and other property, subject to the ownership and policies of the Church.

Recreational Property Administration

For information about administration of recreational property, see Facilities Management Guidelines for Meetinghouses and Other Church Property.

Serving Areas

The serving area in Church meetinghouses is not intended for food preparation or cooking unless it is part of a lesson, demonstration, or other instruction. When food is to be served in the building or on the grounds, it should be prepared elsewhere and brought to the meetinghouse, where it may be kept warm or cold until it is served.

Signs

The name of the Church is to be displayed on all meetinghouses and other Church buildings in the approved language and logo. It is to be mounted on the building. Under certain conditions the name of the Church may also be mounted on the grounds on a stand-alone sign.

Storage

The only storage allowed in meetinghouses is for maintenance items and other approved supplies and equipment. Welfare commodities and other such items may not be stored in meetinghouses.

Materials such as gasoline, propane, matches, and camping gear should be stored in buildings that are separate from the meetinghouse.

Cars, recreational vehicles, and other personal equipment may not be stored on Church property.

Using Meetinghouses outside of Stake Boundaries

All meetinghouses within reasonable distance of a ward must be occupied to their designed capacity before additional facilities will be provided. When necessary, stake presidencies, in consultation with a member of the Presidency of the Seventy or the Area Presidency, may assign wards to use meetinghouses in an adjacent stake. More than one stake may use a stake center if it is conveniently located.

Medical and Health Policies

Acquired Immunodeficiency Syndrome (AIDS)

See "Human Immunodeficiency Virus (HIV)" on page 184.

Autopsies

Autopsies may be performed if the family of the deceased gives consent and if the autopsy complies with the law.

Cremation

Normally, cremation is not encouraged. However, in some countries the law requires it. The family of the deceased must decide whether to cremate the body, taking into account any laws governing burial or cremation. Where possible, the body of a deceased member who has been endowed should be dressed in temple clothing when the body is cremated (see "Temple Burial Clothing" on page 81). A funeral service may be held.

Euthanasia

Euthanasia is defined as deliberately putting to death a person who is suffering from an incurable condition or disease. A person who participates in euthanasia, including so-called assisted suicide, violates the commandments of God. (See also "Prolonging Life" in the next column.)

Human Immunodeficiency Virus (HIV) and Acquired Immunodeficiency Syndrome (AIDS)

Members who are infected with HIV or who have AIDS should be treated with dignity and compassion. If infection has resulted from transgression of God's laws, the Church advocates the example of the Lord, who condemned the sin yet loved the sinner and encouraged repentance. Members should reach out with kindness and comfort to the afflicted, ministering to their needs and helping them find solutions to their problems.

Although HIV and AIDS can afflict innocent victims, the principal safeguards are chastity before marriage, total fidelity in marriage, abstinence from any homosexual relations, avoidance of illegal drugs, and reverence and care for the body.

Attendance of people with HIV infection or AIDS at Church meetings does not pose a serious health problem. Public health authorities affirm that HIV has not been transmitted through casual contact in homes, schools, churches, or places of work.

Those who occasionally may need to clean up blood or render first aid should learn and follow the recommendations of the local health department.

For information about performing ordinances for people who are infected with HIV or who have AIDS, see page 34.

Hypnosis

The use of hypnosis under competent, professional medical supervision for the treatment of diseases or mental disorders is a medical question to be determined by competent medical authorities. Members should not participate in hypnosis for purposes of demonstration or entertainment.

Medical and Health Practices

Members should not use medical or health practices that are ethically or legally questionable. Local leaders should advise members who have health problems to consult with competent professional practitioners who are licensed in the countries where they practice. Fast-offering funds may not be used to help pay for medical care that is beyond the usual and customary practice unless priesthood leaders have received approval in advance from the First Presidency in each case (see pages 8-9).

Organ and Tissue Donations and Transplants

The donation of organs and tissues is a selfless act that often results in great benefit to individuals with medical conditions. The decision to will or donate one's own body organs or tissue for medical purposes, or the decision to authorize the transplant of organs or tissue from a deceased family member, is made by the individual or the deceased member's family.

The decision to receive a donated organ should be made after receiving competent medical counsel and confirmation through prayer.

Prolonging Life

When severe illness strikes, members should exercise faith in the Lord and seek competent medical assistance. However, when dying becomes inevitable, it should be seen as a blessing and a purposeful part of eternal existence. Members should not feel obligated to extend mortal life by means that are unreasonable. These judgments are best made by family members after receiving wise and competent medical advice and seeking divine guidance through fasting and prayer.

Self-Awareness Groups

Many private groups and commercial organizations have programs that purport to increase self-awareness, self-esteem, and spirituality. Some groups promise to enhance individual agency or improve family relationships. Some offer "experiential" or "empowerment" training.

Some of these groups have falsely claimed or implied that the Church has endorsed their programs. However, the Church has not endorsed any such enterprise, and Church members are warned against believing such claims. The fact that the Church has not formally challenged such an enterprise should not be perceived as a tacit endorsement or stamp of approval.

Church members are also warned that some of these groups advocate concepts and use methods that can be harmful. In addition, many such groups charge exorbitant fees and encourage long-term commitments. Some intermingle worldly concepts with gospel principles in ways that can undermine spirituality and faith.

These groups tend to promise quick solutions to problems that normally require time and personal effort to resolve. Although participants may experience temporary emotional relief or exhilaration, old problems often return, leading to added disappointment and despair.

Church members should not participate in groups that:

1. Challenge religious and moral values or advocate unwarranted confrontation with spouse or family members as a means of reaching one's potential.
2. Imitate sacred rites or ceremonies.
3. Foster physical contact among participants.
4. Meet late into the evening or in the early-morning hours.
5. Encourage open confession or disclosure of personal information normally discussed only in confidential settings.
6. Cause a husband and wife to be paired with other partners.

Church leaders are not to pay for, encourage participation in, or promote such groups or practices. Also, Church facilities may not be used for these activities. Local leaders should counsel members that true self-improvement comes through living gospel principles. Members who have social or emotional problems may consult with priesthood leaders for guidance in identifying sources of help that are in harmony with gospel principles.

Stillborn Children (Children Who Die before Birth)

Grieving parents whose child dies before birth should be given emotional and spiritual support. Temple ordinances are not performed for stillborn children. However, this does not deny the possibility that a stillborn child may be part of the family in the eternities. Parents are encouraged to trust the Lord to resolve such cases in the way He knows is best. The family may record the name of a stillborn child on the family group record followed by the word stillborn in parentheses. Memorial or graveside services may be held as determined by the parents.

It is a fact that a child has life before birth. However, there is no direct revelation on when the spirit enters the body.

Word of Wisdom

The only official interpretation of "hot drinks" (D&C 89:9) in the Word of Wisdom is the statement made by early Church leaders that the term "hot drinks" means tea and coffee.

Members should not use any substance that contains illegal drugs. Nor should members use harmful or habit-forming substances except under the care of a competent physician.

Policies on Moral Issues

Abortion

The Lord commanded, "Thou shalt not . . . kill, nor do anything like unto it" (D&C 59:6). The Church opposes elective abortion for personal or social convenience. Members must not submit to, perform, pay for, arrange for, or encourage an abortion. The only possible exceptions are when:

1. Pregnancy resulted from rape or incest.
2. A competent physician determines that the life or health of the mother is in serious jeopardy.
3. A competent physician determines that the fetus has severe defects that will not allow the baby to survive beyond birth.

Even these exceptions do not justify abortion automatically. Abortion is a most serious matter and should be considered only after the persons responsible have consulted with their bishops and received divine confirmation through prayer.

The Church has not favored or opposed legislative proposals or public demonstrations concerning abortion. However, the First Presidency encourages members, as citizens, to let their voices be heard in appropriate and legal ways that will evidence their belief in the sacredness of life. (See Ensign, Mar. 1991, page 78.)

Church members who submit to, perform, pay for, arrange for, or encourage an abortion may be subject to Church discipline.

As far as has been revealed, a person may repent and be forgiven for the sin of abortion.

Abuse and Cruelty

The Church's position is that abuse cannot be tolerated in any form. Those who abuse or are cruel to their spouses, children, other family members, or anyone else violate the laws of God and man. All members, especially parents and leaders, are encouraged to be alert and diligent and do all they can to protect children and others against abuse and neglect.

Members who have abused others are subject to Church discipline. They should not be given Church callings and may not have a temple recommend. Even if a person who abused a child sexually or physically receives Church discipline and is later restored to full fellowship or readmitted by baptism and confirmation, leaders should not call the person to any position working with children or youth unless the First Presidency authorizes removal of the annotation on the person's membership record.

In instances of abuse, the first responsibility of the Church is to help those who have been abused and to protect those who may be vulnerable to future abuse. Victims of sexual abuse (including rape) often suffer serious trauma and feelings of guilt. Victims of the evil acts of others are not guilty of sin. Church leaders should be sensitive to such victims and give caring attention to help them overcome the destructive effects of abuse.

Stake presidents and bishops should make every effort to counsel those who have been involved in abuse. Members may also need professional counseling. When appropriate, bishops should contact LDS Family Services to identify resources to provide such counseling in harmony with gospel principles. If the transgressor is an adult who has committed a sexual transgression against a child, the behavior may be very deep-seated and the process of repentance and reformation may be very prolonged.

In the United States, Canada, and selected other countries, the Church has established a help line to provide guidance to bishops and stake presidents in cases of abuse (in the United States and Canada, the telephone number is 1-801-240-1911 or 1-800-453-3860, extension 2-1911). If one of these leaders becomes aware of physical or sexual abuse involving Church members, or if he believes that a person may have been abused or is at risk of being abused, he should call the help line. He will be able to consult with social services, legal specialists, and other specialists who can help answer questions and formulate steps that should be taken. In countries that do not have a help line, stake presidents and bishops should contact the Area Presidency for guidance. A bishop should also notify his stake president of instances of abuse.

If confidential information indicates that a member's abusive activities have violated applicable law, the bishop or stake president should urge the member to report these activities to the appropriate government authorities. Leaders can obtain information about local reporting requirements through the help line. Where reporting is required by law, the leader should encourage the member to secure qualified legal advice.

To avoid implicating the Church in legal matters to which it is not a party, leaders should avoid testifying in civil or criminal cases or other proceedings involving abuse. For specific guidelines, see "Legal Matters" on page 178.

For additional information, stake presidents and bishops may refer to the booklet Responding to Abuse: Helps for Ecclesiastical Leaders and the pamphlets Preventing and Responding to Spouse Abuse and Preventing and Responding to Child Abuse. The video Protect the Child: Responding to Child Abuse also outlines the responsibilities of leaders and other members in preventing and responding to child abuse. All ward councils are asked to view the program and discuss it according to the guide on the back of the video jacket.

Adoption and Foster Care

See pages 173 and 188-89.

Artificial Insemination

Artificial insemination with semen from anyone but the husband is strongly discouraged. However, this is a personal matter that ultimately must be left to the judgment of the husband and wife. Responsibility for the decision rests solely upon them.

Artificial insemination of single sisters is not approved. Single sisters who deliberately refuse to follow the counsel of Church leaders in this matter are subject to Church discipline.

For information about the sealing of children who were conceived by artificial insemination, see page 87.

Birth Control

It is the privilege of married couples who are able to bear children to provide mortal bodies for the spirit children of God, whom they are then responsible to nurture and rear. The decision as to how many children to have and when to have them is extremely intimate and private and should be left between the couple and the Lord. Church members should not judge one another in this matter.

Married couples should also understand that sexual relations within marriage are divinely approved not only for the purpose of procreation, but also as a means of expressing love and strengthening emotional and spiritual bonds between husband and wife.

Chastity and Fidelity

The Lord's law of moral conduct is abstinence from sexual relations outside of lawful marriage and fidelity within marriage. Sexual relations are proper only between husband and wife, expressed within the bonds of marriage. Adultery, fornication, homosexual or lesbian relations, and every other unholy, unnatural, or impure practice are sinful. Members who violate the Lord's law of moral conduct or who influence others to do so are subject to Church discipline (see First Presidency letter, Nov. 14, 1991).

Euthanasia

See page 184.

Homosexual Behavior

Homosexual behavior violates the commandments of God, is contrary to the purposes of human sexuality, distorts loving relationships, and deprives people of the blessings that can be found in family life and in the saving ordinances of the gospel. Those who persist in such behavior or who influence others to do so are subject to Church discipline. Homosexual behavior can be forgiven through sincere repentance.

While opposing homosexual behavior, the Church reaches out with understanding and respect to individuals who are attracted to those of the same gender.

If members have homosexual thoughts or feelings or engage in homosexual behavior, Church leaders should help them have a clear understanding of faith in Jesus Christ, the process of repentance, and the purpose of life on earth. Leaders should also help them accept responsibility for their thoughts and actions and apply gospel principles in their lives.

In addition to the inspired assistance of Church leaders, members may need professional counseling. When appropriate, bishops should contact LDS Family Services to identify resources to provide such counseling in harmony with gospel principles.

For additional suggestions, stake presidents and bishops may refer to the booklet Understanding and Helping Those Who Have Homosexual Problems: Suggestions for Ecclesiastical Leaders. See also "Same-Gender Marriages" in the next column.

In Vitro Fertilization

In vitro fertilization using semen from anyone but the husband or an egg from anyone but the wife is strongly discouraged. However, this is a personal matter that ultimately must be left to the judgment of the husband and wife. Responsibility for the decision rests solely upon them.

For information about the sealing of children who were conceived by in vitro fertilization, see page 87.

Occult Affiliation

Members should not engage in forms of so-called Satan worship or affiliate in any way with the occult. "Such activities are among the works of darkness spoken of in the scriptures. They are designed to destroy one's faith in Christ, and will jeopardize the salvation of those who knowingly promote this wickedness. These things should not be pursued as games, be topics in Church meetings, or be delved into in private, personal conversations" (First Presidency letter, Sept. 18, 1991).

Pornography

The Church opposes pornography in any form. Indulgence in pornography damages individual lives, families, and society. Such indulgence also drives away the Spirit of the Lord. Members should avoid all forms of pornographic material and oppose its production, dissemination, and use.

Prolonging Life

See page 184.

Same-Gender Marriages

Marriage between a man and a woman is ordained of God. The Church accordingly opposes same-gender marriages and any efforts to legalize such marriages. Church members are encouraged "to appeal to legislators, judges, and other government officials to preserve the purposes and sanctity of marriage between a man and a woman, and to reject all efforts to give legal authorization or other official approval or support to marriages between persons of the same gender" (First Presidency letter, Feb. 1, 1994; see also "Homosexual Behavior" in the previous column).

As a doctrinal principle, based on the scriptures, the Church affirms that marriage between a man and a woman is essential to God's plan for the eternal destiny of His children. The powers of procreation are to be exercised only between a man and a woman who are lawfully wedded as husband and wife.

Any other sexual relations, including those between persons of the same gender, undermine the divinely created institution of the family. The Church accordingly favors measures that define marriage as the union of a man and a woman and that do not confer legal status on any other sexual relationship.

While opposing same-gender marriage, the Church reaches out with understanding and respect to individuals who are attracted to those of the same gender. See also "Homosexual Behavior" on page 187.

Sex Education

Parents have primary responsibility for the sex education of their children. Teaching this subject honestly and plainly in the home will help young people avoid serious moral transgressions. To help parents teach this sensitive and important information, the Church has published A Parent's Guide.

Where schools have undertaken sex education, parents should seek to ensure that the instructions given to their children are consistent with sound moral and ethical values.

Sperm Donation

The donation of sperm is strongly discouraged.

Suicide

It is wrong to take a life, even one's own. However, a person who commits suicide may not be responsible for his or her acts. Only God can judge such a matter.

Leaders should counsel and compassionately console the family members of a person who has committed suicide. The family, in consultation with the bishop, determines the place and nature of a funeral service for a person who has died under such circumstances. Church facilities may be used.

A person who has seriously considered suicide or has attempted suicide should be counseled by his or her bishop and may be encouraged to seek professional help. For more information, see Identification and Prevention of Suicidal Behavior.

Surgical Sterilization (Including Vasectomy)

The Church strongly discourages surgical sterilization as an elective form of birth control. It should be considered only if (1) medical conditions seriously jeopardize life or health or (2) birth defects or serious trauma have rendered a person mentally incompetent and not responsible for his or her actions. Such conditions must be determined by competent medical judgment and in accordance with law. Even then, the persons responsible for this decision should consult with each other and with their bishop and should receive divine confirmation of their decision through prayer.

Surrogate Motherhood

Surrogate motherhood is strongly discouraged.

Unwed Parents

Church members who are involved in pregnancy out of wedlock are encouraged to go to their bishop. By virtue of his priesthood office and calling, he can counsel with them as they make important decisions that affect their own well-being and that of the child. He can also help them begin the process of repentance. Because of the social and emotional issues inherent in such situations, the bishop should consider referring the unwed parents to LDS Family Services (where available), regardless of whether they choose to marry, place their child for adoption, or keep the child without getting married.

The First Presidency has stated:

"Children are entitled to birth within the bonds of matrimony, and to be reared by parents who provide love, support, and all the blessings of the gospel" (First Presidency letter, June 15, 1998).

"Parents and priesthood and auxiliary leaders are encouraged to teach members to live chaste and virtuous lives and prepare to receive the ordinances of the temple. Children sealed to parents have claim upon the blessings of the gospel beyond what others are entitled to receive.

"When a man and woman conceive a child out of wedlock, every effort should be made to encourage them to marry. When the probability of a successful marriage is unlikely due to age or other circumstances, unwed parents should be counseled to place the child for adoption through LDS Family Services to ensure that the baby will be sealed to temple-worthy parents. Adoption is an unselfish, loving decision that blesses both the birth parents and the child in this life and in eternity.

"Birth parents who do not marry should not be counseled to keep the infant as a condition of repentance or out of a sense of obligation to care for one's own. Unwed parents are not able to provide the blessings of the sealing covenant. Further, they are generally unable to provide a stable, nurturing environment which is so essential for the baby's well-being. Unmarried parents should give prayerful consideration to the best interests of the child and the blessings that can come to an infant who is sealed to a mother and father" (First Presidency letter, June 26, 2002; see also "Adoption and Foster Care" on page 173).

If LDS Family Services agencies are not available, leaders should encourage the confidential placement of the child for adoption with a temple-worthy couple through a local licensed agency. LDS Family Services and most other licensed agencies are designed to protect the interest of the child, screen the adoptive couple before placement, and provide needed supervision and counseling.

If an unwed parent decides to keep the child, leaders and other members should treat the parent and child with compassion and concern. Leaders should encourage the parent to have the child given a name and a blessing (see page 31).

For information about whether young women who have children out of wedlock should attend Relief Society or Young Women meetings, see pages 207 and 227 in Book 2.

LDS Family Services has established a toll-free help line (1-800-537-2229) for unwed parents and others to obtain help regarding pregnancies and related matters. Help line staff members provide sensitive, confidential counseling based on gospel principles. The help line is available in all areas of the United States and Canada. Members and non-members may call the number directly or call the local LDS Family Services agency. If leaders do not know the number of the local agency, they may call the help line to obtain that information.

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

By the merest accident, a few months ago, in New York City, the Publishers became personally acquainted with Mr. T. B. H. Stenhouse, of Salt Lake City, the husband of the Author of the present volume, and before they separated, preliminary steps were taken for its publication.

Almost a year before that time, Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, the talented author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," had addressed a kind note to Mrs. Stenhouse, congratulating her upon the appeal which she had made on behalf of the women of Utah, in a little work which she had then just published. Some correspondence subsequently ensued between the two ladies who had so successfully attacked "the twin relics of barbarism"—polygamy and slavery. They afterwards became personally acquainted; and when Mrs. Stenhouse requested Mrs. Stowe to write the preface for her new work, that gifted author unhesitatingly replied: "I am happy to be able to do the least thing which can show how heartily I sympathise with the effort you are making. May God bless both it and you, is the prayer of yours ever truly,—H. B. STOWE."

PREFACE

BY

MRS. HARRIET BEECHER STOWE.

IN these pages, a woman, a wife and mother, speaks the sorrows and oppressions of which she has been the witness and the victim.

It is because her sorrows and her oppressions are those of thousands, who, suffering like her, cannot or dare not speak for themselves, that she thus gives this history to the public.

It is no sensational story, but a plain, unvarnished tale of truth, stranger and sadder than fiction.

Our day has seen a glorious breaking of fetters. The slave-pens of the South have become a nightmare of the past; the auction-block and whipping-post have given place to the church and school-house; and the songs of emancipated millions are heard through our land.

Shall we not then hope that the hour is come to loose the bonds of a cruel slavery whose chains have cut into the very hearts of thousands of our sisters—a slavery which debases and degrades womanhood, motherhood, and the family?

Let every happy wife and mother who reads these lines give her sympathy, prayers, and efforts to free her sisters from this degrading bondage. Let all the womanhood of the country stand united for them. There is a power in combined enlightened sentiment and sympathy before which every form of injustice and cruelty must finally go down.

May He who came to break every yoke hasten this deliverance.

HARRIET BEECHER STOWE.

PREFACE.

IN the fall of the year 1869, a few earnest, thinking men, members of the Mormon Church, and living in Salt Lake City, inaugurated what was regarded at the time as a grand schism. Those who had watched with anxiety the progress of Mormonism, hailed the "New Movement" as the harbinger of the work of disintegration so long anticipated by the thoughtful-minded Saints, and believed that the opposition to Theocracy then begun, would continue until the extraordinary assumptions of the Mormon priesthood were exploded, and Mormonism itself should lose its political status and find its place only among the singular sects of the day.

It was freely predicted that Woman, in her turn, would accept her part in the work of reformation, take up the marriage question among the Saints, and make an end of polygamy.

Little did I imagine at that period, that any such mission as that which I have since realised as mine, was in the Providence of Time awaiting me, or that I should ever have the boldness, either with tongue or pen, to plead the cause of the Women of Utah. But, impelled by those unseen influences which shape our destinies, I took my stand with the "heretics;" and, as it happened, my own was the first woman's name enrolled in their cause.

The circumstances which wrought a change in my own life produced a corresponding revolution in the life of my husband.

In withdrawing from the Mormon Church, we laid ourselves, our associations and the labors of over twenty years, upon the altar, and took up the burden of life anew. We had sacrificed everything in obedience to the "counsel" of Brigham Young; and my husband, to give a new direction to his mind, and also to form some plan for our future life, thought it advisable that he should visit New York. He did so; and shortly after employed himself in writing a history of the Mormon Church, which has since been published.

In course of time, the burden of providing for a large family, and the anxiety and care of conducting successfully a business among a people who make it a religious duty to sternly set their faces against those who dissent from their faith, exhausted my physical and mental strength. Considering, therefore, that change might be beneficial to me, and my own personal affairs urgently calling me to New York City, I followed my husband thither.

On my way East, I met a highly-valued friend of my family, who, in the course of our journey together over the Pacific Railroad, enthusiastically urged me to tell the story of my life, and to give to the world what I knew about Polygamy. I had been repeatedly advised to do so by friends at home, but up to that time no plan had been arranged for carrying out the suggestion.

I had hardly arrived in New York, before the electric messenger announced that a severe snow-storm was raging on the vast plains between the Rocky Mountains and the Missouri River, and for several weeks all traffic over the Union Pacific Railroad was interrupted, and I could not return to my home in the distant West.

That unlooked-for snow-blockade became seriously annoying; for not only was I most anxious to return to my children, but also, never having known an idle hour, I could not live without something to do. At that moment of unsettled feeling, a lady-friend, with whom I was visiting, suggested again "the book;" and she would not permit me to leave her house, until she had exacted from me a promise that it should be written.

Next morning, I began my task in earnest. I faithfully kept my room and labored unremittingly; and in three weeks the manuscript of my little work on "Polygamy in Utah," was completed.

It was issued in pamphlet form, and was very kindly welcomed by the press—both secular and religious—and for this I was sincerely grateful. I had not, up to that time, thought of much else than its effect upon the people of Utah; but the voluminous notices which that little book received, showed the deep interest which the people of the United States had taken in "the Mormon question," and how ardently they desired to see the extinction of the polygamic institution among the Saints.

In Salt Lake City, I was so situated that I was daily—I might almost say hourly—brought in contact with visitors to the Modern Zion; for, during the summer, thousands of travellers pass over the Pacific Railroad. Not a few of these called to see me; and I received from ladies and gentlemen—whose kind interest in my welfare I felt very deeply—many personal attentions, many words of sympathy and encouragement, and many intelligent and useful suggestions in respect to my future life. Indeed, I saw myself quite unexpectedly, and, I may truthfully say, without my own desire, become an object of interest.

By the earnest suggestions of friends and strangers, and by the widely published opinions of the press, I was made to feel that I had but begun my work—that I had but partly drawn aside the veil that covered the worst oppression and degradation of woman ever known in a civilised country. Nearly all who spoke to me expressed their surprise that intelligent men and women should be found in communion with the Mormon Church, in which it was so clearly evident that the teachings of Christianity had been supplanted by an attempt to imitate the barbarism of Oriental nations in a long past age, and the sweet influences of the religion of Jesus were superseded by the most objectionable practices of the ancient Jews. How persons of education and refinement could ever have embraced a faith that prostrated them at the feet of the Mormon Prophet, and his successor Brigham Young, was to the enquiring mind a perfect mystery.

The numerous questions which I had to answer, and the explanations which I had to give, shewed me that my little book had only whetted the appetite of the intelligent investigator, and that there was a general call for a woman's book on Mormonism, a book that should reveal the inner life of the Saints,—exhibit the influences which had contributed to draw Christian people away from Christian Churches to the standard of the American Prophet, Joseph Smith, and subject them to the power of that organisation which has, since his death, subjugated the mass of the Mormon people in Utah to the will and wickedness of the Priesthood under the leadership of Brother Brigham.

There have from time to time appeared many works on Mormonism which professed to give an insight into the “inner life” of the Saints. Some of those books were written by women; some by visitors to Utah, or persons who had resided for a longer or shorter period in the Territory; and more than one at least was published under the name of women who claimed to be members of the Mormon Church. How untrustworthy the accounts of visitors and Gentiles are, and the reason why such should be the case, I shall hereafter, in the course of this volume, have occasion to explain;—and that the autobiographies of supposed Mormon women were equally unreliable, the following facts will clearly demonstrate.

A French Lady—a Countess and a woman of the world—Madame Olympe Odouard—came to see me in Salt Lake City. She was a woman of intelligence and quick perception, with whom to spend an hour was a perfect pleasure. After her return to France, she, of course, wrote a book, entitled Le Far West. And in that book, (page 335,) she said:

“Il y a deux grands journaux à Salt Lake City: le New Deseret et le New Telegraph. Mr. Stenhouse, le redacteur en chef du premier, est un homme éminemment instruit. Allemand d'origine, il parle le Français très purement. Sa femme, née Française, est une femme du monde, bonne, charmante, très-instruite, bonne musicienne, et mère de treize beaux enfants. C'est une ex-Sœur de Charité et la seule femme Catholique et Française què soit parmi les Mormons."

Some of my readers may perhaps have forgotten their French lessons : I, therefore, translate :

There are two principal journals in Salt Lake City—the New Deseret and the New Telegraph. Mr. Stenhouse is editor-in-chief of the first. He is a well-taught man of German origin, and speaks the French language with the greatest purity. His wife, a French lady, is a woman of the world—good looking, charming, well educated, a good musician, and the mother of thirteen fine children. She is an ex-Sister of Charity, and the only French Catholic who has joined the "Mormon Church."

Now here is an example in type. Let us judge of its truthfulness. In the first place there never was such a paper as the New Deseret or the New Telegraph. The Deseret News has been in existence for some years. My husband assisted on its staff, but he was never editor-in-chief. The Daily Telegraph was my husband's own paper, but it never appeared under any other name. Little items may seem of small importance, but in a case where truthfulness is called in question, they are worth mentioning. Mr. Stenhouse is a Scotchman by birth, and I am an Englishwoman. His acquaintance with the French tongue is, of course, limited ; while I, for my part, never was, or will be, either a Roman Catholic or a Sister of Charity. Ten, and not thirteen "fine" children are all who call me mother ; and at the time when Madame Olympe wrote there were only eight. Here I state the whole case briefly. Let the reader judge of the truthfulness of "travellers' stories."

That comprehensive and truthful works on this subject have appeared, I readily admit, but most of them are mere sketches :—such, for example, as that by Secretary Ferris—a Gentile, but a fair and impartial author ;—or else were published—as that, for instance, by John Hyde, a good man and a vigorous writer—so many years ago that they are now, to a great extent, out of date. Mrs. Waite is the best Gentile lady-writer ; but for obvious reasons, although she was a woman of intelligence and penetration, her knowledge of the inner life of Mormonism was necessarily circumscribed.

Two books appeared, each claiming to be written by genuine Mormon women. They were, however, originally published fifteen or twenty years ago ; and although they are still on sale, they are, as a matter of course, silent concerning recent events. The first of these two volumes was really written by a gentleman who was himself neither a Mormon nor had any intimate acquaintance with the system and doctrines of that people. He obtained from the lady—the supposed author—all the information which she was capable of imparting, and then worked it up in a startling and sensational manner, mingling facts and fiction in such a way that the Mormons have always declared that the whole volume was a scandalous libel.

The other volume was first published nearly twenty years ago. It was professedly written by the wife of a Mormon elder ; but it was really the production of an old lady in New Jersey, who had never even been out to Utah, and who drew entirely upon her own imagination for all that she could not adapt from other sensational writers on Mormonism. This book was first published by a New York firm, and being supposed by the innocent public to be genuine, it had an extraordinary circulation—forty or fifty thousand being sold. The publishers, however, failed, and the stereotype plates passed into other hands. Subsequently the work having come under the notice of a subscription firm at Hartford, they negotiated for the use of the plates. One word of the heading of each page was cut out, a new title was selected, some old illustrations and a few new ones were added, and an ancient steel-plate portrait, which had once done duty in some book of poetry or illustrated volume of fashionable beauties of years ago, was vamped up, and the supposed signature of the fictitious author was engraved beneath it. This book, now re-christened, and apparently a new volume, was launched upon the market. It is at the present moment advertised in many local newspapers, and the confiding public cheerfully buy it under the impression that it is the genuine production of a Mormon woman. Such is the history of some of the so-called autobiographies which have appeared.

I mention these facts to show that the demand for a true history by a real Mormon woman has never yet been supplied. It was this knowledge which induced me to publish my former little work, and encourages me to hope that the present volume may meet with acceptance.

A few months after the publication of my first book, I was invited to lecture upon "Polygamy in Utah," and wherever I spoke I observed the same spirit of enquiry and met with a renewed demand for more of circumstance and narrative—which I had, from a sense of personal delicacy, withheld in my former work.

I saw no way of satisfying myself and others than by accepting the rather spiteful invitation of a certain Mormon paper to "TELL IT ALL," and this, in a narrative of my own personal experience, which I now present to the reader, I have endeavored to do. Myself not in any sense a literary woman, or making any pretensions as a writer, I hope to escape severe criticism from the public and the press. I had a simple story to tell—the story of my life and of the wrongs of women in Utah. Startling and terrible facts have fallen under my observation. These also I have related; but my constant effort has been to tell my story in the plainest, simplest way, and to avoid exaggeration, but never shrink from a straightforward statement of facts. I have disguised nothing, and palliated nothing; and I feel assured that those who from their actual and intimate acquaintance with Mormonism in Utah as it really is, are capable of passing a just and impartial judgment upon my story, will pronounce without hesitation that I have told "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

THE story which I propose to tell in these pages is a plain, unexaggerated record of facts which have come immediately under my own notice, or which I have myself personally experienced.

Much that to the reader may seem altogether incredible, would to a Mormon mind appear simply a matter of ordinary every-day occurrence with which everyone in Utah is supposed to be perfectly familiar. The reader must please remember that I am not telling—as so many writers have told in newspaper correspondence and sensational stories—the hasty and incorrect statements and opinions gleaned during a short visit to Salt Lake City; but my own experience—the story of a faith, strange, wild, and terrible it may be, but which was once so intimately enwoven with all my associations that it became a part of my very existence itself; and facts, the too true reality of which there are living witnesses by hundreds and even thousands who could attest if only they would.

With the reader's permission I shall briefly sketch my experience from the very beginning.

I was born in the year 1829, in St. Heliers, Jersey—one of the islands of the English Channel.

From my earliest recollection I was favorably disposed to religious influences, and when only fourteen years of age I became a member of the Baptist Church, of which my father and mother were also members. With the simplicity and enthusiasm of youth I was devoted to the religious faith of the denomination to which I had attached myself, and sought to live in a manner which should be acceptable to God.

My childhood passed away without the occurrence of any events which would be worthy of mention, although, of course, my mind was even then receiving that religious bias which afterwards led me to adopt the faith of the Latter-day Saints. Like most girls in their teens I had a natural love of dress—a weakness, if such it be, of the sex generally. I was not extravagant, for that I could not be; but thirty years ago members of dissenting churches were more staid in their dress and demeanor and were less of the world, I think, than they are to-day. In plainness of dress the Methodists and Baptists much resembled the Quakers. My girlish weakness caused me to be the subject of many a reprimand from older church-members, who were rather strict in their views. I well remember one smooth-faced, pious, corpulent brother who was old enough to be my father, saying to me one day: "My dear young sister, were it not for your love of dress, I have seriously thought that I would some day make you my wife." I wickedly resolved that if a few bright colored ribbons would disgust my pious admirer, it should not be my fault if he still continued to think of me. But many of our other church-members were more lenient. Our good minister in particular bore with my childish imperfections, as he said, on account of my youth and inexperience; and later still, when I was ready to leave my native island, an extra ribbon or a fashionable dress had not affected my standing in the Baptist denomination.

I mention these trifles, not because I attach any importance to them in themselves, but because similar religious tendencies and a devotional feeling were almost universally found to be the causes which induced men and women to join the Mormon Church. From among Roman Catholics, who place unquestioning confidence in their priesthood, and also from among persons predisposed to infidelity, came few, if any, converts to Mormonism. But it was from among the religiously inclined—the Evangelical Protestants of the Old World that the greater number of proselytes came.

But to return to my story. I was one of the younger members of a large family; and when I thought of the future I readily saw that if I desired a position in life I should have to make it for myself; and this I resolved to do. I began by consulting all my friends who I thought would be able to counsel or assist me in carrying out my determination; and before long I found the opportunity which I sought. An English lady, the wife of a captain in the British army, to whom I had confided my aspirations, proposed—although I was not yet fifteen years of age—to take me with her to France, in the temporary capacity of governess to her children, assuring me at the same time that she would advance my interests in every possible way after our arrival.

This lady and her husband were as kind to me as my own parents could have been; and soon after our arrival in France they procured for me a situation in one of the best schools in St. Brioux, called the Maison-Martin, where, young as I was, I engaged myself to teach the young ladies fancy-needlework and embroidery, as well as to give lessons in English. Some of the elder girls, I soon found, were further advanced in fancy-needlework and some other matters than I was myself. This, of course, I did not tell them; but to supply my deficiency I spent many a midnight hour in study and in preparing myself to give the advanced instructions which would be required by my pupils on the following day. For some time after I began my work as teacher in that school, I spent the whole of my salary in paying for private lessons to keep me in advance of my pupils. It was for awhile a severe task and a strain upon my youthful energies ; but I have never since regretted it, as it gave an impulse to my mind that has remained with me through life.

I had not been more than six months in my situation when the parents of one of the pupils objected to the school retaining a Protestant teacher, and I was consequently given to understand that unless I consented to be instructed, if nothing more, in the Roman Catholic faith, I could not remain in my present position. This was my first experience of that religious intolerance of which I afterwards saw so much. The principal of the establishment, however, being very kindly disposed towards me, advised me to submit, and it was finally agreed that I should be allowed twelve months for instruction and consideration.

During this probationary year I attended mass every morning from seven to eight o'clock, and was present at vespers at least three times a week. Every Saturday morning I accompanied my pupils to the confessional, where I had to remain from seven o'clock till noon ; after which we returned to breakfast. On Sundays there was the usual morning mass, and after that high mass ; and in the afternoon, from two to four, we listened to a sermon. In addition to all these services, at which I was expected to "assist," a very good-looking, interesting young priest was appointed to attend to the spiritual instruction of the young Protestant, as they called me, after school hours. He saw me frequently, but he was ill-qualified to instruct me in the Catholic faith or to remove my doubts, for he was not himself too happy in the sacerdotal robe. At first he aimed at convincing me that the apostolic priesthood vested in the Fishermen of Galilee had descended in unbroken succession in the Church of Rome ; but he seemed to me much more inclined for a flirtation than for argument ; I thought I could at times discover something of regret on his own part at having taken holy orders ; and in after years I heard that he had abandoned his profession.

To the numerous stories of Catholic oppression and artifice in undermining Protestants and seducing them from their faith, I cannot add my own testimony. Those among whom I lived very naturally desired that I should be instructed in their religion and join the church to which they belonged; but their bearing towards me was ever kind and respectful; although when the twelve months of probation had expired, I found myself as much attached to the religion of my childhood as ever, and had in consequence to resign my situation. I had made many warm friends in the school, and none were kinder to me than the principal, who proved her attachment by finding for me a lucrative situation in a wealthy private family.

My new position was a decided advance in social life. The family consisted of husband and wife, two children, the husband's brother, and an elderly uncle. The husband was a wealthy commoner. The lady by birth was of the noblesse, but poor. The guardians of the titled lady had formed a matrimonial alliance for her by advertisement, and, fortunately for them, when the husband and wife first saw each other, they loved—an experience not too common in France. The fruits of this marriage were happiness and two sweet little girls, who were, when I first knew them, of the ages of five and seven years respectively. The young gentleman alluded to—the husband's brother—had been educated for the church, but when the proper time came had refused to take orders; the uncle was a fine old gentleman, a retired general in the French army and a bachelor. Altogether they formed as happy a domestic circle as I had ever known. The position which I occupied among them was that of governess and English teacher to the two little girls.

My young charges during the first year made rapid progress, which was very gratifying to the family and secured for me their good-will and interest. Had I been their nearest relative I could not have received more respect and consideration from them. One member of the circle alone seemed to be entirely indifferent to my presence; this was the brother of Monsieur De Bosque. Though I had lived in the same house with him a whole year, and had sat at the same table every day, scarcely a word had ever passed between us beyond a formal salutation.

The young gentleman was very handsome, and when conversing with others his manner was extremely fascinating. I did not believe that I particularly desired his attentions, but his indifference annoyed me—for I had never before been treated with such coldness, and I determined to become as frigid and formal as he could possibly be himself. This formal acquaintanceship continued for two years, and I persuaded myself that I had become altogether indifferent to the presence of my icicle, while at the same time all the other members of the family increased in their manifestations of attachment to me.

But trifles often possess a great significance. It was the custom of the family to get up a little lottery once a week for the children, if my report of their deportment and progress was favorable. In this lottery were presents of books, toys, gloves, and a variety of fancy articles, and among them there was sure to be a bouquet of choice flowers for "Mademoiselle-Miss," as they familiarly called me. I knew not positively whom to thank, although I instinctively felt from whom they came, for the other members of the family always made me more useful presents. In time one little attention led to another, until at the end of three years I found myself the fiancée of the wealthy Constant De Bosque. Then—or rather shortly before—he avowed that he had been silently watching me all those years.

Madame De Bosque was opposed to my marriage with her brother-in-law, as she desired that he should marry one of her own wealthy cousins of the old noblesse of France. She treated me, notwithstanding, with great kindness and confined her opposition to persuading me not to listen to her brother's suit; but finding opposition to his wishes ineffectual, she finally consented to our engagement, which took place in the following winter.

From what I observed of the relations which existed between husbands and wives in France, I did not feel perfectly happy in the thought of becoming the wife of a Frenchman, although I dearly loved the French people. Several of my young lady acquaintances, I knew, had married because it was fashionable, and especially because it was an emancipation from what ladies in the higher ranks of society regarded as a severe social restraint. It was considered shocking for any young lady to be seen talking to a young gentleman in the street; indeed it was hardly proper for any unmarried girl to be seen in the street at all without a bonne or some married lady to accompany her. But immediately she was married she was at liberty to flirt and promenade with all the gentlemen of her acquaintance, while her husband enjoyed the same liberty among the ladies. This state of affairs did not at all coincide with my English ideas, for to me the very thought of marriage was invested with the most sacred obligations, and I knew I should never be able to bring my mind to accept less from my husband than I should feel it my duty to render to him.

I loved the French people, and was pleased with their polite mannerism, but I was not French in character; and though the prospect before me of an alliance with a wealthy and noble family was certainly pleasant, and I was greatly attached to my fiancée, my mind was considerably agitated upon the subject of marriage, as it had before been occupied with religion.

During my sojourn in France I had frequently questioned myself whether I had not done wrong in remaining absent for so many years from my home and from communion with the church of my childhood, and I had always looked forward to the time when I should return to them again. To this occasional self-examination was now added another cause of anxiety, produced by the thought of marriage with a person of a different faith. Marriage, to me, was the all-important event in a woman's life, and some mysterious presentiment seemed to forewarn me that marriage in my life was to be more than an ordinary episode—though little did I then dream that it would have a polygamic shaping.

My young ambition alone had led me to France. I had aspired to an honorable social position, and had found both it and also devoted friends. Sometimes I felt that I could not relinquish what I had gained; at other times I yearned for the associations of my childhood and the guiding hand of earlier friends. The conflict in my mind was often painful. My early prejudices and the teachings of those around me induced me to believe that the Roman Catholic religion was entirely wrong; yet, notwithstanding, while living among Catholics I saw nothing to condemn in their personal lives, but much to the contrary. In fact, Romanism fascinated me, while it failed to convince my judgment.

While laboring under these conflicting sentiments, I resolved to visit my native land, to consult with my parents about my contemplated marriage; and for that purpose I asked and obtained two months' vacation. Surely some mysterious destiny must have been drawing me to England at that particular crisis, and before the fulfilling of my engagement, which would have changed so entirely the whole current of my existence.

MY FIRST INTRODUCTION TO MORMONISM.

DURING my residence in France, my parents had left St. Heliers and returned to Southampton, England. To visit them now I had to take a sailing vessel from Portrieux to the Isle of Jersey, and thence I could take the steamer to Southampton.

Monsieur and Madame De Bosque, together with the two little girls, accompanied me in their private carriage to Portrieux, a distance of forty miles, in order to confide me safely to the captain's care. As they wished me "bon voyage" and embraced me affectionately, Mons. De Bosque handed me a valuable purse for pocket-money during my absence, and they all exhibited great anxiety for my welfare, saying over and over again au revoir, as they entered their carriage to return to their happy home;—thereby implying that this was not a final adieu, but that we should soon meet again.

I cannot tell why it was, but I experienced at that moment a painful feeling of mental indecision about the future. I had no real reason to doubt my return to France and the certainty of a warm welcome when I should again greet those dear ones who were now leaving me in tears ; but my mind was troubled by a vague feeling of uncertainty which made me anything but happy. Filial affection and a sense of duty drew me towards my parents in England ; while a feeling of gratitude, and, I think, another and more tender sentiment, turned the current of my thoughts towards the happy home at St. Brieux.

It was not necessary for me to stop in Jersey for more than a few hours, but I wanted to revisit the scenes of my childhood's happy days and to speak again with those whom I had known and loved in early life. In later years the scenes and memories of childhood seem like the imaginings of a pleasant dream. A sweet charm is thrown around all that we then said and did ; and the men and women who then were known to us are pictured in our recollection as beings possessing charms and graces such as never belonged to the commonplace children of earth. The glamour of a fairy wand is over all the past history of mankind ; but upon nothing does it cast so potent a spell as upon the personal reminiscences of our own infant years. To me that little island had charms which no stranger could ever have discovered ; and even now after the lapse of so many long, eventful years I often feel an earnest wish to visit again those rock-bound shores, to listen to the everlasting murmur of the wild, wild waves, to watch the distant speck-like vessels far away upon the swelling ocean, and to drink in the invigorating breezes which seem to give life and energy to every pulsation of the living soul.

But I must not theorise : life has been to me too earnest and too painful to admit of much sentiment or fancy as I recall the past. Little as I thought it, during the short visit which I paid to my birthplace, the web of destiny was being woven for me in a way which I could not then have conjectured even in a dream.

At St. Heliers I heard for the first time of the Latter-day Saints, or Mormonites, as they were more familiarly called ; but I cannot express how perfectly astonished I was when I learned that my father, mother, sisters, and one of my brothers had been converted to the new faith.

It was my own brother-in-law who told me this. He himself, with my sister, were "Apostate" Mormons. They had been baptized into the Mormon Church, but became dissatisfied and abandoned it. The St. Heliers' branch of the Latter-day Saints had had a turbulent experience. Their first teachings had been a mixture of Bible texts about the last days, and arguments about the millennium, the return of the Jews to Palestine, the resurrection of the dead, and a new revelation and a new prophet ; but the improper conduct of some of the elders had disgusted the people with their doctrines, and the tales of wickedness which I heard were, if true, certainly sufficient to justify them in rejecting such instructors.

The more I heard of this strange religion the more I was troubled ; yet, as I knew my parents were devoted Christians, I could hardly believe that Mormonism was such a vile delusion and imposture as it had been represented to me, or they would never have accepted it : still it was possible that they had been led astray by the fascinations of a new religion.

In this state of mind I met in the street the wife of the Baptist minister whom I have already mentioned. She greeted me affectionately and then began at once to warn me against the Latter-day Saints. I enquired what she knew of them, and she replied that personally she knew nothing, but she believed them to be servants of the Evil One, adding, "There is a strange power with them that fascinates the people and draws them into their meshes in spite of themselves. Let me entreat you not to go near them. Do not trust yourself at one of their meetings, or the delusion will take hold of you too."

"I cannot ignore Mormonism in this way," I said, "or pass it by with indifference, for my parents whom I tenderly love have been blinded by this delusion, and I can do no less than investigate its teachings thoroughly, and expose its errors, and, if possible, save my father's family from ruin."

She was not convinced that this was the wisest course for me to pursue, but I resolved at once to attend a meeting of the Saints and judge for myself. My brother-in-law, when he heard of my intentions, tried to dissuade me, but, finding me determined, finally offered to escort me to the meeting-place.

What I heard on this occasion made a great impression on my mind, and set me thinking as I had never thought before. On returning to my sister's house she asked me what opinion I had now formed of the Latter-day Saints. I replied that I had not yet formed any conclusion, but that what I had heard had given me serious cause for reflection. "Oh," she said, "You have caught the Mormon fever, I see."

I felt a disposition to resent this implication, but I was half afraid that, after all, my sister was right. Much that I had heard could, I knew, be proved true from Scripture; and the rest seemed to me to be capable of demonstration from the same authority. I resolved, however, to fortify myself against a too easy credulity, and thought that probably if I heard more of these doctrines I might be able to discover their falsity.

On the following day, the elder who had preached at the meeting, and who, by the way, is one of the present proprietors of the Salt Lake Herald, called to see me, as he had been intimate with my parents before they left the island. I hardly knew how to be civil to him, though he had done nothing to offend me, nor had he been the cause of my parents entering the Mormon Church; but I disliked him solely on account of the stories which I had heard about the Mormons. Intending only to be kind to me, he told me that on the following day he proposed to take the steamer for Southampton, as he was going to attend a conference of the Saints in London, and that he should be pleased to shew me any attentions while crossing the Channel, and would see me safe home in England. I confess I really felt insulted at a Mormon Elder offering to be my escort; and although my trunks were ready packed for my departure by the same steamer, and Mr.

Dunbar knew it, I thanked him politely but said I would not go by that boat. He tried to persuade me to change my mind and said that I should have to wait a whole week for another vessel ; and at last I frankly told him the abhorrence I felt at the things I had heard about the Mormons, and that I should be afraid to travel in the same steamer with him or any of the Mormon Elders who I regarded as no better than so many whited sepulchres. He, however, very kindly took no offence for he knew that I had been listening to those who disliked the Saints. I felt ashamed at having been betrayed into such unladylike rudeness, but, notwithstanding, tried to persuade myself that his civility was, after all, an insult ; for I had conceived a detestation of every Mormon, on account of the deception which I felt sure had been practiced upon my family.

This feeling was not lessened by the consciousness that an impression had been made upon my own mind. The more in accordance with Scripture the teaching of the Elders appeared, the more firmly I believed it must be a powerful delusion. Here, I said, Satan has indeed taken the form of an angel of light to deceive, if possible, the very elect.

Elder Dunbar finding me unyielding, left by the next steamer and had a pleasant passage across the Channel, and I remained on the island another week. During that interval my mind was haunted with what I had heard of this new gospel dispensation, as it was called. That angels had again descended from heaven to teach men upon earth ; that a prophet had been raised up to speak again the mind of the Lord to the children of men ; that the Saints were partakers of the gifts of the Spirit, as in the Early Christian Church,—all these assumed facts took the form of reality, and came back into my mind with greater force every time I strove to drive them away ; just as our thoughts do when we desire to sleep, and cannot—our very efforts to dismiss them bring them back with greater force to torment us.

We had an unusually bad passage across the Channel, which annoyed me all the more when I remembered my scornful refusal to go in the same boat with Elder Dunbar.

On my arrival in Southampton I soon discovered that my father, mother, and sisters were full of the spirit of Mormonism. They were rejoicing in it, ardently believing that it was the fulness of the everlasting gospel, as the elders styled it ; and whatever I might think of the new religion I was forced to confess that it brought into my father's house peace, love, kindness, and charity such as were seldom seen in many households of religious people. My sisters were completely changed in their manner of life. They cared nothing for the amusements which girls of their age usually crave and enjoy. Their whole thoughts seemed to be occupied with the Church, attending the meetings of the saints, and employing every leisure hour in preparing comforts for the Elders who were travelling and preaching without purse and scrip. And in all this they were as happy as children.

Of my parents I might say the same. My dear mother rejoiced in the belief that she had been peculiarly blessed in being privileged to live at a time when "the last dispensation" was revealed ; and my father, though an invalid, rejoiced that he had entered into the kingdom by baptism. Such was the condition of my father's house ; and who can wonder that, accustomed as I was to listen with respect to the opinions of my parents, I was more than ever troubled about the new religion which they had adopted.

The first Sunday morning that I was in England, my parents asked me to accompany them to meeting, and I readily complied, as I wanted to hear more of the strange doctrines which in some mysterious way had made our family so happy, but which in other quarters had provoked such bitter hostility. I know now that this joyousness of heart is not peculiar to new converts to Mormonism, but may be found among the newly-converted of every sect which allows the emotional feelings to come into play. To me, at the time, however, it was a mystery, but I must confess that the change which had taken place in those nearest and dearest to me, affecting me, personally, and being so evidently in accordance with the teachings of the Saviour, led me to regard Mormonism with less antipathy. The bright side alone of the new faith was presented to the world abroad ; we had yet to go to Utah and witness the effects of Brigham Young's teachings at home before we could know what Mormonism really was.

I shall never forget the trial it was to my pride to enter the dirty, mean-looking room where the Saints assembled at that time. No one would rent a respectable hall to them, and they were glad to obtain the use of any place which was large enough for their meetings. On the present occasion there was a very fair gathering of people, who had come together influenced by the most varied motives. The Presiding Elder—I should here remark that the word "Elder" has among the Mormons no reference whatever to age, but is simply a rank in the priesthood—called the meeting to order, and read the following hymn :

The morning breaks, the shadows flee ;
 Lo ! Zion's standard is unfurled !
 The dawning of a brighter day
 Majestic rises on the world.

The clouds of error disappear
 Before the rays of truth divine ;
 The glory bursting from afar,
 Wide o'er the nations soon will shine !

The Gentile fulness now comes in,
 And Israel's blessings are at hand ;
 Lo ! Judah's remnant, cleansed from sin,
 Shall in the promised Canaan stand.

Angels from heaven and truth from earth
 Have met, and both have record borne ;
 Thus Zion's light is bursting forth
 To bring her ransomed children home.

Every word of this hymn had a meaning peculiar to itself, relating to the distinctive doctrines of the Saints. The congregation sang with an energy and enthusiasm which made the room shake again. Self and the outer world were alike forgotten, and an ecstasy of rapture seemed to possess the souls of all present. Then all kneeled down, and prayer was offered for the Prophet, the apostles, high-priests, "seventies," elders, priests, teachers, and deacons; blessings were invoked upon the Saints, and power to convert the Gentiles; and as the earnest words of supplication left the speaker's lips, the congregation shouted a loud "Amen."

There was no prepared sermon. There never is at a Mormon meeting. The people are taught that the Holy Ghost is "mouth, matter, and wisdom." Whatever the preaching elder may say is supposed to come directly by inspiration from heaven, and the Saints listening, as they believe, not to his utterances but to the words of God Himself, have nothing to do but to hear and obey.

The first speaker on this occasion was a young gentleman of respectable family, who had been recently baptized and ordained. He, too, was from St. Heliers, and I had known him from childhood. His address impressed me very much. He had been a member of the Baptist church, and he related his experience, told how often he had wondered why there were not inspired men to preach the glad tidings of salvation to the world to-day, as there were eighteen centuries ago. He spoke of the joy which he had experienced in being baptized into the Mormon Church and realising that he had received the "gift of the Holy Ghost." The simplicity with which he spoke, his evident honesty, and the sacrifice he had made in leaving the respectable Baptists and joining the despised Mormons, were, I thought, so many evidences of his sincerity.

Alas! how little could that young preacher conjecture how different the practical Mormonism in Utah was from the theoretical Mormonism which he had learned to believe in Europe, before polygamy was known among the Saints. A short time afterwards he gave up his business, married an accomplished young lady, and went with her to Salt Lake City. There they were soon utterly disgusted with what they witnessed, apostatized, and set out for England. When they had gone three-fourths of their way back to the Missouri river, the young man, his wife, child, and another apostate and his wife, were killed by "Indians:"—such, at least, was the report; but dissenting Mormons have always charged their "taking off" to the order of the leaders of the Mormon Church.

But to return to the meeting. The reader must please forgive me if I dwell a little upon the events of that particular morning, for naturally they made a deep impression upon my own mind—it was there that I saw for the first time my husband who was to be.

I had heard a good deal about a certain elder, from my family and from the Saints who visited at our house. They spoke with great enthusiasm of the earnestness with which he preached, of the influence which his addresses produced, and of his confidence in the final triumph of "the kingdom."

At that time—the summer of 1849—although the branch of the Mormon Church in Britain was in a most flourishing condition, there were not in England more than two or three American elders preaching the faith, for when—two years before the period of which I speak—the Saints left Nauvoo and undertook that most extraordinary exodus across the plains to the Rocky Mountains, the missionary elders were all called home, and the work of proselytizing in Europe was left entirely to the native elders. To direct their labors there was placed over them an American elder named Orson Spencer, a graduate of Dartmouth University, a scholar and a gentleman—a man well calculated from his previous Christian education to give an elevated tone to the teachings of the young English missionaries.

Mormonism in England, then, had no resemblance to the Mormonism of Utah to-day. The Mormons were then simply an earnest religious people, in many respects like the Methodists, especially in their missionary zeal and fervor of spirit. The Mormon Church abroad was purely a religious institution, and Mormonism was preached by the elders as the gospel of Christianity restored. The church had no political shaping nor the remotest antagonism to the civil power. The name of Joseph Smith was seldom spoken, and still more seldom was heard the name of Brigham Young, and then only so far as they had reference to the Church of the Saints.

About eighteen months before I visited Southampton, one of these missionaries had come into that town, "without purse or scrip." He was quite a young man and almost penniless, but he was rich in faith and overflowing with zeal. He knew no one there, and homeless, and frequently hungry, he continued his labors. Of fasting he knew much, of feasting nothing. He first preached under the branches of a spreading beech tree in a public park, and when more favored he held forth in a school-room or public hall. He had come to convert the people to Mormonism or he was going to die among them, and before such zeal and determination, discouragements, of course, soon vanished away. He troubled the ministers of other dissenting churches when they found him distributing tracts and talking to their people. He was sowing broadcast dissatisfaction and discontent wherever he could get any one to listen to him, and thus he drew down upon himself the eloquence of the dissenting pulpits and the derision of the local press. But the more they attacked him the more zealously did he labor, and defied his opponents to public discussion. Mormonism was bold then in Europe—it had no American history to meet in those days.

This, and a great deal more, I had heard discussed in glowing language by my relatives and friends; and thus the young missionary—Elder Stenhouse—was, by name, no stranger to me.

It was Elder Stenhouse who now addressed the meeting, and I listened to him with attention. The reader must remember that at that time polygamy was unheard of as a doctrine of the Saints, and the blood-atonement, the doctrine that Adam is God, together with the polytheism and priestly theocracy of after years were things undreamed of. The saving love of Christ, the glory and fulness of the everlasting Gospel, the gifts and graces of the Spirit, together with repentance, baptism, and faith, were the points upon which the Mormon teachers touched; and who can wonder that with such topics as these, and fortifying every statement with powerful and numerous texts of Scripture, they should captivate the minds of religiously inclined people? However this may be, I can only confess that as I listened to Elder Stenhouse's earnest discourse, I felt my antipathy to Mormonism rapidly melting away.

At the close of the service, when he left the platform, he was warmly received by the brethren and sisters, for so the Saints speak of one another, and they came about him to shake hands, or it might be to seize the opportunity of slipping a trifle into his hand to help him in his work. Young and old, the poor and their more wealthy neighbors mingled together like one happy family. It was altogether a most pleasing scene, and, whatever explanation may yet be given to Mormonism in America, one thing I know—the facts of its early history in Europe are among the most pleasant reminiscences of my life.

Elder Stenhouse came up in a familiar and open-hearted way to my mother and sisters, and I was introduced to him as "the other daughter from France." He kindly welcomed me, and when I frankly told him the state of my mind, he made, I must admit, a successful attempt to solve my doubts, and when I left the meeting it was with sentiments towards the saints and their religion far different from those which I entertained when I entered.

This meeting was a memorable era in my life.

CHAPTER III.

THE LABOR OF MY LIFE BEGUN:—HOW THE MORMON MISSIONARIES MADE CONVERTS.

A Confirmation Meeting—The Age for Baptism—How Sister Martha was Confirmed—How Mormon Saints are “Blessed”—The Spirit of Prophecy—A Lecture by Elder Stenhouse—The New Gospel Explained—A Vision of Latter-Day Glory—How I was Convinced—The Finger of Destiny draws Me On—A Mormon Baptism—I Become a Member of the Church—I am Baptized, Confirmed, and Blessed—I begin a New Life—A Happy Dream of Missionary Usefulness—I begin Work with Enthusiasm—Methodism and Mormonism Compared—How Converts are made—Religious Revivals—The Anxious Seats—A Testimony Meeting—How Brigham Young has Damped the Ardor of the Saints—Magical Effects of an Elder’s Speech—The Mormon Marseillaise—Effects of Song upon Religious Feeling.

IN the afternoon I attended a meeting of a still more interesting character. These Sunday afternoon meetings were held for the purpose of receiving the sacrament, and the confirmation of those who had been baptized during the week; they were intended exclusively for the Saints, but for certain reasons I was permitted to be present.

The meeting was opened with singing and prayer, and then the presiding Elder—Brother Cowdy—arose, and invited all those who had been baptized during the week to come to the front seats. Several ladies and gentlemen came forward, and also three little children. Upon inquiry I found that children of eight years of age were admitted members of the Church by baptism—which is administered by immersion. At that age they are supposed to understand what they are doing; but before that, if of Mormon parents, they are considered members of the Church by virtue of the blessing which they received in infancy. Brother Cowdy—the presiding elder—then called upon two other elders to assist him in the confirmation.

One of the ladies took off her bonnet but retained her seat, when all three of the Elders placed their hands upon her head, and one of them said :—

“Martha ; by virtue of the authority vested in us, we confirm you a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints ; and as you have been obedient to the teachings of the Elders, and have gone down into the waters of baptism for the remission of your sins, we confer upon you the Gift of the Holy Ghost, that it may abide with you for ever, and be a lamp unto your feet and a light upon your pathway, leading and guiding you into all truth. This blessing we confirm upon your head, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.”

Then, before they took their hands off her head, the presiding Elder asked the other two if they wished to say anything. Whereupon one of them began to invoke a blessing upon the newly-confirmed sister. He spoke for some time with extreme earnestness, when suddenly he was seized with a nervous trembling which was quite perceptible, and which evidently betokened intense mental or physical excitement. He began to prophesy great things for this sister in the future, and in solemn and mysterious language proclaimed the wonders which God would perform for her sake. When we consider the excited state of her mind, and—if the statements of psychologists be true—the magnetic currents which were being transmitted from the sensitive nature of the man into the excited brain of the new convert, together with the pressure of half a dozen human hands upon her head, it is not at all astonishing that when the hands were lifted off she should firmly believe that she had been blessed indeed. She had been told that she should receive the Gift of the Holy Ghost ; and she did not for an instant doubt that her expectations had been realized.

Each of the newly baptized went through the same ceremony, and then they all partook of the sacrament, when, after another hymn, the meeting was closed with prayer.

In the evening I returned to listen to a lecture upon “the character, spirit, and genius” of the new church, delivered by Elder Stenhouse; and I was captivated by the picture which he drew of the marvellous latter-day work which he affirmed had already begun. The visions of by-gone ages were again vouchsafed to men; angels had visibly descended to earth; God had raised up in a mighty way a Prophet, as of old, to preach the dispensation of the last days; gifts of prophecy, healing, and the working of miracles were now, as in the days of the Apostles, witnesses to the power of God. The long-lost tribes of Israel were about to be gathered into the one great fold of Christ; and the fulness of the Gentiles being come, they, too, were to be taken under the care of the Good Shepherd. All were freely invited to come and cast away their sins, ere it was too late; and the fullest offers of pardon, grace, sanctification and blessing, in this world and in the next, were presented to every repentant soul.

Surely, I thought, these are the selfsame doctrines which my mother taught me when I knelt beside her in childhood, and which I have so often heard—only in colder and less persuasive language—urged from the pulpits of those whom I have ever regarded in the light of true disciples of Jesus. Who can wonder that I listened with rapt attention, and that my heart was even then half won to the new faith? The days passed; and as I pondered over these things it appeared to me that I had at last found that which I had so long earnestly desired and prayed for—a knowledge of that true religion for which the Saviour presented Himself a Holy Sacrifice, and which the Apostles preached at peril of their lives—the only faith, in which I might find joy and peace in believing.

But why should I dwell upon those moments, soul-absorbing as was their interest to me then—sadly-pleasing as is their memory now! The reader can see the drift of my thoughts at that time; and I feel sure, although I have but hastily sketched the causes which brought about these great changes in my religious belief and in my life, that he will not hastily accuse me of fickleness and love of change, if he himself has fought the battles of the soul and has learned even in a slight measure to realize the mystery of his inner-being.

Each day the finger of destiny drew me nearer to the final step. The young Elder, whose words I had listened to with such strange and, to me, momentous results, was intimate with my father's family and called frequently to see us, and before long he convinced me that it was my duty to test for myself whether the work was of God, or not. In the agitated state of my mind at that time, I could not withstand the earnest appeals which were made to my affections and hopes; and within two weeks after my arrival in England, I became formally a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; or in more popular language—I became a Mormon.

The day was fixed for my baptism. Several others were to be baptized at the same time; for scarcely a week passed without quite a number of persons joining the church. For this purpose we all repaired to a bath-house on the banks of the Southampton river. This place was not perhaps the most convenient, and it certainly was devoid of the slightest tinge of romance; but it was the only one available to the saints at that time.

When we were all assembled and had united in singing and prayer, Elder Stenhouse went down into the water first, and then two men went down and were baptized, and came up again. Now came my turn. I was greatly agitated, for I felt all the solemnity of the occasion. I had dressed myself very neatly and purely, for I believed that angel eyes were upon me; I wished to give myself—a perfect and acceptable offering—to my God, and I was filled with the determination henceforth to devote my whole life to his service.

As I went down into the waters of baptism, how thankful I felt that it had been my privilege to hear the gospel in my youth, for now I could give my heart in all its freshness to the Lord, before it had been chilled by the cold, hard experience of life.

I descended the steps, and Elder Stenhouse came forward and led me out into the water; then taking both my hands in one of his, he raised his other hand towards heaven, and in a solemn and impressive voice he said:

"Fanny ; by virtue of the authority vested in me, I baptize you for the remission of your sins ; in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen."

Then he immersed me in the water ; and as I reäscended the steps, I really felt like another being : all my past was buried in the deep—the waters of baptism had washed away my sins ; and a new life lay open before me, in which my footsteps would be guided by the inspired servants of God. All now would be peace and joy within me, for I had obeyed the commands of God, and I doubted not that I should receive the promised blessing, and that now I could indeed go on my way rejoicing.

My baptism took place one Saturday afternoon, and the afternoon following I was confirmed a member of the church. Elder Stenhouse presided at the meeting, and he, with Elder Cowdy and two other elders, confirmed me. As the "blessing" which I then myself received differs somewhat from the one which I have already given, and as it is a very fair specimen of those effusions, I present it to the reader in full.

Elder Stenhouse, Elder Cowdy, and the two other elders, placed their hands solemnly upon my head, and Elder Stenhouse said :—

"Fanny ; by virtue of the authority vested in me, I confirm you a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints ; and inasmuch as you have been obedient to the command of God, through his servants, and have been baptized for the remission of your sins, I say unto you that those sins are remitted. And in the name of God I bless you, and say unto you, that inasmuch as you are faithful and obedient to teachings of the priesthood, and seek the advancement of the kingdom, there is no good thing that your heart can desire that the Lord will not give unto you. You shall have visions and dreams, and angels shall visit you by day and by night. You shall stand in the temple in Zion, and administer to the Saints of the Most High God. You shall speak in tongues, and prophesy ; and the Lord shall bless you abundantly, both temporally and spiritually. These blessings I seal upon your head, inasmuch as you shall be faithful ; and I pray heaven to bless you ; and say unto you—Be thou blessed, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen."

After the meeting, I received the congratulations of all the Saints present, and more particularly those of my own family. My dear mother and father were overjoyed, and I now learned how anxious they had been, and how they had feared that I should return to France and reject the faith of the new dispensation. Altogether we were very happy.

Elder Stenhouse and Elder Cowdy returned home with us to tea, and afterwards we all attended the usual evening lecture. In this way was passed one of the happiest days of my life—one which I shall ever remember;—and yet that memory will always be mingled with regret that so much love and devotion as I then felt were not enlisted in a better cause.

Thus began a new era in my life. All my former friends and associations were now to be remembered no more: my lot was cast among the Saints; and in the state of my mind at that time, I believed that I should be happy in my new position, and resolved to give evidence of the sincerity of my faith.

The untiring energy and restless activity of Elder Stenhouse was ever before our eyes, and inspired all who associated with him with a similar enthusiasm. There were no drones in that hive. The brethren, at a word from him, would roam the country, teaching and preaching in the open air, while the sisters would go from house to house in the city, distributing tracts about the new faith. I caught the enthusiasm of the rest, and was soon in the ranks with the other sisters, as devoted in my endeavors as a young, ambitious heart could be. I was indeed like one born again from an old existence into a new life. I felt grateful and happy—I began to dream of the eternal honor which crowns a faithful missionary life; and I soon found an ample field for testing my fitness for that vocation.

At the time of which I speak, the Primitive Methodists in England were doing a great work in the way of converting sinners. Their missionaries were zealous and devoted men, though generally poor and uneducated. They resembled very closely the Mormon elders in their labors; and, in fact, a very large number of the leading Mormons had been Methodist local-preachers and exhorters; and the greater number of the new-born Saints had come from that denomination with their former teachers, or else had followed them soon after.

The change from Methodist to Mormon was, in course of time, very strongly marked ; but for a considerable period the same, or what seemed the same, influences were at work among the people. Remarkable scenes of excitement were often witnessed at the "love feasts ;" and from the "anxious seats," as they were called, might be heard, the entreaties of self-accusing souls, frightened by a multitude of sins, crying earnestly, nay, wildly, for grace, mercy, and the Holy Ghost, while many of the supplicants would fall upon the ground, completely overcome by nervous excitement. Then they would have visions, and beheld great and unutterable things ; received the forgiveness of their sins ; and, coming back to consciousness, believed themselves now to be the children of God, and new creatures ; doubting not that they would ever after be happy in the Lord.

The experience of the Saints at their meetings, when Mormonism was first preached, was exactly similar to this. Into the psychological, moral, or religious causes of these scenes of excitement I cannot here enter ;—I simply mention facts as they came under my own observation.

The Mormon Missionary often came upon whole communities in the rural districts of England, where this "good time" was in full operation ; and being a man of texts he would follow up the revival, preaching that the spirit of the prophet was subject to the prophet, and not the prophet subject to the spirit. Controversy would arise, and his appeal to Scripture, literally interpreted, was almost invariably triumphant. Even in this country, especially in New York and Ohio, the same causes produced the same effects. It was after his mind was excited by a general revival near his native place, that Joseph Smith, the founder of Mormonism, received his first religious impression, and saw, as he asserted, his first angelic vision. His followers, even in the early days of the church, had revival-meetings and meetings at which the most extraordinary excitement was manifested,—when the Saints fell into ecstatic trances, saw heaven opened, and spake with tongues. But Joseph, shrewd man as he was, albeit "a prophet," when he found too many rival seers were coming into the field, announced by "special revelation," that these too-gifted persons were possessed by devils, and that their visions and prophecyings must be at once suppressed. And he did suppress them.

Not long after my own baptism I was present at a meeting of this description, in Southampton. It was called a "testimony meeting," and was held in a large upper room situated, if I rightly remember, in Chandos street. No one from the outside would have supposed that it was the place of assembly of the Saints, for it was generally used for ordinary secular meetings, and I have heard that great objections were at first raised as to the propriety of letting it to the Mormons.

As we entered the door, we were saluted by Brother Williams, who expressed great pleasure at seeing us. There was a full attendance of the Saints, and every face wore an expression of peaceful earnestness. A person who has never attended a Mormon meeting can form no idea of the joyous spirit which seemed to animate every one present. I am not, of course, speaking of modern meetings, but of meetings as they used to be. Whence and whatever that "spirit" might be which moved the sisters and brethren when they met in early times, I cannot tell; but I, and with me, ten thousand Mormons and seceding Mormons in Utah, can, from our own experience, testify that that spirit no longer visits the Tabernacle services over which Brigham Young presides, or the meetings of the Saints since they adopted the accursed doctrine of polygamy, and forsook the gentle leadings of their first love.

Often have I heard Mormons of good standing and high position in the church, lament the "good old times" as they called them, when the outpouring of the Spirit was so abundant, and mourn over the cold, barren services of the present day. But the elders explain this away. It is, they say, the fault of the people themselves, and because their own hearts have become cold.

At the meeting of which I speak, that happy spirit was peculiarly marked. An encouraging smile, or a kind word, greeted me on every side, and, as a newly converted sister, I received the most cordial welcome. The brethren were seated on forms and chairs and any other convenient article which came to hand, while at the further end of the room was Brother Bench, who was to preside, and with him several other leading elders. Brother Bench gave out a suitable hymn.

The whole congregation joined in the singing, and every heart seemed lifted up with devotion. Then another elder rose and offered a spirit-moving prayer; and then the brother who presided stated that for the time he withdrew his control of the proceedings, and, as the phrase was, he "put the meeting in the hands of the Saints," exhorting them not to let the time pass by unimproved.

There was at first a momentary hesitation, but Brother Burton got up and fixed the hearts of the Saints by relating what the Lord had done for him. He told us of his zeal for the faith, and how, during the week, he had had a terrible discussion with an unbeliever—a clever and learned man, too, and well skilled in dialectics—how he trembled at first at the idea of contesting with such an antagonist, but that the Lord had helped him, until argument after argument had been overthrown and he had come off victor in the fight. Then appealing to every one present he exhorted them to similar zeal, and promised them abundant help from on high to achieve a like result.

Then arose Brother Edwards, a well-tryed champion of the faith, and to him every one listened with profound attention, eagerly drinking in his every utterance. I could almost, even now, imagine that he was really inspired. Then I firmly believed he was. His voice thrilled with an earnestness which seemed to us something more than the mere excitement of the soul. A burning fire seemed to flash from his large, expressive eyes; his features were lighted up with that animation which gives a saint-like halo to the earnest face when fired with indignation or pleading soul-felt truths; while his whole frame seemed to glow with the glory of a land beyond this earth, as in the most impressive and convincing language he reminded us that our sins had been washed away by the waters of baptism, that upon us had been poured the gifts and graces of the Spirit, and that it was our sacred privilege to testify of these things.

The effect of this exhortation was magical. We forgot all our outward surroundings, in the realisation that the great work of the Lord was so gloriously begun and that it would surely go on, conquering and to conquer. One sister—an elderly woman—who was present, unable to control her emotion, burst out with that Mormon hymn which I have heard some old Nauvoo Saints declare produced upon the people in those days an enthusiasm similar to that which moves the heart of every true Frenchman when he listens to the soul-stirring notes of the Marseillaise :

The Spirit of God like a fire is burning !
 The latter-day glory begins to come forth;
 The visions and blessings of old are returning,
 The angels are coming to visit the earth.
 We'll sing and we'll shout with the armies of heaven -
 Hosannah ! Hosannah, to God and the Lamb !
 All glory to them in the highest be given,
 Henceforth and for ever : Amen, and Amen !

I have often heard in magnificent cathedrals, hoary with the dust of time, and in vast places of amusement dedicated specially to music and to song, the outpouring of that glorious vocal flood, which a chorus of a thousand well-trained singers can alone send forth. I have felt sometimes that entrancing state of ecstasy which thrilled the soul of the seer in Patmos, as he listened to the melody of the angelic throng—"the voice of many waters, and the peal of mighty thunders, and the notes of harpers harping upon their harps ;" but never, even when surrounded by all that was best calculated to produce a sentiment of devotion in my mind—never did I experience so rapt a feeling of communion with "the armies of heaven"—as I felt in that unadorned meeting-room surrounded by those plain but earnest and united people.

Nor was I alone in this. The feeling was contagious. There was not one present who did not sympathise. And thus, I suppose, melody has always played a prominent part in all religious revivals, whether of divine or human origin. The Apostles had their psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs; the Martyrs their Te Deum; the Waldenses made the hills and vales of Piedmont vocal with their singing; the Lollards and Hussites had their melodies; and in more modern days the followers of Luther, Wesley, and (may I add?) Joseph Smith, have poured out the fulness of their souls after the same fashion.

The last notes of the hymn had scarcely died away when another, and then another brother arose and bore testimony to the great work, told what the Lord had done for them personally, told of their zeal for the faith, and fervently exhorted all present to persevere unto the end. Again prayer was offered, another hymn sung, and the Saints were dismissed with a solemn benediction.

I WAS now a Mormon in every sense of the word, although entirely ignorant of Utah politics and polygamy.

My dreams were of a life of happiness spent in seeking to convert the whole world to the religion of Jesus, which I believed had been restored again to earth by the ministry of holy angels. It is easy to say that such an ambition was ill-directed when associated with Mormonism, but no one can deny that, in itself, it was the noblest and purest that could inspire the heart of man. There was no sacrifice too great for me to make ; there was no object too dear for me to resign, if it stood in the way of my sacred calling. The whole current of my thoughts and plans was now changed. It was henceforth my duty to be entirely forgetful of self, and to devote my energies—my all—to the advancement of the Kingdom of God. My life was to be identified with the Saints,—my faith required it, and I was willing that it should be so.

But what of my beloved France, all this time ; and my betrothed husband ?

This reflection aroused within me a most painful train of thought. How many fond and endearing memories entwined themselves around my heart at that moment, when most I needed to banish them for ever ! With what lingering love did I look back to those dear ones from whom I had parted but a few short weeks before, and who I might perhaps never see again ! To return would be to desert my newly-adopted friends and faith—to violate the covenant which I had made at baptism to “ be ever afterwards governed by the servants of God.”

No ; it was too late—I could not now return ;—I tried to persuade myself that I did not even wish to ;—in a word, affection, and what I thought duty, were at war together in my heart. All my former ties and associations must now be severed, however terrible the cost might be ; and I was bound not only to submit, but even to glory in the sacrifice. Thus I argued away the regrets which would at times agitate my very soul itself, and caused me so much painful thought.

The trial of my profession in the new faith came swiftly to my door. My marriage-engagement must be broken off, though I knew not how that could honorably and conscientiously be done. Of myself I had no wish to draw back from anything that I had promised of my own free will ; and much less did I desire to be faithless to my solemnly plighted word.

I now first realised the all-absorbing influence of an earnest religious faith. I was brought face to face with the fact that I could not marry out of the Mormon Church. The teaching of the elders was against it, and I saw that in this they were consistent. Great as was the trial, and painful as was the sacrifice, I resolved to be true to my religion. How very earnestly the elders insisted upon such sacrifices, may be seen from an appeal made at a later date by the “ Apostle ” Orson

Pratt. Brother Orson was in Europe, and, speaking authoritatively, he set forth the duties of mothers and daughters in "Babylon," as he graciously styled the rest of the world, in the following terms which unmistakably show the purposes of the leaders relative to marriage :

"Many of you have daughters, some of whom are grown to womanhood; others are now young. Would you have them gather with you to a land where virtue and peace dwell, where God has promised to protect and bless the righteous? If so, teach them, as they love their parents, and the Saints, and the truth, not to throw themselves away by marrying Gentiles; teach them to keep themselves entirely aloof from Gentile courtships and associations. Scores of women who once were counselled as you are now, are mourning in wretchedness, in bondage to Gentile husbands, cut off from all privilege of gathering with their fathers, mothers, brethren, and sisters; and, in some instances, cut off from even attending the Saints' meetings. But this is not all. They are raising up children in these lands to perish with themselves in the general desolations coming upon Babylon. But what is still more aggravating and heart-rending, they are raising up children not only destined for temporal judgments, but who must for ever be cut off from the presence of God and the glory of the celestial kingdom * * * * * What fearful responsibility for any young sister to voluntarily take upon herself, after all the warnings she has received. See to it, then, parents, that you not only do not give your consent, but actually forbid all such marriages.

Let them marry according to the holy order of God, and begin to lay the foundation of a little family kingdom which shall no more be scattered upon the face of the earth, but dwell in one country, keeping their genealogies from generation to generation, until each man's house shall be multiplied as the stars of heaven."

These were the influences which were brought to bear upon my mind at a time when it was peculiarly sensitive and open to impressions from without.

While in this uncertain state a little incident occurred which, though in itself of the most trifling nature, assisted in forming my ultimate decision.

It was a beautiful evening in early summer, and my mother and sister asked me to accompany them to one of the testimony-meetings which I have already described. This meeting was very similar to the others, with one notable exception:—it was here that I saw and heard, for the first time in my own experience, the "gift of tongues" exercised.

I had, of course, heard a great deal about this "gift," much of which was anything but satisfactory, as I think the reader will agree with me, when I explain myself.

I had read in Scripture that the Apostles of Jesus Christ tarried in Jerusalem until the day of Pentecost, when power was given them from on high. Being all together in one place, engaged in earnest supplication and the praise of God, suddenly the building in which they were, shook to its very foundation, and the sound of a mighty, rushing wind was heard, and the Spirit of the Eternal One, who, ere the dawning of creation moved upon the waters of chaos, descended in visible shape, palpable to their eyes in the form of a cloven tongue, an emblem of the gift of eloquence and diversity of speech which was henceforth to be theirs.

Then arose Peter, that disciple so full of zeal. Henceforth he was no longer to be called a disciple, but an "Apostle," which by interpretation is one "sent forth ;"—for now he had received his commission, and, in the power of the Highest, he, with the other Ambassadors of Jesus, could go forth upon their glorious work. But newly pardoned for his great transgression, and still remembering the Saviour's pitying look, and the thrice-repeated question—" Lovest thou Me more than these ?"—burning, also, with zeal to give evidence of his love—the Leader of the Apostles addressed the multitude gathered from every clime to keep the feast.

Lo, then, a miracle ! The Jew of Jerusalem wondered at the wisdom of the unlettered Fisherman. The magi from the still more distant Orient were amazed to hear so strange a story. The Greek paused at the utterances of this new philosophy. But strangest of all was the fact that, though utterly unable to comprehend each other's speech, they all, listening at the same time, could understand the words of the untaught fisherman.

Long before I had even heard of Mormonism, I had frequently thought how wonderfully useful this gift must have been to the Apostles. One of the great difficulties encountered by the missionary is learning the language of the people among whom he works and lives. To be able to dispense with all this labor, and to be understood wherever he went, must have lightened the mind of the holy man of half its load ; and naturally, when I heard that the Mormons had "the Gift of Tongues," I supposed it was the self-same power of diverse speech as that exercised by the Apostles ; and I presume the reader will conjecture with me that it was the same "gift," or, at least, some imitation of it. How surprised I was when I first discovered the meaning of the term "speaking in tongues," among the Mormons, may perhaps be imagined when I explain what happened at that testimony-meeting.

After prayer, and singing, and listening to several very fervent addresses from some of the elders, Brother Seely had delivered a most impassioned speech, and had hardly concluded, when Sister Ellis, who was sitting near me, gave evidence of being in an abnormal condition of mind, which to me was painful in the extreme. Her hands were clenched, and her eyes had that wild and supernatural glare which is never seen, save in cases of lunacy or intense feverish excitement. Every one waited breathlessly, listening to catch what she might say ;—you might have heard a pin drop.

Then in oracular language and with all the impassioned dignity of one inspired of heaven, she began to speak.

I say "speak," as that term is generally applied to the utterances of the human voice ; but she did not speak in the sense in which we always employ that word ; she simply emitted a series of sounds. They seemed to me chiefly the repetition of the same syllables—something like a child repeating, la, la, la, le, lo ; ma, ma, ma, mi, ma ; dele, dele, dele, hela—followed, perhaps, by a number of sounds strung together, which could not be rendered in any shape by the pen. Sometimes in the Far West, in later years, I have heard old Indian women, crooning wierdly monotonous and outlandish ditties in their native tongue. These wild dirges, more nearly than anything else I ever heard, resembled the prophetic utterances of Sister Ellis ; save only, that the appearance of the latter was far too solemn to admit of even a smile at what she said.

Ridiculous as this appears when I now write it down on paper, and strange as even then it was to me, there was something so commanding, so earnest, so "inspirational," if I may be allowed the term, in Sister Ellis's manner, that I could not wonder at the attention which the brethren and sisters paid to this gifted speaker in tongues.

I now know that these extraordinary displays are by no means confined to Mormonism. People of a certain temperament, excited to frenzy—generally by religious enthusiasm—have in all ages given painful illustrations of this mental disease; as the student who remembers the Convulsionnaires of the middle ages, the Munster Anabaptists of Luther's time, and the various emotional sects of more modern days, will abundantly bear me witness. But at that time, new in the faith, and believing as I did, that, as the elders said, it was the manifestation of the power of God, as foretold by the prophet Joel, though I secretly felt a sense of repugnance, I tried to combat my better sentiments.

Overcome by the excitement of the moment, Sister Ellis suddenly paused, not so much intentionally as from sheer inability to proceed; and the leading elders looked round from one to another to see if any one was present who could interpret. The gift of interpretation is very rarely possessed by the same person who has the gift of tongues, and you may often hear one after another arise and "speak," but there is no one to "interpret," and the Saints go away unedified. Even when an interpreter is present, there is no authority to determine whether he gives the proper rendering of the sounds uttered, and I have over and over again heard the most ludicrous stories of the comical interpretation placed by some half witty or half-witted expounder upon these oracles.

When Brother Brigham—then a man who was lowly in his own eyes—first met the prophet Joseph Smith, at Kirtland, Ohio, there was a scene somewhat like the one I have described; and the future leader of "this people," as he calls the Saints, himself spake with tongues and uttered wonderful things. But even supposing his words at that time to have been of the wisest, we all know from the example of Balaam's reprover, that it does not require a very high order of intellect to speak in unaccustomed language—and that, too, to some purpose. In later days the exercise of this gift has been discouraged by the elders, and especially by Brigham Young. Going one day, some years after, to the Lion-House to see a certain member of the Prophet's little family concerning a subject which lay very near to my heart at that time, we prayed together earnestly and anxiously; when suddenly the lady's face was lighted up with a supernatural glow, and placing her hand on my head she, sibyl-like, poured forth a flood of eloquence which—although I did not understand a single word that was uttered—I confess sent through me a magnetic thrill as if I had been listening to an inspired seeress. Another of Brigham's wives who was present interpreted the words of blessing to me, but added: "Do not speak of this, Sister Stenhouse, for Brother Young does not like to hear of these things." Thus we see that one inspired prophet in the presence of another "prophet, seer, and revelator," could himself take part at one time in a miraculous manifestation, which in later years he "would not like to hear of," if it was only one of his many wives who enacted the prophet's rôle.

But my meeting! I have wandered far away from that. Let me proceed.

After more testimony, more "speaking," and much enthusiasm, the Saints separated. My sister was talking with a young-lady friend, and regretting that no one present had been able to interpret; and I stood by, but did not join in the conversation. Suddenly the young lady turned to me and said: "Sister Fanny, do you not see in all this, more and more, the convincing power of God?"

Rather hesitatingly I replied, "Yes, I think I do."

"Think! sister?" said she, with warmth. "Oh, yes, I see by your looks that you are only half convinced; your faith is not strong enough yet; but remember, whatsoever is of doubt is sin!"

"But," I answered, "I do not see clearly what good we receive from these manifestations when no one can understand them."

"That is your want of faith—nothing else; you have the evidence of the truth before you, and you see how these miraculous powers build up the belief of God's people; and yet you doubt. To doubt is sin: whatsoever is not of faith is sin. You must pray and strive, sister, to be strengthened against temptation."

All this was not very logical, and it certainly did not help to dispel my doubts. But, twice in the course of a few short sentences, she had used a certain expression which, though trifling in itself, was recalled to my mind very forcibly before many days had passed.

This was my first experience of speaking in tongues.

But there were every-day matters of much more real importance to me than those strange speculations which had recently employed so much of my time and attention. It was now necessary that I should either return to France and fulfill my engagement with Monsieur De Bosque, or else resolve, once and for ever, to renounce all those ties which had become so dear to me.

Meanwhile, religious theories were not the only influences brought to bear upon my mind.

While day by day I began to be still more doubtful whether it would not after all be sinful in God's sight for me to leave my friends in the new faith and go back to France and my betrothed, who I knew neither was nor ever could become a Saint, other thoughts began to intrude themselves, and to shake my determination.

Elder Stenhouse's visits to my father's house began to be more frequent than ever, but as he desired to become familiar with the French language, and would bring his French grammar with him "to get a lesson," as he said, no particular notice was taken of his frequent coming. He was always welcomed with pleasure by the whole family, and, of course, by myself, who was his teacher. After awhile he took so much delight in his studies that he could not endure to let an evening pass without a lesson ; and somehow or other, I must confess, it was the first time since I had been a teacher that I felt such a peculiar pleasure in imparting instruction. I suppose it was the interest which all teachers experience when their pupils are studiously inclined. My pupil was particularly studious—so much so that he told my father and mother that he could not study very well in the parlor where every one was conversing, and begged the privilege of having the folding doors thrown partly open, that we might sit in the back parlor and be more quiet.

This was granted. But after a few evenings my pupil took a notion to partly close the folding doors after him, and as mothers' eyes are ever watchful, one of my sisters was sent in with her sewing to keep us company. But my pupil by this time had made rapid progress in the French language, and while my sister was innocently sewing, he was repeating his lesson to me ; and it was not our fault if in those French phrase-books there were passages expressive of love and devotion. Unconsciously to us both, he formed the habit of repeating those phrases to me at all times, and I formed the equally bad habit of blushing whenever he made use of them.

This my sister observed, and communicated the fact to my mother, who immediately said that we had better discontinue our French for awhile, as it was monopolizing too much of our time, and keeping both of us from attending to other and more important duties. But the discontinuation of the French lessons did not put an end to the visits of Elder Stenhouse. He was a persevering young man ; but the secret of the great interest taken in the French lessons was soon discovered.

Then it was that arguments of all kinds, and strong reasons were brought forward to shake my purpose of returning to France. I was "in doubt" :—when one day, discussing the point, Elder Stenhouse made use of the very same expression which had fallen from the sister's lips at the testimony-meeting—"Whatsoever is not of faith is sin." My mind unsettled, with all the strength of argument and religion on the one side, and on the other no one to plead for reason and for my return to France, who can wonder that I—at best only a weak and inexperienced girl—listened to the entreaties of my friends, and resolved to stay.

In the course of a few months I was engaged to be married to Elder Stenhouse. It may, perhaps, seem strange that I could so soon forget the past, with all its pleasant memories, and renouncing my betrothed husband, accept the attentions of another; but it should be remembered that I now firmly believed it was my duty—a duty which I dared not neglect—to blot out for ever all past associations, however dear to my heart they might be. Besides which, I, in common with all around me, had learned to look upon Elder Stenhouse as almost an angel, on account of what he had endured for the Gospel's sake; and I thought that any girl might consider herself honored by an offer of marriage from a man in his position in the church. My marriage in France would, I feared, have been but doubtful happiness in this world, and certain ruin in the next; but heaven itself would bless my union with one of its own ordained and tried servants.

Thus it came to pass that on the 6th of February, 1850—eight months after my arrival in Southampton—I was married to the young Mormon missionary, Elder Stenhouse. I entered upon my new sphere as a missionary's wife, feeling that there were no obstacles so great that I could not overcome them for the Gospel's sake. How little could I then imagine the life that was before me.

I wrote to my friends in France. I told them frankly all. In return they wrote to me—especially Monsieur De Bosque entreating me to alter my determination. Kind, and very gentle, were those letters. Dear, very dear, has been the memory of them, and of their writers, in later days. But, at the time, I felt that the influence which they still retained over me was in itself a sin.

I told all to my friends at home—showed them the letters and everything—and, both before and after my marriage with Elder Stenhouse, I never hid from myself and from him the fact that until my dying day I should cherish with an unchanging affection the memory of those friends whose tender love was the charm of my early life.

NOT long after my marriage I saw a miracle performed—a real, true miracle.

Let not the reader smile, or think that I am only jesting, for I am quite in earnest, and mean what I say. I saw a sick person who for years had been confined to her bed, her limbs distorted and her back bent; I was present when, after her conversion, the elders visited her; I saw them anoint her, and lay hands on her, and pray most fervently; and I saw the same decrepit old woman walking and singing and praising God. If that was not a miracle, I should like to know what is?

The Mormon leaders preached everywhere that their religion was not really a new one—it was only the fulness of the Gospel—the dispensation of the last days. Just—they said—as Jesus Christ fulfilled and completed the old Jewish law, so the modern prophet preached the perfection of Christ's Gospel;—nothing new; only the perfection of the old. This it was that made them so very successful when arguing with people who were well-taught in the letter of the Bible, but otherwise had received very little educational training.

The following attempt at an argument, which was once carried on between a Mormon Missionary and a Methodist local preacher, in my presence will serve to explain what I mean:—

Local Preacher: But, sir, I deny in toto that your elders ever do work miracles. The age of miracles is past.

Mormon: Statement is not proof. You say, sir, that the age of miracles is past.—Do you believe in the Bible?

L. P.: Certainly.

M.: Well then, sir,—do you consider that the Bible asserts that miracles can be, and have been worked,—do you believe that, or not?

L. P.: Certainly I do. Christ and His Apostles worked miracles, and the Bible speaks of many others besides.

M.: We agree on that point. But did Christ anywhere say that miracles should ever cease? Did His Apostles?

L. P.: Yes—No—Yes,—that is to say, I don't remember.

M.: Let me try to refresh your memory. Have not all the sacred writers foretold that ultimately this globe should be destroyed by fire, that the heavens should pass away, and the earth melt, and the sun, and the stars, and the moon be blotted out?

L. P.: Yes, of course, we all know that.

M.: Then let me ask you, Is such a terrible convulsion a common matter of fact. Is it not out of all calculation, out of all order of nature? Is it not a miracle—and a miracle yet to be performed.—Have then miracles ceased?

L. P.: Oh yes; but that's not a personal matter like healing the sick.

M.: Tell me then, does the Bible teach, or does it not teach, that bone shall come to bone and sinew to sinew and earth and sea shall give up their dead, at the last trump? Is not that a miracle, and don't you think it's a little "personal" to you and to me?

L. P.: Well, of course I admit that.

M.: But I have not done yet. Did, or did not Christ say, "These signs shall follow them that believe; in my name they shall cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover?" Now tell me—Are not miracles promised there, and nothing said about when they should cease. Is it not just as fair for the infidel to say that one of Christ's promises was of no avail as for you to say that He has broken His word? Solemnly He makes a promise to be with them to the end of the world and to confirm their miracles. You, because of your want of faith, see and work no miracles, and so you virtually say Christ broke His word on that point. The rest of the promise you don't deny, because you can say it is fulfilled without bringing forth any visible proofs.

L. P.: Well, I hardly know what to say to all this.

M.: Let me ask you one more question sir—Have you ever seen a miracle of any kind performed?

L. P.: No sir. Certainly not!

M.: And are you a teacher in Israel and know not these things? Have you been preaching the Gospel, as I think you said you had, for over eighteen years, and never yet saw a miracle performed: been preaching Christ and yet never saw Him discover His power in proof of what you taught?

L. P.: I'm afraid not, sir:—you trouble me.

M.: No, sir, it is not I who trouble you: it is He troubles you whose word you have doubted. Only last week Mr. Sterne—a minister of your own persuasion—but not far, I trust, from the kingdom of God—visited Bill Wright, the murderer, in prison. Bill had lived a life of infamy—the vilest of the vile—and he wound up his horrible crimes by cutting the throat of his wife. That brute in human form refused at first to speak with any one. Day after day and night after night the good man went to see him, but long in vain. At length one day he chanced to mention the words of Jesus: "Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out." A little boy, by his mother's knee, the murderèr had listened to those words which have brought peace to so many broken hearts. The appeals of the good minister had fallen dead upon his ears. But now was the time of the Spirit's influence, and the strong man wept. I have seen that fiendish man, whose very face betrays the depths of degradation to which his nature has fallen—I have seen him listening meekly and humbly to the word of God—without hope for earth, but with a changed soul within. Tell me, was not that a miracle if ever there was one?

L. P.: Sir, I admit that what you say is very forcible. I admit that these things are miraculous; but what I deny is that, in these days, men,—whether Catholic priests, or Mormon Missionaries,—can like St. Paul, or St. Peter, go about with power to heal the sick or raise the dead.

M.: And what I assert, sir, is, that God in these last days has raised up a holy priesthood to preach the fulness of the everlasting Gospel. Peter quoted the prophecy of Joel, and said that it was now fulfilled, and that “your young men should see visions, and your old men dream dreams, and I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh, saith the Lord.” Now if those were the last days—what are these? That was the beginning of the end; this is the end. I do not deny that much imposture has been practiced; but the existence of a counterfeit only proves that the real thing must be somewhere. In many instances, too, some of our holiest men have failed, and the world has scoffed at what it called their imposture. But even the disciples of Christ, you remember, once tried to work a miracle, and were not able to do so. What did Christ say, but that it was their want of faith, and bade them fast and pray more?

L. P.: Well, sir, I am willing to allow this, but if you yourself could perform a miracle before my eyes—if, for instance, you'd cure some man or woman who I knew really and truly was a confirmed invalid—then, sir, I'd accept all you say—I'd become a Mormon at once; but you'd decline that test, I suppose?

M.: No, sir! I would not decline! Brother Sturges, a new convert of ours, has been ill for years. You know him well, for he used to go to your meeting, years ago before he fell from a ladder and the doctors pronounced him incurably deaf. Your religion didn't help him, and the doctors didn't;—but if that man has only faith—faith as a little child—he shall hear as well as you or I hear to-day. We are going to pray over him; will you go with me?

L. P.: Yes. I'll go, but—but I hardly know what to think of it.

So saying, the two disputants walked off together. What ocular demonstration of miracle-working was presented to the Methodist minister, I do not know; I can only say that a fortnight after, I was present at a meeting of the Saints when he was admitted into the Church by immersion. He was followed by a goodly number of his flock; he became a very earnest missionary, and, years after, died in the full odor of sanctity and was buried in Zion, clothed in the full canonicals of a high-priest.

At the time of which I speak, such arguments as those I have briefly sketched from memory, and many which were much more forcibly put, had great weight with me. The Holy Scriptures I implicitly believed; and taking them quite literally I found that the reasoning employed by the Mormons, was, at least to me, altogether unanswerable.

But, for all that, I always liked my believing to be mixed with a little seeing and judging for myself; and on this account it was that I went, with a good deal of pleasure, to the house of Sister Armstrong upon whom the elders were going to lay hands and pray. St. James had said: "Is any sick among you? Let him call for the Elders of the Church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord: and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him." I wanted to see this command obeyed in these days, and to note results.

Sister Armstrong lived in a by-street not very far from the place where our meetings were held. She had lived in Southampton nearly all her life, and probably even now, although in the course of nature she must long since have gone to her rest, there must be many persons living who could remember her and her sudden recovery from illness ; for at the time, as might be expected, it produced no small sensation in the immediate locality in which she resided. She had been the wife of a master-builder, who meeting with an accident while engaged in business, was for a long time confined helplessly to the house, and then to his bed, from which he never arose.

His wife was a faithful and good woman. She nursed him tenderly, and by dint of great exertions on her part, was able to provide all the necessaries and decencies of life for her afflicted husband, herself, and their two little girls, besides paying for suitable medical attendance. In course of time the girls were sent to school—it was the mother's pride that they should not go to a free-school, or as schools of that class are called in England, a "charity-school"—and, night and day, she would toil with her needle in order to carry out this praiseworthy determination. When their father died, the girls were a great comfort to their mother. They were now almost grown up to womanhood, and were able by their own exertions to add very considerably to the family income. Thus happily and contentedly they lived together for several years, until one of the girls married very suitably a good, hard-working mechanic who had known her from childhood ; but the other remained at home with her mother.

Not long after the marriage of her elder daughter, Mrs. Armstrong was troubled with a severe cold which confined her for some weeks to the house. She grew alarmingly worse, and finally took to her bed. One morning her daughter found her speechless, and a doctor being called in, he pronounced her condition desperate. She was subject to convulsive fits which were at first of very frequent occurrence. After a time they came only at intervals, but their effect upon her was terrible ; her limbs were drawn up towards her body and her spine was completely curved, while all one side of her face was permanently distorted ;—and this continued for over five years.

Sarah, the younger daughter, watched her mother tenderly ; earning meanwhile a modest living by her needle, and from the proceeds of a little miscellaneous shop which she was able to tend without leaving the invalid for more than a few minutes at a time. Thus they lived together contentedly and happy until the arrival of the Mormon Missionaries in Southampton.

The married daughter and her husband being rather better in education and position than people of that class usually are in England, had made it a rule to go regularly every Sunday to their own parish church, and their children were baptized by the regular clergyman. This latter gentleman, however, died, and his successor who, of course, was appointed without consulting the wishes of the people, was, although a scholar and a gentleman, utterly without the slightest tinge of religious enthusiasm. The Methodists at that time had a grand-revival, and the young couple being induced to attend one of their meetings, liked what they heard, and, not long after, left off their attendance at the Anglican Church and joined the denomination to which they had become attached. This change, as might be expected, somewhat unsettled them, and when the Mormon Missionaries came, Bible in hand, and quoting chapter and verse for everything they said, they found ready listeners ; and in a very short time the whole family was admitted into the Mormon Church by baptism.

The affliction of the old lady was naturally the subject of conversation among these newly-made Saints and their neighbors. As we have seen, the Mormon Missionaries not only asserted their power to work miracles, but appealed to them as proofs of their mission. People suggested that if this was really true, here was an opportunity of the best kind for putting these pretensions to the test ; for every one knew that there was no deception about the malady of Sister Armstrong.

Themselves firmly believing in what they taught, the Elders desired nothing more than to be able to prove the truth of their assertions, and declared their readiness to do what was required of them. A proper time was appointed when the relations and friends of the sick person should meet together to intercede for her in solemn prayer, after which they would anoint her with oil, as the Apostle James had directed, and lay their hands upon her, that the prayer of faith might save the sick, and God should raise her up.

The room was full of people. There were several of the leading elders present, and also a goodly number of the Saints, who naturally felt a deep interest in the result of these proceedings; besides these, the neighbors who, of course, had heard what was going on, came and filled up the room quite inconveniently.

A stranger would at once have been struck with the prevalence of that peculiar magnetic feeling which evidently influenced all present. Even those who, as the poet says, came to scoff, felt the same influence, as many afterwards acknowledged. The elders surrounded the bed, and after a brief but most earnest address from one of them, we all engaged in prayer. The subject of the prayer can readily be supposed; but the earnestness—the intense, anxious pleading of the supplicants—no one could comprehend who had never been present at such a scene.

A bottle of oil was now brought out by the eldest daughter of the invalid; and three of the elders took it in their hands. It was an Italian flask of very thin glass, covered with wicker, and holding somewhat more than a pint. In taking hold of it, the elders placed their fingers quite round it; though, where many assist in the consecration, I have seen them simply touch it with their fingers. Then one of the elders said:

“By virtue of the holy priesthood, and in the name of Jesus Christ; we consecrate this oil to the healing of all those who are sick and afflicted; that it may remove all infirmities and impurities of the system. And may this oil, which we dedicate especially to the healing of our afflicted sister, penetrate her to the afflicted parts, and give them new life and vigor, that she may be strengthened and healed by the power of faith, and the laying on of hands, as commanded by thy servants in the last days;—for this especial purpose do we bless and consecrate this oil; in the name of Jesus Christ.—Amen.”

After this a large tablespoon was brought forth and filled with the consecrated oil, which latter was poured down the throat of the patient. She was then thoroughly anointed—the oil not being applied by the tip of the finger as in “extreme unction,” but poured upon her much after the fashion described by King David when he says the precious fluid ran down the beard of Aaron and saturated all his clothing.

The patient, however, was patient indeed. To her it was no idle form. She was newly converted and her heart was burning with zeal and faith. Perhaps the reader may think that this had much to do with the success of the operation, as probably it had. However this might be, the elders, who while they anointed her had mingled prayers and benedictions above her head, now once more united in fervent supplication, and then laid their hands upon her, according to the letter of the Scripture.

There was something peculiar about this laying on of hands. It was not a mere gentle touching, but a thorough manipulation. The two hands were placed firmly on the top of the head and then drawn energetically down the body while vigorous “passes”—as magnetizers call the action—were made repeatedly over the affected parts. These prayers and manipulations were made for very nearly three hours, when the elders engaged in the work—for work it was—were thoroughly exhausted. One of them then placing his right hand on the head of the sufferer suddenly blessed her in the name of the Lord, told her that her sins were forgiven her; that the evil spirits who had afflicted her were cast out; that the infirmity and disease which for five long years had kept her bound upon the bed of sickness was rebuked, and would torment her no more; and bade her be strong in the faith and be of good cheer, for God would raise her up.

Watching all this, as I was; believing all this, as I did; my heart filled with joy at the manifestation of heavenly power which I expected to witness,—I must nevertheless acknowledge that a feeling of wonder pervaded my mind when I saw Sister Armstrong, who for so many years had been unable even to turn in the bed by herself, stretch forth her poor, bony arm, all unassisted, and say to one of the elders—"Give me your hand, brother."

One of the brethren put forth his hand, and took hers, saying as he did so: "Have faith; have faith Sister Armstrong;"—while the brother who had recently blessed her repeated: "The prayer of faith shall save the sick, and God shall raise him up!"

Sister Armstrong, who an hour before could not, unaided, have changed her position, now grasping the elder's hand, raised herself up in the bed. She looked upon us with a smile of triumph for a moment—faith was triumphant. But nature asserted her immutable laws and the next instant the poor sister sank gently back upon the pillows and closed her eyes. We thought that she was dead.

The room was cleared of all but those immediately connected with the sufferer, and I, on account of my new position as Elder Stenhouse's wife, was allowed to remain. Sarah and her younger sister applied such simple restoratives as came conveniently to hand, and we were soon satisfied that Sister Armstrong had only fainted; and who could wonder at it?

I sat there, not far from the bed, lost in astonishment at what I had seen, and wondering whether what Elder Bronson had said was true—that in a day or two, at furthest, she would be quite well. To me it was all a mystery. I knew then nothing of the miraculous power of faith—not religious faith, but often just the reverse, which has so often relieved and cured diseases and infirmities which have baffled the power of the most skilful physicians. Moreover I knew nothing then of that peculiar magnetic power which scientific men now have proved belongs to certain constitutions and can be used for curative purposes. So, in the childlike simplicity of my heart, I knelt down and thankfully poured forth my gratitude to God that he had permitted me to witness this wonderful manifestation of his power and love.

As I rose from my knees, I saw standing just by me and intently watching my movements, a young girl—little more than a child—who was destined in after years to cross my path more than once, and whose sisterly affection I shall ever cherish among the treasures of my heart. She wore a light summer dress, with little or no ornament, and indeed she needed none ; while on her head was a little coquettish hat of the prettiest and most becoming style. Her hair was bright and golden—such hair as I have never seen, except in pictures and on one or two extremely rare occasions—and her eyes, I could not tell the deep, deep love—the charming, engaging beauty which beamed from them.

The reader may perhaps think I am romancing a little, but I do assure him that when I first saw that young girl in all the heavenly beauty of budding maidenhood, I could hardly persuade myself for a moment that I was not dreaming after the fashion of some fairy story. Years passed away—years of anxious cruel trial to us both, and now how changed we are ! She then a pretty, gentle faërie queen ; I, a new-made bride, hardly out of my teens. What are we both now ?

She came right up to me, and said, “ Mrs. Stenhouse, you don’t know me, but I have seen you often, and I like you very much—yes, and I want to talk to you.”

“ Yes, dear,” I said, and I kissed her on both cheeks and she looked pleased,—in her simplicity she thought it was a great honor to be noticed by a missionary’s wife.

Then we sat down together and she told me all about herself :—how her father was a wealthy man, a doctor in good practice and with property beside ; how he had accidentally met with a Mormon gentleman—a man of education and position ; for many such joined the Church before the blighting doctrine of polygamy was promulgated ;—how that his arguments and Bible-proofs had been so convincing that her father had been baptized and had cast in his lot among the Saints ;—how that he, being called away on business, had left her with a maiden aunt who did not belong to the Mormon Church, and who would not let her come to see

Sister Armstrong anointed ; and how she had quietly crept out unnoticed, and would now have to return quite alone."

"No," I said, "I will go with you and see you safe home, but you must not come out all by yourself in this way again."

She kissed me, with a comical little smile dancing on her lips, as much as to intimate that whatever I might sagely suggest, she would, after all, be pretty certain to have her own way.

I saw my young friend safely to her father's house, and then I went home myself, thinking of her childish beauty and winning ways, and pondering over what I had witnessed.

The next morning Sarah called in to see us. She told us that her mother had had a calm and peaceful night, and had been much refreshed ; that when she awoke she insisted upon being washed and dressed and was now sitting up, with my new acquaintance—Mary Burton—talking to her. I could hardly believe this could be true, so I put on my bonnet and went to see.

There, sure enough, was Sister Armstrong, very pale, and evidently very weak, but quite another woman. No one could have recognised her. The muscles of her face were no longer contracted, and she sat there straight enough for a woman of her age. - I could scarcely believe my eyes. The poor old lady seemed glad to see me, and it did my heart good to hear her talk of the mercies of God.

As we talked, Mary came near and put her hand in mine. I stooped down and touched her cheek gently, and kissed her. "You did not even tell me what your other name was, dear ?" I asked.

"No, Sister Stenhouse ; but I told you everything else. My name is Mary Burton," she replied, "but you must call me only Mary."

I stooped down and kissed her again. That was my only answer.

Then she arose from the stool on which she was sitting, and said : "I must leave you for a few minutes, please ; I promised to go back directly I'd seen how Mrs. Armstrong was ; but I'll return soon." And with a little whimsical nod and an imperative wave of the hand, she tripped away.

After this I saw plenty of the gift of healing and the working of miracles. Some cases were not quite so successful as that which I have described. Then we were told the fault was in our want of faith. That cures were really effected, no one who has been present on such occasions could possibly doubt. That they were miracles in the sense in which we generally use that term, I do not for a moment believe ; but I think that in cases where the efforts of the elders were successful, scientific enquiry would readily show that the effects were only natural results of natural causes.

One brother—a deacon in the church—was suddenly attacked with cholera. He sent immediately for Elder Stenhouse. It matters not what the disease may be, the same means are employed. Young and old, of both sexes, are treated alike ;—from measles to cholera morbus, from toothache to blindness, from whooping-cough to deafness ; and from headache to "possession by devils"—the same prescription serves for every one. And so satisfied are the Saints that this is the only right way to effect a cure, that, until very recently, to send for a physician would have been accounted a sin—doubting the promises of God—want of faith.

In the case of the deacon to whom I have just alluded, the experiment was successful. Another missionary happened to be in Southampton at that time, and he was with Elder Stenhouse when the messenger arrived. They were both much surprised, for they had seen the sick man only an hour and a half before, but they set off at once, and found him in such a state that he could hardly be recognised.

They immediately anointed him with oil, administering a good dose internally ; then laid hands on him and prayed for him ; but the cholera maintained its hold. The two Missionaries were full of zeal and were determined not to yield to the terrible disease ; from early evening to the following morning at daybreak they continued to anoint the brother and to lay hands on him, praying for his recovery probably thirty times during the night. In their rough but expressive language, they " had a regular battle."

Victory at length crowned their efforts :—the disease was mastered ; but they themselves were utterly prostrated by the physical and mental exertions of the night.

The Saints regarded this as a great miracle ; but unbelievers would doubtless wonder why, if it was done by " the power of God "—as the Elders asserted—it had cost so much exertion on the part of man. I, however, simply state the facts as they fell under my own observation ; and I may add that, during that same night, in the same block of low tenement buildings, five persons died of that dreadful scourge.

On the following day, an enthusiastic sister came running to Elder Stenhouse for him to come and lay hands upon her husband who had also been attacked by the cholera. She was a woman of great faith, or thought she was, and she had no doubt that a wonderful miracle would be wrought. Even in the midst of the affliction at home she was perfectly jubilant over the idea that the power of the priesthood would be demonstrated. She had called in several of her neighbors before the elders arrived, and they stood round the bed of the sick man.

When the elders reached the house, the livid countenance of the sufferer told plainly that he was very far gone. Elder Stenhouse laid his hands upon him in the usual way, but instead of commanding the disease to depart, as it was expected he would, he prayed that the afflicted brother himself might pass away in peace. The head of the dying man instantly fell back upon his pillow, and all was over.

The bereaved woman was almost petrified with surprise and disappointment, and the unexpected change which had made her a widow. Elder Stenhouse could only answer that there was " no virtue in him ;" he had no faith at that moment to heal any one ; the former exercise of the gift had exhausted him. There was, perhaps, more truth in his answer than he himself imagined.

The poor woman of whom I have spoken must have been greatly distressed when she saw the promise of miraculous assistance upon which she had so confidently relied fail her in such an unexpected manner. But she was not alone in her disappointment. Many a man and woman who believed that the laws of nature would be reversed and the decrees of the Almighty set aside because their faith was strong and they "expected" God to act in such and such a way, made shipwreck of their hopes as this poor woman did, upon the quicksands of a false expectation.

My husband and myself were invited to take tea at the house of a brother in Southampton. The brother's name was Isles, and he and his wife had a child who had been very seriously ill for nearly three weeks. Mr. Stenhouse had frequently "administered" to him by the laying on of hands. On the evening to which I allude the child appeared to be much better, and he even sat up to the tea-table, perched, child-like, upon his high chair and in accordance with his own earnest request. We all thought that he was doing very nicely.

After tea, and just when we were about to leave, Sister Isles said : " Brother Stenhouse, please lay your hands upon my babe, and ask the Lord to bless him, that he may have a refreshing sleep to-night. My husband complied, and began by praying that the child might rest well,—when, suddenly, as if by an irresistible impulse he implored that the child might die easily and without pain. I instinctively glanced at the mother, and our eyes met. She looked as if frozen to the heart ; and in a moment we knew that the child was dying,—not painfully, but calmly and peacefully, as if he were going to sleep. The poor mother wept piteously ; but my husband bade her not trouble the last moments of the dying child.

In a few moments all was over ; and I—and probably the mother, too—asked mentally ;—if this also is the age of miracles—"is the Lord's hand shortened that He cannot save, or His ear heavy that He will not hear?" We had yet to learn that the thoughts of God are beyond the comprehension of man.

Since those times when the spirit of enthusiasm and religious zeal animated the Mormon missionaries and teachers, and stirred up the Saints who listened to them to emulate in faithfulness the Christians of the Early Church, a great change has come over everything connected with the doctrines which were then taught and practiced.

Several years after the occurrence of the events which I have just narrated, when we had been for a considerable time resident in Salt Lake City, our faith in the miraculous gift of healing was still so strong that we suffered one of our children to lie almost at the door of death before we would dare to call in medical assistance, and when, at length, love for our suffering child overcame, to a certain extent, our scruples, it was under protest and with many an effort to silence the voice of a falsely-accusing conscience, that my husband reluctantly went for the physician.

Now—so great are the changes which the influx of Gentiles and more intimate contact with the advanced civilisation of the age have produced—there is not one of the most pious leaders of the Church—including Brother Brigham (who but a very little while ago denounced such a course as the first step towards rank apostasy)—who would not call in, if it appeared needful, the very best medical assistance—whether Mormon or Gentile—which could be procured. And yet Brigham, despite his notorious inconsistencies, lays claim to an "Infallible Priesthood!"

The Saints, in theory, still cling to the first teachings of the Church; but, if the truth must be told, not only does "iniquity abound," but "the love of many has waxed cold."

ABOUT three months after our marriage it was rumored that four of the Twelve Apostles had been appointed to foreign missions, and were then on their way to England.

The Saints in Britain had been for several years without any missionaries direct from the body of the church, and the announcement of this foreign mission was hailed with joy.

I confess to experiencing much pleasure at the thought of becoming acquainted with a living Apostle. How often in my girlhood I had wished that I had lived when men inspired of God walked the earth. What a joy, I thought, it would have been to have listened to the wisdom of such teachers. Now the time was near when I should realise all the happiness of my day-dreams—when I should really have the privilege of conversing with those chosen men of God. The invitation, therefore, to meet the conference in London on the first of June, was very welcome intelligence.

It must not, however, be supposed that I expected to find in them anything which would place them out of the ordinary pale of humanity. I knew that the Apostles of our Lord were very ordinary men, who in their day pursued the common avocations of life. Their charm and glory consisted only in the fact that the spirit of God rested upon them, guiding them in all their ways. These men who now were coming to England were, I firmly believed, as true Apostles as any who ever saw Christ in the flesh ; but they, like the chosen ones of old, had also the gift of inspiration, and were consecrated and set apart specially, by direct revelation from on high, to perform a great and glorious work. But though I did not expect to find them differ, either in appearance or in ordinary conversation, much from their brethren, I expected to find in them grave and very earnest men, and I certainly did experience a sense of disappointment when, in all their conversation and in all their doings, I found that American Prophets and Apostles were, after all, very much like other men.

We went to the London Conference—my husband and I—and there for the first time I met with Apostles, who were also Prophets, and Priests, and High-priests, and Teachers, and Elders, and Deacons—all assembled in solemn convocation.

The four Apostles whom I met at that time were John Taylor, Lorenzo Snow, Erastus Snow, and Franklin D. Richards—pleasant and agreeable men, and withal very fair specimens of Mormon missionaries, who had found favor in the eyes of Brigham Young and of the leaders in Zion, and who had been promoted accordingly. They lived comfortably, wore the finest broadcloth, fashionably cut, and were not averse to gold chains, and charms, and signet-rings, and other personal adornments. They put on no particular airs, were as polite and attentive to ladies as gentlemen always are, and could go to a theatre or any other place of amusement without hesitation. I afterwards discovered that in one particular, at least, if not in all, they resembled the early Apostles, for they too could, like St. Paul, “lead about a sister” without any compunctions of conscience.

At that time I had not become acquainted with the Mormon "mystery of godliness," and was far from suspecting these pleasant American Apostles of having even the slightest inclination to imitate King Solomon or the patriarchs in their domestic habits. That was to be a discovery of later date.

I do not care to describe this London Conference, as it was very much like any other meeting of the same kind. It had been specially called for the purpose of welcoming the four newly-arrived Apostles. Saints from every part of Britain were assembled, and a good deal of enthusiasm was manifested. Hymns and prayers were interspersed with speeches, and business details of all kinds were fully entered into.

The Southampton Saints had hitherto formed only a branch of the London Conference, but did not form a conf  rence of their own. It was now resolved that since so large a number had recently been baptized in Hampshire, the several branches of the church there should be organised into a special conference at Southampton, with Elder Stenhouse as its president; and the Sunday following was appointed for that purpose, when the Apostle Snow, en route to Italy—to which country he had just been appointed missionary—would honor the occasion with his presence.

As we returned, some gentlemen in the same railway carriage, to while away the time, I suppose, entered into a religious discussion. What the subject was I do not now remember, but I can recollect that a good deal was said as to which of all the numerous Christian sects really possessed divine authority. Elder Stenhouse took an active part in the argument, and being, like all the Mormon missionaries at that time, very well posted in Scriptural discussions, he attracted considerable attention, and was much complimented by several persons present.

The Apostle Lorenzo Snow was silent all the time, but he took note of all that passed. Elder Stenhouse was a man of great zeal and untiring energy—qualities in which perhaps Brother Snow felt himself a little deficient; and he was going on a mission which required unflinching devotion and perseverance. We had not been an hour at home, before he told my husband that the Lord had thrice revealed to him that he should accompany him to Italy! How often—even while I still clung to Mormonism—did it appear strange to me that the “revelations” of distinguished Saints should so frequently coincide with their own personal wishes, and come at such convenient times.

I had laid aside my travelling dress, and was hastening to provide some refreshment for the Apostle, when my husband came and told me of the revelation which had been so opportunely received. I was at that time as much an enthusiast as Elder Stenhouse himself, and I felt honored that my husband should be the first English elder appointed to a foreign mission. Here was the fulfilment of my ambition that we should be in the forefront of the battle, and should obtain distinction as zealous servants of God. But at what a cost was this ambition purchased! My poor, weak heart sickened at the thought—I had been but four months married.

When the Apostle asked me if I were willing that Elder Stenhouse should go to Italy, I answered “Yes,” though I felt that my heart would break. I remembered that in my first transport of joy and gratitude after being baptized, I had made a covenant with the Lord that I would do anything which he might require of me, and I dared not rebel or break that vow. Oh, the agony that fell upon my young heart; it seemed that the weight of a mountain rested upon it when I was told that my husband might be five years absent. He had already been five years a travelling elder, without a home, trusting for daily bread to the voluntary kindness of the Saints. He had labored faithfully, and looked forward to the day when his “conference” should be established, and he could count upon an improvement in his temporal position, and an early call to emigrate to Zion. In the few months that I had been his wife, it was only natural that I should share his hopes; but just at the moment when they were about to be realised, hopes and expectations were scattered to the winds.

On the following day the Saints assembled, the Southampton Conference was organised, and Elder Stenhouse elected its president. Ten minutes later he was publicly appointed by the Apostle on a mission to Italy.

In one short year what changes I had seen. I had relinquished a happy home in France and forsaken the friends of my youth ; I had set aside an alliance that promised wealth and honor, to embrace a faith that was everywhere ridiculed, and to cast in my lot among a people universally regarded as dupes and fools ; I had married a missionary elder who could offer me nothing but toil and privation ; and now to complete the changes of an eventful year, my husband was about to leave me—probably for five years, and in fact it was very possible that I might never see him again. All this for faith—a faith no doubt mistaken, but certainly sincere.

During the few days which intervened between the time when Elder Stenhouse received his appointment, to the hour of his departure, I enjoyed but little of his society. Arranging the affairs of the conference which he was leaving, and preparation for his mission, fully occupied his attention. I do not think we either of us uttered a word, when alone together, respecting the future that was before us. It was probably better that we did not. There are moments of our life when silence is better than speech, and it is safer to trust in the mercy of God than try to shape our own destiny.

The Saints are noted for the fraternal spirit which exists among them. There are, of course, exceptions ; but, as a rule, every Mormon is willing to help his brother in the faith, acting upon the principle, "One is your Master, even Christ: and all ye are brethren." The Southampton Saints were no exception to this rule, but showed their kindness both to my husband and myself in a thousand little ways. I have spoken of my unhappiness during that week of preparation, but I must not forget that there were gleams of hope in the darkness. One occasion I shall never forget—a pic-nic which our friends held as a kind of valedictory feast in honor of the missionaries—of Elder Stenhouse in particular.

Right up the Southampton River, not far from Netley Abbey, is a pleasant and picturesque spot named Bittern, which I need not too particularly describe, although the memory of its beauty recalls recollections of mingled sadness and pleasure to my mind. There my parents now lived, and thither it was proposed our friends should go. They could obtain all they needed for the pic-nic at my father's house, and we could take our good things into the woods and enjoy ourselves as we pleased. We had a very happy time—for the moment, even I forgot the cloud that was hanging over me, and our dear friends not only enjoyed themselves to the utmost, but seemed bent upon making the time pass pleasantly to everyone else.

I had been talking to Sister White about the recent doings of the Saints, the establishment of the conference and the sending away of Elder Stenhouse. I wanted Sister White, as in fact I wanted everyone else, to think that I was perfectly happy in the separation, and that I counted my feelings as a wife as nothing when placed in the balance against my duty as a missionary, and I tried to impress upon her how proud I was that my husband should be the first English Elder entrusted with a foreign mission. We talked together a great deal. She was still quite a young woman, though married, and the mother of four darling little children; but probably she had a better experience than I had and could see through my attempts to stifle my natural feelings, while at the same time she sympathised with me. She spoke very kindly to me; and as we talked, we wandered inadvertently away from the rest of the party. Suddenly she thought of her little boy, and, mother-like, thinking he might be in danger, ran off to find where he was, promising to come back immediately.

I sat down upon the grass to await her return. I was somewhat excited by the conversation which had passed between us; but as I sat musing my agitation began to cool down and I was soon lost in thought and did not notice that I was not alone.

I did not hear the light footsteps near me, and did not see my fairy friend, as I called her, pass between me and the sun. But a tiny hand was laid gently on my shoulder, and looking up I saw the loving eyes of Mary Burton looking straight down into mine.

"Where have you been, dear?" I asked, "Why, I have hardly seen you all the day."

"But I knew you were here," she said, "and I thought you were alone—and I wanted to see you and talk with you."

"Come and sit down beside me, Mary," I said, "and let us have a little chat together." Then I drew her gently towards me, and she sat down by my side. For a few moments we said nothing, but I was watching her, and waiting to hear what she would say. She seemed such a pretty, such a sweet and gentle girl—more like one of those little-birds of glorious plumage and thrilling song that we see glittering among the dew-drops and the dancing leaves, than a child of earth. And I pitied her for her beauty, for such beauty is a snare; and I wondered whether her innocent soul was as fair and glorious before God as her face was sweet to me; and I asked whether, in years to come, when the glory of her childish radiance had passed away, the brightness of a soul pure and serene would lend a new beauty to her features—the beauty not of childish innocence but of a noble womanhood.

I took her hand in mine, and asked her some trifling question; but she did not answer. Suddenly she looked up full into my face and said, "Sister Stenhouse; I'm very, very sorry for you."

"Sorry for me, dear?" I said, "Why should you be sorry? I am not sad."

"You shouldn't say so," she replied, "you know in your heart you are sad, although you don't say so. It's a fine thing, no doubt, for Elder Stenhouse to go away, though for my part I'd rather stop at home if I loved any one there, and at-any-rate, you must feel sorry that he is going away so far, if you love him."

"But Mary," I said, "you know it is his duty to go, and he has been called to it by the Apostle, and it is a great honor."

"Oh yes, I know that," she replied—"I know that." Then we relapsed into silence for some few moments. Presently drawing nearer to me, she said again quite suddenly, "Sister Stenhouse, do you know the meaning of the word Polygamy!"

"Why, what a funny question to ask me, child!" I exclaimed.

"Child, you call me, Sister Stenhouse, but I'm not a child—at least not quite a child—I shall be fifteen next birthday."

"Well dear," I said, "I did not mean to offend you; and I call you 'child' because I love you; but you asked me such a strange question and used such a strange word."

This was quite true, for at that time the word Polygamy was as seldom used as the word 'polyandry,' or any other word signifying a state of things with which we have nothing to do.

"I'm not offended," she said, "only people have a way of treating me as if I were only such a very little girl:—I suppose I look so."

She certainly did look so, and I suppose she read my thoughts. Womanhood, by and by, brought to her more of reality both in face and figure as well as in the terrible facts of life; but at that time the term "little fairy," which I have so often used respecting her, seemed the most appropriate. The meaning of that terrible word "Polygamy" she understood, in later years, fully as well as I did.

"Well dear," I said, "Why did you ask me that strange question?"

"You must promise not to be angry with me if I tell you," she answered, "and yet I think you ought to know."

I readily promised—what could I have refused her?—and she said:

"The other day two of the Sisters were at our house—I may not tell you their names for fear of making mischief—and they were talking together between themselves and did not notice that I was present—or else they didn't care. And I heard one of them tell the other that she had heard secretly that in Zion men were allowed to have many wives, and she used that word "Polygamy" very often, and said that was what the people of the world called it."

"Well, Mary dear," I replied, "that is no great secret. We have all heard that said before. Wicked people who hate the Gospel say that, and a great deal more, in order to bring scandal upon the Church; but of course it isn't true."

"Ah, but I haven't told you all," she said, "the sisters had a long talk about it and they explained who they heard it from, and it was from no one outside the Church; and then one of them said that Elder Stenhouse had heard all about it and knew it was true, only of course he did not talk about such things yet; but that the time would come when everyone would acknowledge it, and all the Saints would have many wives. I was frightened when I heard this, and very angry—for I thought of you—and I spoke to her and said it was all untrue and I'd ask Elder Stenhouse; and they scolded me very much for saying so, and said it was very wicked for a child to listen, and that was why I did not like you to call me 'child.'"

"Well darling," I said, "I'll not offend you any more in that way—and it was very good of you to tell me anything you thought I ought to know." Then I kissed her, and continued: "But, after all, I don't think it's of any consequence. It's the old scandal, just as in the early days they said wicked things of Christ and His apostles. Elder Stenhouse knows all that people say, but he has told me again and again that there is not a word of truth in it, and I believe him."

"You think so, Sister Stenhouse," she replied, "and I suppose I ought to think so too, but if it's all false how did people first begin to think of it? People don't say that the Mormons are murderers or thieves, because we have given them no reason to think so. Then why should they think of such an unheard-of thing as Polygamy—surely there must have been some reason. Don't you think so?"

"No, dear," I answered, "Elder Stenhouse says that some very wicked men have sometimes joined the Church, and have done all manner of shocking things, so that they had to be cut off, and then they went about trying to make other people believe that the Mormons were as wicked as they were. There was John C. Bennett who lived a frightful life at Nauvoo, and then tried to make out that Joseph Smith was as bad as he was. And Marsh, the president of the twelve apostles, and Orson Hyde, when they apostatised not only said bad things of Joseph, but took affidavit and swore solemnly before the magistrates that the prophet had been guilty of the most fearful crimes."

I kissed her again, and she said, "Well, perhaps you are right"; but I could see that in her heart she was not convinced.

Then we talked of ourselves and all that interested us, and she told me all her childish hopes and ambitions; and to me—young as I was myself—it was pleasant to listen to her innocent prattle. She promised to come and see me when Elder Stenhouse had gone and I should be left alone; and when we got back to the rest of the party we were as firm friends as if we had known each other a lifetime.

At midnight, Saturday, June 15th, 1850, the steamer left Southampton for Havre-de-Grace, bearing on board the first two Mormon Missionaries to Italy—one of them was my husband.

The Saints had called in the evening to bid Elder Stenhouse good-bye, and as he was, of course, to travel "without purse or scrip," they vied with each other in showing their appreciation of his position and his devotion to the faith. The poorest among them would not be denied the privilege of contributing their mites to aid in the conversion of the Italians, and none of the brethren felt that they could show too much kindness to the departing missionary. Just in this way have all the foreign missions of the Mormon Church been projected and sustained; the elements of success were always present—devotion and self-abnegation on the part of the missionaries, and an earnest, self-sacrificing disposition on the part of the people, commanding respect, however erroneous or foolish the foundation of their faith.

In the bustle of departure, Mr. Stenhouse seemed never to have thought about himself, and certainly he made no preparation for me. I had full confidence in him, however, and loved him devotedly, and knew that my love was returned. But men who look for miracles, and count upon special providences for daily bread, are not generally very prudent or far-seeing in their domestic arrangements. Elder Stenhouse had been told that "the Lord would provide," and it therefore seemed to him superfluous that he should interfere; it would have been a lack of faith to have shown too much interest in what might become of me. He left me with only £1.

I now realised the loneliness of my position,—there was no earthly friend to whom I could turn for sympathy at a time like this. Before my Heavenly Father alone I could pour out the bitterness of my soul and all my griefs, and in His presence weep and pray.

CHAPTER VII.

MY HUSBAND'S MISSION :—I AM LEFT ALONE.

WHEN the Apostle Snow called upon Mr. Stenhouse to go to Italy, the Saints willingly accepted the responsibility of providing for me during his absence.

They thought it was more an honor than a burden to have this charge committed to them ; but it was very humiliating to me to be placed in such a position, however anxious they might be to assist me and to serve the general cause. To face opposition or to give my all for my religion, I was willing indeed ; but to depend upon others for my daily bread was utterly repugnant to my feelings, although, of course, if the Church sent away my husband, whose proper place and duty it was to support his family, it was only right that the members of that Church should undertake the responsibility. But then, and at many other times during my life, I have learned the truth of Christ's precept "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

The American Apostle was not without worldly wisdom when he proposed that an unmarried man should be appointed to preside over the Southampton conference, as his wants would be few. But Mr. Stenhouse had been solicited by a friend who had a wife and children, to secure his appointment, and with ready confidence in that friend, he overlooked his own interests and my welfare, and I was left to pass through trials and privations which I can never forget.

The Saints were very kind, and took pleasure in doing all they could for me ; but the mistake which my husband committed in leaving his friend to succeed him as president of the conference was soon apparent. The 'friend' thought of his own family first, and the family required all that the Saints could reasonably be expected to contribute, and even then they had not enough. I therefore received only such little sums as could be withheld from them, and to make the matter worse those who had any property or estate were counselled to sell all and "gather to Zion." The more wealthy Saints were soon gone, and the current expenses of the church fell heavily upon those who were hardly able to support their own families.

They tried to send me something every week, and I have no doubt they did send me all that they could. When their contributions reached four or five shillings (about $1) I thought myself fortunate ; more often I did not receive the value of fifty cents in the whole week, at times less, and sometimes nothing at all. That unfailing comfort to respectable English poverty—a cup of tea—was my greatest luxury, but at times for weeks together I had not even that ; I had nothing but bread—but I never complained.

Whenever it was possible I concealed my true situation from every one, and in my almost daily letters to my husband not a shadow of a hint was ever dropped relative to my own privations. I wanted him to be successful in his mission, and I feared that his energy would desert him if he knew of my difficulties. I was in extreme poverty, certainly, but for myself I was not in trouble. God would provide for me, I felt, and it was glorious to suffer in a sacred cause.

But darker days—days of severer trial, were creeping slowly near me. Up to this time I had worshipped God and loved my husband with a perfect heart. Now the dark shadow of an accursed thing was looming in the distance, but approaching surely if slowly. The strange suggestions made by darling little Mary Burton at the pic-nic, were not the first whisperings that I had heard of a probable change in our faith and practice respecting marriage, though I did not care to tell her so. Others had spoken in my presence of the same subject, but I had not believed them. I had questioned my husband, and his answers had reassured me.

Although Polygamy was utterly denied by the Missionaries in Europe, yet long before it was openly avowed a great deal was written and said on the subject. Joseph Smith, whatever he said and did in private, always denied it in public, and after his death the leaders of the Church followed his example. In some way, however, an idea had got abroad that the Mormons were somewhat unsound respecting the marriage question. Still the elders stoutly denied the charge, and the more they were accused the more strenuous became their denials.

At a public discussion at Boulogne-sur-mer in France, the Apostle John Taylor, in reply to the accusations of Polygamy which were brought against him, said :

"We are accused here of actions the most indelicate and disgusting, such as none but a corrupt and depraved heart could have contrived. These things were too outrageous to admit of belief. . . . I shall content myself with quoting some views of chastity and marriage from a work published by us, containing some of our articles of faith—Doctrine and Covenants."

He then proceeded to quote from the Book of Doctrine and Covenants " such passages as the following :—

"Marriage is ordained by God unto man ; wherefore it is lawful that he should have one wife, and they twain should be one flesh. [p. 218].

He quoted many other things also, among which might be enumerated the following :

“Thou shalt love thy wife with all thy heart, and shalt cleave unto her, and none else.”

He quoted also many other passages of Scripture which had reference to the subject;—each powerful to put aside even the idea of polygamy; and each equally powerful as an argument against polygamy itself.

Let the reader here note the value of what Mormons say when their faith is called in question :—See and judge :—

Brother Taylor, who spoke at that meeting, and utterly denied polygamy, had himself—at that very moment when he so atrociously perjured himself and when he swore that no Mormon had more than one wife—five wives living in Salt Lake City : One of his friends there present had two wives ; and the other was married to a mother and her own daughter !

Any conclusion, any expression of disgust at these abominations and deliberate perjuries, I leave to the reader.

Among those who came to see Mr. Stenhouse before he left for Italy, was Elder Margetts, an English elder of some prominence in the British mission. At the pic-nic, of which I have already spoken, I noticed that this elder was more than usually attentive to a pretty young sister who was also present. There was always an affectionate familiarity among the Saints ; as I previously mentioned, they were like brothers and sisters, and addressed each other as such. But the attentions of the elder I speak of pointed a little beyond all this. He could not, perhaps, be accused of any open impropriety, but he certainly looked much more like the girl's lover than an ordinary friend or her spiritual adviser.

I knew this Elder's family in London, and his conduct pained me a good deal. So I drew the attention of my husband to the circumstance, and he said the Elder was foolish but he would speak to them both ; and this he did.

After the departure of the missionaries, this elder remained for several days. He then returned to London, but it was not long before he was again in Southampton, and he still paid marked attention to the same young sister. This caused unpleasant remarks among the Saints, who at this time certainly did not believe that polygamy was practiced in Utah.

At a later date this Elder, with some others, was again in Southampton, and I was invited to take tea with them at the house of one of the Saints. In the course of the evening there was a general conversation on "the work of the Lord," in which I, of course, was greatly interested.

Whenever any of the missionaries were visiting, the Saints would seek their society just like children who were glad to meet again their parents after a long absence; and at such times they were at liberty to ask what questions they pleased. On the evening I speak of, I well remember that the general subject of conversation was the apostasy of the Christian Church from the true order of God's salvation. Prominence was given to the history of Abraham and his descendants, and occasional allusion was made to their marital relations; but nothing directly was spoken. It was very evident that these elders only wanted to drop a word or two here and there to suit those who wanted it, but nevertheless they spoke so obscurely and mysteriously that they could easily have retracted what was said if any one had accused them of teaching a doctrine which they were unwilling openly to avow.

When I returned home that night I was fully satisfied that the Elder I have spoken of had a reason for his frequent visits to Southampton, and shortly after, the young sister went to London. Whether Polygamy was ever to be a doctrine of the Church or not, it was very clear to me that the London Elder was a polygamist at heart. The more my mind dwelt on these things, the more sick at heart did I become, and faint and weary.

I had, however, personal cares and trials enough to engage my attention. I found that I could not depend upon the Saints to provide me with even the barest necessities of life, so I looked about me, and made enquiries for some light employment by which I might support myself. My health at that time would not have allowed me to do much, but for a long time I could not get anything at all to do. I had, of course, been used to teaching, but employment of that kind it was just then impossible for me to take, even if I could have got it; the only resource which seemed left to me was to find occupation for my needle, and it was a long and weary time before I could obtain even this.

At length I got a little plain sewing to do, and out of the miserable pittance thus earned I contrived to pay my rent and provide a few necessaries; but at times that too was beyond my power, and I have gone a fortnight at a time with nothing to eat but dry bread. Still my faith never failed. And thus the weary days passed by.

Now, however, a new interest began to gather round my life, for I expected before the end of the year the arrival of a little stranger to share my affections and my care. This certainly was a sad beginning of domestic bliss, but still the thought was pleasant to me. I had at that time no one to aid me or comfort me. The Saints were very kind, but they could not supply the place of an absent husband. My dearest friend, Mary Burton, used to come as often as she could to see me, and her presence was like a gleam of sunshine; but she was so young, and innocent, and happy that I had not the heart to trouble her with my sorrows. All my jewelry and trinkets and the greater part of my wardrobe had gone in providing for my daily wants and in preparing those necessary trifles upon which a young mother bestows so much loving care. My health was daily failing, and sometimes I doubted if I should ever be well and strong again. But all that I suffered was for the Church, and that thought sustained me.

Often I would sit alone and think—think of the past and all my early day-dreams of love, and hope, and bliss; think of my husband in a far-off land devoting his life and all his energies to the preaching of the latter-day glory; think of those whisperings of that accursed doctrine which has since brought desolation and anguish to the hearts of so many weary women; think of my future life, dark as its promise even then appeared.

Sometimes I heard from Italy, heard how my husband was progressing with his work, and with wifely love I sympathised with him in all his difficulties, for he told me how arduous the task was in which he was engaged.

It was not the expectation of the Mormon Apostles that the missionaries would do much in Catholic Italy. The same causes were in operation there as affected the work in France. Few, if any, really good Roman Catholics have ever joined the Saints. The Irish Mission was never successful, and the same may be said of the French and Italian Missions. In France and Italy by far the greater part of the people might be classed under two heads—Roman Catholics, and infidels. The first had already an infallible guide in which they trusted, and as for the infidels, they ridiculed the idea of any guide at all. Both classes were utterly devoid of that acquaintance with Scripture of which the Mormon Missionaries understood so well how to take advantage, and which rendered them so susceptible to religious influences which took the Bible as their basis. The Missionaries in Italy soon experienced the difficulties presented by these facts.

After their arrival in Genoa, Mr. Stenhouse was directed to carry the gospel to the Waldenses—those brave old Protestants of the dark ages, who so manfully suffered, even unto death, for conscience sake; and some time after he had begun his labors among them, the Apostle Snow joined him.

Whatever they might believe or teach theoretically, there can be no doubt that the American Apostles were largely endowed with the “organ” of caution. Preaching without purse or scrip among people who either detest you as a heretic or else regard you with profound indifference is not a pleasant task, and the Mormon Apostles very prudently “took up” liberal collections in England before they started. Had it not been for this common-sense proceeding I am at a loss to say what would have become of the Missionaries in Italy; and as it was, their lot was not a very enviable one.

Besides the scarcity of money, the other great difficulty experienced by the Missionaries was learning the language of their destined converts. For many years, it was supposed among the Saints that the "Gift of Tongues" would be all-sufficient for this purpose. The two distinguished Apostles, Orson and Parley P. Pratt, whose writings did so much for Mormonism, had both of them eloquently discussed the subject in print; but the Missionaries soon discovered that for practical purposes the "gift" was not of much service; and the two Pratts themselves afterwards experienced—the one in South America and the other in Austria—the fallacy of their theories. Without the "gift" in any shape the work in Italy was necessarily very slow, and an Elder who could speak a little French was sent out from London to assist them. They had at last come to the conclusion that if the Lord would not bestow the "gift" upon them, they must try to acquire it themselves.

The Apostle Snow now thought of sending the Gospel to the Swiss, and Mr. Stenhouse was selected for the work. But before he went it was determined that the Church in Italy should be "organised," and about a week later, I received a long account of how this was done. I heard how, one pleasant November morning, the Apostle Snow, Elders Stenhouse and Woodward, together with several Waldenses whom they had converted, ascended the mountain-side contiguous to La Tour, and overlooking the fertile valley of Pinerello. There they sang praises and prayed:—they christened the place "Mount Brigham;" and the stone upon which the three elders stood and offered up a written prayer, they named "The Rock of Prophecy"; and there they organised the church—dedicating the soil of Italy to the Lord. Moreover, then and there, my husband was solemnly consecrated a "High-Priest, after the Order of the Son of God."

All this I heard, and much more; and in confiding faith that this was indeed a great and glorious work, I rejoiced that I had been accounted worthy to suffer patiently at home, if only my husband might successfully fulfil his task abroad.

After that I heard that he had left Italy and had arrived in Geneva, believing that he would be more successful among the Swiss than the Italians.

A few days after the arrival of the Missionary in Geneva, an event occurred which interested my own self personally—my little Clara was born. Very happy was I when I looked upon her tiny little face for the first time and kissed her for being the prettiest baby in the world: very happy was I when I folded her in my arms and talked to her as if she could understand all that I said—very happy indeed, as I looked at her again and again, and marvelled whether she really could be indeed and certainly my own baby girl. It seemed as if baby's papa would never come back again, but I had a companion now in my child; and weak and weary as I was, with new responsibilities and less power to help myself, I found comfort in my new care, and realised the truth of the old Scotch song:

“Muckle licht is the load,
When Juve bears up the creel.”

I was not now alone.

Then, too, came round to see me, Mary Burton. She was as fond and tender to me as ever, and tripped quietly about the room, and tried to wait upon me, and sat by the bed, playing with baby, calling her all the pretty things she could think of, and I felt that her presence brought new light and life to my room. She brought me another letter from my husband, and I found that he was now acquiring for himself the “gift” of the French tongue, unable to do much else, as he and everybody didn't understand each other. He could not yet talk to the French-speaking Genevese; and the English-speaking residents would not listen to him; they had only heard of Mormonism as a clumsy fraud, and looked upon the prophet Joseph Smith as an impostor. So, for a whole winter, he sat shut up in his own room poring over a French grammar, and deploring his hard fate in being denied the gift of tongues.

In the spring of the new year I received a distinguished visitor who kindly interested himself in my welfare. The Apôstle Lorenzo Snow left Piedmont for England and passed through Geneva en route. On his way to London he called upon me at Southampton, and expressed much sympathy for me :—he noticed the change in my appearance, and immediately sent for Mr. Stenhouse to return to England. He acted very kindly by me at that time ; did all that he could to assist me, and said that he never again would ask any man to make such a sacrifice. I fully appreciated all his kindness ; but much as I wanted to, I did not venture to ask him about the truth or falsity of those terrible suggestions which I had heard whispered of late.

My husband hastened home, coming by way of Calais, in order to meet his president and receive his instructions. The Apostle showed much sympathy for him, and very early in the morning accompanied him some miles to the railway station ; but he never once mentioned how I had been situated in Southampton until he left him, and then he exacted from him a promise not to open his lips whatever he might learn.

I need not say that I was happy to see my husband once again, and to present to him his little daughter who was now five months old. He was, of course, soon busy in visiting the Saints, and he received from them many tokens of attachment.

In the beginning of June a General Conference of the branches of the Church in Britain was held in London. The Apostles and foreign Missionaries were present, and my husband and I were also there. We had speeches and prayers. The business of the Conference occupied but very few minutes, for no measure was questioned. Among the Mormons there are no opinions, no discussion. The presiding head has made out his programme before he comes to the conference ; he knows what he wants to do, and no one ever questions him. He may perhaps for form's sake invite the brethren to speak on any point he introduces ; but when he has furnished the clew to his wishes, the Elders who speak only spend their time in arguments in favor of his measures. At the Conference of which I speak the reports of the native elders were very cheering to us. Throughout England and Wales they had been most successful in adding members to the Church. Mormonism was then most successfully preached in Britain. There were more Mormons there than in all Utah Territory: there were fifty Conferences, with over seven hundred organised "Branches," and more than six thousand men ordained to the priesthood. That peculiar influence which the Mormons call "the Spirit," of which I have spoken, elsewhere, was spoken of by the Elders as being a common experience everywhere.

During all that Conference, I listened carefully for a word from the lips of any of the speakers which might indicate in any way that Polygamy was part of the Mormon faith; but not a whisper, not a hint was uttered. I naturally concluded that the Elders, whose doubtful expressions at Southampton had so troubled my mind, were misinformed or unsafe men. Still I could not altogether banish my apprehension of coming evil; but so bound to secrecy were those who did know of Polygamy being practiced in Utah, that there was not one who would admit it, and even my own husband's lips were sealed to me. He did not deny it, but he would not talk about it, and did everything he could to banish the thought from my mind.

At that Conference the Apostle Snow spoke very strongly of the way in which I had been neglected; and it was arranged that Elder Stenhouse should return to Switzerland, and that I should accompany him. My knowledge of French was expected to be very serviceable.

We now made preparations for an early departure, and prepared to leave our friends. To the reader it may seem strange for a man, his wife, and babe, to be sent out in this way on a mission without any proper arrangement for their maintenance, but to my mind, at the time, it seemed to me not only perfectly proper, but altogether in accordance with God's word and commandment.

My young friend, Mary Burton, came round to bid me good-bye; and the poor girl wept, and I wept with her, and we kissed one another tenderly as our tears mingled. We had become very dear to each other, and the thought of separation for years, or perhaps for ever, was very painful to us.

She hung about my neck at the last moment, kissing me and begging me not to forget to write to her very, very often, and this I gladly promised her, asking the same in return. Then with a fond embrace we parted, and it was years before I saw her dear face again.

Thus it was that we three—my husband, my babe, and myself—set forth on our pilgrimage to convert the Swiss.

It was with no ordinary feelings that I entered the ancient city of Geneva. I was not ignorant of its history and the struggles of its inhabitants for civil and religious liberty. It had been the refuge for the English Protestants during the fiery days of Queen Mary, just as in the time of the French Revolution it was the refuge of infidel and Papist, royalist and republican alike;—there Calvin lived in gloomy austerity, battling with Rome; there Servitus, the Unitarian, was condemned to be roasted alive as a heretic; and there we expected in our own humble way to be able to testify, by our suffering and patience, to what we firmly believed was the truth.

In free countries like England and the United States—free from the surveillance of a military police, it is easy, if he wishes it, for the Missionary to mount a chair at a street corner, or hold forth under a tree, and such has often been done. But all over continental Europe there is hardly a place where this would be possible. In the various grand duchies, kingdoms, and empires, paternal governments look too closely after the morals and religion of their subjects; while under the ephemeral republics, as long as they happen to last, there is often to be found, under the name of liberty, a despotism more despotic than under the rule of royalty. It is the colporteur, the man of books and tracts, who makes the converts there, and in this slow way we soon found that we were destined to proceed.

During my husband's former stay in Geneva he had had neither Mormon books nor Mormon papers, with the exception of a paper published at Boulogne, containing a letter by the apostle Taylor, in French and English. This single copy he lent to a Genevese to read, and never saw it again ; and yet in a short time, even before he could properly speak French, he converted and baptized two men in the Rhone, one of whom is to-day a devoted Mormon in Southern Utah.

His first attack was upon a shoemaker whom he visited for the purpose of repairs. While the shoemaker worked, Elder Stenhouse talked ; and as the English are all reputed wealthy on the Continent, the friendly overtures of the Mormon Missionary were graciously received. As they grew intimate, Elder Stenhouse would sit down on the bench beside the man as he worked, and taking from his pocket a French Testament, which he always carried about with him, would try to read it aloud—the good-natured shoemaker undertaking to correct his pronunciation. In this way he kept his auditor's attention constantly fixed upon certain passages, more especially those which spoke of baptism for the remission of sins, and the laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost. So persistent was he that at last the shoemaker's curiosity was awakened, and finally he was baptized ; but unfortunately, not long after, a small pamphlet upon the mission of Joseph Smith fell into his hands and made shipwreck of his faith.

With his second convert he was much more successful. This time it was his landlord who was to be the subject of attack. He was a tailor, and, fortunately for the Missionary, somewhat talkative. The same arrangement was made about reading and correction, and with a like result—the tailor was baptized. Just at this time came the Apostle Snow's letter telling my husband to return to England ; and as he might not leave the country without a representative, he ordained the tailor a Priest in the Mormon Church.

When we arrived in Geneva, Monsieur le tailleur was all that constituted the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints in Switzerland.

Soon a few personal friends began to gather to hear the English Missionary tell about the new religion, and my husband being very much in earnest, interest before long began to be excited. I remember well our first meetings among the Swiss :—half-a-dozen people sitting round a table with open Bibles before them, passages from which Mr. Stenhouse was trying in very bad French to make them understand. I pitied him very much, but those who were present made as if they did not notice his embarrassment, and listened with marked attention. Among the Mormons it is a woman's duty to keep silence; I therefore remained a listener only. But at the close of the service,—for such it was regarded—when I might speak, my missionary labors began, I was aroused to eloquence, and our parting was longer than our meeting.

The warmth with which the few who were present responded to our efforts satisfied me that they had come under the same mysterious influence which I had observed in England. I was then convinced that Mormonism could awaken the Christian soul more to a realisation of what it already possessed, than impart to it any new moral or religious qualities. Mormonism of itself never made Christians, but Christianity built up Mormonism. It was an awakening to the teachings of Christ and his Apostles that begat confidence in the mission of the Mormon Prophet.

Although we observed the very strictest economy, it did not take long for us to exhaust what little money we brought from England. This placed us in a very awkward position. It is inconvenient enough to be without money in one's own country, where one understands and is understood by everybody; but to be in a strange land, especially in a country like Switzerland, where every Englishman is supposed to be a "milor" and the bounteous dispenser of unlimited wealth, it is more than inconvenient.

We left our first quarters, where we had had so many visitors, and rented a room from a widow woman, who fortunately was not inquisitive. She had a family of children to support, and as we paid our rent monthly in advance, she had no occasion to know whether or not we kept a bank account, and we were thankful that it was so, for, had it been so ordained, we could there have starved to death without attracting the notice of any one.—A nice thing to be thankful for.

We were not hopeless, though we were heavy-hearted ; but we had expected trial, and could not complain, for we knew from the beginning that thus it would probably be.

One day my husband received a letter from an infidel gentleman who lived in Lausanne—a neighboring canton—requesting him to come and see him, that they might talk together over Mormonism, for he had heard of us and of our doctrine, and my husband resolved to visit him before our money was all gone.

When Mr. Stenhouse reached Lausanne, he visited first a Protestant minister with whom he had some slight acquaintance, and who was also interested in Mormonism, and told him that he was going to call upon the Gouverneur de l'Hopital. The minister was greatly opposed to my husband visiting such a man. "He is a socialist," he said—"a revolutionist ; he fought at the barricades ; he is a mauvais sujet, and anything but a fit person to be spoken to about religion."

This only increased the interest which Mr. Stenhouse felt in the Governor, and made him more than ever determined to see him ; and he did see him, although the good minister had represented him "aussi noir que le diable." So they met ; and my husband began the work for which he had come. They had long talks together, and my husband—as did the Elders ever in such cases—spoke to the Governor of redemption through Christ, and baptism for the remission of sins. Faith is not an act of the will. Like the unseen wind, it comes, and we see the power thereof, but know not whence it proceeds. Thus at first the unbelieving Governor found it—he might find himself no match for the arguments of his opponent, but he could not force his heart to believe, and he was by no means a willing convert. My husband, however, remained with him, and before he left, the Governor had been baptized into the Church.

Our new convert proved to be a most excellent and worthy man, notwithstanding his former infidelity, and he was subsequently a great aid to us in our mission. We felt satisfied that the expenses of that journey had been well spent, although a few francs at that time could ill be spared.

But our circumstances seemed to be getting worse and worse, and my health began to fail. For several months neither of us had had sufficient nourishment, and my anxieties increased my physical weakness; I was dispirited, yet I feared to complain, or even to let my husband know what I felt. At length I was really ill, and could not leave my bed. I well remember the solemn silence that reigned in our home one day. I had risen from my bed, weak, and Oh, so faint-hearted, that I had scarcely any desire to live; and I was sitting with my little daughter in my arms. She had cried herself to sleep, cold and hungry, and much as I loved her—nay, idolised her—I confess that for an instant, I harbored in my soul the impious, the unnatural wish, that rather than see my darling awake again to cold and hunger, she might sleep her sweet young life away. For me to yield to such a thought—to wish my child to wake no more—I, who would have given gladly the last drop of my life-blood to save her—for me to look upon her innocent little face with such a thought! I can hardly now believe that such a thing was possible, even for a moment. But I was desperate, and bold, and cowardly—all at the same time—or my heart was humiliated by poverty, and my faith was rousing bitter thoughts in my mind.

My husband was pacing the room; I knew too well all that was passing in his mind, although we had long been silent. At length I said to him: "Take courage, dear, for we are the servants of the great God, and surely He will find a means of escape for us. We were sent here; we came because the Lord wanted us to come, and surely He will provide for us!"

He turned to me in reply, and said kindly, "We can at least have some water," and he went for some water, and then with as reverential feeling in his soul as ever inspired a grace before dinner, he blessed it, and we drank.

We had scarcely done so when the mail-courier brought a letter to our door.

Governor Stoudeman, with a feeling of delicacy, had hesitated, when my husband visited him at Lausanne, to offer him any assistance; but, he said in his letter, he had been "impressed" to do so, and hoped that we should not be offended. As the letter was opened, a piece of gold fell upon the table. We could hardly believe that God had so soon answered our prayers and sent us relief, and our emotions of gratitude for this timely aid, found expression in tears.

All this time our landlady knew nothing of our distress; she was as ignorant of our situation as if she had never seen us. So long as I was able to walk about, I used at regular hours to go to the kitchen, get the cooking utensils, and go through the routine of cooking as if we had had a well-filled larder all the time. I set the table with punctilious care, and the good old widow never suspected but that we had plenty. Thus supposing that we wanted nothing, she and her children were more than ordinarily kind to us and to our little girl, who was now old enough to toddle round and go from room to room. Very often they would get her into their room at meal-time and give her little things to please her; and while they felt honored in being permitted to do so, we were silently thankful for our child's sake, for her sufferings were more than we could endure.

The temporary aid from Lausanne was very welcome to us, though it only served to make us feel more keenly our dependent position. I might relate stories—alas, too true—of cold and want; of days, and even almost an entire week passed at one time without food—stories which for painful detail would eclipse romance. It was a weary waiting for Providence! Such things are better forgotten. And yet I feel that in after years my temper was more subdued and my mind more patient under affliction than it would have been had I not experienced this preparatory discipline.

People who have heard, with a sneer, of Mormon Missionaries and their work, would perhaps have realised that faith may be sincere, although mistaken, if they could have seen us at that time. The first teachers of a doctrine, whether it be good or evil, if only it stems the current opinions of the hour, have ever found that at the end of a rocky way there was waiting for them a crown of thorns.

Many a time since then I have felt the weight of anxious care in providing for my family—the trial of our faith has not been light or seldom repeated; but those days of trouble in Switzerland were, I think, the darkest that I ever experienced. We realised literally the necessity of trusting to God's daily mercies for our daily bread; and the assurance that the Lord would provide was our only hope. To say that we practiced the strictest economy would be to give but a faint idea of the way in which we had to consider and contrive in order to exist at all. For years we kept "The Word of Wisdom"—a "Revelation of Joseph Smith," which enjoined abstinence from wine, coffee, tea, or, in fact, warm drinks of any kind; and trifling as such self-denial may at first appear, it was not really so when other privations were added thereto. For months at a time we existed,—for I dare not say lived,—without what are considered, even by the poorest, the most common necessities. I can even recall to mind one trying week in Switzerland, when, for the whole seven long days, we had less than a pint of corn-flour to live upon, and that was chiefly reserved for our poor child.

As I look back to those dark, painful times I feel that it was by little short of a miracle that our lives were spared,—our faith alone saved us.

VERY soon after this we were notified that the Apostle Snow was on his way to Switzerland, and that we might shortly expect him.

This to me was joyful news, for he had relieved me of my trouble once before, and I almost looked upon him as my good angel. He came, and remained with us a few days, and before he left he instructed Mr. Stenhouse to repair to England to raise funds to aid the mission. He also gave me a few pounds to procure what I needed for an event which I expected shortly to take place. This kindness on his part brought to my mind such a sense of relief, and renewed my energy, so that I felt ready for my missionary labors again.

When my second child was about two months old, I went to Lausanne, to reside, while my husband was absent in England. Apartments were engaged for me at the house of a gentleman who had recently been baptized. I was made very comfortable there, and for the first time since my husband was sent on a mission, I experienced a feeling of repose, so that I now had some hopes of regaining mental and physical strength. No provision had been made by the Saints for my support; but even without that, I thought, living among those who were themselves happy, and one with us in the faith, I should myself find more tranquillity of mind.

Madame and Monsieur Balif, in whose house I resided, were persons of good social position. The husband was one of nature's gentlemen, and as good a man as I ever knew. He received the Mormonism taught by Mr. Stenhouse with all his heart, and never seemed weary of showing his gratitude by his good deeds. Madame Balif did not at once join the Church, and probably never would have done so but for the love which she bore to her husband; she was not however hostile to the new faith, as some other wives were, and she did all that she could to render pleasant my stay with them, and tried to make me forget what I had suffered in Geneva.

Madame Balif was a high-spirited, impulsive woman, and devotedly attached to her husband; I never saw a woman more so. She impressed me as being one of the happiest of wives; he one of the best of husbands. After I had lived in the house a few weeks, she was baptized; but she never was satisfied with Mormonism. Poor, dear lady! How often have I bitterly regretted that I was instrumental in leading her into the Mormon Church, in which, as years later, in Utah, she told me, she endured such cruel humiliation and martyrdom. I knew well indeed then what all that meant.

While I lived with them, it was agreed that I should pay for my apartments monthly; but after I had paid for the first month, Monsieur Balif told me that I should do so no more; and knowing that he meant it as an expression of kindness and gratitude on his part, I felt relieved of all anxiety on that account. All that I had, even then, for the support of myself and my two little ones was about five francs ($1) a week, but my wants were few, for I had taught myself to require nothing but what was absolutely necessary to keep me alive.

During Mr. Stenhouse's absence, the meetings were held in my parlor, and as the brethren who had joined the Church had not previously been religious men, though they were persons of the best moral character, they were very diffident about conducting the meetings, and for a time could not think of praying before others. It devolved upon me—of sheer necessity, for I disliked prominence as much as they did—to lead the singing, to pray, to preach, in fact, to do everything. Had I not done so, they would have sat looking at each other, for they were all too timid to speak. I encouraged them in every way to try, and finally we got along very well. A "good spirit" prevailed, and we were like a little band of brothers and sisters.

The only person, now, who gave me any anxiety was Madame Balif, who was very weak in the faith. Her doubts and fears troubled me much, for I had conceived a very great regard for her. I feared that with a heart so proud and rebellious as hers, she would never get salvation, and I trembled for her happiness. How slight a hold the new faith had taken of her mind I was forcibly reminded by an incident which was at the time a great trial to me.

My little daughter fell sick of intermittent fever, and I dared not call in a physician ; it would not do for me—a missionary's wife, to show lack of faith. Such was our zeal in those days ; but now, as I once before stated, even the most orthodox Mormons, including Brigham Young, do not think of relying upon God and the ordinances of the Church, as they used to in former years, but call in the best physician they can get.

I was much troubled about my little girl, for she was evidently failing fast. She had been "administered to" by one of the native Elders who had anointed her with oil and prayed over her, but yet she did not get better. Madame Balif, in the midst of my affliction taunted me about the child not recovering, and asked where was the power of God, of which I had talked so much : "Now," said she, "if you could get that child healed, it would be some proof, to my mind, that the power you speak of is still in the Church." I felt ashamed that I had not exercised more faith ; I was certain that the gift of healing was in the Church, and I believed it was my own fault that the child was not even now well. In my zeal I replied rather warmly : " My child will be healed, and you shall see it." But I had no sooner uttered these words than I began to fear I had promised too much.

I determined, however, that nothing on my part should be left undone. I sent for Governor Stoudeman—our new convert—as he was the President of the branch and an Elder. I told him that this child must be healed by the power of God. We had not witnessed any manifestation of the healing power among the Saints in Switzerland, up to that time, and I earnestly desired that now for the first time this gift might be proved among us, for the sake of the Church as well as for my own. So I told the Governor that it was his duty, as well as mine, to fast and pray that the Lord might grant us this blessing, that it might be a testimony that it was His work and that we were His servants.

He became as enthusiastic as I was myself, and we fasted and prayed for nearly two days. At the end of that time he came to see me, and by the bedside we knelt and prayed, and he laid his hands upon the child and blessed her in the name of the Lord.

That night the child was very low, and though I strove to show my faith, I dreaded that she would have her usual attack of fever about midnight. After the departure of the elder, Madame Balif came into the room and said : " Your child is very ill ; if your God cannot help her, why do not you send for a physician ?" This appeared to me so profane and such an insult to my God and my faith, that I replied indignantly : " Madame ; she will and shall be healed this very night ; for I know that power is in the Church. The reason why the child was not healed before is because I have not been earnest enough in seeking the Lord."

When I was left alone I sat down by the bedside, trembling lest I had been too rash in declaring that the child would be healed that same night. Much and fondly as I loved my little treasure, I confess that I suffered more at the thought of God's name suffering reproach than I did from fear of my darling's death ; and I tried earnestly to banish my doubts with the remembrance that all things are possible to them that believe.

Kneeling there in the dark and lonesome midnight, I poured out my soul fervently to God, beseeching Him for His kingdom's sake and for the glory of His great name to answer, and not to suffer my unworthiness to stand in the way. I watched hour after hour beside my darling's bed, and the child slept on peacefully, without any symptoms of returning fever ; and, Oh, how anxiously I waited for her awaking.

At last, worn out with fatigue and watching, I laid myself down on the bed beside her, and soon fell asleep ; and when I awoke it was daylight, and my little one was peacefully sleeping on still—the fever had left her. No tongue could tell the gratitude which filled my heart ; I could only weep tears of joy and sing aloud my praise to God.

Madame Bailif entered the room early in the morning to see what kind of a night we had passed. Then I drew her to the bedside, and told her how tranquilly the child had slept all night, and showed her how much better she looked, and asked her if she did not see in all this the providence of God. But she simply said : “ Ah, well ! I suppose the disease had run its course.” This grieved me, for I had trusted that such a direct answer to my prayers would have helped to increase her faith in our religion, but Mormonism had not touched her heart, and I believe it is much more the devotion of the heart than it is the mental acquiescence in doctrine which gives us the power to hope, and endure and believe.

When, by-and-by, my little Clara awoke, she was evidently very much better, and not only free from the fever, but bright and cheerful, like her former self, and she never relapsed. In the course of a week she was running about as well as ever, and the Saints were greatly confirmed in their faith.

One morning not long after this, Madame Balif brought me a letter which, as it bore the English post-mark, she supposed came from my husband. The writing, however, was strange to me; and dreading that some terrible thing might have happened, I tore it open. There, at the bottom of the last page—for the letter was very long—in neat, clear characters, was the signature of my fairy friend, as I called her, Mary Burton. I read the letter through with the deepest interest. It was addressed “to darling Sister Stenhouse,” and was overflowing with affection. Used as I was to all her endearing ways, I could almost fancy that while I read I heard her speaking the words. After a great outpouring of love, she said :—

. Since you left Southampton, we have had many changes. We remained there until nearly all our old friends had left us and emigrated to Zion; and although my father could not possibly go at that time, and I was much too young to travel alone, the President actually scolded me for not being willing to emigrate with the others. When I told him that I was too young to act for myself he said a good deal about Elder Shrewsbury. I do not know whether you will remember Elder Shrewsbury but I will try to bring him to your mind. Do you not remember a gentleman who came several times to the meeting with me, and who was at the pic-nic just before you left England? He was very young, with dark hair and beautiful dark eyes to match. He came with Papa first to the meeting, and then he contrived to make friends with me, and I used to see him very often, and he paid me much attention.

I suppose I ought to tell you all that I think about him, and how we have had such pleasant times together,—and so I would, too, if you were here so that I might be kissed first, as you used to do; but it seems so formal to write such things on paper; I’m afraid almost that he might see. No! I never told him yet that I cared for him a bit, and I am not sure myself whether I do. I think he’s very nice, but I know he’s a good Mormon, and if I thought there was any truth in those things which we used to talk about, I’d die before I’d marry him, or go to Salt Lake either.

I remember you talked to him on the day of the pic-nic, and I thought you seemed to like him; in fact you could not help doing so, for he is so clever and so intellectual. That was a happy time we had then; the brethren and sisters all seemed to have cast dull care to the winds, and to have given themselves up to full and free enjoyment, with the exception of one solitary pair of married lovers—you know who I mean—but now you are again united, I suppose, and, of course happy.

I told the President that I had not the “spirit of gathering,” and that if my father agreed, I would perhaps go next season; but, entre nous, I did not tell him that I had another reason besides. What would you think, dear, if I were to go out as a bride? But I am very naughty I suppose to think of such a thing.

Since you went, I have grown quite an old woman. You used to call me "little fairy," but, Sister Stenhouse, I am much bigger now. I am now a good deal over fifteen, and people say that I am getting to be quite a woman. I might tell you some other pretty things that are said about me, but I'm afraid you'd say it was all vanity of vanities. If you stay away much longer you won't recognise me when we meet again.

And now I want to tell you something that interests you as much as me. I have not been able to discover anything more with certainty about those hateful things of which I told you, although the word Polygamy seems to me to become every day much more familiar in people's conversation. Elder Shrewsbury tells me that there is not a word of truth in it, and he has had a good deal of conversation upon that subject with the apostles who are here, and also with a man named Curtis E. Bolton—an Elder from the Salt Lake ; and they all positively declare that it is a foul slander upon the Saints of the Most High. So you see that all our unhappiness was for nought. Our Saviour said we should be blessed when all men spoke evil of us falsely for His name's sake ; and the wicked scandal which has been raised against our religion has had a tendency to strengthen my faith, which you know was rather wavering.

And yet do you know, Sister Stenhouse, that even while I am writing to you in this strain, I am weak enough to allow doubts and fears to creep into my heart when I think of the conduct of some of the American brethren.

They appear to me, for married men, to act so very imprudently ; and to call their conduct 'imprudent' is really treating it with the greatest leniency, for I have often been quite shocked at the way in which some of the brethren and sisters acted. But I will tell you a little about it, and you shall judge for yourself.

When I found out, as I had long suspected, that dear Papa was going to marry again, I at once resolved that I would no longer be a burden to him, but would find some employment and support myself. I was induced to do this partly because, as you know, step-mothers and daughters do not always love each other quite as much as they might. So I communicated my wishes to Papa, and told him that I had been introduced to a very nice lady, who has a large dress-making establishment at the west end of London ; she is a member of the Church, and has always been very highly spoken of. I told him that she employed a number of highly respectable young girls, and that four, at least, of them were members of the Church, and that in consideration of my lonely situation, and at the earnest request of Elder Shrewsbury, she was willing to take me into her house to board and lodge me, and teach me the business thoroughly, if my father would pay her a premium of fifty pounds.

This Papa readily agreed to do, as I expected he would, for he is so taken up with my step-mama—that is to be—and besides which he has, I know, been unfortunate lately in some railway speculations, and has lost a great deal of money, and therefore wishes to economise. In this way I went to London, and became a member of Mrs. Elsworth's family—and here I am still.

Now you have been in London, Sister Stenhouse, and must remember "the office" in Jewin Street—the head-quarters where all the elders congregate, and where the American elders board, and Church-business is managed. Well, the very first week I was at Mrs. Elsworth's I noticed that the four young sisters who were working there were constantly talking of Jewin Street and the dear American brethren who were stopping there. One of them in particular was always talking about dear Elder Snow; and another girl whispered to me that she went to Jewin Street every evening, and frequently remained there to tea with him, and went afterwards to the theatre with him, or to a meeting, as the case might be; and, the young lady added, "She does make such a fuss over him, toying with him and brushing and combing his hair. I know that she does it, for I have been there with her, and have seen her do it; and he appears to enjoy it quite as much as she does, and, I believe, if Polygamy was true he would marry her."

"But," I said, "it is not true, and therefore it is very wrong for her to act in that way, for he is a married man."

"Oh, but you know," she answered, "that we are all brothers and sisters, and the brethren tell us that those little attentions make them feel that they are not so far from home, and they are thus enabled to perform their mission better; and if that is so, it is the duty of the young sisters to encourage them. These little attentions cost nothing, and I'm sure it's quite a pleasure to me."

"Then you go to Jewin Street?" I asked.

"Yes," she said, "sometimes, but not very often, for my elder calls here frequently, as he is acquainted with Mrs. Elsworth; and then I take my work up into the parlor sometimes and have a long talk with him. Mrs. Elsworth does not like it, I know, but she does not care to oppose the Elders;—in fact her husband will not allow any such thing—he has dared her to do so. After all, she is very silly, for we ought to love each other and be free and friendly. My Elder—I call him my elder, you know, simply because I like him better than the others—calls Mrs. Elsworth 'Gentilish,' and says she'll get over when she goes to Zion. But she says she won't. She is awfully jealous of her husband and a certain Miss Caroline somebody, though she doesn't care for him."

"But what difference can it make to him," I asked her; "he has a wife and ought not to pay attention to other women."

"Ah, you silly child," she said, "it is only brotherly love, after all, and men often have wives who do not make them happy and that makes them seek the society of the young sisters, for those who are far from home are lonely. My own elder's wife is here in London, but he isn't much with her. He spends nearly all his time in Jewin Street; he is a travelling Elder, and when he is going anywhere to preach he always calls for me, as he does not like going alone, he is such a genial soul. If Polygamy were true I'd promise to marry him when we reached the valley."

Then I asked why his wife didn't go with him, and she said: "Oh, poor man! he has no pleasure in her society. She is always moping and unhappy; you know, some women are naturally so. I do all I can to make him feel well, for it must be awful to be married to a woman who is always sad."

I asked her why his wife should be so unhappy, and she said: "He tells me that she has got it into her head that somehow or other Polygamy is practiced in Zion; and I'm sure I, for one, wish it was so, for then we could marry whoever we pleased."

"Oh, for shame!" I said, "I'm sure I'd never go there if I thought so."

Then I asked her whether she did not think it was wrong for her to encourage the attentions of her elder; and she said: "He wishes it just as much as I do, and his wife had better behave herself, or I'll marry him whether Polygamy exists or not in Zion ; and he does not know, though we both suspect, that there is something in the rumors which we have heard." Then I told her I thought it was very wicked to encourage the visits of that man, for I believe that if he paid a little more attention to his wife she would be less unhappy—for I supposed she knew of his attentions to her.

She said the wife knew nothing about it ; that he was obliged to be out late at night, preaching, or at Jewin Street, which I knew meant flirting with the sisters and going to the theatre, and I fancy he does more of that than preaching. But she seemed to think it was all the wife's fault, and blamed her. I asked her if she would like to be treated so, if she were an Elder's wife, and had to work as hard and endure as much as all the Missionaries' wives do; but she said she never could be in such a position, and told me that I was not a good Mormon or I would not set myself up as the accuser of the brethren. But I ask you, Sister Stenhouse, if that is the Mormonism which the elders used to teach us?

And now I have told you all our long talk together and so you can judge for yourself what a change has taken place since you left.

The same day, after dinner, Brother Snow called, in company with two other elders, to see Mrs. Elsworth, and to ask her and the girls to a tea-party the next day. Mrs. Elsworth declined; but one young lady would go with Brother Snow, and Miss Caroline went with another Elder ; and my light-hearted friend waited till her Elder came also to ask her. After that, came Elder Shrewsbury, and I, of course, was to go with him.

With all my faith, I am very much troubled about these things. They are not right, I think. Why, scarcely a day passes but some of those Elders, who appear to have very little to do, call here and send for one or two of these young sisters, and detain them from their work, much to the annoyance of poor Mrs. Elsworth, who I believe will apostatise over it eventually.

See what a long letter I have written to you ! I am afraid it will tire you. I often long to have you here, that I might come to you and tell you all my troubles. But perhaps, after all, I am wrong, and ought to see things in a different light. Have not the Elders and Apostles positively denied that Polygamy or any other sin was practiced in Utah, or formed any part of the Mormon religion; and we know that these men of God would not lie to us.

Be sure, dear, to write a nice long letter to me very soon; and with fondest love remember your own

MARY BURTON."

I read this letter carefully through, and I sat down and thought of dear Mary Burton, and felt deeply sorry that she should be placed in a situation surrounded by so many temptations. To myself the letter brought a sad confirmation of all my fears. There was something painful in the thought. Had polygamy been openly avowed as a Mormon doctrine I should never have joined the Church. But now, what could I do?

After three months' absence, Mr. Stenhouse was to return home, and I went to Geneva to meet him, feeling very happy when I saw him once again. Numbers of persons, both in Geneva and Lausanne had been converted while he was away and were waiting for him to baptize them ;—among them was a retired Protestant minister, Monsieur Petitpierre, of whom I have something yet to mention. We began at last to rejoice in our success and to be thankful that the Lord had answered our prayers.

I was now more than ever anxious about Polygamy. From much thinking on that subject, it had become the haunting spectre of my existence, and I dreaded what every day might bring forth. The news which my husband brought with him by no means reassured me. He told me that he had heard in England from the American Elders that there was a general expectation among the Saints in Utah that at the October Conference in Salt Lake City, Brigham Young would publish to the world that Polygamy was a doctrine of the Mormon Church.

After all the prevarications and denials then of the Apostles and Elders, Polygamy among the Saints was really a fact. As the truth became clearer to my mind, I thought I should lose my senses ;—the very foundations of my faith were shaken, and not only did I feel a personal repugnance to the unholy doctrine, but I began to realise that the men to whom I had listened with such profound respect and had regarded as the representatives of God, had been guilty of the most deliberate and unblushing falsehood, and I began to ask myself whether if they could do this in order to carry out their purpose in one particular, might they not be guilty of deception upon other points? Who could I trust now? For ten years the Mormon Prophets and Apostles had been living in Polygamy at home, while abroad they vehemently denied it and spoke of it as a deadly sin. This was a painful awakening to me ; we had all of us been betrayed ; I lost confidence in man, and even began to question within myself whether I could even trust in God.

There was no argument between Mr. Stenhouse and myself. It would have been worse than useless, for it was not his doing, and he assured me that he had as great a repugnance to the doctrine as I had. He had at first only hinted that it might eventually be acknowledged by the leaders of the Church, but it was a matter of too deeply a personal character for me to keep silence, and I did not rest until he had told me all. He had not seen the revelation, but the information which he had received was beyond a question; and singularly enough Elder Margetts, the London Elder, of whose flirtation in Southampton I have already spoken, was at that time on a visit to Switzerland, and confirmed all that my husband had said. Thus the very man who, two years before, first excited my suspicions, now confirmed my fears, and openly stated as a fact, that which he then was ashamed almost to suggest.

Elder Margetts had been in Utah from the time I saw him in England, and was now on a mission to Italy. He knew, therefore, very well what was said and done among the Saints in Zion. I, and those like me, whose faith was not too strong, were spoken of as 'babes' to whom milk only must be given; and in this way any deception necessary to quiet our tender consciences was allowable; but Elder Margetts was one of the 'strong men' to whom meat was necessary:—in other words, they were initiated into all the mysteries of the faith.

My husband enjoined me not to speak of what I had heard, and I felt very little inclination to do so—my heart was too full. The pleasant dreams and hopes of life were ended now to me—what could I look forward to? Henceforth the stern realities of a lonely and weary existence were all the future that should be mine.

Still, the "Revelation" sanctioning a change in the doctrines and practice of the Church, was not yet published; and until Polygamy was openly avowed I felt that the doom of my happiness was not yet sealed, and like many another heart-broken woman, I hoped against hope.

THE REVELATION ON "CELESTIAL MARRIAGE."

AND time flew by; and at length the dreaded Revelation came.

One very pleasant morning, early in January, 1853, two Elders of the Italian Mission, Jabez Woodward and Thomas Margetts, took breakfast with us; and with them also was Mons. Petitpierre from Geneva, the Protestant minister of whom I have already spoken. While I was busy preparing the meal, Mr. Stenhouse and the two English Elders went to the post-office to get their letters, for at that time they were expecting important news. When they returned, breakfast was quite ready, and they took their seats at the table. I asked if there were any letters from England, and my husband said: "No; no letters, but there is a Star, and it contains the Revelation on Polygamy."

He handed me a copy of the Millennial Star—a Mormon paper published in Liverpool—and as I took it, I felt as if I were receiving my death-warrant :—it was indeed the death-warrant to all my hopes of happiness. I rose from the table, asking them to excuse me ; and overcome with agitation and conflicting emotions, I retired to my own chamber. There, for the first time, I read that document which has since brought such sorrow and misery to so many wronged and heart-broken women. The reader may perhaps like to see the only foundation and authority for the practice of Polygamy, ever produced by the Mormon leaders. So I copy exactly from the Millennial Star, what I then read, leaving out only a few lines here and there, which had no special reference to the subject, but helped to swell the size of the “revelation :”

CELESTIAL MARRIAGE :

A REVELATION ON THE PATRIARCHAL ORDER OF MATRIMONY, OR PLURALITY OF WIVES.

Given to Joseph Smith, the Seer, in Nauvoo, July 12th, 1843.

1. Verily, thus saith the Lord, unto you, my servant Joseph, that inasmuch as you have inquired of my hand, to know and understand wherein I, the Lord, justified my servants, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; as also Moses, David, and Solomon, my servants, as touching the principle and doctrine of their having many wives and concubines : Behold ! and lo, I am the Lord thy God, and will answer thee as touching this matter : Therefore prepare thy heart to receive and obey the instructions which I am about to give unto you ; for all those who have this law revealed unto them must obey the same ; for behold ! I reveal unto you a new and everlasting covenant, and if ye abide not that covenant, then are ye damned ; for no one can reject this covenant, and be permitted to enter into my glory ; for all who will have a blessing at my hands shall abide the law which was appointed for that blessing, and the conditions thereof, as was instituted from before the foundations of the world : and as pertaining to the new and everlasting covenant, it was instituted for the fulness of my glory ; and he that receiveth a fulness thereof, must and shall abide the law, or he shall be damned, saith the Lord God.

2. And verily I say unto you, that the conditions of this law are these : All covenants, contracts, bonds, obligations, oaths, vows, performances, connections, associations, or expectations, that are not made or entered into, and sealed, by the Holy Spirit of promise, of him who is anointed both as well for time and for all eternity, and that too most holy, by revelation and commandment, through the medium of mine anointed, whom I have appointed on the earth to hold this power, (and I have appointed unto my servant Joseph to hold this power in the last days, and there is never but one on the earth at a time; on whom this power and the keys of the priesthood are conferred), are of no efficacy, virtue, or force, in and after the resurrection from the dead : for all contracts that are not made unto this end, have an end when men are dead.

* * * * *

4. Therefore, if a man marry him a wife in the world, and he marry her not by me, nor by my word ; and he covenant with her so long as he is in the world, and she with him, their covenant and marriage is not of force when they are dead, and when they are out of the world ; therefore they are not bound by any law when they are out of the world ; therefore, when they are out of the world, they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are appointed angels in heaven, which angels are ministering servants, to minister for those who are worthy of a far more, and an exceeding, and an eternal weight of glory ; for these angels did not abide my law, therefore they cannot be enlarged, but remain separately and singly, without exaltation, in their saved condition, to all eternity, and from henceforth are not gods, but are angels of God for ever and ever.

5. And again, verily I say unto you, if a man marry a wife, and make a covenant with her for time, and for all eternity, if that covenant is not by me, or by my word, which is my law, and is not sealed by the Holy Spirit of promise, through him whom I have anointed and appointed unto this power, then it is not valid, neither of force, when they are out of the world, because they are not joined by me, saith the Lord, neither by my word ; when they are out of the world, it cannot be received there, because the angels and the gods are appointed there, by whom they cannot pass ; they cannot, therefore, inherit my glory, for my house is a house of order, saith the Lord God.

6. And again, verily I say unto you, if a man marry a wife by my word, which is my law, and by the new and everlasting covenant, and it is sealed unto them by the Holy Spirit of promise, by him who is anointed, unto whom I have appointed this power, and the keys of this priesthood, and it shall be said unto them, Ye shall come forth in the first resurrection ; and if it be after the first resurrection, in the next resurrection ; and shall inherit thrones, kingdoms, principalities, and powers, dominions, all heights and depths—then shall it be written in the Lamb's Book of Life, that he shall commit no murder whereby to shed innocent blood ; and if ye abide in my covenant, and commit no murder whereby to shed innocent blood, it shall be done unto them in all things whatsoever my servant hath put upon them, in time, and through all eternity, and shall be of full force when they are out of the world ; and they shall pass by the angels, and the gods, which are set there, to their exaltation and glory in all things, as hath been sealed upon their heads, which glory shall be a fulness and a continuation of the seeds for ever and ever.

7. Then shall they be gods, because they have no end ; therefore shall they be from everlasting to everlasting, because they continue ; then shall they be above all, because all things are subject unto them. Then shall they be gods, because they have all power, and the angels are subject unto them.

* * * * *

9. Verily, verily I say unto you, if a man marry a wife according to my word, and they are sealed by the Holy Spirit of promise, according to mine appointment, and he or she shall commit any sin or transgression of the new and everlasting covenant whatever, and all manner of blasphemies, and if they commit no murder, wherein they shed innocent blood—yet they shall come forth in the first resurrection, and enter into their exaltation, but they shall be destroyed in the flesh, and shall be delivered unto the buffetings of Satan, unto the day of redemption, saith the Lord God.

10. The blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, which shall not be forgiven in this world, nor out of the world, is in that ye commit murder, wherein ye shed innocent blood, and assent unto my death, after ye have received my new and everlasting covenant, saith the Lord God; and he that abideth not this law can in no wise enter into my glory, but shall be damned, saith the Lord.

* * * * *

13. God commanded Abraham, and Sarah gave Hagar to Abraham, to wife. And why did she do it? Because this was the law, and from Hagar sprang many people. This, therefore, was fulfilling, among other things, the promises. Was Abraham, therefore, under condemnation? Verily, I say unto you, Nay; for I, the Lord, commanded it. Abraham was commanded to offer his son Isaac; nevertheless, it was written, Thou shalt not kill. Abraham, however, did not refuse, and it was accounted to him for righteousness.

14. Abraham received concubines, and they bare him children, and it was accounted unto him for righteousness, because they were given unto him, and he abode in my law: as Isaac also, and Jacob did none other things than that which they were commanded, they have entered into their exaltation, according to the promises, and sit upon thrones; and are not angels, but are gods. David also received many wives and concubines, as also Solomon, and Moses my servant; as also many others of my servants, from the beginning of creation until this time; and in nothing did they sin, save in those things which they received not of me.

15. David's wives and concubines were given unto him of me, by the hand of Nathan, my servant, and others of the prophets who had the keys of this power; and in none of these things did he sin against me, save in the case of Uriah and his wife; and therefore, he hath fallen from his exaltation, and received his portion; and he shall not inherit them out of the world; for I gave them unto another, saith the Lord.

16. I am the Lord thy God, and I gave unto thee, my servant Joseph, an appointment, and restore all things; I have conferred upon you the keys and power of the Priesthood, wherein I restore all things, and make known unto you all things, in due time.

17. And verily, verily I say unto you, that whatsoever you seal on earth shall be sealed in heaven; and whatsoever you bind on earth, in my name, and by my word, saith the Lord, it shall be eternally bound in the heavens; and whosoever sins you remit on earth shall be remitted eternally in the heavens; and whosoever sins you retain on earth shall be retained in heaven.

18. And again, verily I say, whomsoever you bless I will bless, and whomsoever you curse I will curse, saith the Lord; for I, the Lord, am thy God.

19. And again, verily I say unto you, my servant Joseph, that whatsoever you give on earth, and to whomsoever you give any one on earth, by my word, and according to my law, it shall be visited with blessings.

* * * * *

20. Verily I say unto you, a commandment I give unto mine handmaid Emma Smith your wife let mine handmaid, Emma Smith, receive all those that have been given unto my servant Joseph, and who are virtuous and pure before me ; and those who are not pure, and have said they were pure, shall be destroyed, saith the Lord God ! I give unto my servant Joseph, that he shall be made ruler over many things, for he hath been faithful over a few things, and from henceforth I will strengthen him.

21. And I command mine handmaid, Emma Smith, to abide and cleave unto my servant Joseph, and to none else. But if she will not abide this commandment, she shall be destroyed, saith the Lord ; for I am the Lord thy God, and will destroy her if she abide not in my law ; but if she will not abide this commandment, then shall my servant Joseph do all things for her, even as he hath said ; and I will bless him, and multiply him, and give unto him a hundred fold in this world, of fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters, houses and lands, wives and children, and crowns of eternal lives in the eternal worlds. And again, verily I say, let mine handmaid forgive my servant Joseph his trespasses, and then shall she be forgiven her trespasses, wherein she has trespassed against me ; and I, the Lord thy God, will bless her, and multiply her, and make her heart to rejoice.

24. And again, as pertaining to the law of the priesthood : If any man espouse a virgin, and desire to espouse another, and the first give her consent ; and if he espouse the second, and they are virgins, and have vowed to no other man, then is he justified ; he cannot commit adultery, for they are given him ; for he cannot commit adultery with that that belongeth unto him, and to none else ; and if he have ten virgins given unto him by this law, he cannot commit adultery, for they belong to him ; and they are given unto him—therefore is he justified. But if one or either of the ten virgins, after she is espoused, shall be with another man, she has committed adultery, and shall be destroyed ; for they are given unto him to multiply and replenish the earth, according to my commandment, and to fulfil the promise which was given by my Father before the foundation of the world ; and for their exaltation in the eternal worlds, that they may bear the souls of men ; for herein is the work of my Father continued, that He may be glorified.

25. And again, verily, verily I say unto you, if any man have a wife who holds the keys of this power, and he teaches unto her the law of my priesthood, as pertaining to these things ; then shall she believe and administer unto him, or she shall be destroyed, saith the Lord your God ; for I will destroy her ; for I will magnify my name upon all those who receive and abide in my law. Therefore, it shall be lawful in me, if she receive not this law, for him to receive all things whatsoever I, the Lord his God, will give unto him, because she did not believe and administer unto him, according to my word ; and she then becomes the transgressor, and he is exempt from the law of Sarah, who administered unto Abraham according to the law, when I commanded Abraham to take Hagar to wife. And now, as pertaining to this law : Verily, verily I say unto you, I will reveal more unto you, hereafter ; therefore, let this suffice for the present. Behold, I am Alpha and Omega. Amen.

And this was the “revelation !”—this mass of confusion, cunning absurdity, falsehood, and bad grammar ! This was the celebrated document which was henceforth to be law to the confiding men and women who had embraced Mormonism! Looking at it now; noting its inconsistencies and its flagrant outrage upon common decency and morality, I can hardly credit that I should ever have been such a silly dupe as to give it a second thought. And yet, what could I do? I was bound hand and foot, as it were, and my very vision itself was distorted. Unquestioning obedience, we had been taught, was the highest virtue; rebellion was as the sin of witchcraft. I had been convinced of the truth of some of the tenets of the Mormon faith, and confident in them, I accepted without question all the rest. Never, till the possibility that polygamy might some day be acknowledged by the Church, began to be whispered among the Saints—never did a solitary doubt respecting my religion intrude itself upon my mind; and after my apprehensions were fairly aroused by those rumors, whenever I felt the faintest shadow of unbelief or suspicion arising in my heart, I banished it as an unholy thing. The time had not yet come when I could judge dispassionately: the "revelation" aroused within me feelings of horror and dismay, but I did not dare to question its authenticity. It brought bitterness to my soul, but I believed it was from God, and that I must learn to bear the cross patiently.

I did not at that time read the document through from beginning to end. No; my indignation was such that before I had read half of it I threw it from me in anger. Perhaps if I had read it all, and considered it carefully, my own judgment and my sense of right and wrong might have pointed out its absurdity and wickedness. But I was far from being tranquil enough to think calmly. I felt bitterly that this new doctrine was a degradation to woman, and I wondered why God should see fit to humiliate my sex in this way. I was willing to devote myself, my life, my all to His service, but wherefore should He doom me to everlasting sorrow.

What now was to be a woman's lot among the Mormons? A life without hope! Who can express the terrible meaning of those words—without hope! Yet so it was. Hereafter our hearts were to be daily and hourly trampled upon ; the most sacred feelings of our sex were to be outraged, our affections were to be crushed ;—henceforth we were to be nothing by ourselves ; without a husband, we were told, we could not even enter heaven ! But had our trials been limited to this life we might have borne them, as many a weary soul has done, waiting for the relief of death. But death was to bring no hope to us : we were told that in the other world Polygamy should be the only order of marriage, and that without it none could be exalted in glory. We were told these things by men who we believed were true and holy men of God ; and we trusted in them.

Rebellious I felt, indeed, as I paced the room after I had thrown the Revelation on the ground : I almost felt as if I should lose my reason. A woman in the time of trouble always looks to some one in whom she can confide ; but to whom could I turn for one kind or cheering word—who would comfort me ? I had neither relation or friend to whom I could speak of this trial ; there was no one who could understand me. I could not turn to my husband in this sorrow, and I dared not even kneel to my God to implore His aid. It was He, they said, who had declared this revelation was His will ; how then could I turn to Him ? No ; my heart sank within me ; henceforth there was to be no hope, no peace for me !

There was a knock at my chamber door, and my husband came in. He knew how acutely I must feel, and he came to comfort me. I was almost choked with emotion and tears, but he threw his arms round me tenderly and spoke to me as if I had been a child that needed consolation. He tried to persuade me that God as a loving Father could never have intended the pain or misery of his children, and that when we came to understand the doctrine better, we should find that all would be well. He spoke also of his own unchanging attachment, and appealed to me whether I thought he could ever love me less or place his affections on another.

I tried to believe, and when I felt a little better I went with him to the breakfast room where the others were waiting for us.

We were not a very entertaining party that morning. The Elders present, of course knew what had kept me in my room, and their attempt at cheerfulness was not very successful. My husband was in sympathy with me, and I have no doubt that I looked sad enough. There was only one person present who did not appreciate the situation—Monsieur Petitpierre, the Protestant minister—and they handed the Revelation to him. Mr. Stenhouse and the other Elders had some misgivings as to how he would receive it, and they were afraid it might disgust him with Mormonism. But the old gentleman stood the test bravely, and I saw then, as I have seen since, that men can be easily satisfied that the Revelation on Polygamy, or any other revelation, is divine, if they desire it to be so.

Here was old Monsieur Petitpierre, a man of more than three score years, and childless. To him the example of Abraham and Solomon appeared most instructive—an example which might be followed with advantage. His wife, like Sarah of old, had never been called by a mother's name; and now although, thus far, he had no idea who might act the part of a second Hagar, there seemed a fair chance that a little Ishmael might perpetuate the race of Petitpierres on earth, if only the Revelation was acted upon by the faithful.

"It ought to be prayerfully thought of," he said.

Prayerfully thought of! Poor, silly old man! Before then I had respect for his years and learning; but now—what could I think of a man who talked such nonsense? Had the revelation told him that the wife of his youth, now tottering in step, and with hair silvered by age, was commanded to take two or a dozen young husbands—I wondered whether he would have added with such satisfaction: "It ought to be prayerfully thought of!"

From that day I learned to regard polygamy as an essential part of the Mormon faith, and such for many years the world has considered it; but when I first joined the Church, such an innovation would have appeared to the European Saints beyond the wildest fancies of a dream

CHAPTER X.

MISSIONARY WORK:—TEACHING POLYGAMY.

Preaching Polygamy—A Phase of Missionary Life—An Embarrassing Position—Bearing the Cross—One Ever-Present Thought—The Haunting Spectre of My Life—My Little Daughter Clara—The Work of Repentance—Why Men are Sent on Mission—Working in the Dark—Days and Nights of Prayer and Fasting—Preparing for Work—Breaking the News—My First Convert—The Victim Chosen—The “Beauties” of “Celestial Matrimony”—Introducing a Pleasant Subject—“Came Down Stairs Singing”—A Cruel Task—“Does My Serge Believe This?”—“I Tried to Comfort Her”—Not Wisely, but Too Well—How the Swiss Women Received the Revelation—A Companion in Misery—A Letter from Mary Burton—Polygamy in England—Elder Shrewsbury in Difficulties—Love and Religion—How Polygamy Was Denied—Looking Most Miserable—“He Kissed My Hand Sorrowfully.”

I NOW entered upon a new phase of my Missionary life ; the Elders assured me that it was my duty to teach Polygamy to the women of Switzerland.

Hitherto, although I had suffered much from poverty and privation, my work as a Missionary had been very pleasant. I believed with my whole heart all that I taught, and my best wishes for the people around me were that they might become altogether such as I was, except in my sufferings.

Now, however, all this was changed. It was no longer salvation through faith in Christ, or repentance, or baptism ; it was no longer love and peace for this world and the promise of everlasting joy in the world to come, that I was called upon to teach. My task hitherto had been a labor of love ; now it was to be a weary work of pain. How could I teach the sisters, the affection of whose guileless hearts I had won to myself—how could I teach them that which my own heart abhorred, a doctrine which I hated with my whole soul!

How I strove against my rebellious nature: how I battled with myself! That God had sent the Revelation I never questioned, and all rebellion to His will I knew must be sinful. I had no thought of evading the responsibility: my heart must be subdued. It might be subdued; it might be crushed and broken, but I could never again, I felt, be truly happy. I tried to reason with myself and to persuade myself that it was I who was to blame and not the Revelation. If the Lord required me to submit, it must be for some good purpose, and I must not refuse the cross that He called upon me to bear. Sometimes for a few moments something would attract my attention and divert my thoughts; but the terrible reality—Polygamy, refused to be ignored, and I felt all the more bitterly afterwards. I never was happy, for life had lost its charm to me. Ere I slept at night one dreadful thought was haunting my pillow,—it disturbed my very dreams,—and when I awoke in the morning, it was with a feverish apprehension of coming evil hanging over me. All through the long, weary day it haunted my footsteps like a spectre, and like a fearful blight that had fallen upon me it seemed to be withering my soul. One thought was ever present in my mind—that thought, Polygamy!

It can be no wonder that I lost all interest in life, and that I should almost wish to die rather than live that life of degradation which I dreaded would be mine. But death flies from those who woo her; the wretched, the weary, the hopeless, they find her not. I felt that there was no rest for me. My only comfort was in my children; no revelation, I felt, could change their relationship to me. But over my little daughter Clara I mourned, for I thought if this revelation were acted upon by the Saints, as doubtless it would be, she would some day be called upon to suffer as I did. How little did I then, however, anticipate in what way my fears would be realised! My Clara is now the daughter-in-law of Brigham Young, having married his eldest son, Joseph A. Young.

I am afraid at that time I was somewhat of a trial to my husband, for my heart was not yet quite subdued. I grew impatient at the wrong which I felt had been done to me, and I often said bitter things against the Prophet of the Lord and all his sex, including my husband, who was then, and for years after, a devoted Mormon, and was quite horrified at what I said. He often told me that I was a great hindrance to him, and that it was impossible for any one who lived with me to enjoy the Spirit of God,—and I was afraid that he only spoke the truth.

Then I repented, and sought to chasten myself; and I fasted and prayed and asked forgiveness of God and my husband. But even when most subdued I was as unhappy as ever, and some one was sure to say something which reminded me of my trouble, and whenever the Elders came to the house they were sure to discuss the one painful topic. Then my indignant feelings all came back again, and I felt the spirit of rebellion stirring within me. I could not help it, for I felt that woman's nature itself was insulted by the degrading doctrine, and any mention of it excited my anger.

My husband and the Elders had anticipated that I would not readily submit, and they bore with me as patiently as they could, losing no opportunity of strengthening me in the faith, ever keeping before me the obligation that rested upon me in particular to explain the doctrine to the Swiss sisters. They knew very well that nothing tends more to confirm the faith of the wavering than setting them to teach others. Brigham Young has always acted on this principle, and whenever any of the brethren have evinced signs of doubt or disaffection they have been at once despatched on Mission. Their efforts to convert others, established their own faith.

Among the Swiss we had never spoken on Polygamy or any kindred subject, and we were therefore spared the humiliation which the British Elders experienced in having to retract their own teachings. Nevertheless, Mr. Stenhouse and the other Elders felt great anxiety as to how the new doctrine would be received. My husband did not at once openly tell them that such a Revelation had been sent from Zion ; but whenever an opportunity presented he took them aside singly and spoke to them about the ancient patriarchs who practiced Polygamy ; and so great was his influence with the converts that he soon won them over to the new teaching, and made them feel that they would not be justified in rejecting the Revelation. Many of the Swiss Saints before their conversion had been more Socialists than Christians, and they probably thought that this change in the marriage institution was a sign of advancing intellectual supremacy ; but their wives were very far from sharing these opinions with them.

After many days and nights of prayer and fasting I prepared myself for my work. To a certain extent I had brought my own self under control, or I thought I had, and I almost felt anxious to begin, so that I might get over the painful scenes which I fully anticipated. It was agreed that Madame Baliff, of whom I have already spoken as being rather sceptical when my child recovered from her critical condition, should be the first to whom the intelligence should be imparted, for it was thought that if she accepted the Revelation without much difficulty, the other sisters would be more easily won over. She was a well-educated and intelligent woman, and had seen a good deal of the world. She had met her husband while travelling in Russia, had married him, and they had returned to their native land. She was in every respect a lady, but she was a spoilt child and had her whims ; and she possessed a great influence over the minds of the other sisters. On this account it was that she was selected as the victim to whom should first be imparted the mysteries of the Revelation, for it was thought that whatever reception she might give to Polygamy, her views would greatly influence the conduct of the rest.

As I before mentioned, Madame Baliff and her husband were models of affection to one another, and it seemed to me quite a sin that I should introduce into such a household a doctrine which could only produce disunion and misery. I had, however, schooled my heart to what I thought was my duty, and I strove to smother the rebellion rising within me. But, after all it seemed to me hardly fair that I should be selected for this painful task. These husbands had not courage enough, or were ashamed, to tell their own wives about this wonderful Revelation; and so I, a weak woman, hating in my heart the doctrine as much as a woman could hate—I was chosen to introduce this pleasant subject, and to persuade those I loved to their own ruin. I had had it all fully explained to me, and I thoroughly understood the beauties of the system in the sight of the Elders, and what they considered the strong points in the Revelation;—but it is miserable work to try to convince others of a thing that you yourself detest.

One day, quite unexpectedly to her, they had told Madame Baliff that a new Revelation had been sent from Zion, and that I would explain it to her; then Monsieur Baliff left the house and remained absent until the wife whom he so devotedly loved should have heard this new thing.

Madame Baliff came down stairs singing, in her usual gay spirits, little expecting what she was going to hear; and when she came to me I felt so unfitted for my task that I dared not look her straight in the face, although she was my dearest friend and I had such an affection for her. I stood there, pale and trembling, and she thought that I was not well;—I was not indeed well—I was sick at heart. Never before had the face of a friend been so unwelcome.

She asked me what it was that I had to tell her; and when I hesitatingly denied having wanted to speak to her at all, she said she knew there must be something, as her husband had told her so.

I hesitated still; but at last found courage, and told her all. It was a cruel task to impose upon me. Day after day I had observed her and her husband, I had noticed their deep affection; had seen her watching at the window for his return; and he would come with a little offering of choice fruit or flowers: and I thought no woman could be happier than Madame Baliff. And now for me to so cruelly awaken them from their dream of bliss!

She sat and listened eagerly as I told my story; and when at length she began to understand what was meant by it, she thought that I must be playing some unseasonable joke upon her, and showed as much in her countenance. But when she saw that I really was in earnest, she sprang up and cried out : "Oh, my God ! what a beastly religion ! How dared your husband and you come to us Swiss with such a religion as that ?" My eyes sank before her as she turned on me with mingled rage and disgust, as if she would wither me with her contemptuous looks. I felt as humbled as if I myself had been the author of the Revelation.

"And does my Serge believe this ?" she cried.

I assured her that he did believe it, and she paced the room, to and fro, as if she would go crazy ; my heart ached for her. She gave way to a perfect storm of rage, and then sobbed and cried like a child who had lost its mother. I was silent, for I knew how she must feel, and I felt that she would be relieved by tears. I had gone through the trial all alone, without one word from a woman's heart that could reach my own. And I tried to comfort her. I remembered how I had felt myself, and I believed that thus it was now with her. In an instant, when I first realised that Polygamy had anything to do with me, just as I have heard it said of dying men, all my past life rushed to my remembrance, and every word or deed of love therein, stood out in brightest reality. Thus I doubted not it was with my friend. Every tender word which her husband had ever uttered ; every loving deed he had ever done, came to her recollection with a ten-fold dearness as she realised the horrors which awaited her in the future.

How little did we either of us imagine the story she would afterwards tell me in Utah !

I tried to soothe her, and she threw her arms passionately round me, and pressed me to her throbbing heart, and wept again. She thought of her husband and her little girls. But with all her fears she dreamed not how miserable was the life before her in poverty and Polygamy. She was herself handsome in form and fair in feature, and, in the full enjoyment of all that could be desired in her sphere of life, she was as happy as a youthful wife could be. She pictured to herself a time—not now, her Serge loved her too truly now—when her husband might cast his eyes upon some blooming damsel, younger than she was then, and might begin to take a nearer interest in Polygamy. She pictured him bestowing on the youthful beauty the love and tenderness which he had always bestowed on her;—how his affections would die out towards her; how her heart would be desolate and alone!

I took her hand in mine and spoke very gently to her, and when she was calmer, I talked to her more freely. We found now, as we tried to look our common enemy in the face, how strong a hold Mormonism had taken of us; and it is in this that persons unacquainted with the Saints have so greatly misjudged the women of Utah; they know how small a hold such a religion—now they look upon Mormonism and Polygamy as identical—would have upon them; and they forget how all-absorbing was our faith in Mormonism without Polygamy. We confided not wisely, but too well.

Had Polygamy been an invention of our husbands, or a system which they capriciously adopted, we might have been grieved, but we should have known how to act, for we were in a Christian country where women had rights as well as men;—it was our own hearts which were traitors to us. We had been taught to regard Abraham and Jacob, and David and Solomon as types of holiness, as men who were fit objects for imitation; and now it was proved to us, from Scripture, that these men were Polygamists, and yet were blessed by God; and we were called upon to follow their example. Thus we tried to crush out the remembrance of our own womanhood. Had we but followed the light of reason which God had given for our guide, we should have trampled in the dust that vile burlesque upon the holy religion of Jesus, called a “Revelation upon Celestial Marriage.” As it was, the religious teachings which we had received both before and after we embraced Mormonism alike combined to blind us to the truth.

In this state of mind we knelt and prayed for the Lord to increase our faith in that very doctrine which in our hearts we cursed and hated; and on our knees we wept again; and natural feelings of repugnance mingled with an earnest struggle to submit to the will of God. Madame Baliff had not so much faith in Mormonism as I had, and she had consequently less to trouble her in that respect; but she loved her husband, and she knew that he was determined to go to Zion as soon as he could, and then not only would all the luxuries of a happy home be sacrificed, but all her anticipations of the future were overshadowed by a terrible apprehension. Thus we were equally troubled, though I had to endure most, as the task of teaching fell upon me. I did at last manage to persuade her not to offer any active opposition to the revelation, but I could not satisfy her that all was right. She even went so far as to promise to try to overcome her own feelings, for if it was really true she did not wish to be found fighting against the Lord. She had, however, hardly ceased speaking when the thought of her little daughters crossed her mind and once more she paced the room like an enraged tigress, declaring angrily that "no vile Polygamist should ever possess either of her sweet girls." I had felt like this for my own darling Clara.

I had now a companion in misery—some one who could sympathise with me. Even had my husband detested the doctrine, as I did, he could not have comforted me as a woman and a mother could. My poor friend could feel as I felt, and her sympathy was very dear to me—misery loves companionship—we were sisters in affliction. Not only so—Madame Baliff declared that this painful task should not rest on me alone; she would help me in speaking to the sisters. Thus we helped each other in the time of our trouble.

It must have been about this time that I received another letter from Mary Burton. The postmark is quite indistinct, but a week or two one way or the other does not signify much. In her usual quick and impulsive way she gave me her views of the "beauties" of Polygamy, and perhaps the reader would like to hear what she said.

. I am very miserable, Sister Stenhouse, and furiously indignant. I little thought when I last wrote to you that I should have such news to tell; but I suppose you know it all without my saying a word. How we all felt when we first learned that Polygamy was true, no words of mine can describe ; we hardly dared look one another in the face. Let me tell you how it was.

One night, quite late, Elder Shrewsbury came round in a hurry, and asked to see me. I went down into the parlour to meet him, and Mrs. Elsworth came down also, and remained until he went away. Elder Shrewsbury looked very strange that night, just like a man who had been doing something wrong and was ashamed of it—and well he might feel so. He began by talking to Mrs. Elsworth about the weather, and when they had both said all they could think of on that interesting and original subject, we all three sat silent for some time. Elder Shrewsbury at last spoke.

He excused himself for coming so late, but he said he had only just received some important news, and could not rest until he had seen us. He had been round at the Conference-house, and had there seen a good many of the Elders. They were all talking earnestly upon the same subject, for that day they had received not only letters from the Apostle at Liverpool, but also copies of the Millennial Star, with the Revelation in it, which I suppose you have seen. Of course it was impossible for them to doubt any longer, but most of them felt it was a cruel blow. Elder Shrewsbury said they looked at one another, but did not dare to speak. Nearly all of them had been anxiously trying to get rid of the false scandal, as they supposed the accusation of Polygamy to be ; and in public in their sermons, and in private to all the weak brethren, they had over and over again solemnly declared that Polygamy was unheard of among the Saints, that it was a Gentile lie ; and they had proved from the Bible, and from the Book of Mormon, that a doctrine so sinful could never be believed or practiced by God's people.

Now, all this would be thrown in their teeth. Those who hated Mormonism would revile them for it, and, worse still, the Saints themselves would despise and doubt them for the lies which many of them had innocently told. Who could tell where all this would end? When they were found to have been deceived in a matter like Polygamy, about which it was so easy to arrive at facts and certainty, who would trust them concerning other doctrines which depended upon their veracity and testimony alone?

Then, too, there was worse to be said about the American Elders and Apostles. Who could believe that Orson Pratt or Lorenzo Snow knew nothing of Polygamy? And yet they denied it in the most solemn way. And, oh, Sister Stenhouse, think of the Apostle Taylor calling God to witness his truth when he proved from the Book of Covenants that there was no such thing as Polygamy : and all the while he had himself five wives in Salt Lake City ! Oh, my ! This is dreadful. Whether the doctrine is true or not, I can never believe that God would forgive all that abominable lying about it.

But I was telling you of that evening.

Elder Shrewsbury told us all this, but he spoke slowly and disjointedly, like a man whose mind is troubled. He said he hardly knew what he was doing. Then he gave Mrs. Elsworth a copy of the Star, and he asked me, too, to read the Revelation carefully before I condemned it.

"If the Revelation, as you call it, allows Polygamy," I exclaimed, "it is a lie, and I hate and despise it, and you, and Mormonism, and all !" I was quite in a fury, and I did feel as if I hated him then.

He did not answer me ; he seemed too cut up to utter a word, but I did not pity him. I felt that men who would write such a revelation as that for their own wicked purposes deserved all the hatred which the cruellest heart could muster up—they were loathsome to any pure-minded woman. Then we went down stairs, for I generally go to see him out. He took my hand in his to shake it, and he held it there, although I tried to take it away, and he said mournfully, "Sister Mary, I know you have good cause for anger ; but be just. I have been just as much deceived as ever you have been. It has unsettled all my faith ; even our best and most tried Missionaries are shrinking from it. Do not blame me for what I have not done. I never deceived you about it."

"How can I tell that?" I said. "If the Apostles thought nothing of deceiving us and perjuring themselves, how can I trust any one? If they had only held their tongues, I should have thought it wrong for them to passively let us be deceived ; but you yourself know how solemnly they affirmed that it was all false. I tell you fairly, I hate them."

The Apostles, he said, had told some who were strong enough in the faith to bear it, all the truth, but they gave us milk, as the Bible says, because we were babes and our faith was weak.

"Nonsense!" I said, "to tell me such stuff as that! As if the Bible called lies and perjury 'milk!' Nice food for babes, indeed! Why, it's blasphemy even to talk so!"

"I cannot help it, Sister Mary," he said:—"I am more sorry than I can tell you—but what can I do?"

I did not answer him, and after a few moments, during which he still held my hand in his, he said:—"Mary, I want to speak to you alone about these things ; I have much that I want to say, and I don't want Mrs. Elsworth to be with us. Can I see you, to-morrow evening, if I call? Can I speak with you for half an hour by ourselves?"

"I wish you would not call me 'Mary,' any more, Elder Shrewsbury," I said ; "it is too familiar now. We have been far too friendly, but, thank God, I have found out in time, and know how to act. I hardly think I ought to let you call me Sister Mary even;—there can be no brotherhood or sisterhood with Polygamy ; but I don't want to be unkind to you." Then I told him that he might come as he said, and that I would ask Mrs. Elsworth to let me see him.

He went away looking most miserable, and Mrs. Elsworth scolded me for being so long at the door. I suppose she thought we were love-making, but she was greatly mistaken. She did not seem much pleased or vexed about the Revelation, and she told me that she knew quite well before that it would come some day ; and as she said that there was a peculiar look of determination about her mouth that I had never noticed before. I felt sure at once that she had formed a plan of some kind, that she would carry it out if it cost her her life.

Then I went to my own room, and tried to think the matter out. If I were married, as you are, Sister Stenhouse, and if my husband believed in the Revelation, I think I should go crazy. As it was, I felt it terribly. You know, dear, I told you that I liked Elder Shrewsbury very well, but nothing more. Well, that was very true then, but now I know that it was not all the truth. I take care that he shall never know what I think of him, but, entre nous, I know that he is not the same to me as other people. I do not think I love him ; no, I'm sure I don't now ; but I do feel a great deal of interest in him. That night, however, I felt very bad at him. That he had been deceived, I knew, and also that he must have felt sorry for having deceived me ; and, if he cares for me, he must have felt uneasy for what I might say or do, now the doctrine was proclaimed. But I thought that as a man he ought to have shown more courage, and not to have appeared so thoroughly frightened before a girl like me.

Well, the more I thought of it, the more angry I became, and I couldn't sleep all night. The next morning I wrote a little note to Elder Shrewsbury, saying that after all that had happened, I had fully resolved not to see him again. Many of my friends, I said, were married and could not help themselves, but I both could and would. The Mormon sisters I should ever pity and love ; but as for the Mormon men, I would never have anything to do with one of them as long as I lived. I did not want to be unkind to him personally, but I really could not trust any one now.

Then I showed this note to Mrs. Elsworth, and asked her to give it to Elder Shrewsbury that night when he came.

He came, of course, and he came again and again ; but I would not see him ; and I did not even go to the meetings for fear of coming across him there. He had long talks with Mrs. Elsworth, and tried to get her to interfere, and at last he sent me a long letter, entreating me not to refuse him. I was cooler now, and when Mrs. Elsworth said I ought at least to see him, even if I dismissed him then, I agreed to do so, and the next night he came.

He was very humble that night. You know what torrents of eloquence he pours forth about anything that interests him, and how earnest he is. But then all his eloquence had fled. He hesitated and blundered until I really quite pitied him. He came and sat by me, and would have taken my hand, but I would not let him. He did not tell me that he loved me, but he spoke as if I were conscious of the fact, and you know, of course, I couldn't help feeling that he cared for me, whether he spoke about it or not. He assured me over and over again that though he had often heard the scandal—as I had done—he did not for a moment believe it ; he said that he should never himself act up to the Revelation ; that if he loved it should be an undivided and all-absorbing love ; that he would rather have less glory in eternity, with one whom he could idolize, than obey the Revelation on Polygamy, and obtain a higher position.

All this time he hardly once looked at me, but when I did see his eyes they seemed very sorrowful and very earnest. I confess to you that what he said made me feel very differently for him. For a man of his ability and talents, who has such an influence, and wins so much respect from every one he meets, to be sitting there all bashful, like a naughty child, before a young girl like me, and all because he loved me, made me feel for him a pity which was very near to love.

But it was not love quite ; and I did not let him read my thoughts. I asked him to tell me all he knew, and to explain to me the meaning of different parts of the Revelation which were rather obscure to me ; and he did so. Then he tried to shake my resolution, and so anxious and troubled did he seem, that I really do think that if I had asked him to give up Mormonism altogether, he would have done so for my sake. I told him that I had quite resolved, now that Polygamy was acknowledged, never to see him again, except as I might see the other Elders at meeting. I said I believed I was still a good Mormon, as Mormons used to be, but I would never receive Polygamy, or be more than an ordinary friend to any one who did believe it. We talked together a good deal, and we sat silently together a long while ; and at last he rose to go. He kissed my hand sorrowfully—and I didn't like to be vexed with him for doing so, he looked so doleful—and he said he'd wait and wait, ever so long, if I wanted him to do so ; but that he would hope on, trusting that some day I might change. I told him I thought—I knew I should never change.

After that I only saw him at meeting. And, oh dear ! you should see what meetings we have now ! Half the people don't attend, and everything is so cold and lifeless. Some of our most earnest Elders never come ; and it is said among the brethren, that Polygamy will produce the greatest apostasy which the Church has ever seen. Every one seems ashamed of it.

And now, dear, I have written you a terrible long letter, but you must please forgive me, for I have no one to whom I can open my heart except to you. I wish I had some keepsake to remember you by. Well, I don't mean that, but I should so like to have your portrait. Did you not once tell me that Elder Stenhouse talked of learning photography ? Does he ever practice it now ? And if so, couldn't you get him to take a shadow of yourself ? I should so like to have one. Mine I will send you as soon as it is taken. I mean to write again to you in the course of a day or two, and then I'll tell you what Elder Shrewsbury said about the Revelation itself. Meanwhile, dear, kiss both the babies, please, for me ; and write soon to your most affectionately loving,

MARY BURTON."

Poor girl ! I said, as I folded up her letter ; but it is better for her to suffer a little now than for her to have been married first, as I was, and then, when too late to go back, to have Polygamy announced as an article of faith.

CHAPTER XI.

MORMONISM IN ENGLAND:—PREPARING TO EMIGRATE.

A Blissful State of Ignorance—The Opinions of Monsieur Petitpierre—Strong Arguments—How He Became an Apostate—"He Shall Rule over Her"—The Nobler Sex—How Women were Sufficiently Honored—Looking Anxiously for a Change—Establishing a Mormon Paper—Denouncing the Gentiles—Terrible Expectations—Hastening to Zion—A Journey of Many Days—The Swiss Pilgrims—Death by the Way—Disobeying Counsel—The "Judgments" of the Lord—The Love of Many Waxes Cold—The President of the London Conference—Distinguished Apostates—Strange News from Zion—An "Object of Interest"—Great Success of Mormonism in Britain—How Saints were Re-baptized—Poor Elder Marsden!—The Emigration Season—My Little Daughter Minnie—Saintly Treatment—A Visit from Mary Burton—How Love Affairs Progressed—Pacifying a Lover—The Meaning of the Word "Patience."

IT was fortunate for the Swiss Mission that the new converts in general could not read any language but their own, and thus were ignorant of the deceptions which the American Elders had practiced upon the people.

Monsieur Petitpierre, the Protestant minister, who thought that the Revelation ought to be "prayerfully considered," was the only one who understood English, and his knowledge was very limited. His wife did not at all coincide with him about the prayerful consideration of Polygamy; she disposed of the subject without any prayer at all, and it is to be regretted that in this respect the whole body of the Mormon women did not follow her example.

What arguments she used I do not know; but that they were very much to the point no one can doubt, for they banished for ever all thoughts of Polygamy from her husband's mind. It was said among the Saints that she was very energetic in her private discussions with her husband. But however this might be, it is certain that Monsieur Petitpierre resisted as long as he could, for the revelation quite fascinated the childless old man, and it is possible that he might have held fast to the faith; but, unfortunately, just then certain documents and publications of the Apostles, and a very large amount of evidence respecting them and their doings, attracted his attention. He was in the main a good and truthful man, although of small mental calibre, and the deceptions and contradictions which he discovered quite disgusted him. His wife's strong personal arguments gave the finishing blow to his faith, and the spell was broken. The vision of a modern Hagar and a little Ishmael vanished from his mind; he apostatised—and Mr. Stenhouse lost the services of a very useful translator.

When I heard that he had left the Church, how I wished that I could have followed in his footsteps. But apostasy from Mormonism is only possible to two classes—the young disciple, who has embraced the faith more from enthusiasm than from conviction, whose experience is limited, and the old disciple who has entirely outgrown it, and has become disgusted with it all.

I was neither of these. My faith was too firmly grounded to admit of my giving it up. Though I hated Polygamy, I did not dare to question the divinity of its origin. I only pitied myself and my sex for the burden which God had seen fit to place upon us. I never for a moment supposed that any man would have been so wicked as to fabricate a "Revelation," or so blasphemous as to palm it off in the name of the Lord.

Oh yes, I hated Polygamy in my heart. And my efforts in teaching it only increased my hatred; for when I was gravely told by the Elders that woman had been cursed in the Garden of Eden, and that Polygamy was one of the results of that curse—"her desire shall be unto her husband, and he shall rule over her!"—I must confess that my heart within me was rebellious. From my earliest childhood I had thought of God as a father and a friend, to whom I might go and tell all my griefs and cares ; but now He was presented to me as a hard taskmaster, not as a father or a friend.

I met with much kindness, but I did not meet with much sympathy from the brethren. They could not understand that opposition to Polygamy was anything else than selfishness on the part of the sisters ; they did not comprehend the feelings of a woman's heart—its craving for some object upon which to devote its whole wealth of love. They were taught that theirs was a nobler position than that of the sisters, and that women might consider themselves sufficiently honored in being allowed to become the mothers of their children and to help in building up their "kingdom."

Of my Missionary work in Switzerland subsequent to the introduction of Polygamy I will say but little, except that it was too successful. The same sorrow and indignation which Madame Baliff had so forcibly expressed, were shown by almost every new convert, and I had to bear the blame of teaching such a doctrine. The sisters became unhappy, and wished that they had died in ignorance of Mormonism ; and I felt humbled to the dust to think that I should be the innocent cause of so much misery to others. I looked anxiously for a change, but the only change which seemed probable was that we might be permitted to emigrate to Utah, and there was no comfort for me in that prospect.

We remained in Switzerland until the close of the year 1854, and through the unremitting efforts of my husband, Mormonism was introduced into six cantons of the Confederation. Monsieur Baliff became an indefatigable Missionary, as was also Governor Stoudeman ; and to their liberality and zeal Mr. Stenhouse was greatly indebted. With the aid of Monsieur Baliff, he established in Geneva a monthly periodical in the French language, for the edification of the Saints, beside a volume in reply to the attacks of the clergy, and many minor effusions.

At that time there was great excitement among the Saints in Utah. Brigham Young and his Apostles were denouncing the Gentiles in the most unmeasured language. As I write, a volume of sermons delivered at that time is before me, and I really can hardly credit that so much ridiculous nonsense, bad grammar, and blasphemy, could ever have been uttered in a public place of worship;—yet it was so. The Saints were told that in these last times all the Vials of the Wrath of God were about to be poured upon the earth; wars and desolations, anarchy and persecution, fire, pestilence, and unheard of horrors, were to desolate all the world, until men should call upon the rocks to hide them, and in the bitterness of their souls curse the day in which they were born; death was to be sought for, but not found. Believing, as they did, that all this was true, it is no wonder that the Saints in Europe were alarmed, and became anxious to emigrate to Utah, where they were told they would be safe. A seven years' famine was said to be at the door, when a sack of wheat should be sold for a sack of gold, and Gentile Kings and Princes were to come and crouch to the Saints for a morsel of bread. The very women in Zion were counselled to sell the ribbons from their bonnets, to buy flour with the proceeds, and to hide it away against the day of wrath.

The brethren and sisters in Switzerland who could dispose of their property hastened to "flee to Zion." Some did so at a ruinous sacrifice. One gentleman—a Monsieur Robella—I knew, who was part proprietor of a newspaper and printing establishment. In a very short time it would have been entirely in his own hands; but he sold out at a great loss, dreading that the storm might overtake him before he reached the "Chambers of the Lord in the Mountains," as the Elders called Salt Lake City.

The journey from Europe to Utah at that time occupied six or eight months; it was a very tedious pilgrimage. My Swiss friends had first to travel to Liverpool; thence by sailing vessel to New Orleans; by steamer up the Mississippi as far as St. Louis; up the Missouri to the frontiers; and then across the Plains by ox-teams. Much of this distance had to be travelled during the worst part of the year. They left their homes while the Jura Mountains were still draped in snow, and those who escaped the ravages of cholera and the perils of the way, reached their destination just as the frosts of winter were beginning to whiten the hoary heads of the hills which stand about Zion.

All the Swiss pilgrims travelled together until they arrived at St. Louis; there they separated, one party going up the river, and the other making the journey overland. The cholera attacked the latter party and cut off the greater number of them, and their bones now whiten the prairie.

The news of their death soon arrived in Switzerland, and the people at Lausanne were exasperated against the Mormon Missionaries, and when my husband visited that place he found it prudent not to remain long. At the same time those of the Saints whose relations had perished in the emigration were pained to hear that it was because they "had not obeyed counsel," and gone up the river with the other party, that they fell by the way. And, as if in mockery of this statement, the next news that we received was that a Missouri steamer, on board of which were many Mormon Missionaries—all most obedient to counsel—had been blown to atoms. Many of the Saints began to consider these things, and their love waxed cold.

Through all this our position was anything but pleasant, and my husband applied for permission to be released from the Presidency of the Swiss and Italian Missions, in order that he might "gather to Zion." His request was granted; and in the autumn of 1854, we bade a final adieu to Switzerland.

We might now be said to have begun our journey to Zion, although we tarried long by the way, and several years elapsed before we reached our destination.

When we arrived in London we obtained apartments in the house of the President of the London Conference, and there I had opportunities of observing the effects of the system upon the English Saints. Elder Marsden, the President, was a thorough Mormon, and a man who was very highly thought of. He had been acquainted with all the Apostles and High-priests who had resided in Liverpool—the great rendezvous of the Saints in England; had been President of the Conference there, and now occupied the highest position of the European mission. He was a pleasant, intelligent man, who in his day had done much to build up the Church; but like his two predecessors, John Banks and Thomas Margetts, he also apostatised from the Mormonism of later years. At the time, however, of which I speak, he was considered to be of good standing among the Saints.

Up to this time I had never seriously doubted my religion, and I probably never should have done so had it not been for the introduction of Polygamy. But what I saw in London at that time sadly shook my faith, and the stories which I heard from Utah quite frightened me. Nothing, of course, was openly said, and at first I disbelieved every evil report, until at last it was impossible for me altogether to reject what was told me. The testimony of an Apostate or of a Gentile would have been dismissed with contempt; but when we saw letters from mothers to their children, and husbands to their wives—all people of unquestioned faith, setting forth the troubled state of men's minds in Utah, expressing fears for their own safety, and hinting at "cutting off" the transgressor, and the doings of "Avenging Angels," we could not cast them aside with contempt. My views of the glories of Zion were changing;—henceforth I was never firm in the faith—I felt that there was something wrong.

Perhaps the reader may think that now I might have left the Church, and thus have avoided all those troubles which awaited me in Utah. But let him remember that, although my faith was shaken, it was not wholly destroyed. All that I clung to on earth—my husband, whom I truly loved, and my darling children—were part and parcel of Mormonism. I could not tear myself from them, and isolate my soul from all that made life worth having.

My unsettled state of mind, however, did not long remain a secret. It was spoken of among the Saints, and I became an object of interest. The Pastor over the London and adjoining Conferences was the son of one of the chief Apostles in Utah—a young man, whose good nature was far better than his religion. He visited us very frequently, and used to bring with him the distinguished American Elders who might be visiting the metropolis. I have no doubt that they were sincere in their desire to do me good, but it was not kind attentions that I then needed, it was the removal of the cause of my sorrows.

They tried to persuade me that it was all “the work of the Lord ;” but I could not see it in that light, and very often in reply to their consolations I said very hard things of Polygamy and the leaders of the Church, whose conduct I considered sinful. And in this I did not stand alone, for I soon found that the President of the Conference—Elder Marsden—had been in the same position for years, and his wife was “quite through” with Mormonism. In fact, so great had been the distrust occasioned by Polygamy, that in the report ending June 30th, 1853, it was stated that from the whole British Church—which then numbered very nearly thirty-one thousand souls—seventeen hundred and seventy-six had been excommunicated for apostasy!

Of those who remained faithful I cannot give a much more cheering account. The Elders who visited President Marsden made as damaging reports of the condition of the Saints as their worst enemies could desire. All that my young friend, Mary Burton, had told me did not equal the truth of what I saw for myself. No one had any confidence now in what the Elders said ;—how could they be trusted after so many years of deception?

The Elders who visited me and reasoned with me about my want of faith, tried to persuade me to be baptized again. Among the Mormons it is the privilege of the faithful to be baptized over and over again, as often as may be needed, for the remission of their sins, which are thus washed away, and the penitent is enabled to start afresh. At that time of fearful excitement in Utah, called by the Mormons "The Reformation," when people were being exhorted under terrible penalties to confess their sins, many were so frightened that they acknowledged themselves guilty of crimes of which they had never dreamed, while at the same time many horrible and detestable sins were brought to light. Brigham and the leaders found that they were confessing too much—the sinners were far more numerous than the godly. Brigham, with his usual craft, soon found a way of escape; the people were told to be baptized again, as then, their sins being washed away, they could truly say they were not guilty of such crimes of which they might be accused.

I was not convinced, and did not see that I had anything to repent of, but I was quite willing to be re-baptized if it was thought proper. At the same time I stipulated that the President of the Conference—Elder Marsden—should be baptized with me. I felt that if I required re-baptizing, how much more necessary was it for Elder Marsden to have his sins washed away also. I partly believed in the fearful stories that I had heard from Zion, but it was he who had shown them to me. The Pastor of the Conference gave no sign that he suspected my meaning in wishing Elder Marsden to be baptized at the same time as I was, though I believe he must have formed a pretty shrewd guess. And so we two went down into the water, but I am afraid that little of our sins was washed away. Not long after, President Marsden apostatised, and my heart remained as hard as ever. At least I was frequently told so.

Poor Elder Marsden! He was branded with the most opprobrious titles which Mormon ingenuity or malice could fling against him:—and yet I know of many men—not one nor two—associated most intimately with Brigham Young, to-day, whose faith is not a whit stronger than that apostate's, who serve the Prophet because it is their interest to do so, but who in their hearts no more believe in his high pretensions than did James Marsden, the President of the London Conference.

Meanwhile, the season for emigration had again arrived, and we were directed to hold ourselves in readiness to start. Although by no means unexpected, this "counsel" to emigrate came very painfully to me, for every step we took toward Utah seemed to bring me nearer to the realisation of my worst apprehensions. I had lost my affection for Mormonism, and my enthusiasm had now quite melted away. But to refuse to go was altogether out of the question.

Two little ones had been added to our family in Geneva, and a fourth was born in London, the Christmas day after our return from the Continent. The foggy atmosphere of the metropolis did not agree with them at all—accustomed, as they had been, to the pure and bracing air of Switzerland—and I soon had serious illness in my family. My second little girl, Minnie, was so sick that we almost despaired of her life, and the others required constant attention, while the little baby boy only a few weeks old, was seldom out of my arms. Just then it was, when so very awkwardly situated, that the notification came for us to set our faces Zionward.

They chided us for our want of faith, because we did not take our poor little sick child from her bed at the risk of life ; but I thank God now that nature was stronger than our fanaticism, and that our little girl was spared to grow up a blessing of which we shall ever be proud.

One day, President Marsden came to me confidentially and told me that the brethren were determined that I should leave England, and had counted upon my yielding in a moment of despair. My husband was to be counselled to go without me to Utah, if I persisted in my refusal. After he had left London, Elder Marsden was to give me notice to leave his house ; and left destitute, and entirely among strangers, it was thought that I should be only too glad to follow.

I cannot tell how indignant I was ; I could not find words sufficiently contemptuous to express what I felt, but I reproached Elder Marsden with cowardice for agreeing to such an inhuman proposition, and I declared that I would not risk the life of my child if an eternity of suffering awaited me.

My husband was absent when this took place; but when he returned he approved of what I had done, and Elder Marsden was consequently "counselled" to send us away. The doctor warned us against the danger of exposing my little daughter to the cold in removing her, but we had no choice, for we were obliged to leave. Those were very painful times. Constant watching and anxiety had undermined my own health, and I fell ill. Even then, had we been left alone, we might have escaped much of our trouble, but the incessant meddling of "counsel" was a perpetual irritation, and we were completely worn out with annoyance.

A pleasant apartment at the west end of the town was taken for me, by the advice of the medical man, and I was removed thither with my baby. I was not equal even to the task of taking care of that little thing, and had to procure the assistance of a nurse; the other children were cared for by friends. All that I needed was rest and tranquility of mind, and I soon began to recover strength, though far from well. But this state of quietude was soon to be disturbed. Again we were notified that the last emigrant ship of the season was about to leave, and we must sail in her, and again we were obliged to refuse. My husband telegraphed to the Apostle at Liverpool that I was not well enough to travel, and he was told to "bring me along, and I should get better." The Apostle (!) cared nothing for individual suffering, providing the ambitious plans of the priesthood in Salt Lake City were carried out. But my husband, anxious though he was to set out for Utah, and obedient, as he ever was to "counsel," was not such a slave as they thought him, and he positively refused to go. For this he was very much blamed, and it was said that his own faith must be wavering.

Since my arrival in London I had several times seen my young friend, Mary Burton, but some one was always present at the time. She had, as she told me in her letters, very greatly changed, for she had now become quite a young lady. Still she retained most of her winning ways, though her childish prettiness had given place to the more mature beauty of womanhood, and when I saw her I was not surprised that she should be an object of attention, or that Elder Shrewsbury should have felt so deeply her rejection of him. She was as loving to me as ever, and when she found that we could not have one of our old quiet chats together, on account of the people who were present, she promised to call on me some afternoon when we should be quite alone.

Before she came, however, I had a visit from another person, whom I little expected to see. This was no other than Elder Shrewsbury himself, who, I had been informed, had left London some months before. This, after the usual salutations, he told me was quite true;—he had left London and gone to work as a Missionary hundreds of miles away; trying to forget his disappointment, but to no purpose. His was one of those natures which, though kind and considerate to every one, are not ready to form hasty attachments, but which, when once they do meet with an object upon which to lavish their affections, become devoted in friendship and unchanging in love. Their affections flow more deeply than those of most people.

Such was Elder Shrewsbury, and such I thought he would always be; but what disposition, however good, can be relied upon when influenced by religious fanaticism? He stood before me, then, manly and upright in his bearing, truthful and honest, a man who would have scorned evasion or deceit, and his every thought of Mary was replete with tenderness and love. And yet I lived to see that man again, in Utah—alas, how changed a man!

Before we first left England I was acquainted with Elder Shrewsbury, but not very intimately. We had had one or two interesting conversations together, but I remembered him chiefly in connection with Mary Burton. It was about her that he now came to see me;—he wanted me to talk to her and intercede with her in his behalf. But I was no match-maker, and all my thoughts respecting love and marriage had recently been anything but pleasant. I told him plainly that I thought Mary had done quite right in refusing to see him, and, in fact, declining to receive the attentions of any Mormon man. I did not doubt his love for her at present, I said, but no one could any longer rely upon a Mormon Elder's word. Years to come, when they had a little family growing up around them, and when it would be too late for Mary to repent of trusting him, he might suddenly be convinced of the necessity of obeying the Revelation, and then, what could she do? No! Even supposing that she loved him, which, I said, was very questionable, it was better that she should suffer a disappointment now than have her heart wrung with cruelty and neglect in after years.

"What!" he cried, his eyes flashing with indignation; "do you take me for a dog that I should treat her so?"

"No, no," I said, and tried to pacify him; "I do not think anything bad of you, but I look upon you as a man who is in love, and therefore blind. You think of nothing now but Mary, and are willing to sacrifice everything, and to promise anything, providing you can win her. But when she has become your wife, if she ever does, and you have time to cool down, you'll begin to see things in another light. You'll find that she is a real ordinary woman, made of flesh and blood, like all the other daughters of Eve, and with, I daresay, quite as many whims, and fancies, and perverse ways as any of them; and then, when she ceases to be 'an angel' in your eyes, and becomes merely a woman, you'll begin to assert your right to think and judge for yourself, and very probably all your former devotion to your religion will return."

"Sister Stenhouse," he replied, "you do not seem to have a very high opinion of my constancy; but I can assure you that I have given this matter my most earnest, prayerful thought. My love for Mary I need not mention; my devotion to my religion you only partly know. While we were told that Polygamy was not true, no one could be more steadfast in the faith than I was; and when the Revelation came, I looked upon it as a blight and a curse to the Church of God, and how well-founded my fears were you can see from this terrible apostasy which has come upon us. I almost myself left the Church. Then I went to the Apostle, and I told him how I was situated. I told him all about Mary, and my devotion to her; that I wished to win her for my wife, but that I knew she would not marry me if she thought there was the shadow of a chance that I should live up to the Revelation. I told him that I myself should be perfectly wretched in Polygamy, and that it was impossible that I should love more than one. The Apostle said that I was quite right in all this. We had no proof, he said, in the Bible, that Isaac had more than one wife, and he was accepted by God. He counselled me to do all I could to win Mary, and told me that I might truthfully promise her that I would never enter into Polygamy. But Mary would not so much as listen to me—in fact, since then she never would see me alone."

"I am not sure," I answered, "whether I am doing right; but I don't mind saying to you that I think, from what I have seen of Mary, that she does not dislike you; but she is a sensible girl, and does not choose to risk the happiness of her whole life."

He was vexed with me for saying this. How could I suppose that he would wreck her happiness? Was he not willing to die if it would give her a moment's pleasure? And much more lovers' nonsense he talked. He had met her at the meetings sometimes, but she had very coldly said good-morning, or evening, as the case might be; but whenever he had ventured a word more than that, she had made some excuse to leave him. What he wanted me to do was to invite Mary to meet him with me, and to use my influence with her in his favor. I answered him very kindly, and did my best to reassure him, but I told him that I never would try to influence the conduct or affections of any one in a matter of the heart; such things should take their own course; and if he waited patiently no doubt all would be well.

"Patience!" he said; "Sister Stenhouse, do you think a man in love knows the meaning of that word? Patience, indeed!"

THE afternoon following, Mary herself came to see me, her face all flushed with excitement, and eager to tell me something.

“Who do you think I’ve been talking to, Sister Stenhouse?” she exclaimed, “You’d never guess.”

“I don’t think there’s much need for guessing,” I said, “Your face betrays the secret, Mary.”

“Well,” she said, “perhaps it does, but you wouldn’t wonder at it, if you only knew how very anxious I have been. All this time I have kept my word, and I did not see him or speak to him once, except at meetings, and not much then, and I have been very unhappy. This afternoon I came round about an hour ago to see you, and there on the step was Elder Shrewsbury. He said he was here yesterday, and was just going to call on you again, and then he asked me to go a little way with him, as he had something very important to say to me. At first I refused to go, but he wouldn't listen to it for a moment. So I went with him, and we have been talking ever since; or rather he has been talking, and I have been listening to him. I can't tell you, Sister Stenhouse, all he said—you can guess better than I can tell you. But I'm afraid I shall not be able to keep my resolution much longer, for when we came back to the door again he said he wouldn't come in to see you now, and when he begged me to let him call at Mrs. Elsworth's to-morrow night, I did not feel it in my heart to refuse him;—was it very wrong of me to do so?"

Said I—"I'm afraid, Mary, my opinion would not matter much either way; Elder Shrewsbury's eloquence is the music which you like best to listen to."

She blushed, and came and sat down beside me, and we talked together until the sun went down and my little room was quite dark. I told her of my troubles in Switzerland and of the miserable effects of introducing Polygamy there; and she in return told me all her love affairs with Elder Shrewsbury and of her resolution not to listen to him unless he solemnly promised never to have anything to do with the hated Revelation. Her faith in Mormonism itself had, as I expected, been very severely shaken, and I think that had it not been for my efforts to re-assure her, she would have left the Church at that time. Would, to God, she had.

After tea, she said—"Have you a copy of the Revelation here, Sister Stenhouse? I want to show you some strong points in it which I think will astonish you. I learned all about it from Elder Shrewsbury that night when he came to see me, and it was that that disgusted me with the whole affair." We searched through my trunk but could not find the document, and I told her that I had not patience to read it quite through when it was given to me, and that since then I was not sure that I had even seen it. "Never mind," she said, "I'll bring it with me when I come again."

How often have I thought since how much depended upon that trifling circumstance. Had we then together read over the Revelation and noticed the "strong points," of which she spoke, I believe my eyes would have been opened and I never should have submitted to the misery which I afterwards endured in Utah.

By and by she asked me whether I had heard anything of the terrible doings out in Zion, and I, in return, asked her what doings she alluded to.

"Well," she said, "I hardly like to tell you, if you have heard nothing about the matter, for I'm not quite sure whether it all is true; but we have had some strange reports floating about here, just like the reports of Polygamy, before it was acknowledged. It is said that in the time of Joseph Smith a band of men was organised who put to death any one who was troublesome to the Church or offended the Elders. Some people say that it was one or perhaps more of this band who fired at Governor Boggs, of Missouri, and who killed many other Gentiles. Dr. Avar and Sidney Rigdon are said to have been mixed up in the matter, and that wretched man, John C. Bennett, tells a frightful story about it. But that is not the worst, for Elder Shrewsbury himself told me long ago that Thomas B. Marsh, the then President of the Twelve, when he apostatised, took oath that the Saints had formed a "Destruction Company," as he called it, for the purpose of avenging themselves, and Orson Hyde, in a solemn affidavit swore that all that Marsh had said was true."

"Well dear," I said, "I've heard all that before, but no doubt it is all scandal."

"I'm afraid not," she replied; "for I have heard from people who ought to know, that since the Saints have been in Salt Lake Valley the same things have been done; only now they speak of those men as "Danites" and "Avenging Angels." People say that those who are dissatisfied and want to leave Zion, almost always are killed after they set out, by the Indians, and they dare not say boldly who they believe those "Indians" are. Then, too, one lady told me that she had heard from her sister that not only were apostates killed in a mysterious way by Indians or some one else, but that many people were "missing," or else found murdered, who were only suspected of being very weak in the faith. These things are horrible, and sometimes I think I will never go out to Zion."

I had heard these very same stories, and told her so; and I tried to make her believe that they were without foundation; but I could see that what she had heard had made a great impression on her mind. So I turned the conversation to other topics, and we talked over our plans and prospects for the future. Neither of us were very hopeful—she because she was undecided what course to pursue; I because of the shadow of coming sorrow which already began to darken my way. We tried, however, to comfort each other; and when she left I certainly felt more assured and hopeful. -

At this time I was left much alone, for my husband having no business in which to employ himself was sent by the Pastor of the London Conference to travel among the Saints; domestic comfort or the claims of a wife were never for a moment thought worthy of consideration. Then it was that I felt how lonely one may be in the midst of that Great City.

Towards the end of the year 1855, it was determined that a company of Mormon emigrants, numbering several hundreds, should leave Liverpool en route for Salt Lake City; and for that purpose a vessel was chartered early in November. This was not the ordinary season for emigration, but there were then in England numbers of the Saints, anxious to go to Zion, but too poor to pay their passage all the way. It was thought that when they arrived in New York they would have time to earn sufficient to carry them on, and it was then supposed they could join those who came over by the ordinary spring emigration. My husband and myself were counselled to join these emigrants in Liverpool and proceed at once to New York.

I was now strong enough to travel, and though far from well, and the prospect of such a journey in the middle of winter, was anything but cheering. My husband, however, who was anxious to go, smoothed away every difficulty, and it was resolved that this time we should "obey" counsel.

The reader may perhaps think me somewhat unreasonable in regarding such a journey as more than an ordinary annoyance; but he should remember that I am speaking of eighteen years ago. The passage across the Atlantic Ocean in mid-winter is anything but inviting even under the best of circumstances, but in the old days of sailing-vessels it was infinitely worse. The ocean-steamers now make the passage in from ten to fourteen days; but then a month was considered a good, quick passage for a sailing boat. Then too the modern accommodations—even for steerage passengers—bear no comparison with the frightful disorder and utter lack of comfort experienced in former times. All this ought to be taken into consideration when speaking of the early Mormon emigrants and the sacrifices which that people then made for their faith. There was the same difference between them and the snug little party which a year ago crossed the ocean under the guidance of the councillor Apostle G. A. Smith, and the childless versifier Eliza R. Snow, as there was between St. Paul braving the perils of shipwreck with the tempestuous Euroclydon, and the modern orthodox missionary with well-filled purse and comfortable outfit on board the magnificent steamers of the Mediterranean.

The Mormon emigration has always been a well-managed business; and, forming a united body, under the guidance of inspired leaders, the Mormons have never given so much trouble as ordinary passengers. At the time of which I speak, the emigration was on a much larger scale than at present; although even now several thousand converts arrive every summer in New York on their way to Utah. Now the journey from Liverpool to Salt Lake City is accomplished easily in less than a month;—then it required nine. The Saints used then to speak of Zion as being “a thousand miles from everywhere;” and when they went East they used to talk of “going to the States” as if they belonged to another nation:—but now the Great Pacific Railway has knit together the utmost limits of this vast country, and a journey to the Far West is only a pleasant summer tour.

Every presiding Elder in Britain is a Mormon Emigration-Agent:—unpaid, but no less effective. It is a part of his mission. The Elder presiding over “the office” at Liverpool—generally some favored Apostle—pockets all the profits of the transaction, and has but little trouble in return. The Saints are notified through the Star of the day when the vessel will sail, and are told to forward their emigration-money, or at least a portion of it;—as the Church risks nothing. The Apostle, being thus secured by the deposits, arranges with the shipping agent for the passage of a specified number of persons, and receives a very nice commission upon each emigrant—which commission is one of the chief perquisites of his office.

The Mormons in London were very kind to us before we left and did all they could to help us in preparing for our journey. A kinder people than the Saints in Europe could nowhere be found. My husband had been directed to take charge of the emigrants in the transit from London to Liverpool, and consequently I received no assistance from him. It seemed to me a very cruel arrangement for the Elders to take away from me and my helpless little ones the very person to whom we ought naturally to have turned for protection; but what were the feelings of a weak woman when they came in conflict with the “counsel” of inspired Apostles?

We arrived in Liverpool the same evening, and there my husband was relieved of the charge of the company, and some of the brethren were appointed to see that the baggage was safely transferred from the railway to the ship. Early the next morning we went on board, and it was not long before we began to experience the pleasures (?) of an emigrant life.

Before we set out for Liverpool, I had been told that on board ship I should be able to obtain all the help that I might desire; and anxious to provide for the comfort of the children, I engaged the services of two young girls to look after them and assist me generally. This was an imprudent step, as I afterwards found to my cost; but at the time I thought that I had made a very sensible arrangement. Help being secured, my next thought was to get our berths fixed, so that all might be ready before the rolling of the ship began. My first enquiries were for our bedding; but it was no where to be found. Now this was very annoying, for we were all tired and the children, poor things, were fidgetty; and anticipating a long and unpleasant voyage I wanted to have everything in readiness. Besides which I had made special preparations in the shape of many additional comforts which I knew on board ship would be absolutely necessary, and had even sold my watch and jewelry for that purpose.

I enquired of the proper authorities, but could obtain no information, and nothing remained but for me to wait until the Apostle came on board to bid a final adieu to the emigrants. I felt this annoyance all the more as I considered that we had no right to expect such mismanagement. We would naturally have preferred to make our own arrangements and to go alone, had we been permitted to do so; but we had, over and over again, been instructed not to go by any other vessel but that chartered by the Apostle Richards, that so we might escape the perils which were sure to overtake the Gentiles. Imagine our disgust when we found that as there were not enough of the Saints to occupy the whole ship, the lower deck was filled with Irish emigrants of the most barbarous type, and that their luggage and ours had been thrown together indiscriminately into the hold. Most of the Mormon emigrants recovered their property when they arrived at New York, but as for our own, personally, we never saw it again, and all the voyage through we were left utterly destitute.

The Apostle Richards and Pastor Kimball came on board before the vessel sailed and I told them all about it. We could not possibly put to sea in that condition, I said, and I wanted to leave the ship. He promised that the things should be looked after, and assured me that on no account should we be permitted to sail without being properly provided for. I not only trusted their word as gentlemen but I believed in them as favored servants of God ; and when subsequently I found that they had wilfully deceived me I became conscious that there was as little of the true and truthful gentleman about some of the modern Apostles, as there was of the apostle about ordinary gentlemen.

Thus in the cold, foggy days of an English November we set out, bereft of the commonest necessities, and deceived by our own leaders, to begin a new life in a new world.

I would not for my own sake mention these unpleasant reminiscences were it not that so many mean and cruel deceptions—and, were it not that I do not care to use harsh words, I might call downright "swindles"—had come beneath my observation in connection with the Mormon emigration in past years. I will mention one alone which ought not to be passed by unnoticed.

In the year 1854, Brigham Young and the leading Elders were most anxious to draw to Zion the converts from every part of the globe ; and for this purpose the faithful were called upon to bring in freely their contributions to the Perpetual Emigration Fund. To set them an example, Brother Brigham himself stated that he would present as a free-gift his own property—a valuable city house and lot, if any purchaser could be found wealthy enough to purchase it. An English gentleman named Tenant, a new convert, accepted the offer and advanced the money—thirty thousand dollars—and set out for Salt Lake City, expecting there to be put in possession of the property. He was one of the unfortunate Hand-Cart Emigrants, of whom I shall presently have occasion to speak more fully ; and he died on the plains. His wife and children, when they arrived in the Valley, were told that the transaction was not made with them but with Mr. Tenant, and all their efforts to obtain the property, which in common justice was theirs, were unavailing. At the present moment Mr. Tenant's wife lives in miserable poverty in Salt Lake City, while there is no one to bring the honest Prophet to account.

The vessel sailed, and we heard no more of our property. Whether it ever left London, or whether some obliging brother took charge of it on his own account, I cannot say, but I could form a pretty good guess. I frequently see that man in Salt Lake City, and I always think of my bedding when I see him. Nothing, however, remained but for me to put the best face I could upon matters. I took my wearing apparel and other articles out of the trunks and put them into pillow slips, and extemporised as well as I could a rough substitute for beds. These served for the children, and I covered them with my cloaks and shawls; and for our own berths and bed-covering I had only a few pieces of carpet which I had put aside for the cabin floor, together with a worn-out blanket which an old lady on board was good enough to lend me.

We had not been long at sea when the young sisters whom I had engaged to help me, fell sick, and some of the brethren were very anxious to nurse them. This appeared to be quite the established order of things, for I then found that it was very seldom that a Mormon emigrant ship crossed the ocean without one or more marriages on board. It was, no doubt, very interesting to them, but to me it was extremely inconvenient, especially considering that my husband had now taken to his berth, which he did not leave during the remainder of the voyage, and myself and the children were not much better off.

Sick as I was, I had to prepare our food, and manage everything, for in those times emigrants either took out their own provisions or were allowanced in raw material, and in either case had to do their own cooking. My chief difficulty was in getting what I had prepared to the fire-galley, for I could not leave the children, and I was afraid to venture myself upon deck. So I got any of the brethren who chanced to be passing to take it up, and of course they were willing to oblige me; but the galley was so crowded—every one having his or her own interests to attend to—that I very rarely, if ever, had my provisions decently cooked, and on more than one occasion I never saw them again. This was an inconvenience which modern emigrants do not suffer at the present day.

Unsuccessful with the young sisters, I thought I would try if I could not get one of the brethren to help me, and fortune at first appeared to favor me. There was on board a young man—Harry, they called him,—and he was so situated that I found it easy to open a negotiation with him. He had been a saddler's apprentice in a country town in England, and having listened to some itinerant preacher, had been converted, joined the Church, and begun to think for himself. So hearing that terrible judgments were quickly coming upon the Old World, he resolved to flee to the New, and in his hurry to get there he forgot to inform his master that he was about to leave. This accounted for his being so badly provided for.

Now, Harry had those two great blessings—a splendid appetite and unimpeachable powers of digestion. I will not say that he enjoyed these two blessings, for that he did not, on account of lacking a third blessing, namely, the wherewithal to make the first two blessings a pleasure, and not an inconvenience. The ship's allowance was altogether insufficient for him, and he, therefore, gladly engaged to do what few things I required upon condition that I should add a little to his own private commissariat.

Harry was a smart lad and at first very useful, and he soon convinced me that he had told the truth when he said that he had not had enough to eat ever since he came on board—it seemed to me very questionable whether he ever had before. He had, however, nothing to complain of in that respect while in our employment, for although the children were able to eat whenever we had anything fit for them, my husband and myself could seldom touch our rations, and as everything that was not used fell to Harry's share, he fared pretty well.

Harry was not the lad to neglect his own interests, and as our interests appeared just then to be his also, matters worked very harmoniously. Our bread was never now brought back to us half raw or burnt to a cinder. It must be properly cooked for our eating or it would not do for Harry's, and as for it being lost or delayed on its way to or from the galley that was, of course, quite out of the question. But the strangest thing of all connected with Harry was that immediately after his coming we were incessantly annoyed by the rats. I had brought for the children's use a small supply of preserves and other little delicacies; but these mysteriously disappeared with alarming rapidity, and whenever I saved any trifle for the children to eat between meals, that also was gone when it was wanted, and in every instance Harry suggested that it was "the rats," though I never could find any traces of those interesting animals. I was sorry to part with Harry, for he used to tell funny stories to the children, and amused them a great deal, but "the rats" and Harry were so closely associated in my mind that I thought if Harry left, the rats might perhaps also cease their visits. So Harry went, and I was once more left alone to do the best I could.

The weather was very cold, and though we wore our clothing day and night, we felt its severity very much. The rigging of the ship was hung with icicles, and without fire or warmth of any sort, it is no wonder that we all were soon hardly able to move from cold and sickness. I have heard emigrants who came over in steam-vessels say that even in mid-winter the heat in their berths was almost unendurable; but in a sailing-vessel there were, of course, no engine fires to warm the ship, and the passengers suffered accordingly.

In the midst of my trouble I was told of an ancient Scotch sister—a maiden lady, sharp and shrewd,—who, like the miser in Scott's "Fortunes of Nigel," was willing to help us "for a consideration." So we talked the matter over, and it was agreed that she should give me her services for the remainder of the voyage; and the "consideration" was to be two pounds English. Small as was our stock of money, and much as I knew we should need it upon our arrival, I felt that I could do no better than engage her. There was no saying upon whom she might chance to set her maiden fancy, but there was not the remotest chance of any of the brethren falling in love with her; so I considered her a safe investment, and, besides, I must have somebody—there was no alternative.

It was now Christmas time—a season which in England was always sacred to joyous memories and festivities ; but to us, exiles and wanderers, seeking a land of which we knew nothing, and which to us was a new and untried world, it was far from being a happy time. In the midst of the wild, dreary ocean there was nothing to recall the pleasant reminiscences of the past, or to inspire us with hope and courage as we thought of the future.

The Captain told us that we might prepare to eat our Christmas dinner in New York ; but he was mistaken. I can form no opinion of the captain as a seaman, but as a man I detested him for his cruel treatment of two unfortunate men who were under him. These men—one a Spaniard, and the other a Hungarian—had agreed to work out their passage to New York, but they were quite unfit for sea life. One of them when he refused or was unable to go up into the shrouds, was dragged aloft by main force, and there they tied him, and there they kept him until he was nearly frozen to death. On another occasion they beat both of these men with spikes, and I feared they would kill them, and their cries and groans right above my head were most painful to listen to. In fact, so badly were they treated that on their arrival they had to be carried to the hospital. Such was the “discipline” on board that ship.

The Captain was mistaken in his calculations. We did not eat our Christmas dinner in New York, as he had promised. A storm came on, which compelled us to stand out to sea again, and then a dead calm followed, and it was not until New Year's eve that we set foot upon the shore of the New World.

We were now three thousand miles nearer to Zion ; but my heart misgave me as I thought of the future, and the first New Year's day that I spent in the United States was anything but a day of pleasure to me.

LIFE IN NEW YORK:—CONDUCTING A MORMON PAPER.

VERY cold, and dark, and dreary, were the first days which we spent in the New World. That faith which once had led me to hope, and believe, and endure all things, was now powerless to nerve me to any new course of action for my religion's sake; for the dark shadow of Polygamy had come across my way; hope had fled, and my love, with the love of many other faithful Saints, had waxed cold.

To my husband and children I was, of course, devotedly attached, and was willing to combat any difficulty or endure any trial with them, or for their sake; and it was not long before my constancy was put to the test.

The Mormon emigrants have always a Captain and two “Counsellors” to every company. The Captain on board the Emerald Isle—the vessel in which we came—was a returning Utah Elder;—one of his Counsellors was also a returning Elder, and my husband was the other. As soon as the Mormon Captain had come on shore, and had reported to the Apostle in charge of the New York Saints, he left to visit his friends. The Utah Counsellor had a young lady in the company to whom he had become very much attached, and who afterward became one of his wives. I was not, therefore, surprised that, as soon as he could get his baggage, he also should disappear; but my husband—the other Counsellor—being encumbered with a wife and family, was obliged to remain, and the whole charge of seeing to the company devolved upon him.

We had, therefore, to remain in Castle Gardens until the whole company of emigrants was provided for; and during all the next week I, with my four children, remained in that public place, sick and weary, and as destitute of bedding and covering as we had been on board ship. The weather was intensely cold, and, unaccustomed as we were to the severity of an American winter, we suffered not a little. The other unfortunate victims to faith were in the same condition, with the exception that they had something to sleep on at nights, while I had nothing but the bare boards for my bed since we left Liverpool;—all that I could gather together had been reserved for my babes. How we lived through that journey I know not, but I am certain that, could I have foreseen what we should have to endure, I would never have left England, whatever my refusal might have cost me.

I could not refrain from contrasting my life before and since I knew Mormonism. Before, I scarcely knew what suffering was, so little had I been called upon to endure; I never knew what it was to be without money, or to want for anything; but now I was in a strange land, in the depth of winter, without a home, without a pillow to rest my weary head upon, and with a future before me so dark that not a single ray of light gave to it the promise of hope. Could any slavery be more complete than mine? My fanaticism and zeal were all gone—I had nothing to sustain me. Certainly, I was still held by the fear that Mormonism, after all, might be of God, and that all this suffering might be necessary for my salvation—but if at that time I had only had a friend whose mind was clear from all the nonsense of Mormonism, and who had felt sufficient interest in me to advise me for my good, I think even then I might have freed myself from the mental slavery in which I was bound. But I had no intercourse with any but Mormons; and, indeed, a wish to form Gentile friendships I should then have considered a sin.

A week after our arrival, my husband found time to seek for apartments for his family, and I was thankful to leave our miserable quarters at Castle Gardens.

The Mormon authorities had, meanwhile, given instructions to the other emigrants how to act, and they did little more than this. Those who had not found work or places to go to were ordered to leave the Gardens, and received permission to occupy an old dilapidated school-room in Williamsburgh, which had been used for preaching. I went there almost daily to see them, and therefore state what I saw as an eye-witness, and neither exaggerate nor misrepresent. There they huddled together about one hundred and fifty men, women and children. Most of the men had been respectable mechanics in their own country; many of them I had known personally and had visited in their cosy English homes; and their wives and families had been decently brought up. What they must have suffered under this change of circumstances I leave the reader to guess.

In that miserable place they lived day and night—the poor, dispirited mothers—many of them very sick—having to cook, and wash, and perform all the necessary domestic duties, round two small sheet-iron stoves. It was not long before the place became like a pest-house from so many being confined in so small a place, and breathing the same fetid and pestilential atmosphere, and many of the young children died of an epidemic which was raging among them.

They had saved some of their ship's provisions, and that was all they had to eat, and it did not last long. To me it was most distressing to witness so much misery without being able to render any assistance, particularly to see the poor little children shivering and crying with hunger and cold, while many of their mothers were in such a miserable state of apathy that they paid little or no attention to them. I often tried to awaken in them feelings of human sympathy, but I was met with a murmur of discontent—the people, men and women alike—seemed to be utterly demoralised. Nor can this be a matter of wonder; for in England the men had been told that—while at home they could only earn four or five shillings a day, and would never be able to put by enough to carry them all the way to Utah—in New York they would be able to earn two-and-a-half to three, and even four dollars a day—equal to from ten to sixteen shillings English—and that employers would even come on board ship anxious to engage them. Thus they had by false statements been allured from their homes and plunged into the most abject poverty. Day by day they went out seeking work, but finding none, willing to do anything to provide bread for their families, but returning nightly, unsuccessful, to their starving wives and children.

My own resources were gone. I could do nothing. When we left Castle Garden I think we only had about five dollars left, while the heavy snow which covered the ground and the intense cold promised many weeks of unusual severity. Needing so greatly pity myself, how I sympathised with those poor sufferers, how I pitied them!

In the midst of all this, the Apostle John Taylor learned that some of these poor souls had been seen begging. So he came from his comfortable boarding-house in Brooklyn, well wrapped up in a handsome overcoat, and scolded these poor, starving creatures, and harangued them concerning the meanness of begging. With great swelling words he spoke of the dignity of the Saints of the Most High, and told them that he despised a Mormon who could fall to the level of a common street beggar.

Could he have heard the unspoken curses of the poor, wounded hearts of those who listened to him, as they thought of his brother "Apostle" in England, and of how he had deceived them and sent them into a strange country, in the depth of winter, to beg, to starve, or to steal, he would have learned that though the victim of a delusive faith may mentally submit to man-made creeds and priesthoods, in his heart he will judge, not so much the words he hears as the man who utters them.

MOCKED WITH WORDS.

J. SPEER, SC.

The wisdom of the Apostle found out a remedy. He "counselled" the men and boys to buy shovels, and go forth into the streets and clean away the snow from the fronts of the doors and from the side-walks, and told them that they would thus get plenty of money to keep them until winter was over. One elderly brother, who had a little money left, bought a stock of shovels; but the emigrants found that there were plenty of others who were as eager as they for work, and who were much better acquainted with the way of obtaining it. The shovel experiment was a failure, and the poor old brother lost his money in the investment.

For whatever the Apostle Taylor may have contributed to these unfortunate persons—whether in "counsel," money, or provisions—he will doubtless have his reward; and, for aught I know, he may have been unable to give anything more than counsel; but, at the same time, my opinion of the value of counsel remains unchanged. There has been no lack of "counsel" or counsellors in the Mormon Church. "Counsel" has been given in abundance to all, and by no means always for the benefit of those who received it. It was not, however, because he failed to assist them practically that the people hated the Apostle Taylor, and have hated him ever since, but it was for his pride and arrogance, and the way in which he dared to talk to free-born Englishmen and Englishwomen about the dignity of the Priesthood, and the contempt in which he held them in the hour of their humiliation and distress—for that they hated him.

I do not, of course, wish to justify the people in begging; such conduct would have been despicable if they could have found employment of any sort. But when I saw the starving condition of those men and their helpless families, in that wretched school-house, in my heart I almost honored them for having the courage to beg; and I thanked God that the "mean Yankee Gentiles"—as the Elders taught the Saints to call American citizens who did not believe in Mormonism—were able and willing to assist them.

One of those emigrants very recently related to me some of the painful circumstances through which he passed at that time. He told me that he walked the streets of Williamsburgh for three days and three nights without a mouthful of anything to eat, or a place to lay his head;—he could obtain no work, and at length, in sheer desperation, he was forced to beg. The Church authorities knew well the misery of the people, but took no adequate steps to alleviate it.

During the first weeks after our arrival in New York city we had nothing to depend upon but the provisions which we had saved from the ship's rations. I had known what it was to be in a foreign country without money and without food; and on board ship I took care of our rations when they were not consumed by Harry or "the rats;" for I thought that if I did not need them—which, indeed, I sincerely hoped might be the case—I could certainly find some one who would be thankful for them. These rations consisted chiefly of sugar that was almost black; very bad black tea, which when made looked like dye; the poorest kind of sea-biscuit; and other things accordingly. The provisions for the Mormon emigrants were purchased in bulk by the Church authorities, who made their own profits out of them, and the Apostle at Liverpool had the benefit of all that could be saved out of them during the voyage. It was commonly said among the people that the sight of them alone was quite sufficient for any one who was not half-starved; and yet they had paid the price of the best.

We had been in New York several weeks when one day my husband called at the office of a paper called The Mormon, and there met with the Apostle Taylor who conducted that paper. The Apostle expressed great regret that Mr. Stenhouse should be without occupation at that season of the year, and with a family of children upon his hands. This sympathy coming from a brother Missionary was, I thought, very tardy, for my husband had then devoted over ten years of his life to the cause, and his record in the Church had been untarnished. The Apostle was living in an elegant house surrounded by every comfort and luxury, while he knew that we had not so much as a chair, or even a bed to lie upon. What had he done for the Church more than my husband had done? Indeed, I firmly believe that he had not endured half as much, but—he was an Apostle! His unhelping sympathy appeared to me a little more than questionable.

He told my husband that he might come into the office of The Mormon, and write the addresses on the wrappers, and that he would give him a few dollars a week “to help things along,” until something better presented itself. My husband thought this a disinterested action on the part of the Apostle John Taylor, but my experience in Mormonism led me to be distrustful and suspicious of everything that an Elder or Apostle said or did. This offer, however, came when we really had nothing to look to, and dared not refuse any assistance that was offered, however small it might be. But I must allow that my ideas of Apostolic liberality were very much shocked when at the end of the week Mr. Stenhouse informed me that he had been allowed four dollars for his services, and that out of that magnificent sum the Apostle John Taylor had deducted twenty-five cents which sheer necessity had compelled him to borrow for the week’s ferriage.

The Apostle-editor had two assistants from Utah with him in the “Mormon” office—the one a “Seventy,” and the other a “High-Priest”—terms and titles which I shall presently explain. A few weeks after my husband entered the office, the “Seventy” who had charge of getting out the paper was allowed to return to Zion. The High-Priest remained in the Eastern States visiting alternately the various branches of the Church, and doing some very zealous courting with a young English girl who lived in Williamsburgh, while his two unsuspecting wives at home in Salt Lake City were earnestly praying the Lord to bless him in his “mission.”

Whatever the Apostle may have thought of his associate, he could not very well remonstrate with him, for he himself was, and had been for some time, doing a good deal in that line with an amiable Connecticut girl, and was only waiting for special permission from Brigham Young, to add her to the half-dozen wives he already had in Utah.

There was, moreover, another High-Priest attached to that office, but no one seemed to understand his exact position. To all appearance his principal occupation was travelling from New York to Connecticut and from Connecticut back again to New York. He was a very robust-looking man, but it was reported that he was troubled with heart-disease, and that the purer air of Connecticut was a great relief to him. This I fully believed when, some time after, I discovered that the young lady engaged to the Apostle had a charming sister, for I thought it very probable that she rendered no small assistance to the Connecticut air in giving relief to his diseased heart.

My husband not being at that particular time under the influence of "heart-disease," soon became very useful on the editorial staff. In fact, pretty well everything was left to him, and not unfrequently for two or three days he saw nothing of the Apostle or either of his associates, and the whole responsibility of getting out the paper—at the magnificent salary of four dollars a week!—rested upon him. He was told that he must regard it as a mission and be prepared to act accordingly.

In course of time, however, the visits to Connecticut came to an end. The Apostle obtained Brother Brigham's permission to practice a little Polygamy among the Gentiles, and Miss Young made him an excellent housekeeper in a handsomely furnished house in Brooklyn. The poor High-Priest and the Seventy did not fare so well: they were expected to wait until they reached Zion. The two young ladies to whom they were engaged were amiable and good girls who would without doubt have met with excellent husbands either in or out of the Church; but the name of an Apostle or High-Priest—when the men themselves were away from home—carried with it many charms, and won the hearts of the young ladies and their friends. The Apostle was, of course, well used to the training of wives in the "celestial order," and when he returned home with his youngest bride he suffered no particular inconvenience. But the High-Priests realised the truth of the adage "the course of true love never did run smooth." The first wife of one of them refused to have anything to do with his new bride, and kept him at a respectful distance from herself then and ever afterwards ; while the first wife of the other declined to acknowledge the claims of her youthful rival. The first High-Priest has gone to heaven ; the other, in the course of time, gave a bill of divorce to his young wife. What happiness either of these three girls found in Polygamy, they best know, but the young widow appears decidedly the happiest of the three.

I had heard so much while in London about men taking wives "from principle" and that, after the first wife, they made no open display of their love, but I could not see that they differed in the slightest from their Gentile brethren in that respect ; the Utah Elders, of whom I have spoken, always seemed to me very human. In all Polygamic courtships that I have since witnessed, the brethren have appeared to think that the "Lord's" revelation was a trifle too slow in arranging affairs of the heart, and they have very zealously prepared for its coming. In some instances the revelation has come too late, and in many others it would have been very disastrous if it had not come at all. In all cases it may be safely asserted that all that has been said about getting the consent of the first wife and obtaining a revelation from the Lord as to whether it is pleasing in His sight for a man to take another wife, or not—is purely folly and nonsense. Brigham Young is the only "lord" who has ever been consulted on that question. If he acknowledged this to the people and they chose to abide by it, they alone would be to blame ; but it is the grossest of frauds for men claiming to be the representatives of Jesus Christ to play upon the credulity of an honest people, trifling with the most sacred subjects, and telling them that God answers by special revelation and declares whether or not it is His will that each of these plural marriages should take place. The Apostles and Elders themselves are not deceived. They know well enough that there is no truth in all this mockery ; they know that the only source of all their revelations is the man Brigham Young.

CHAPTER XIV.

SAINTLY PILGRIMS ON THE WAY—THE “DIVINE” HAND-CART SCHEME.

ONE Sunday morning in early spring, I attended a meeting of the Saints in Williamsburgh.

My husband was there and took part in the service, and so did the Apostle Taylor, and one or two other Utah Elders. I went to that meeting in a very desponding state of mind, for our prospects since the day of our arrival had not brightened very much, and I felt the need of some comforting and cheering words.

Whether it was the influence of the clear spring morning, or that the Elders had noticed the depression of spirit among the Saints, I cannot tell, but I know that on that particular occasion their words seemed to me more earnest and encouraging than they had been for a long time past.

As we came out from the meeting, Brother Benton, one of the Elders, stepped up to my husband and said: "Brother Stenhouse, they are expected to arrive to-night or to-morrow; I suppose you will be down at the "Gardens," to meet them."

I knew well enough who "they" were who were expected to arrive, and so did Mr. Stenhouse. "Yes," he said, "of course I shall be there, but most likely we shall have to wait a few days before they come." Then he stopped and talked over the matter with Elder Benton.

Now it chanced that at that time Brigham Young was trying an experiment. The "Prophet of the Lord" sometimes finds it necessary—notwithstanding the "revelations" which he is supposed to receive—to try experiments like other men before he can feel sure that his plans are likely to succeed. The only difference between him and other men is, that he—knowing himself that his plans are his own inventions, or the inventions of the leaders—gives out that they come direct from God, thereby deceiving the ignorant, innocent, and confiding people; and when his plans fail, as they often do, he never confesses that he is wrong or mistaken, but lays all the blame on some other person, or, failing that, on "the Lord" or the devil. Other men, as a rule, say nothing about the "Lord" or devil, but when their experiments fail, they frankly confess that they themselves were not inspired, but were liable to err. That is all the difference.

In the present instance Brigham Young tried an experiment upon a rather large scale.

Up to the year 1856, the Mormon emigrants made the journey from the Frontiers across the Plains by ox-teams, as I have already described, and every season some of the wealthier Mormons formed themselves into an independent company, paid their own expenses, and travelled with more comfort. The expense to the poorer emigrants was very small, for they performed the greater part of the journey on foot—the ox-teams being used for transporting provisions and baggage—one hundred pounds of the latter being allowed to each emigrant.

This "plan" was, so far, a success, and the settlements of the Saints increased thereby slowly but surely, in population and wealth. There were, however, at that time thousands of Saints in Europe anxious to emigrate, but who were too poor to provide the small sum requisite for that purpose. During the winter of 1855, this difficulty was discussed in Conference by Brigham and the leading men in Salt Lake, and some one suggested what was afterwards known as the "Hand-Cart Scheme." The idea of this "scheme" was to transfer the people from Liverpool to the Frontiers in the cheapest possible way, and for them then to cross the Plains with light-made hand-carts, just strong enough to carry the fewest possible necessary articles, but sufficiently light for the men, women, and even young girls, to draw them.

This "plan" would not perhaps have been a bad one if it had been properly carried out, and if Brigham Young had seen, as he might have done, that suitable preparations were made beforehand. But the Hand-Cart Emigration Scheme began with a lie and ended in ruin.

The confiding Saints were told that "God" had specially inspired His servant Brigham for this purpose, and the scheme was a revelation direct from on high. No proper measures were taken to provide for the emigrants—all was done upon faith—faith on the part of the people in their—as they supposed—inspired leaders; deception on the part of those leaders towards the people, whose only fault was that they trusted them too well.

The Millennial Star proclaimed the "plan" to the Saints in Europe, and so great was the response to this special summons that in that year—1856—it was roughly estimated that no fewer than five or six thousand Mormon emigrants travelled from Liverpool to Salt Lake City. It was the first company of these emigrants that Brother Benton alluded to when he told Mr. Stenhouse that "they" were expected that night or the next; but in those days emigrant vessels were frequently delayed by adverse winds and other circumstances, and no one could calculate upon the exact time of their arrival in port.

The following morning, my husband when he returned from the Mormon office, brought with him a letter bearing the English postmark and addressed to me in the neat unmistakeable handwriting of Mary Burton. I had been waiting and watching for a letter from her ever since our arrival ; I was anxious to hear from her, and I hastily tore it open, so impatient was I to know how she was getting on. What I read interested me deeply, though it did not surprise me. I had seen Mary many times after the interview which I have already related, and our conversations and discussions were to us of all-absorbing interest ; but as they were mostly personal, I have not cared to record them in this narrative. To tell the truth, her love affairs with Elder Shrewsbury occupied more and more the most prominent place in all our discussions. His enthusiasm was perfectly infectious. As long as Mary absolutely refused to see him, her love for him and her faith in Mormonism were anything but overpowering. But Elder Shrewsbury was one of those peculiar persons who have a sort of magnetic charm about them, who without our knowing it, or even, in some instances, contrary to our will and reason, enlist all our sympathies and leave behind them an impression that we vainly try to efface. He only wanted opportunity and his success was sure.

Opportunity he had had for pressing his suit with Mary and making an impression upon her heart, ever since the day when they had met at my door, and had taken that walk together, as Mary said, for the purpose of discussing important matters.

Now the letter which I received opened to me another chapter in Mary's life which, without the gift of prophecy, I might have easily predicated. Elder Shrewsbury's patience and perseverance met with their due reward, and Mary at length promised to become his wife ;—but fascinated though she was, and herself almost as deeply in love as he was, she nevertheless made one condition which showed that she had not entirely lost that prudence and determination which she had shown in the early days of their courtship:—

"When he spoke to me in that way,—you know how, Sister Stenhouse"—she said in her impulsive way :—"How could I persist in saying No to him?" It wasn't in my heart to do so. I didn't say "Yes" in so many words, but I simply said nothing, and he took my silence for consent. Then———but no, I won't even tell you everything I know he thought he was going to have it all his own way; but I didn't think so. I told him then that I had firmly resolved upon one thing—that I never would marry him unless he made a solemn vow and promise before God that he would never enter into Polygamy. I could not hide from him that I loved him—he knew it and could see it; but I said I never would go to Utah alone, and I certainly never would marry at the risk of my husband taking another wife. No; I was willing to give him my heart, my all—it was only fair for him to do the same by me. He was very near me then; and my hand was in his; and he was looking up into my eyes. Then he whispered the promise I had asked of him, and, dear Sister Stenhouse, I know I can depend upon his word. We shall be happier in this world by ourselves, and we feel quite sure that God will not ask us to do anything in heaven that would make us miserable. Perhaps I oughtn't to say this, but I'm so happy that I cannot allow myself one single wretched doubt about the future or my husband, such as I used to have.

We were married on the 27th of January.

And now we are getting ready for Zion, and are busy day and night. Of course you have heard of the "Divine Plan"—the Hand-Cart Scheme. Oh, Sister Stenhouse, I am so very, very much ashamed of myself for all the wicked things that I used to say about the Apostles and the Elders. Since our marriage, Elder Shrewsbury has explained everything to me and set things in their right light. It is a glorious privilege for us to be permitted to gather to Zion, and now that I know my dear husband will never even think of another besides myself, I glory in the thought of leaving the Gentile world and all its wickedness.

We go with the first company this season.

I will tell you all the rest of the news when I meet you, dear "

So Mary Burton was married, and coming with the Hand-Cart Company. "Why," I said, turning to my husband "they'll be here in a day or two now."

"Perhaps to-day," he replied.

They did not, however, arrive either that day or the next; but towards the end of the week we were told that their vessel was in the river, and I accompanied my husband to Castle Gardens to see them.

A strange spectacle was presented to our view. More than six hundred Mormon emigrants were gathered there, all on their way to Zion, and burning with zeal and enthusiasm worthy of a better cause. There were aged men and women, whose heads were hoary with the snows of many a winter, and whose tottering steps had borne them to the verge of three score years and ten; there were stout-hearted fathers of families, and matrons with sons and daughters growing up around them; there were young men in the pride and strength of manhood; and maidens in the modest blush of womanly beauty; and little toddling children, and babes in their mother's arms—all obedient to what they thought was the command of God Himself—all with their faces set steadfastly and anxiously Zionward.

Let not the reader smile at the blind infatuation of those poor emigrants. Would he or she have suffered so confidently—so faithfully—for his or her religion? They might be mistaken; but truly theirs was a faith which “hoped all things, believed all things, endured all things.” Surely, in His sight—who judges the heart—the blind obedience of those men and women who were ready to suffer and to endure unto the bitter end, because in their child-like faith they thought it was His holy will—such practical devotion was more truly acceptable than the formal professions of an untested faith which orthodox professors are so ready to make.

I met at Castle Gardens many whom I had known in the old country; but it was one particular face which I was anxious to see. A man wrapped in a thick great-coat, and with a fur cap upon his head, brushed against me; and before I had time to raise my eyes, my hand was grasped in his, and I heard Mary's husband say “Oh Sister Stenhouse, I'm so glad to see you: I knew we should meet you in New York. Come and see Mary. She's my Mary now!”

I went with Elder Shrewsbury and I saw Mary. But oh, how greatly was she changed! When I returned from our Swiss mission and saw her, after an interval of several years, I was, of course, struck with the alteration which had then transformed her from a pretty little fairy-like girl into a decorous young lady contemplating matrimony; but although I had now been absent from England only a few months, I observed a much more striking alteration in her than on the previous occasion. It was not now, I thought, so much an outward and personal change, as a new development of her inner consciousness—her soul itself. Her form was as graceful, and her eyes as bright as ever; but from those eyes there now shone forth another light than that which I had thought so charming in the by-gone time.

Her affection for me was as warm and demonstrative as when we first met:—She recognised me in a moment, before her husband had time to say a word; and, throwing both her arms round me, she kissed me again and again with all the effusion of her childish days. Taking my hand she led me gently into a quiet corner and seated me beside her upon a big trunk, and then she began to talk. It was the same soft sweet voice again, which used to be so dear to me when I was left all alone in Southampton, soon after my marriage, while my husband was on mission in Italy.

She told me all the story of her courtship—all, and much more than she had told me in her letter. But it was when she came to speak of her marriage, of her husband, and especially of their pilgrimage to Utah that I observed more especially the change which had taken place in her. She was no longer the light-hearted girl, half-doubting her strange religion, and rejecting it altogether when it did not coincide with her own ideas and wishes. No: Elder Shrewsbury—had he been ten times a Mormon Elder—could not have wished for a more obedient, a more earnest, I might say—a more fanatical believer than was now to be found in his young and beautiful wife. Her eyes really glowed with enthusiasm as she spoke of “the work of the Lord” and of “gathering to Zion;” and her voice, though soft and sweet as ever, had in it, now and then, a tinge of sternness which told of a determination and spirit which the casual observer would never have suspected.

I expressed some surprise that she and her husband, not being without funds, should have gone with the Hand-Cart Company when they might have waited and have gone with so much more comfort with one of the independent companies.

"Why, Sister Stenhouse," she said, "We have done it as a matter of faith. Certainly we could have afforded to go in any way we chose, but my husband said we ought to be an example to the poorer saints ; so we gave away nearly all our money to help the emigration fund, and then we came, just as you see us, along with the rest."

"But the danger and discomfort is so great," I suggested. "Surely the Lord does not want us to sacrifice ourselves when no one is benefitted by it?"

"Not a bit," said she, "there's no danger, Sister Stenhouse, and if there were it would only please me all the more. As for discomfort, why we should have had that any way, and we both glory in making sacrifices. Besides which, we have been told by the Apostle that this will be the most pleasant and successful journey across the plains that has ever been made."

"I am a little doubtful of the promises of Apostles and Elders," I said, "and I remember, Mary, when you used to agree with me."

"I know I did," she answered, "but Brother Shrewsbury has shown me how wrong I was—I never doubt now. But I think you have a wrong notion about this hand-cart scheme. It is not an ordinary plan such as any man might have made. God Himself revealed this plan to Brigham, and in fact we call it 'the divine plan' in our songs. Oh, you should hear our songs! They're a little rough, but the singing is so earnest and the voices of the men and girls blend so well together that I know you'd like them. There's only one thing that I don't like about this plan, and that I daresay is all right if only I knew it."

"I think, Mary," I said, "I could tell you a good deal that you wouldn't like if you knew it."

"No, dear," she replied hastily, as if afraid to hear me, "don't tell me unpleasant matters. I'll tell you all I meant. The Prophet and Heber C. Kimball, and Jedediah Grant counselled the richer emigrants to give as much as they could—all their property, if they had faith enough—to help the poor brethren to emigrate; but the American Elders had private instructions—so Brother Shrewsbury told me—to use the money to help out all the unmarried girls who are willing to go. I confess that this troubled me not a little; but my husband says that when we get to Zion we shall find all will be right, and of course I believe him.”

Mary's conversation puzzled me a good deal at the time. She had formerly been so clear-sighted and so unbiassed by prejudice, and now she seemed ready to believe anything. All her husband's enthusiasm was now her own; she saw with his eyes, and in the intensity of her love for him she believed all that he accepted as true. Long after, when I thought of that short interview, I called to mind her impulsive earnestness, and I felt that a secret misgiving, unconsciously to herself, was partly the cause of it. Unknown to herself her excess of zeal was the offspring of doubt.

Life in the future was in anticipation to my poor friend one long day of hope and happiness. She could not see the shadow of a cloud—no coming sorrow darkened her way. Zion, to her excited imagination, was the abode of peace, and sanctity, and unchanging joy.

I asked her whether the Saints in England had heard any of those strange reports about Brigham Young defying the Government, which had attracted so much attention in this country.

“Certainly,” she said, “it is because the day is so very near when all intercourse between God's people and the Gentile world shall be cut off for ever that these great efforts are being made to gather the Saints to Zion. Of course you know this, but I don't think you know all. Why, at the last general conference in Liverpool, the president had instructions from Salt Lake to propose Brigham Young as ‘prophet, seer, revelator, and King!’”

“King?” I said, “How can President Young ever be ‘king?’ Utah is part of the territory of the States, and under their jurisdiction ; it is not even a State itself yet, and Congress has refused to sanction the name of Deseret. This country will never suffer a kingdom to be set up in Utah ; you must be misinformed, Sister Mary."

"No, Sister Stenhouse," she exclaimed, "I am under no mistake. My husband assured me that the conference accepted the proposition, and that it was received unanimously. The Saints are gathering in from all parts of the world, and when war is declared they will not be found unprepared. Why, here on board with us, the American Elders are all provided with swords and revolvers of the very best make that could be got for love or money, and I myself have heard them say that Brigham Young intends shortly to declare his independence of the United States. We didn't know this before we left England, but we felt sure that he had some great purpose in view which had been revealed to him."

"Before we left," I said, "the Saints were all eager to emigrate."

"Yes, dear," she answered, "but nothing like they are now. You have no idea how excited and anxious everybody is. Some of the people, in order to obey counsel, sold their watches and jewelry, and even their best clothes, scarcely keeping enough for the journey, and every one who had any money gave it away. Brigham Young set a noble example in that ; even the Gentiles would admire him if they knew all. Why, we had on board ship with us Brother Tenant, the rich, new convert who paid thirty thousand dollars for the property which Brigham Young so generously gave to help the Emigration Fund. He hardly had enough left to carry him and his family to Zion ; and now he is going to cross the Plains with us, to settle in Salt Lake City. He is somewhere here among the emigrants, I believe, at the present moment, and you could ask him all about it if you liked. The brethren assure him that Brother Brigham is so liberal that he will get vastly more than the value of his thirty thousand dollars when he reaches Zion, and I hope he will, for I like both him and his wife."

All this was thus far true, but it was with some misgivings that I heard Mary talk about it. Still I tried to persuade myself that it was a sin to doubt. How little did either of us imagine that after poor Mr. Tenant's miserable death upon the Plains we should live to see his wife—destitute and defrauded of her property by generous-hearted Brigham—dragging out a miserable existence in Zion, and dependent even for a crust of bread upon the kindness of the brethren. And yet, as I previously stated in another place, this was how the Prophet, under the mask of liberality, contrived, for his own purposes, to cheat this unfortunate and too-confiding Saint.

Then we talked of what more nearly interested ourselves, and Mary asked me when Mr. Stenhouse and myself were coming out. I told her that it was quite uncertain, but that we expected to before long. "At any rate you will come out before the season is over," she said.

"Most likely so," I replied, "but you will be safely there and settled before we arrive."

How little did she imagine the fearful scenes she was to witness—the terrible sufferings she was to endure before the season she spoke of had passed away. Could I at that time have known all, I would have prayed that sooner than set out on that fearful journey she might find refuge in the grave from the horrors which, unknown to her, were brooding over her way.

We talked long, and then my husband joined us—Elder Shrewsbury was called away by some necessary duty—and when we parted it was with many promises to write frequently to each other of our common religious interests, as well as the welfare of ourselves and those we loved. Then I spoke with several other old friends, and we exchanged greetings with all sorts of people, for my husband wherever he goes is always sure to be upon speaking terms with almost everybody he meets.

The Hand-Cart Company left New York for Utah—a long and formidable journey at best—but in that instance, through mismanagement and neglect, one of the most fatal expeditions that imprudent man has ever undertaken ; and it was not until months and months had passed away, and another season had come round that we heard anything of their fate.

And time went on, but my troubles did not lighten. My husband still continued to work at the Mormon office, and after a while his salary was slightly increased from time to time ; but still his earnings were altogether inadequate for the support of a family, and I found it absolutely necessary to obtain some employment for myself. It cost me many a long and weary day of search and enquiry, and many a battle with my pride before I could get anything to do, but at last I was successful, and although my little ones required constant attention, I contrived to add a very decent quota to the scanty family purse.

And thus matters continued until the following year—our life of uncertainty and care unchanged. Little in my life at that time is worth recording : to me it was one long, painful struggle, and any change which could come, I felt must be for the better. My experience of Mormonism was of course enlarged as new facts presented themselves to my observation, and by nothing was my faith so much shaken as by the discrepancies between the written and spoken Mormonism which was presented with fair face to the European Saints and the world at large, and the actual conduct of the Elders.

From the first moment when Polygamy was announced, the leaders had strictly forbidden the missionaries to enter into any alliances with the sisters abroad, or to make any proposals of marriage to them, or to enter into any matrimonial covenants. In the language of Heber C. Kimball—Brigham's first counsellor—they were "not to pick out from the flock the young, fair, and tender lambs," but were to bring them all safely home to Zion.

This counsel was all very well, for it tended to keep the Elders out of mischief, and afforded an opportunity to the brethren at home to select more, and more youthful wives from the fair converts who were gathered in to Zion. But the missionaries found it very irksome to obey this counsel, and in point of fact, those who did so formed a very small minority.

One of the Missionaries who had just returned from Europe came one day to our house in New York, and brought a youthful sister with him. He was by no means a handsome man or prepossessing in his appearance, but I saw at once that he had succeeded in obtaining considerable influence over the young sister's mind. He said she was not very happy, and he wanted her to stay with some respectable family for a week or two until they set out for Utah, and I agreed that she should stay with us.

She began to play with the children, and took one of them in her arms in a way which attracted my attention, for I noticed that tears were in her eyes, and she excited my sympathy. I asked her as gently and as delicately as I could what was the matter with her, and what her sorrow was, and she told me that she herself had two little ones at home and was wretched at being parted from them. She had obeyed counsel, and had left her husband and a happy home to go to Zion. She loved them all dearly, but deluded by false teachings, and promises that she should soon have her children again, she had stolen away and left them all.

I reasoned with her, tried to make her see how wrongly she had acted, and persuaded her to return to her husband and seek his forgiveness. No ; it was all in vain. The salvation of her soul she thought was beyond all earthly considerations ; she must stifle the suggestions of her heart within her ; she must hasten to Zion. Thus she left me, and like many another victim, I never expected to see her again.

One morning, a few months later, I was astonished to receive a visit from her. After expressing my pleasure at seeing her once more, she told me that what I said had so impressed her that when the emigrants had arrived at St. Louis she had refused to proceed any further on the journey, had written to her husband, had made all right with him, and was now on her way back to her home in England.

My story is so full of painful reminiscences, that it is with pleasure that I record this incident—one of the rare cases in which folly was not succeeded by utter ruin and misery. Alas, how many instances I might mention, which fell beneath my own personal observation, of wives and mothers led away by the delusive doctrines which they mistook for inspiration, and who sought vainly, through years of misery, for peace and rest, until at length they found it in the darkness of the tomb.

Towards the end of the year 1857, the difficulties in Utah, and a financial panic in New York, resulted in the discontinuance of the Mormon. My husband was thus thrown out of employment, and to add to our difficulties, the people for whom I worked suspended operations. This new trial of our faith, however, was not long ; out of apparent evil, good came. Released from his obligations to the Apostle and the Mormon paper, my husband now set earnestly to work to obtain a living without the crippling influences of "counsel" or the dictates of those whom his religion taught him to respect.

I had always believed that if suffered to act for himself, his energy was such that he would certainly carve his way to a respectable position in the world. In this I was not deceived, either at the time of which I speak or at a later period when in Salt Lake City he engaged in active business on his own account. In New York, where he had been, by this time, appointed President of the Eastern Mission, and was actively engaged in advocating the claims of the Mormon Church, he sought and found employment on the staff of the Herald, and in connection with other daily papers ; and such was his success, that from a condition of misery and poverty we were very soon raised to a position of comfort, and surrounded by every luxury suitable to our station in life ; and this position we enjoyed until called upon to leave all and journey across the Plains to Zion.

Our own journey to Zion was postponed for a while ; but not long before we set forth, I received the long-expected letter which Mary Burton had promised me ; and as it contains a vivid picture of a mode of transit—the only mode which could then be used—across the Plains; and shows what people were forced to endure so recently as a few short years ago, I shall give extracts from it in the following chapter; for I feel sure that if the reader did not peruse the story in the exact words of my unfortunate friend, he never would believe, that in this country and in our own times such a terrible tragedy could have been enacted.

"I PROMISED to write and tell you all about our journey across the Plains, but I little expected to have such a terrible tale to tell.

"You have heard so much of the journey to Salt Lake Valley that you know pretty well how we must have travelled to Iowa City where it was necessary that we should wait until the whole company was quite ready for the long journey which lay before us.

"Our life up to a certain point was much the same, and we met with the same difficulties as all other emigrants who had gone before us. But there the comparison ends. Privation, and toil, and weariness, and not infrequently sickness and death, wore out many of the companies that went before us, but they never suffered as we did. It is utterly impossible for me to tell you all that we went through. And when I finish this letter and lay down my pen, and even when you read the fearful story of my own experience during that journey, you will still have but the faintest idea of the horrors and sufferings which we endured.

“At Iowa City we found nothing prepared for us. When we left Liverpool we were told that hand-carts, provisions, and all that we needed should be provided before we arrived. If this had been done we should have had just fairly time enough to travel over the Plains and reach Salt Lake before the terrible cold of winter set in. As it was, everything went wrong. The Elders who had been sent out before us to buy tents and carts and all that we wanted, had either been unfortunate or very careless, for, as I said, when we arrived in Iowa City not the slightest preparation had been made.

“You know how strong my faith was when we left New York and how Brother Shrewsbury and myself were ready to sacrifice everything. I can assure you that we were fully tested, and I do think that but for our strong faith, not a single soul of all that company would have survived that journey.

“Three companies had, after a long delay, been sent out before we reached Iowa City. As it was then early in the season they completed their journey before the cold of winter set in. I afterwards heard that Brigham Young and the Elders, when they saw those companies arrive safely in Salt Lake City, spoke of the scheme as a successful experiment. We had been taught that the scheme came directly from heaven and was neither speculation nor experiment, and when I heard that, after all, the Prophet himself spoke of it as a matter of doubtful issue, I asked myself—Who then can we believe?

“We waited three weeks in Iowa Camp while they were making the hand-carts. They were very lightly made and I think not at all suitable for such a long and wearisome journey; and being so hastily put together and most of the wood unseasoned, they were utterly unfit for the rough work for which they were constructed. Twenty of these carts—one to every five—were allowed to every hundred persons, who were also allowed five good-sized tents, and one Chicago wagon, with three yoke of oxen to transport the baggage and provisions. We were only allowed seventeen pounds of bedding and clothing each, which, with cooking utensils, &c., made up about one hundred pounds to each cart, and that was quite as much as the cart (itself only sixty pounds in weight) could carry. You can see, Sister Stenhouse, how difficult it must have been out of every hundred persons—men, women, and children—to find twenty who were strong enough to pull even such frail things as those hand-carts were. The married men and the young men and boys did the best they could, but they could do no more, and some of the carts were drawn by young girls alone.

“The girls and women who had no husbands used to occupy a tent by themselves at night, but in the other tents, whole families, without respect to age or sex, together with the young men who assisted them during the day, used to find shelter. This you will see at once was exceedingly inconvenient, but we had no choice, and we had been so long associated and had suffered so much together that we did not feel it as much as we otherwise must have done.

“What weary days we spent! Hour after hour went by, mile after mile we walked, and never, never seemed to be a step the further on our way. Sometimes I recalled to mind a hymn which we used to sing at Sunday School, when I was a child—an evening hymn in which we returned thanks that we were—

‘A day’s march nearer home.’

“But day after day went by—wearily, hopelessly—and when each night came on, and, tired and footsore, we lay down to rest we seemed no nearer to our home in Zion.

“Do not think, Sister Stenhouse, that we gave way to despondency. What we felt, God alone knows ; but our poor weary hearts were full of confiding faith in Him, and we placed undoubting confidence in the promises and prophecies which we had received through His chosen servants. The young folks were light-hearted and gay, and with all the enthusiasm of youth they pressed on, thinking not of the way but only of the end ; and their example was most encouraging.

“My husband was one of the bravest and truest of all that band. He drew the cart which we shared with another Elder and his wife and their grown-up daughter. They were old people—I mean the Elder and his wife—and the daughter was an old maid, unpleasant, thin, and sour, and too feeble to do anything. There were reasons why I was excused from taking any share in hard work ; but I felt as zealous as the rest, and day after day walked beside my husband thinking that, if nothing more, my companionship might cheer him. The old folks walked behind, and so did the children, but sometimes, when the little ones were very weary indeed, the parents would place them on the top of the bedding in the hand-cart and give them a lift. But some of the elderly people who were unused to walking far, and whom it was impossible to carry, suffered a great deal ; and sometimes mothers with children at their breasts would trudge on mile after mile in all the heat and dust without a murmur or complaint until they almost dropped down with fatigue. What some of those poor creatures suffered, no words could tell.

“The sun shone down upon us with intense heat as we travelled through Iowa, and the people from the farm-houses and villages came out to see us and wondered at our rashness in undertaking such a journey. They were very kind to us and came and visited us in our camps and offered some of the men work and good wages if they would wait there instead of going on to Zion. A few of the people accepted these offers, but the Elders, as you may suppose, watched carefully every company and every man ; and in the evening, when meetings for prayer and preaching were held, we were earnestly exhorted to obedience, and the sin of acting upon our own judgments was set forth in the very plainest terms. The kindness of the Iowa people, however, encouraged us, and they freely gave to those who most needed whatever they could to help us on our way.

“ And we needed help and sympathy.

“ Of course, with only one wagon to carry all the provisions for a hundred persons, besides five tents, our supply of food was very limited. At that period of the journey the grown-up people were allowed ten ounces of flour a day and a little—and but a very little—coffee, sugar, rice, and bacon. This was a very scanty allowance for people who all day long had to draw the hand-carts or to trudge mile after mile in all that burning heat and dust—but we never complained. Some of the men ate all their rations at breakfast, and went without anything more until the next morning, unless they were able to beg a little of some friendly farmer by the way. The little children received just half as much as the others. With a very small amount of management this inconvenience might certainly have been avoided, for provisions of all sorts were very cheap in the districts through which we passed. Some of the more thoughtful Saints, I know, felt very bitterly the injustice of this, for, as you are aware, we had paid all our expenses in full—even to the uttermost farthing ; and we had been promised in return a safe and sufficient outfit with plenty of provisions, and in fact all that was necessary. Had we been left to ourselves we should of course have provided for every contingency ; but we came in obedience to counsel under the direction of the Church, and after we had paid for everything ; the Church even “ took care ” of our money, so that we therefore could not procure necessities by the way, as otherwise we might have done.

“ Thus wearily, and suffering not a little privation, we travelled all through Iowa until we came to the Missouri river and encamped at Florence, a place about six miles north of Omaha, and there we remained about a week preparing for our journey across the Plains.

“It was the middle of August when we arrived at Florence, and we had been delayed so much on the way that it appeared to many of the more experienced that it would now be the height of imprudence for us to cross the Plains at that season. With old people, delicate women, and little children, and without carriages of any sort—except the frail hand-carts that carried our bedding—it would be a weary long time, before we could reach Salt Lake. Every step must be trudged on foot, and it was quite impossible that we could walk many miles a day, while there was before us a journey of over a thousand. Some of the Elders proposed that we should settle where we were, or somewhere near by until the following spring, and then go on to Zion; but others who were more confident urged that we should proceed at once. The Elders called a great meeting to settle the matter, at which we were all present.

“I should tell you that when we first started, our whole company was placed under the guidance of Elder James G. Willie as captain; and we were again sub-divided into five parties of about one hundred each, and over every hundred was placed an Elder or sub-captain. The first hundred was headed by Elder Atwood, the second by Levi Savage, the third by William Woodward, the fourth by John Chislett, and the fifth by Elder Ahmensen. About two hundred of the people were Scotch and Scandinavians; nearly all the rest were English. All were assembled at the meeting. You know, Sister Stenhouse, how meetings were held at home. Well, it was just the same there. We, of course, had nothing really to say—we had only to obey counsel and sanction the decision of the leading Elders. I used to feel annoyed rather at that sort of thing in London, as you may remember, but now when life and death depended upon the wisdom of our decision, with all my faith, I felt worse than annoyed, wicked as I have no doubt it was for me to feel so. My husband never uttered a word, but I know he felt much as I did, and in that he was not alone among the Elders.

"We had neither vote nor influence—the elders held our destiny in their hands. In all our company there were only three or four men who had been out to Salt Lake before, and of course they could not be overlooked, so they gave their opinion at the meeting. They must have fully known the dangers and difficulties of the way, and what hardships must overtake a company so scantily provided for as was ours, if we continued our journey. But, for all that, they not only spoke slightingly of the danger which threatened us, but prophesied in the name of the Lord, that we should pass through triumphantly and suffer neither loss nor harm.

"One man alone—Levi Savage—dared to tell the truth. People well-mounted, or even with good ox-teams, could safely and easily make the journey, he said, but for a band of people like ourselves, with aged folks, and women, and little children, to attempt it so late was little short of madness. He strongly urged that we should take up our quarters there for the Winter, when, he said, as soon as Spring came on, we could safely and successfully perform the remainder of our journey.

"The other Elders thought that he was weak in the faith, and plainly told him so; and one of them even said he'd eat all the snow that fell between Florence and Salt Lake City. The people, of course, believed without question what they were told to believe, for they had long ago made up their minds that the leaders were inspired, and therefore they dared not doubt them, and the prudent counsel of Brother Savage was rejected accordingly. I was not near enough to hear his words, but I was afterward told that he said: 'What I have said, I know is the truth; but as you are counseled to go forward, I will go with you; I will work, and rest, and suffer with you, and, if God wills it so, I will also die with you.' Never was man more faithful to his word than was Brother Savage, and often after that, when sickness, and weariness, and cold, and hunger, and death, overtook us—as he had foreseen—he never for one moment forgot the promise which he had so solemnly made.

“Then—the middle of August being passed—we left Florence behind us, and began our weary journey across the Plains in much the same fashion as we had already travelled through Iowa. We had, however, taken in fresh provisions to last us until we reached Utah, and as the oxen could not draw so much extra weight, one sack, weighing about a hundred pounds, was placed on each of the hand-carts, in addition to the other baggage. This was a severe task upon the endurance of the people, but most of them bore it without a murmur. On the other hand, we fared a little better in the matter of provisions, for we were allowed a pound of flour a day each, and also, occasionally, a little fresh beef, and, besides that, each hundred had three or four milch cows. As we continued our journey, and the provisions were consumed, the burdens on the carts, of course, grew lighter.

“But this was only the beginning of our pilgrimage:—the end we could not foresee. Every evening, when we pitched our tents, we endeavored by songs, and jests, and interesting stories, to beguile the tediousness of the way. The days were not quite so warm now, and the nights were more chilly; but altogether it was much more pleasant travelling than it was in the earlier part of the journey, and no one seemed to remember the almost prophetic remonstrance of Brother Savage.

“Still we travelled very slowly, for the carts were always breaking down; the wheels came off, and we had nothing to grease them with. The boxes of the wheels were made of unseasoned wood, and the heavy pressure upon them, and the dust that got into them, soon wore them out. Some of the people cut off the tops of their boots and wrapped them round the axles, and others cut up their tin plates and kettles for the same purpose, and for grease they used soap, and even their pitiful allowance of bacon. But as the days passed, and the flour began to be used up, these accidents became less frequent.

“Upon an average, they said, we travelled about fifteen miles a day, which I think was very good. Some few days we even made a little over twenty miles, but they were balanced by the shortcomings. We tried to feel happy and hopeful, and even the aged and infirm tried to make light of their toil and privations, for we did not yet see that heavy cloud which was looming across our way. I frequently talked with the old and weakly among the people, to whom both my husband and myself were able to offer little kindnesses, and they all spoke cheerfully of our prospects. Such faith had they in the promises of the Elders.

“Just before we reached Wood river, vast herds of buffaloes appeared in our vicinity, and one evening all our cattle stampeded, and the men had to go in search of them. About thirty were lost, and after hunting after them for three days, we gave them up. We had only one yoke of oxen now for each wagon, and as the wagons were loaded each with three thousand pounds of flour, the teams could not move them. So they yoked up the beef-cattle, and cows, and heifers, but they were unmanageable—and at last we were obliged again to place a sack of flour upon each hand-cart.

“This sorely tried us all. Some of the people even complained, but the greater part of us bore up bravely, believing that it was the will of the Lord. We still had faith that all would yet be well. This was, however, a hard blow. Our milch cows were useless to us, our beef-rations were stopped, and the burdens which we drew were doubled. Every one did his or her best, but many of us began to be disheartened, and could hardly get along.

“One evening there was quite a commotion in the camp. We had pitched our tents for the night on the banks of the Platte River, I think, when suddenly quite a grand turn-out of carriages and light wagons came up from the east and joined us. Each carriage was drawn by four horses, and the outfits were in first-class style. Nothing could be too good for Apostles and other “distinguished” servants of the Lord. I was anxious to know who they were, but was not long in finding out. There was the Apostle Franklin Richards, and Elders Webb and Felt, and Joseph A. Young, the son of the Prophet, and Elders Dunbar, and Kimball, and Grant—all returning Missionaries. They stayed with us all night, and in the morning called a great meeting, and the Apostle Richards delivered a speech, which troubled me not a little, and made me very sorrowful.

“He had heard of what Brother Savage had said, and then and there, before us all, he rebuked him. He then exhorted us to remember the hope set before us, and told us to pray and work on, and especially to be obedient to counsel; and he finished by solemnly prophesying, in the name of the God of Israel, that the Almighty would make a way for us to Zion, and that though the snow might fall and the storm rage on the right hand and on the left, not a hair of our heads should perish.

“Some of the people wept with joy as they heard these words. My own heart was full. To me, this was the voice of inspiration—the voice of God—how could I doubt again?

“Sister Stenhouse; before a month was over, I saw with my own eyes that prophecy, those promises, falsified to the very letter; and yet at the time they came to me and to all else as the word of the Lord from heaven. Tell me, if men can thus deceive themselves—for I do not doubt for a moment that the Apostle believed his own prophecy—and if we could be so sadly deluded as to believe that what was said was divine, what surety have we for our religion at all? I strive against these sinful doubts, but they will sometimes creep into my heart unbidden.

“The Apostle and the Elders with him told Captain Willie that they wanted some fresh meat, and the Elders killed and gave them of our very best. What could be denied to the Servants of the Lord? We were then more than four hundred in number—aged men and feeble women, with babes and poor little children too young to walk; many of them infirm and sick, all of them footsore and weary. We were far away from home, travelling slowly hundreds and hundreds of miles, worn out and without sufficient provisions for the way or the remotest chance of obtaining any: And yet, Oh God! I shame to tell it; these servants of Heaven—our leaders, our guides, our example—these chosen vessels who came to us, riding comfortably and at ease in their well-appointed carriages, took of our poverty—took the very best we had!

“As they left the camp, I looked up into my husband’s face and our eyes met. We said not a word, but in our hearts there was the same thought. Sister Stenhouse, there must have been that selfsame thought in the mind of many another poor soul who watched those Elders depart after they had lectured us on faith and patience and obedience!

“They crossed the river pleasantly enough, and pointed out the best fording-place and then they watched us wade through—the water there being nearly a mile in width, and in some places two and even three feet in depth—and though many of the heavy-laden carts were drawn by women and girls, they never so much as offered to lend us the aid of their handsome teams. One sister told me that they watched the poor people crossing, through glasses, as if it were an entertainment, but I did not see that, and can hardly believe it was true. All that they did, however, was to promise that when we reached Laramie we should find provisions and bedding and other necessities ready for us, and that they would send help from Salt Lake Valley to meet us.”

"IT was early in September when we reached Laramie, but we found nothing awaiting us there. We were all very much discouraged at this, and Captain Willie called another meeting for consultation. We knew, of course, beforehand, that our position was very bad, but figures when stated plainly become startling facts. We now learned that if we continued at the same rate as that which we had previously been travelling, and received each the same allowance daily, we should be left utterly destitute of provisions when we were yet three hundred and fifty miles from the end of our journey. Nothing remained but to reduce our allowance ; so, instead of one pound, we were rationed at three-quarters of a pound a day, and, at the same time, were forced to make incredible exertions to travel faster.

“Not long after this, Captain Willie received a message from the Apostle Richards. It is the custom, you know, for people who want to send messages to emigrants who come after them, to write a note on a scrap of paper and tie it to a stone or a piece of wood and leave it on the way. No one disturbs it, as no one but the emigrants travel along that road, and they are sure to find it. It was from a rough post-office like this that Captain Willie got his letter. In it the Apostle told him that we should receive supplies from Salt Lake when we reached the South Pass ; but that we knew would be too late. So our allowance was again reduced, and after that we were rationed at an average of ten ounces for every person over ten years of age. The men who drew the carts received twelve ounces, the women and aged men, nine ounces, and the children from four to eight ounces according to age. Before this, the men with families had done better than the single men, as they had been able to save a little from the children's rations, and of course they did not like this new arrangement so well.

“Picture to yourself these men—in the cool air of September, drawing after them each one a loaded cart, with one or more children most frequently superadded to its weight, trudging wearily every day, ten, fifteen, or twenty miles over the rough desert, wading across streams with the women and children, setting up tents at night, working as they never worked before in all their lives, and withal keeping soul and body together upon twelve ounces of flour a day. This is but one side of the picture—the physical toil and endurance of the working men. Think what the feeble and aged, the sick, the women and children must have endured !

“By this time many of those who had hitherto held out bravely began to fail, and the people in general were greatly discouraged. Captain Willie and the Elders who assisted him did their best to keep up the spirits of the people and to get them over as much ground as they could each day. The captains over the hundreds had also no little work to perform in distributing provisions, helping the sick and infirm, and, in fact, superintending everything.

“For some time the nights had been getting colder and colder, and by the time we arrived at the Sweetwater river we suffered considerably from that cause ; we felt that winter was fast approaching. In fact, it came on earlier and more severely last year than at any time before, since the Saints settled in Utah. Does it not seem strange that at the very time when they were offering up special prayers for us in Zion, that we might be defended from cold and storm, the terrors of a more than ordinary winter overtook us and proved fatal to so many of our company ! The mountains were covered with snow, and it was soon quite evident, even to those who had prophesied most loudly that the Lord would work a special miracle in our behalf, that the storm-clouds of winter would soon burst upon us.

“You have never seen the Sweetwater river, so I may as well tell you that it is a very irregular stream, and we had to cross it again and again upon our way. As usual we had to wade through the water each time, and though the men helped over the women and children as well as they could, many of us got very wet indeed, and quite chilled, and we were all cold and miserable. Still, our faith never gave way—some, I know, began to doubt a little, but they had not yet lost all faith, and discouraged and wretched, as indeed we were, the greater number bore up with heroic resolution. I noticed, however, on the faces of some poor souls—men and women—a peculiar expression which it is quite impossible for me to describe. Later on I was led to believe that at that time they, perhaps unconsciously, felt the presentiment of that fearful death which so soon overtook them.

“We suffered much at night. You may remember that I told you we were only allowed seventeen pounds of clothing and bedding, and that, of course, was of little use. Sleeping in a tent, under any circumstances, is not generally pleasant to those who are accustomed to the shelter of a house, but sleeping in a tent, exposed to the keen night air of the wilderness, and with scarcely a rag of covering, was almost sufficient to prove fatal to the stoutest and strongest. During the summer time, although our fare was scanty and our labor incessant, we rose each morning refreshed and strengthened and ready for the toils of the day. But now we crept out of our tents cramped and miserable, half-frozen, and with our eyes red and tearful with the cold. We seemed to have no life left in us.

"These things soon began to tell upon the health of every one of us, especially upon the aged and those who were sickly. Hope at last died out in their poor weary hearts. One by one they fell off—utterly worn out. Poor things! how they had longed to see the promised Zion, and now all expectation of peaceful rest on earth was over—the bitter end had come.

"We dug graves for them by the wayside in the desert, and there we laid them with many tears, scarcely daring to look one another in the face, for we felt that our own time might perhaps be nearer than we thought.

"One by one at first they fell off, but before long the deaths became so frequent that it was seldom that we left a camp-ground without burying one or more. This was, however, only the beginning of evil.

"Soon it was no longer the aged and the sickly who were taken off, but the young and strong, who under other circumstances would have set disease and death at defiance. Cold, hunger, and excessive toil brought on dysentery, and when once attacked by that, there was little hope for the sufferer, for we had no medicine, and it was quite out of our power to give them relief in any other way. I now began to fear for my husband, for I had noticed for some time an expression of extreme weariness in his face. Our trials had not hardened our hearts; on the contrary, I think, as death seemed to be drawing near, our affection for each other grew more pure and devoted, and in my heart I often prayed, that if it were His will, God would let us die together and rest in the same grave. We never spoke a word to each other on this subject, but we felt the more. I exerted all my strength, and day after day toiled along at his side, helping him all I could ; but although he never complained, I saw in his eyes a dull and heavy look which, more than any words, told of failing strength and the approach of disease, and my heart sank within me.

“ But my own troubles did not alone engross my attention ; there was too much wretchedness around us to allow anyone to be absorbed entirely in his own griefs. Acts of devotion on the part of both parents and children came before me daily such as would have put to shame the stories of filial and parental piety which we used to be taught at school.

“ I saw one poor man whose health had evidently never been strong, draw the cart with his two little ones in it, as well as the baggage, mile after mile, until he could hardly drag his weary limbs a step further ; his wife carried a little five months old baby in her bosom. This they did day after day, until disease attacked the husband, and it was evident that he could bear up no longer. The next morning I saw him, pale as a corpse, bowed down, and shivering in every limb, but still stumbling on as best he could. Before the day was half over, the poor wife lagged behind with her babe, and the husband did not seem to notice her. This was not the result of heartlessness on his part ; I believe that even then he had lost all consciousness. He did not know it, but he was dying. Still he stumbled on, until the short wintry day came to a close, and we pitched our camp, and then I missed him. There was no time to enquire, and a chill came over my heart as I thought of what might be his fate. Presently my husband came to the tent and told me all. The poor man had dragged the cart up to the last moment, and, when the company halted for the night, he had turned aside, and sitting down he bowed his head between his knees and never spoke again. Later still, the poor wife reached the camp, and I saw her then. There was no tear in her eyes, and she uttered neither cry nor moan, but there was upon her features a terrible expression of fixed despair which I dared not even look upon.

A few days after this, one morning as we were almost ready to start, I saw that poor mother in her tent, just as they had found her. She was cold and still—frozen to death—her sorrows were over at last, and her poor weary spirit was at rest ; but on her bosom, still clasped in her arms, and still living, was her little child, unconscious of its mother's fate.

“Most of those who died, as far as I could tell, seemed to pass away quietly and with little pain, as if every feeling of the heart were numbed and dead. But my own sufferings and fears at that time were so great that I could not be a very close observer. Strange as it may seem, the fear of death did not so much appear to terrify these poor victims as the thought that their bodies would be buried by the way-side in the desert, instead of in the sacred ground of Zion. Poor souls ! the absorbing passion of their life was strong in death.

“As death thinned our ranks, the labors of those who survived were increased, until at last there were hardly enough left with strength sufficient to pitch our tents at night. A great deal devolved upon the captain of our hundred, Elder Chislett. He is a very good man, and a devoted Saint ; and I am glad to say that both he and a lady to whom he was betrothed, and who was also with our company, escaped with their lives. I have often seen him, when we stopped for the night, carrying the sick and feeble on his back from the wagon to the fire, and then working harder than a slave would work in putting things straight for the night. He showed a great many kindnesses to my husband and myself.

“But individual efforts availed nothing against fatigue and hunger, and the fearful cold. To the minds of all of us, the end was fast approaching. Nothing but our faith sustained us ; and foolish as many people would think that faith, I am quite sure, that but for it, no living soul of all our company would have ever reached Salt Lake.

"At last the storm came, and the snow fell—I think it must have been at least five or six inches deep within half an hour. The wind was very keen and cutting, and it drifted the snow right into our faces ; and thus blinded by the storm, and scarcely able to stand, we stumbled on that day for fully sixteen miles. What we suffered it would be useless for me to attempt to describe. The scenes we witnessed were too terrible to describe.

"There was a young girl, with whom I was very well acquainted, and who I saw struggling in the snow, clinging to one of the hand-carts, and vainly trying to help in pushing it on, but really doing just the contrary. She is now in Salt Lake City, and you can see her wandering about any day upon the stumps of her knees, her limbs downwards having been frozen during that storm, and subsequently amputated. A poor old woman, too, who I think you must have known in London, lingered behind later in the day. When night came on it was impossible for any one to go back to search for her, but, in the morning, not very far from the camp, some torn rags—the remains of her dress—were found, a few bones, a quantity of hair, and at a little distance a female skull, well gnawed, and with the marks of the wolf fangs still wet upon it ;—the snow all round was crimsoned with blood.

"We halted for a little while in the middle of that day, and to our surprise and joy, Joseph A. Young and Elder Stephen Taylor drove into the camp. We found that when the returning missionaries, of whom I have already told you, left us by the Platte river, they made their way as speedily as they could to Salt Lake City. Joseph A., who felt deeply for our sufferings, although he had been away from home for two whole years, hastened to his father and reported to him the condition in which we were. Brigham Young was of course anxious to undo the mischief which had resulted from the people following his inspired counsel, and at his son's earnest entreaty allowed him to return with provisions and clothing to meet us. Joseph A. lost no time, but pressed on to the rescue, and having told us that assistance was on the way, hastened eastward to meet the company that was following us.

"I cannot tell you what a relief this intelligence was to the minds of all, and how much the poor people felt encouraged by it. But as for me, at that time my heart was sad enough. For some time my husband's strength had evidently been failing, and for the last two days I had felt very serious apprehensions on his behalf. He had been overtaken, and like the rest of us he was starving with cold and hunger, and I saw that he could not hold out much longer. My worst fears were speedily realised. We had not journeyed half a mile from the place where we rested at noon, when, blinded by the snow, and completely broken down, he dropped the rail of the cart, and I saw that he could go no further. How I felt, you, as a wife and mother, only can guess. In a moment my own weakness was forgotten; my love for my husband made me strong again. To leave him there or to delay would have been death to one if not all of us. So I called to those who shared the cart with us, and they helped me as well as they could to lift my husband up and put him under part of the bedding. It was the only chance of saving his life, for, as I before mentioned, some, previous to this, who had been overcome, and had lingered by the way, had been frozen to death or devoured by the wolves.

"I then took hold of the cross-bar or handle of the cart, and numbed with the cold, and trembling in every limb, it was as much as I could do to raise it from the ground. To move the cart was impossible, so I appealed to the old folks again, and they exerted all their strength to push it from behind, and our combined efforts at length succeeded; but the chief weight fell upon me. How gladly I bore it; how gladly I would have borne anything for the mere chance of saving my dear husband's life, your own heart can tell.

"The snow drifted wildly around us, and beat in our faces so blindingly that we could hardly proceed. The greater part of the train had passed on while we delayed on account of my husband, and now every one was making the most desperate efforts to keep up with the rest ; to be left behind was death. Had I been asked whether under any circumstances I could have dragged that heavy cart along in all that storm, I should certainly have replied that it would be utterly impossible ; but until we are tried we do not know what we can bear. It was not until the night came on, and we pitched our tents, that I realised what I had passed through.

“ They helped me to carry my husband to the tent, and there we laid him, and I tried to make him as easy as was possible under the circumstances, but comfort or rest was altogether out of the question. All that night I sat beside him, sometimes watching, sometimes falling into a fitful sleep. I did not believe that he would live through the night. In the morning he was by no means improved, and then I felt too truly the abject misery of our position. It is a painful thing to watch at the bedside of those we love when hope for their recovery is gone, but think what it must be to sit upon the cold earth in a tent, upon the open desert, with the piercing wind of winter penetrating to the very bones, and there before you, the dear one—your life, your all on earth—dying, and you without a drop of medicine, or even a morsel of the coarsest nourishment, to give him. Oh, the bitterness of my soul at that moment ! I tried to pray, but my heart was full of cursing ; it seemed to me as if even God Himself had forgotten us. The fearful misery of that dark hour has left on my soul itself a record as ineffaceable as the imprint of a burning iron upon the flesh.

“ The morning broke at last, dark and dreary, and a thick heavy mantle of snow covered all the camp, but we contrived to communicate with each other, and soon it was whispered that five poor creatures had been found dead in the tents. Want, and weariness, and the bitter cold had done their work, and we did not weep for them—they were at rest ; but for ourselves we wept that we were left behind—and we looked at one another, wistfully, wondering which of us would be taken next.

We buried those five poor frozen corpses in one grave, wrapped in the clothing in which they died, and then we comforted each other as best we might, and left the dead who were now beyond our reach, that we might do what we could for those who were fast following them to the grave. A meeting of the leaders was held, and it was resolved that we should remain where we were until the promised supplies reached us. We could not, in fact, do otherwise, for the snow was so deep that it was impossible for us to proceed, and the sick and dying demanded immediate attention. That morning, for the first time, no flour was distributed—there was none. All that remained, besides our miserable cattle, was a small quantity of hard biscuit which Captain Willie bought at Laramie, and a few pounds of rice and dried apples. Nearly all the biscuit was at once divided among the whole company, and the few pounds which remained, together with the rice and apples, were given to Elder Chislett for the use of the sick and the very little children. They also killed two of the cattle and divided the beef. Most of the people got through their miserable allowance that very morning, and then they had to fast:

“Captain Willie set out that morning with another Elder to meet the coming supplies and hasten them on, and as we saw them disappear in the distant west we almost felt as if our last hope departed with them, so many chances there were that we should never see them again.

“The whole of that long, long day I sat beside my husband in the tent—and I might almost say I did no more. There was nothing that I could do. The little bedding that was allowed for both of us I made up into a couch for him; but what a wretched make-shift it was! And I got from Elder Chislett a few of the dried apples which had been reserved for the sick; but it was not until nightfall that my husband was capable of swallowing anything—and then, what nourishment to give to a sick man! The day was freezingly cold, and I had hardly anything on me, and had eaten nothing since the day before; for my mind was so agitated that I do not think the most delicate food would have tempted me. God alone knows the bitterness of my heart as I sat there during all that weary day. I never expected to see my husband open his eyes again, and I thought that when evening came I would lie down beside him and we would take our last long sleep on earth together.

"When night came on and all was dark I still sat there; I dreaded to move lest I should learn the terrible truth—my husband dead! I looked towards the place where I knew he was lying, but I could see nothing. I listened, and I fancied that I heard a gentle breathing—but it was only fancy. Then, louder than the incessant moaning of the wind, I could hear in the distance a fearful cry—a cry which had often chilled our hearts at midnight on the plains—it was the wolves! The darkness grew darker still—so thick that one could almost feel it; the horror of death seemed stealing over all my senses. Oh that there might be one long eternal night to blot out for ever our miseries and our existence. I threw my hands wildly above me and cried bitterly: 'Oh God, my God, let me die!'"

"God was nearer to me than I thought. As my hand dropped lifelessly to the ground it touched some moving thing—it was my husband's hand—the same hand which I had watched in the twilight, stiffening, as I thought, in death. The long, thin fingers grasped my own, and though they were very, very cold, I felt that life was in them; and as I stooped down to kiss them I heard my husband's voice, very weak and feeble, saying in a whisper—"Mary." I threw myself upon his bosom. In a moment the fear of death—the longing for death—the wild and terrible thoughts, all had gone;—the sound of that voice was life to me, and forgetful of his weakness, forgetful of everything but him, I threw myself upon his bosom and wept tears of joy.

"Very carefully and gently I raised him up, and, in the darkness, every whispered word conveyed more meaning to my mind than all his eloquence in by-gone times. After some time I persuaded him to take a little nourishment—miserable stuff that it was—and presently he fell asleep again. I laid his dear head upon the best pillow that I could make of some of my own clothes, and then I slept a little myself—not much, but it was more refreshing than any sleep that had visited my eyes for long time past—hope had come again.

“The next morning my husband was evidently better, and I knelt down beside him and thanked God for the miracle that He had wrought; for was it not a miracle thus to raise my dead to life again? How many stronger, stouter men than he had I seen fall sick and die; but to me God had shown mercy in my utmost need.

“We waited three long days for the return of Captain Willie. My heart was so full of thankfulness that my husband had been spared that I certainly did not feel so acutely the misery with which I was surrounded as I otherwise should have done; I was like the prisoner who feels happy in a reprieve from death, but whose situation is nevertheless such as would appear to any other person the most wretched in which he could be placed. The misery that was suffered in that camp was beyond the power of words to describe. On the second day they gave us some more beef-rations, but they did us little good. The beef was, of course, of the poorest, and, eaten alone, it did not seem to satisfy hunger, and those who were prostrated by dysentery, although they ate it ravenously, suffered much in consequence afterwards.

“The number of the sick rapidly increased, and not a few died from exhaustion; and really those seemed happiest who were thus taken from the horrors which surrounded them. Had it not been for the intense frost, we should all probably have fallen victims to the intolerable atmosphere of the camp. I would not even allow my mind to recall some of the scenes which I witnessed at that time: scenes, the disgusting and filthy horrors of which, no decent words could describe. When you consider the frightful condition in which we were, the hunger and cold which we endured, you may perhaps be able in a small degree to conjecture—as far as a person can conjecture who has not himself suffered such things—what we then passed through. I saw poor miserable creatures, utterly worn out, dying in the arms of other forlorn and hopeless creatures as wretched as themselves; I saw strong and honest, honorable men, or who had once been such, begging of the captain for the miserable scraps which had been saved for the sick and the helpless children; I saw poor heart-broken mothers freezing to death, but clasping as they died, in an agony of loving woe, the torn and wretched remnants of clothing which they still retained, around the emaciated forms of their innocent babes—the mother-instinct strong in death; and sometimes at night when, all unbidden, I see again in dreams the awful sufferings of those poor God-forsaken wretches, I start in horror and pray the Almighty rather to blot out from my mind the memory of all the past, than to let me ever recollect, if but in fancy, that fearful time.

“The third day came, and still no relief. There are mysterious powers of endurance in human nature, weak as we often deem it, but there is a point beyond which the bow, however flexible, will not bend. It was evident that if no help arrived speedily, the end was not far off.

“The sun was sinking behind the distant western hills, in all the glory of the clear frosty atmosphere of the desert, and many who gazed upon its beauty did so with a mournful interest, believing that they would never again behold the light of day. But at that moment some who were anxiously watching with a last hope—watching for what they hardly dared expect to see—raised a shout of joy. We knew what it was! Men, women, and children rushed from their tents to welcome the approaching wagons and our friends in time of need. Captain Willie and the other Elder had found the rescue from Salt Lake overtaken by the storm just as we were, but he had told them of our terrible situation, and they had hastened on without a moment's delay. It was he and they, conveying good supplies, who now approached us. The poor creatures shouted wildly for joy, even the strong men shed tears, and the sisters, overcome with the sudden change from death to life, flung themselves into the arms of the brethren as they came into the camp and covered them with kisses. Such happiness you never saw—everyone shaking hands and speaking joyfully—everyone saying ‘God bless you’ with a meaning such as is seldom attached to those words.

“The supplies were to us more than food and clothing—they were life itself. Elder John Chislett was appointed to distribute the provisions and clothing, and everything was placed in his hands. He gave out to us all what was immediately necessary, but strongly cautioned us to be very moderate in what we ate, as it was dangerous to go from the extreme of fasting to a full meal. After supper, the clothing and bedding was fairly divided, and we felt more thankful for those little comforts than a person, who had never endured as we had, would have felt had he become suddenly the recipient of boundless luxury.

“Two of the Elders who had held forth such delusive hopes to the company, not long before, as I have already told you, were with the brethren who came to our relief. I have never ventured to ask how it was that they could hold out to us in God’s name such promises, when they must have known, after a moment’s reflection, that they were utterly baseless, but I think that probably they left their comfortable homes in Salt Lake City and came across the stormy desert with supplies to meet us, only to show practically how anxious they were to atone for having led us astray. Next morning Elder Grant went on east to meet the company following us, but Elder W. H. Kimball took command of our company for the rest of the way.

“We could now journey but very slowly, for the road was bad, the sick and weakly were, however, able to ride, and altogether we suffered less. To some this change for the better arrived too late—the mental and physical sufferings which they had endured were too much for them. Poor souls! they alone and their Father in heaven knew what they had passed through. They seemed to have lost all consciousness, as if their faculties had been numbed and stultified. We talked to them of the past, but they looked at us with unmeaning eyes, as if we spoke of something in which they had no interest ; we tried to lead their thoughts to Zion, and the promises of the Lord ; but it was all in vain. They turned from us with a look of terrible apathy ; and one or two, who partly seemed to understand, only replied with an indifference painful to witness—"too late, too late!"

"As we journeyed, the weather every day grew colder : Many of the unfortunate people lost their fingers and toes, others their ears ; one poor woman lost her sight, and I was told of a poor sick man who held on to the wagon-bars to save himself from jolting and had all his fingers frozen off. Few, if any, of the people recovered from the effects of that frost. One morning they found a poor old man who had vainly tried the evening before to keep up with the rest. His corpse was not far from the camp, but it had been sadly mangled by the wolves. Then there came another snow-storm, only worse in proportion as the weather was colder, and it was with the utmost difficulty that we could be kept from freezing. We wrapped blankets and anything else we could get around us, but the cold wind penetrated to our very bones. I was told that some of the people, even women and children who lagged behind were whipped so as to make them keep up, and to keep life in them. I did not see this myself, but I believe, if the story was true, it was an act of mercy and not of cruelty, for to delay a moment was fatal. The captain of our hundred, more than once stayed behind the company to bury some unfortunate person who died on the road : how he ever got up with us again I cannot tell, but he seemed to be as indefatigable in his labors as he was wonderfully preserved.

"Sometimes the carts came to a dead stand-still, and several had to be fastened together and drawn by a united effort, and in more than one instance the poor people gave up altogether ;—they were carried on, while they lived, as well as we could ; but their carts were abandoned. The stragglers came in slowly to camp the night of the storm ;—the people from the Valley even went back to fetch some in ; and it was nearly six o'clock in the morning before the last arrived

"The next day we remained in camp, for there were so many sick and dying that we could not proceed. Early in the morning Elder Chislett and three other Elders went round to see who was dead, that they might be buried. They found in the tents fifteen corpses—all stiff and frozen. Two more died during the day. A large square hole was dug and they were buried in it three abreast, and then they were covered with leaves and earth, every precaution being taken to keep them from the wolves. Few of the relatives of those who were dead came to the burial—they did not seem to care—death had become familiar to them, and personal misery precluded sorrow for the dead.

"As we drew nearer to Salt Lake Valley we met more of the brethren coming to our assistance. They supplied us with all we needed, and then hastened on to meet those who followed us. The atmosphere seemed to become sensibly warmer, and our sufferings were proportionately less as we approached Zion.

"What the feelings of others might have been when they first saw the goal of our hopes—Zion of our prayers and songs—I cannot tell. Weary, Oh, so weary I felt, but thankful, more than thankful that my husband's life had been spared. He was pale and sick, but he was with me still.

"I have written too much already, Sister Stenhouse. I cannot tell you more now, but I may as well add that when we left Iowa City we were about five hundred in all. Some left us on the way. When we left Florence and began the journey across the Plains we were over four hundred and twenty, of which number we buried sixty-seven—a sixth of the whole. The company which followed us, and to which I have frequently alluded, fared worse than we. They numbered six hundred when they started, but they buried one hundred and fifty on the journey—one in every four. May God grant that I may never again see such a sight as was presented by the miserable remnant of that last company as they came on slowly through the Cañon towards Salt Lake Valley."

CHAPTER XVII.

WE FORSAKE ALL, AND SET OUT FOR ZION:—OUR JOURNEY ACROSS THE PLAINS.

Wells Promises Assistance—A Woful Spectacle of Tallow Candles—Odorous Illumination—“L'Eglise c'est moi”—“An Ugly Man With a Cast in His Eye”—An Awkward Mistake—Beginning Life in Zion.

IT was with strange feelings of doubt and unrest that I read that painful story; but I folded up Mary Burton's letter and stored it carefully away in my desk, and then I began to think.

Certainly I was still a Mormon—at least I was nothing else—but I was not now so firmly grounded in my faith as once I was, and these terrible stories completely unsettled my mind. Then, too, I was well aware that, before long, my husband and myself would be called upon to cross the Plains to Zion, and I felt that if our experience were anything like that of Mary Burton, I and my children would never reach Salt Lake. The prospect was not very cheering.

One morning we were surprised to receive a visit from the Apostle George Q. Cannon who informed us that he had received letters from Utah and had come to take the place of Mr. Stenhouse as President of the Mission in the Eastern States, and that we might now prepare to travel with the next company of emigrants.

To me this was most unpleasant intelligence. Polygamy,—the knowledge that before long I should be brought personally within its degrading influence,—had now for years been the curse of my life, and I had welcomed every reprieve from immediate contact with it in Utah. But the time had come at last when I was to realise my worst apprehensions, and I think at that time, had I been permitted to choose, I would have preferred to die rather than journey to Zion. Besides this, ever since my husband had been engaged with the secular papers, we had been getting along very comfortably. We had now a pleasant home and many comforts and little luxuries which we had not enjoyed since we left Switzerland, and I was beginning to hope that we should be allowed to remain in New York for a few years at least. We had also by this time six children—the youngest only a few days old—and I leave it to any mother to determine whether I had not good cause for vexation when I was told that we were expected to leave New York within two weeks with the emigrants who were then en route from England. My husband also was to take charge of the company, and therefore everything would depend upon me—all the preparations for our long and perillous journey, the disposal of our furniture, and, in fact, the thousand and one little necessary duties which must attend the packing up and departure of a family.

In the course of a few days the emigrants arrived, and then my husband was compelled to devote all his time to them. When I told the Elders that it was almost impossible for me, in the delicate state of health in which I was, and with a babe only two weeks old, to undertake such a journey, they told me that I had no faith in the power of God, and that if I would arise and begin my preparations, the Lord would give me strength according to my day. Thinking that probably my husband believed as they did, I made the effort, but it cost me much. In the Mormon Church the feelings or sufferings of women are never considered. If an order is given to any man to take a journey or perform any given task, his wife or wives are never thought of. They are his property just as much as his horses, mules, or oxen, and if one wife should die, it is of little consequence, if he has others, and if he has not he can easily get them; and if he is not young or fascinating enough to win his way with the young ladies, he has only to keep on good terms with Brigham Young, or even with his bishop, and every difficulty will be smoothed away, and they will be "counselled" to marry him.

It is never expected, nor would it be tolerated in any Mormon woman that she should exercise her own judgment in opposition to her husband, no matter how much she might feel that he was in the wrong: I have frequently seen intelligent women subjected to the grossest tyranny on the part of ignorant and fanatical husbands who were influenced by the absurd teachings of the Tabernacle. One of the greatest Mormon writers has said:

"The wife should never follow her own judgment in preference to that of her husband; for if her husband desires to do right, but errs in judgment, the Lord will bless her in endeavoring to carry out his counsels; for God has placed him at the head, and though he may err in judgment, yet God will not justify the wife in disregarding his instructions and counsels; far greater is the sin of rebellion, than the errors which arise from the want of judgment; therefore she would be condemned for suffering her will to arise against his. Be obedient, and God will cause all things to work for good."

The trouble and annoyance occasioned by leaving a comfortable position in New York to travel to such an unknown region as Utah was then, was not a trifle; but we hastened our preparations, sacrificing all that we possessed, in the most reckless manner, and in due time set out.

When we reached Florence—the starting-point on the Frontiers—we were detained on account of some mismanagement on the part of the Church Agents, and remained for three weeks in camp. Ours was what was called "an independent company"; by which I mean that we were able to defray our own expenses without borrowing from the Church: the poorer emigrants were assisted from a fund provided for that purpose—the Perpetual Emigration Fund. More than twenty years ago contributions were levied on the more wealthy Saints for the purpose of providing the passage, outfit, &c., of those who could not otherwise have "gathered to Zion." It was not, however, intended that a free passage should be provided; those who had a little money were assisted, and then, after all, they had to make good to the last farthing, with interest, what they had borrowed from the fund. I have known many people who contributed very largely, and it was represented constantly as the duty of all to do so.

Men who contemplate entering into the patriarchal order of matrimony, if they are Americans, generally try to discover whether the "emigration" of their lady-love has been "settled for," and if their investigations end unfavorably the result very frequently is that their devotion is turned into another channel and some other maiden whose expenses have been fully paid bears off the palm. Englishmen have not always been quite so prudent, and some have married according to their own sweet fancy without asking a question, and to their dismay, not long after the wedding, an account has been sent in for the emigration of Miss Blank. Others, again, have not been allowed to marry the lady of their choice until she was first paid for, and if the old man was very much in love, this was a quick way of getting the account settled. The Mormon Church never gives, it only lends to the poor. Many a man and woman has given enough to have emigrated himself or herself over and over again. This was because they were old people, and it was the young girls and young people generally who received the benefits of the fund. Many years ago a poor old widow woman in England said to me: "I have nearly starved myself to contribute all that I could to the emigration fund, in hopes that I should have the privilege of going to Zion and mingling with the chosen people of God, but every season the young girls are all picked out of our branch, and I am told to wait. I cannot think that this is right, but I don't wish to judge the actions of God's servants. I suppose I must wait."

She did wait, and died waiting.

Our company was in an infinitely better position than that of those emigrants of whose sad fate my friend Mary Burton had told me; for our journey was made at the proper season, and as far as was possible under the circumstances, convenience and comfort had been attended to. The incidents which befell us were few, and although, of course, every one of us felt weary and worn out, we were not called upon to pass through the miseries and sufferings endured by the hand-cart emigrants. Looking back to our primitive mode of travelling, it appears to me almost as if I must be making some mistake about my own age, and that it must have been several centuries, instead of a few years ago, since we crossed the plains. The ox-team and wagon, the walk on foot in the day and the camp life at night have been pleasantly exchanged for the swift travel of a few days in a Pullman palace-car.

What living contradictions we were as we crossed the Plains—singing in a circle, night and morning, the songs of Zion and listening to prayers and thanksgivings for having been permitted to gather out of Babylon, and then during the day as we trudged along in twos and threes expressing to each other all our misgivings, and doubts, and fears, and the bitterness of our thoughts against Polygamy; while each wife, confiding in her husband's honor and faithfulness, solaced herself with the hope that all might yet be well. How little sometimes do the songs of gladness reflect the real sentiments of the heart. How often have I heard many a poor heart-broken woman singing the chorus:

"I never knew what joy was Till I became a Mormon."

I never could sing that song, for my experience had been exactly the reverse.

It was the month of September—the beginning of our beautiful Indian summer—when we emerged from the cañon, and caught sight of Salt Lake City. Everything looked green and lovely, and in spite of all my sad forebodings while crossing the Plains, I involuntarily exclaimed, “Ah, what a glorious spot!” It looked like a beautiful garden—another Eden—in the midst of a desert valley. We had a glimpse of the Great Salt Lake far away in the distance, stretching out like a placid sheet of molten silver, while everywhere around were the lonely-looking snow-capped mountains, encircling us like mighty prison-walls.

It would be impossible for me to describe my feelings at that time. Even while I was enchanted with the glorious prospect before me, there arose again in my mind that haunting spectre of my existence—Polygamy. I believed that this little earthly paradise would probably be to me and my daughters after me, a prison-house, and with a mother’s instinct I shuddered as I thought of what they might be destined to suffer there. Lovely as the scene was, there was a fatal shadow overhanging it all. Then, too, there was no escape: if the sad forebodings of my heart were realised, it would be utterly impossible for us ever to get away. The idea of a railway being constructed across those desert plains and rocky mountains never for a moment entered my mind, and even had I thought it possible, I should have supposed that it would take a life-time to complete. No, there was no help for me, even if it came to the worst. I felt that my doom was sealed; and there were many women in our company who thought just the same as I did and who were troubled at heart with fears as sad as mine.

My first impressions of Salt Lake City when we began life there were anything but pleasant—we had to “rough it.” For nearly two weeks we were obliged to remain in our wagons, as it was quite impossible to obtain house-room. At that time each family built their own little hut, and there were no vacant houses to let.

The weather was now growing very cold and wintry, and it was absolutely necessary that we should have some better shelter than the wagons afforded. One day my husband told me, when he came home, that he had been offered a house which belonged to the Church. It was in a very dilapidated condition, he said, but that if I would go and look at it with him, we could then decide about taking it. No time was to be lost, for companies of emigrants were coming in almost daily, and if we neglected this chance we might not find another.

When we arrived at the house I was much discouraged at seeing the condition it was in: the window panes were all cracked or broken out, the floors and walls looked as if they had never known soap or paint, and the upper rooms had no ceilings; in fact it was not fit for any civilised Christian to live in. In point of size there was nothing to complain of, but of comfort or convenience there was none,—the wind whistled through every door and every cracked window; and altogether it presented anything but a cheering prospect for winter.

My husband told me that Daniel H. Wells, who was superintendent of Church property and also one of the First Presidency of the Church, had promised him that if we took the house it should be repaired and made fit for living in, before winter fully set in; and under the circumstances we thought we could do no better than accept his offer.

Thus we began housekeeping in Utah, and we unpacked our trunks and tried to give the place as home-like an appearance as we possibly could. I had known what it was to be in a strange country and destitute; and, therefore, benefiting by experience, when I left New York, regardless of the teachings of the Elders and of my own husband's directions to the contrary, I had secretly stowed away many little necessities towards housekeeping. Indeed, had I not done so, we should have been as badly off when we reached Zion as when we arrived in New York. Besides which, I have no doubt that our wagons would have been filled with the trunks of those very brethren who counselled us not to take more than was absolutely necessary. The brethren who gave this counsel were, I noticed, constantly purchasing while they advised everyone else to sell, and I thought it wiser to follow their example than their precepts.

Among my treasures was some carpet, and when that was laid down and the stove put up we began to feel almost at home. The wind, however, soon drove away all thoughts of comfort, for it came whistling in through a thousand undetected crevices, and the tallow candles which we were obliged to burn presented a woful spectacle. Even the most wealthy, then, had no other light but candles, and every family had to make their own: I have often seen people burning a little melted grease with a bit of cotton-rag stuck in the middle for a wick—how pleasant the smell, and how brilliant the light thus produced can be imagined. Everything was upon the same scale—and to keep house in any fashion was really a formidable undertaking, especially to those who had been accustomed to the conveniences of large towns. I believe that many women consented to their husbands taking other wives for the sake of getting some assistance in their home duties.

We spent nearly all the first evening in our new house in trying to discover some means of keeping out the storm, but to little purpose. Nearly a fortnight passed before any one came to see about repairing the house, but as it belonged to the Church my husband seemed to think it must all be right. The Mormon men are always very lenient towards "the Church"—very much more so than the Mormon women, for the latter have somehow got mixed up in their minds the idea that Brigham Young and "the Church" are synonymous terms. I remember one day a good young sister—a daughter of one of the twelve Apostles—saying to me, "I have just seen the Church," and when I asked her what she meant, she said: "I have just met Brigham Young and Hiram Clawson, and are they not the Church?" It was evident to me that others besides myself sometimes gave way to wicked thoughts. Nevertheless I was still of opinion that "the Church" had plenty of money and ought to have repaired the house.

One day a man whom I had never seen before, called upon me and asked what repairs I should like done. I was not feeling very well, and had been annoyed at the delay, and I answered rather ungraciously that I should like anything done, if only it were done at once, for I thought we had waited long enough. He answered me very politely and said that he would see to it immediately. When Mr. Stenhouse returned home in the evening he said: "So you have had a visit from President Wells." "No," I said, "there has been no one here but a carpenter—an ugly man with a cast in his eye, and I told him that I wanted the house fixed right away."

"Why, that was President Wells," he said, very much shocked, and I think I felt as bad as he did when I realised that I had treated one of the "First Presidency" so unceremoniously.

This Daniel H. Wells, besides being an Apostle, a Counselor of Brigham Young, and one of the three "Presidents" who share with Brigham the first position in the Church, and are associated with him in all his official acts, was Lieutenant-General of the Nauvoo Legion, and at the present time and for some years past, Mayor of Salt Lake City. It was a shocking indiscretion, to say the least, to speak slightly of such a high and mighty personage.

The repairs, however, were seen to, and the house rendered a little more habitable. We had now to begin the struggle of life afresh and could not afford to be too particular about trifles;—to obtain shelter was something—for the rest we must still continue to hope and trust.

CHAPTER XVIII.

MY FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF THE CITY OF THE SAINTS.

Some Personal Observations—An Innocent Prophet—Living Witnesses of the Truth—How Salt Lake City was Laid Out and Built—The Houses of Many-Wived Men—My First Sunday in the Tabernacle—Curious Millinery of Lady-Saints—Two Remarkable Young Ladies—A Doubtful Experiment—How Service is Conducted in the Tabernacle—Extraordinary Sermons—Deceitful Dealings of the Original Prophet—Why Joseph, the “Seer,” Married Miss Snow—Another of the Prophet’s Wives—A Shameful Story—Aunty Shearer, and her Funny Ways—Spiritual Wives and Proxy Wives—How the Saints are Married for Time and for Eternity—Concerning Certain Generous Elders—How Wives are Secretly “Sealed”—Extraordinary Request of One of Brigham’s Wives—“The Next Best Thing”—Mormon Ideas of the Marriage at Cana—The “Fixins” of a Mormon Husband—How “The Kingdom” is Built Up—Women Only to be Saved by Their Husbands—A Painful Story—A Very Cautious Woman—A Woman Who Wanted to be “Queen”—A Deceitful Lover—A Strange Home-Picture—“These Constitute My Kingdom”—Forebodings.

WITH the eager observation of a woman who has a great personal interest at stake, I took note of everything in Zion which was new to me, and especially all that related to the system of plural marriages, and all my worst fears were abundantly realised.

Although I had looked at the dark side of Mormonism and had pictured with horror the life of women in Polygamy, there were nevertheless some truths which broke upon my mind with painful effect. In England we had heard so frequently from the lips of the Apostles and Elders that not only was Polygamy contrary to the teachings of Joseph Smith, but that it was utterly unknown in Nauvoo during the Prophet’s lifetime. Directly the Revelation was published, we, of course, knew that if it really proceeded from Joseph he could not have been so innocent of Polygamy as we had been taught; but I was hardly prepared to meet several of his wives out in Utah; and yet almost the first thing that I heard was that there were living in Salt Lake City, ladies well-known and respected, who had been sealed to the Prophet. This I afterwards found was true.

The Mormon Colony in Salt Lake City had at first to contend with all those difficulties and submit to all those privations which beset the path of all new settlers in a strange country. Until very recently the greater number of the dwellings were small and low, like so many little huts, and not infrequently you might see a row of these huts, with one window and a door to each, and, inside, a wife, a bedstead, two chairs and a table—with poverty to crown the whole. But even then might be seen in the laying out of the streets, and in the other arrangements, the germs of a great city. The roadways were broad and the sidewalks convenient, and provision was made—more with an eye to the future than to present necessity—for a great depth in the measurement of the houses and blocks. Down the sides of the streets flowed a sparkling stream—the water of which was brought from the mountains for the purpose of irrigating the gardens in the city; and, as far as they possibly could, the settlers marked out and planned a capital worthy of that name for the Mormon people.

When I arrived in Salt Lake City, a great many improvements had been effected; and expecting, as I did, that this would be our future home for many years, perhaps for life, I was interested in everything that I saw. But even then, in merely taking a walk about the city, I met with evidences of the degrading teachings of Polygamy—I saw that little deference was paid to the women, they were rudely jostled at the crossings, and seemed to be generally uncared for. Since the completion of the railway and the consequent influx of Gentiles, this, of course, has not been noticeable.

The city is built on a slope formed by a bend in the mountain-range. Brigham Young's house is on the northern side, and has a commanding prospect. The Tabernacle and tithing-office are in the same street. The Tabernacle is a plain-looking building entirely devoid of any architectural beauty. It stands in the block where the Temple, which has been building for the last quarter of a century, and is now only a few feet above ground, is waiting to be finished. Nearly twenty-six years ago Brigham wrote to Orson Spencer, the President of the Mormon Church in England, urging him to "gather up as much tithing as he possibly could, for glass, nails, paint, &c., to assist in building up the Temple of the Lord in the Valley of the Great Salt Lake." A large sum of money was collected, and millions have been raised by tithing and by other means, but there has been no one hitherto with courage and authority sufficient to demand of the Prophet an account of those funds, and the interest and compound interest which should be accruing thereunto.

The first Sunday I went to the Tabernacle I was greatly amused at the way in which some of the sisters were dressed. Quite a number wore sun-bonnets, but the majority wore curious and diverse specimens of the milliner's art—relics of former days. Some wore a little tuft of gauze and feathers on the top of the head, while others had helmets of extraordinary size. There were little bonnets, half-grown bonnets, and "grandmother bonnets" with steeple crowns and fronts so large that it was difficult to get a peep at the faces which they concealed. As for the dresses, they were as diversified as the bonnets. Some of them presented a rather curious spectacle. I noticed two young women who sat near me: they were dressed alike in green calico sun-bonnets, green calico skirts, and pink calico sacks. On enquiring who they were, I was told that they were the wives of one man and had both been married to him on the same day, so that neither could claim precedence of the other. Outside of Utah such a thing would seem impossible, but so many of the young girls at that time came out to Zion without father or mother or any one else to guide them, and left to their own inexperience and afraid to disobey "counsel" it is no wonder that they soon yielded to the universal custom.

The two young women whom I have mentioned, did not appear to me to be overburdened with intelligence; they looked like girls who could be made to believe anything; but after that I met with two well-educated women who, like these foolish girls, thoughtlessly tried the experiment of two or more marrying the same man on the same day,—agreeing with their "lord" that that would be the best way to preserve peace in their household. But they were terribly mistaken, and even before the marriage-day was over, the poor bewildered husband had to fly to brother Brigham for counsel.

The Tabernacle services seemed to me as strange as the women. There was no regular order in conducting the proceedings, but the prominent brethren made prayers, or "sermons" as they were called upon to do so. The "sermons" would be more properly called speeches—they were nothing but a rambling, disconnected glorification of the Saints, interspersed with fearful denunciations of the Gentiles, and not infrequently a good sprinkling of words and expressions such as are never used in decent society. More unedifying discourses could hardly be imagined. As for the spirituality and devotional feeling which characterised our meetings in England, they were only conspicuous by their absence, and many devout Saints have told me that when they first went there—before the erection of the great organ—the free-and-easy manners of the speakers and the brass band which was then stationed in front of the platform, made them feel as if they had come to witness a puppet-show, rather than to attend a religious meeting.

There was one lady at the Tabernacle service whom I regarded with considerable interest. This was no other than Eliza R. Snow, one of the Prophet's wives. I was told that she was the first woman married in Polygamy after Joseph Smith received the Revelation, and I believe it was so. People who lived in Nauvoo, respectable people, and not one or two either, have assured me that for four years before Joseph is said to have received the Revelation, he was practicing Polygamy, or something worse, and that the Revelation was given to justify what was already done. After it was given, or said to be given, Joseph and his brother Hyrum cut off from the Church more than one person for preaching it, and nine years more passed away during which the Mormon Elders everywhere most emphatically and solemnly denied it, before it was publicly avowed. However this might be, it is generally understood that Eliza Snow was the first plural wife of the Prophet, and I was told by a lady from Nauvoo that Joseph did not care much for her, but that she was getting to be quite a querulous old maid, and he married her to keep her tongue quiet. If that is true she has entirely changed her tactics since she left Nauvoo, for her principal occupation at the present time is converting rebellious wives to obedience to their husbands and convincing young girls that it is their duty to enter into Polygamy. Unhappy husbands derive great consolation from her counsels. In matters of religion she is a perfect fanatic, and in connection with the Female Relief Society she reigns supreme ; but otherwise there are many excellent traits in her character, and I could tell of many acts of loving-kindness and self-denial which she has performed, and which will surely have their reward. She is said to have been tolerably good-looking when young, but in appearance there is nothing now to distinguish her. As the chief poet of the Mormon Church, and as the representative of Eve in the mysteries of the Endowment House, she enjoys a reputation such as would be impossible to any other woman among the Saints.

Another of the late Joseph's wives is a Mrs. Doctor Jacobs, who was actually married to the Prophet while she was still living with her original husband, Jacobs. Under the same circumstances she married Brigham Young, after Joseph's death. For some time her husband knew nothing of the whole affair, but Brigham very soon gave him to understand that his company was not wanted. The sister of Mrs. Jacobs —a Mrs. Buel—was another of Joseph's wives, and she married the Apostle Heber C. Kimball, but does not appear to have made a very good bargain.

Besides these there is another lady, a Mrs. Shearer—or as she is familiarly called—"Aunty Shearer." She is in every respect a unique specimen of womanhood, tall and angular, with cold yet eager grey eyes, a woman of great volubility, and altogether grim-looking and strong-minded. She was an early disciple and is said to have sacrificed everything for Mormonism. She lived in Joseph Smith's family, and, of course, saw and heard a great deal about Polygamy, and at first it was a great stumbling-block to her. She was, however, instructed by the immaculate Joseph, and so far managed to overcome her feelings as to be married to him for eternity. Like the others she is called "Mrs.," and I suppose there is a Mr. Shearer somewhere, but upon that point she is very reticent. Her little lonely hut is filled with innumerable curiosities and little nick-nacks which some people are for ever hoarding away in the belief that they will come into use some day. She is a woman that one could not easily forget. She wears a muslin cap with a very wide border flapping in the wind under a comical-looking hood, and is easily recognised by her old yellow marten-fur cape and enormous muff: her dress, which is of her own spinning and weaving, is but just wide enough, and its length could never inconvenience her. Add to these personal ornaments a stout pair of brogues, and you will see before you "Aunty Shearer," one of the Prophet's spiritual wives.

I may as well explain what is meant by "spiritual" wives and "proxy" wives.

Marriages contracted by the Gentiles, or by Mormons in accordance with Gentile institutions, are not considered binding by the Saints. That was partly the cause of my indignation and the indignation of many another wife and mother—we were told that we had never been married at all, and that our husbands and our children were not lawfully ours: surely that was enough to excite the indignation of any wife, whatever her faith might be. For a marriage to be valid it must be solemnized in the Endowment House in Salt Lake City, or the persons contracting it can never expect to be husband and wife in eternity. Should the husband die before he reaches Zion, and if the wife loves him sufficiently well to wish to be his in eternity—when she arrives in Salt Lake City, if she receives an offer of marriage from one of the brethren, and does not object to him as a second husband in this world, she will make an agreement with him that she will be his wife for time, but that in eternity she and all her children shall be handed over to the first husband. A woman thus married is called a "proxy" wife. It can well be understood that if the lady had lost her youth and good looks there would be very little chance of her husband seeing her again in eternity, as there would not be too many willing to stand proxy for him, and in that case he would have to depend upon the generosity of friends.

Now "spiritual" wives are of two classes. The one consists of old ladies who have plenty of money or property which of course needs looking after; and generous Elders marry them, and accordingly "look after" that same property, and the owner of it becomes the Elder's spiritual wife. She will only be his real wife in eternity when she is rejuvenated—the prospect of which rejuvenation is, I suppose, very fascinating to some men, for I have known quite youthful Elders who displayed their self-sacrificing spirit by marrying "spiritually" very old, but very wealthy, ladies.

The other kind of "spiritual" wife is one who is married already, but who does not think that her husband can "exalt" her to so high a position in the celestial world as she deserves;—perhaps some kind brother who takes a great interest in her welfare has told her so—she then is secretly "sealed" to one of the brethren who is better able to exalt her—perhaps to this same brother; and in the resurrection she will pass from him who was her husband on earth to him who is to be her husband in heaven—if she has not done so before.

This is what is meant by "proxy" and "spiritual" wives.

I think it will be evident even to the dullest comprehension that under such a system, "the world, the flesh, and the devil" are far more likely to play a prominent part than anything heavenly or spiritual.

All this is so repugnant to the instincts and feelings of a true woman, that I feel quite ashamed to write about it. And yet the working out of this system has produced results which would be perfectly grotesque were it not that they outrage every ordinary sense of propriety. Let me give an example. One of the wives of Brigham Young—Mrs. Augusta Cobb Young—a highly educated and intelligent Boston lady with whom I am intimately acquainted, requested of her Prophet-husband a favor of a most extraordinary description. She had forsaken her lawful husband and family and a happy and luxurious home to join the Saints, under the impression that Brigham Young would make her his queen in heaven. She was a handsome woman—a woman of many gifts and graces, and Brigham thoroughly appreciated her; but she made a slight miscalculation in respect to the Prophet. He cares little enough for his first wife, poor lady, and few people who know him doubt for a moment that he would un-queen her and cut her adrift for time and eternity too, if his avaricious soul saw the slightest prospect of gain by doing so—he did not care for her, but he never would allow himself to be dictated to by any woman. So when the lady of whom I speak asked him to place her at the head of his household, he refused: she begged hard, but he would not relent. Then finding that she could not be Brigham's "queen," and having been taught by the highest Mormon Authorities that our Saviour had, and has, many wives, she requested to be "sealed" to Him! Brigham Young told her (for what reason I do not know) that it really was out of his power to do that, but that he would do "the next best thing" for her—he would "seal" her to Joseph Smith. So she was sealed to Joseph Smith, and though Brigham still supports her and she is called by his name on earth, in the resurrection she will leave him and go over to the original Prophet.

The reader will certainly be shocked at this terrible burlesque of sacred things, but I felt it my duty to state the truth and place facts in their right light. It is not generally known that the Mormons are taught that the marriage at Cana of Galilee was Christ's own nuptial feast, that Mary and Martha were his plural wives, and that those women who in various parts of the New Testament are spoken of as ministering to him stood to him in the same relation.

Malicious first wives, especially if they are rather elderly themselves, frequently call the proxy wives "fixins;" and the tone in which some of them utter the word is in the last degree contemptuous. These poor "fixins" are seldom treated as real wives by the husband himself. He may think sufficiently well of the "proxy" wife to make her his for time and to raise up children to his friend, as the Elders say, but he never forgets that in eternity she will be handed over to the man for whom he has stood proxy, and he expects that she also will bear that in mind, and do all she can for her own support, and never complain of his want of attention to her. Some men, after having married a young proxy wife, have become so enamored that they grew jealous of the dead husband, and have tried to get the wife to break faith with him, and be married to them for eternity as well as time. This was certainly rather mean. Very few Gentile husbands would fret themselves about possibilities in the world to come, if in this world they had the certainty of enjoying the undivided affections of their wives.

Mormon husbands are so influenced by their religion that they neither act nor think like other men. I am thinking of one wretched family that I knew soon after I went to Utah. There was a man and his wife and four children, all living together in a miserable, poverty-stricken hut. I had heard that the man was paying attentions to a young girl with a view to making her his second wife, and I frequently watched the first wife as she went in and out, doing her chores, and wondered how she felt about it. The poverty of the man, of course, was of no consequence; living in the primitive style in which necessity then compelled the Saints to live, one or even half-a-dozen extra wives, made very little difference, and Brigham and the leading Elders have always represented it as a meritorious act, for the young especially, to "build up the kingdom," without regard to consequences, or the misery of bringing up a family in a destitute condition. I never can see children without loving them, and in this case it was not long before I contrived to make acquaintance with the little ones. One day, while I was talking to them, the mother came out. She seemed pleased to see me, for she had heard of me that I was not too strong in the faith, and she told me that her husband had said, in speaking of such women as myself, who did not like the celestial order of marriage, that their husbands ought to force them right into it, and that would show what they were made of : if they were true-hearted women seeking their husband's glory and "exaltation" in the world to come, they would bear it well enough ; and, if not, the sooner it killed them the better ; for if they were dead their husbands could save them in the resurrection, but if they lived they would only be an incumbrance.

This, I found, was the general opinion among the Mormon men. Even in England, the American Elders had taught us that the man was the head and "saviour" of the woman, and that the woman was only responsible to her husband. It was necessary, we were told, that the woman should keep in favor with her lord, otherwise he might withdraw his protection and refuse to take her into the celestial kingdom ; in which case when she got to heaven she would only be an angel ! To be an angel is not considered by the Saints to be by any means the highest state of glory. Those who do not obey the "Celestial Order of Marriage" will, like the angels, neither marry nor be given in marriage ; they will be located, the men in one place, and the women in another, and will serve as slaves, lackeys, and boot-blacks to the Saints. Brigham Young once publicly said of a certain President of the United States, that he would clean the boots of the Mormon leaders in heaven. He did not say this as a figure of speech, but meant it literally. Those who have obeyed the Gospel of the new dispensation, but who have failed to enter into Polygamy will be as upper servants, but the rebellious—the “vile apostates,” and the “wicked Gentiles” will join the angels and do all the drudgery for the men of many wives. Thus I learned in Zion that my youthful notions about the glory of the cherubim were quite a mistake, and that it was not such a fine thing to be an angel, after all.

But I have run away from my story, and had almost forgotten my poor acquaintance. She was a woman who was likely to preserve a painful place in the memory of any one who once saw her. Her face was pale as death, and her jet-black eyes glistened with an unearthly lustre; it was easy to perceive that she was very unhappy, although she tried hard to exhibit a cheerful disposition, and when our conversation turned to that subject which to women here is all-absorbing, the nervous twitching of her pale face showed how deeply painful such thoughts were to her. She told me that her husband was soon to be married to a young girl about fourteen years of age. “Do you see,” she said, “that he is building for her?” And sure enough he was, at odd hours, adding another hut to the miserable hovel in which they already lived; and thither, when it was finished, he intended to take his bride. As I looked at the poor wife, I felt little doubt, that ere that time came, her troubles on earth would have ended and her little ones would be motherless.

The Mormon women, as well as the Mormon men, are noted for attending to their own business—they do not care to tell their sorrows and trials to strangers or to people who are not of their own faith. In this way visitors to Salt Lake who have gone there with the intention of “writing-up” the Saints in the newspapers or in a book, have generally been misled. My own experience as a Mormon woman leads me to form anything but a flattering opinion of the Mormon stories told by Gentile pens. The following instance will show that the sisters are not quite so free in giving their experience as some writers would suggest.

One day, while passing through the city, I saw a young woman running across the road with a little child in her arms. The child was crying piteously, for the water was running from its clothing, and I saw in a moment that it had fallen into the stream which ran in front of the house. I followed, to see if I could be of any assistance, but fortunately found that the little creature was not seriously hurt, but would soon recover from the fright and cold. I helped the mother to change its clothing, and while she was lulling her baby to sleep, we entered into conversation. At first she appeared to be very shy of me, and avoided speaking of anything in the slightest degree personal; but growing more interested, she said at last:

"Are you a Mormon?"

"Certainly," I answered, "but why do you ask me?"

"Because," she said, "We have had one or two Gentile women among us, and they go round among our people and question the women, and get them to tell their troubles, which God knows are heavy enough, and then they go and write about it, and Brigham Young finds it out, and their husbands are called to account for allowing their wives to speak to the Gentiles. You are sure you are a Mormon?" she added, "and you are not deceiving me?"

"I'm sorry you should think such a thing," I said, "but if you suppose I would deceive you, I will not trouble you with my company." And I rose up to leave.

"Do not go yet," she said, "and pray forgive me if I have wounded your feelings; it is simply the fear I have of getting into trouble. Brigham Young and the Elders have frequently told us to have nothing to do with the Gentiles, for they are enemies to the kingdom of God, and are seeking our overthrow—and I suppose it is true."

"How long have you been here?" I asked.

"Over two years," she replied, "and it seems almost twenty—time has passed so slowly. I left father and mother, sisters and brother for the Gospel's sake, and I do not regret it, because it is right, but it was a very great sacrifice to make.

Yet I believe that God blesses us for the sacrifices we make, and I shall get my reward."

"You have it already," I said, "in that pretty child on your knee, and your husband, I hope, is a good man and kind to you."

"Yes," she answered, "my child is a very great source of happiness to me, and I love my husband very much but—" (hesitatingly) "are you in Polygamy?"

"No, not yet, but I do not know how soon my husband may take it into his head to get another wife."

"Are you first wife?" she asked.

"Yes," I replied, "and I suppose you are also?"

"No, I am third wife," she said, "I wish I were first wife."

"But why," I suggested, "do you wish that? If Polygamy is the true order of marriage, I do not see that it makes much difference whether one is the first or the twentieth wife?"

"Oh dear, yes," she replied, "it does make a great deal of difference; for the first wife will be queen over all the others, and reign with her husband. If I had known that before I was married, I should have made my husband promise to place me first. Men can do that if they like."

"But do you think you would be doing right in trying to gain the position of first wife in that way?"

"Why not?" she said, "Didn't Jacob obtain his brother's birthright by deception—and was he ever punished for it? Do you think that Brother Brigham, notwithstanding that he is the inspired servant of God, could have obtained his position, and all his money, by simple honest dealing? If you think so, I don't; and it is just as proper and right for us women to secure a position for ourselves by such means as it is for Brigham Young—the end justifies the means."

"If that is so," I said, "it is a wonder to me that any woman should consent to become second, third, or fourth wife—seeing they cannot be queens."

"I can see that you have not yet had your 'Endowments,'" she said, "or you would understand more about these things, but as you are a good Mormon I can speak freely to you."

You see it is not always those who are first wives in this world who will be first in the celestial kingdom. It all depends upon the amount of sacrifice the wife is capable of making for her husband, her faithfulness to him, and the number of children she has borne him. If she pleases him in every particular and is good, patient, and above all things obedient to all his wishes and commands, then she is almost certain to be made queen, unless the first wife is just as good, and then I don't know how they would fix that. And so you see it is safer to be first wife at once."

"Well but," I asked, "knowing all this, I am surprised that you consented to be third wife!"

"But I did not know it then," she continued. "My husband told me that all the wives were queens—all equal—and he says so still when I talk to him about it. But he can't deceive me. I have spoken to some of the old Nauvoo women who know all about it, and they tell me that all the Polygamic wives will be subject to the first wife; but the first wife, having suffered most, will be the one who has gone through the fire and been purified, and found worthy."

"But do you think that your husband would wish to deceive you about such an important matter?" I said.

"Wait till you have lived a little longer here," she replied, "and you will be able to answer that question yourself, or else your experience will be very different from that of the rest of the people here."

Just then the husband made his appearance, and put an end to the conversation. He was a tall, dark-looking man, with grey hair, old enough to be her father. He appeared to be well educated and to have seen better days, though everything about their home indicated poverty—the room in which we were sitting had no carpet on the floor, there was a plain white-pine table in the middle, a small sheet-iron stove, four wooden chairs, a small looking-glass, and some cheap pictures. This was the sitting-room for the whole family—three wives, eleven children, one husband. He asked me if I had seen the rest of the family.

I replied negatively, and he said he would see if any of them were about. Presently he returned accompanied by an elderly woman whom he introduced as Mrs. Simpson. Then came another, not quite as good-looking as the first, but a great deal younger, and he introduced her as "My wife Ellen. And this one," he said, turning to the one with whom I had been conversing, "is my wife Sarah. Don't you think I have got three fine-looking women?" Then, after a pause, he added: "And they are just as good as they are good-looking—good, obedient wives. I have no trouble with them: my wishes are law in this house. Here you have a family in which the Spirit of God reigns. We are not rich in worldly goods, as you see, but we are laying up treasure in heaven. We all live in this little home of four rooms. My wife Ellen, here, has given up her room for a parlor for us all to meet together in, and she sleeps in a wagon-box; it is not the most comfortable, but she never grumbles. Then, here is our Sarah; we are obliged to humor her a little, and give her a room all to herself. She is young and inexperienced, and doesn't like to put up with the inconveniences that the Saints have to bear with; while old mother here has got to have half-a-dozen children in her room, but she never complains."

"Why did you not wait," I said, "until you had a larger house?"

"Then where would my kingdom be?" he answered, "Young men may wait, but old men must improve their time."

There came in now a troop of children of all ages. They had been playing in the lot, were miserably clad, barefooted, and some looked gaunt and hungry:—manners to match. "These," he said, with all a father's fondness—"these constitute my kingdom, and I am proud of them."

I felt thankful that I was not destined to be queen over such a kingdom, wished them good-bye, and with a sad heart, went home to my own darling little ones not knowing what might be their fate.

CHAPTER XIX.

BRIGHAM YOUNG AT HOME:—WE VISIT THE PROPHET AND HIS WIVES.

Inside the Lion House—The Family-Circle of the Prophet—A Gracious Reception—A Woman's Description of Brigham Young—His Early Life and Struggles—Working for "Six Bits" a Day—How he "Ate Up all the Corn"—How he Worked as a Painter and Glazier—Born at the Right Time—Brigham Young's Character Summed Up—How he Obtained his Position—The Twelve Apostles of Mormonism—Intrigues for Place and Power—Pulling the Nose of a Queen—Delivered Over to "The Buffetings of Satan"—Poor Sidney!—The "First Presidency"—Yearly Elections—A Foe to Education—What Boys and Girls Should Learn—An Unfortunate Musical Society—Moral Delinquencies of the Prophet—Borrowing Clothes for a Conference—How a Million Dollars were Borrowed and Paid!—Brigham's Avarice, Cowardice, and Thiefts—A Terrible Despotism—Lost Opportunities.

SHORTLY after our arrival in Salt Lake City we visited President Young, who received us very graciously and appointed an early day for us to dine with him.

On that occasion he invited some of the Apostles and leading men to meet us at his table, and we passed an exceedingly pleasant evening. The Prophet made himself very affable; talked with us about our missionary life and other subjects of personal and general interest; and expressed a high opinion of the energy and ability which my husband had displayed. His wives, too,—who I found, as far as I could judge from such a casual acquaintance, to be amiable and kind-hearted ladies,—made every effort to render our visit agreeable.

I was much pleased with the manner and appearance of Brigham Young, and felt greatly re-assured ; for he did not seem to me like a man who would preach and practice such things as I had heard of him while I was in London. This I was glad to see, for it encouraged me to think that, perhaps, after all, matters might not be so bad as I had anticipated. We were, in fact, very kindly received in Salt Lake City by every one with whom we came in contact ; for having been Missionaries for so many years, we were, of course, well known by name, and had a wide circle of acquaintances among the chief Elders and emigrants.

Fifteen years have, of course, worked a great change in the appearance of Brigham Young ; but though he is now nearly seventy-three years of age, he is still a portly-looking—I might almost say handsome man. His good looks are not of the poetic or romantic kind at all ; he is very common-place and practical in his appearance, but long and habitual exercise of despotic authority has stamped itself upon his features, and is seen even in the way he carries himself :—he might without any stretch of the imagination be mistaken for a retired sea-captain.

When I first knew him in appearance he was little over fifty years of age, was of medium height, well built, upright, and, as I just stated, with the air of one accustomed to be obeyed. His hair was light,—sandy, I suppose I ought to call it,—with eyes to match ; and the expression of his countenance was pleasant and manly. I, of course, regarded him from a woman's stand-point ; but there were others who were accustomed to study physiognomy, and they detected—or thought they detected—in the cold expression of his eye and the stern, hard lines of his lips, evidences of cruelty, selfishness, and dogged determination which, it is only fair to say, I myself never saw.

The lines on his face have deepened of late years, as what little of gentleness his heart ever knew has died out within him ; but still he presents the appearance of a man who would afford a deep study to the observer of human nature. In early life he had to work hard for a living, and according to his own statement he had a rough time of it. He was, by trade, a painter and glazier, and has frequently said in public that in those times he was glad to work for "six bits" a day, and to keep his hands busy from morning to night to get even that. Whether or not the privations of early years fostered in him that avaricious and grasping spirit which of late years has been so conspicuous in him, I cannot say, but it is certain that it cropped out very early in his career as a Saint. An old Nauvoo Missionary,—a Mormon of the Mormons once, but now, alas! a "vile apostate" as Brigham would politely call him,—once told me that when the Prophet Joseph Smith sent the Apostle Young on Mission, a good deal of discontent was shown that the said Apostle did not account properly for the collections and tithings which passed through his hands. Brother Joseph who was then "the Church" suggested in a pleasant way—for the Prophet Smith was a big, jovial fellow, six feet two or three inches in height, and withal somewhat of a humorist—that the said Apostle Brigham would appear in his eyes a better Saint if he displayed a little less love for filthy lucre. Thereupon the Apostle, like somebody else who shall be nameless, quoted Scripture and reminded the Prophet that Moses had said "Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn." "True, Brother Brigham," said Joseph, "but Moses did not say the ox was to eat up all the corn." Brother Brigham made no reply, but is said to have "sulked" for two or three days.

Brigham Young

I have not the slightest doubt that, but for Mormonism, the Prophet would have remained all his life a journeyman painter, and his "sweetness," as the poet says, would have been wasted "on the desert air." But he was born just at the right time, and he fitted into the right groove; and thus, while, the original Prophet of the new faith—Joseph Smith—a man of ten times the intellect of his successor, a man ignorant and deluded, it is true, but, at the same time, a man in whom was the material for one of those natural giants who from age to age have left the impress of their individuality upon the history of the world;—while, I say, this man's name and doings have ceased to interest any but persons of studious mind—Brigham Young, whose narrow soul could never look beyond the little circle in which he lived; whose selfishness and heartlessness have been only equalled by his cruelty and degrading avarice, has, by the force of circumstances alone, obtained a place in the recognition of the world, to which by nature or by grace he had not the shadow of a claim.

I have often heard intelligent Gentiles remark “Well, Brigham Young may be a wicked man and an impostor, but there must be a great deal of talent in him, to manage those people for so many years.”

From this opinion I altogether dissent; and those who know Brigham best, think with me, though many of them would not dare to say so. I do not think Brigham Young a wicked man or an impostor in the sense in which those words are ordinarily used; and experience, and a careful study of his life and doings, have convinced me that he is certainly not a great man or a man of genius in any sense of the word. There can be no doubt that he has been guilty of many and great crimes, but I believe that in the early part of his career he was so blinded by fanaticism that those crimes appeared to him actually virtues:—the force of habit and the daily associations of his life have so completely taken from him all sense of right and wrong; while the devotion of his people has made the idea that he could possibly do the slightest wrong so utterly inconceivable to him and to them; that his perceptions of justice, truth, honor, honesty, and upright dealing are as utterly stultified as they ever were in the mind of the wildest savage who prowled among the cliffs and cañons of the Rocky Mountains.

People think that Brigham Young attained to his present position by the exercise of ability, such as has been displayed, only on a greater scale, by all those men, who, not being born to power, nor having it thrust upon them, have by the force of their genius seized it and held it—unlawfully it might be, but, nevertheless, with talent and moral energy.

Nothing could be more untrue. The fact that he was of a certain age at a certain time, and only that, was the cause of Brother Brigham's first step up the ladder of ambition. Joseph Smith endeavored, in organising his newly-invented religion, to make it resemble as much as was possible both the old and new dispensations of Christianity, and among other institutions he appointed "Twelve Apostles" who were to assist in governing the Church. He associated with himself his elder brother, Hyrum, and also Sidney Rigdon, who had so greatly assisted in every way to establish the new faith and define its principles. This Rigdon is the same who has always been suspected of the authorship of the Book of Mormon, though it must be admitted that nothing more than circumstantial evidence can be adduced in support of this statement. However that might be, the two Smiths, Joseph and Hyrum, and Sidney Rigdon formed what was called the "First Presidency"—in other words they were "the Church." Next in order to them came the "Twelve Apostles," and after them the "Seventies," and the other grades of the Priesthood, of which I shall say more presently. The "Twelve Apostles" were first appointed according to a plan of Joseph's own—Lyman Johnson was placed first, Brigham Young came next, and the others followed. Not long after, however, Joseph made a new arrangement, and placed the Twelve according to their age, and this plan was always followed subsequently. Thomas B. Marsh now stood first, and next to him came David Patten, and then Brigham Young.

I am obliged to give these little details, in order that the reader may understand Brigham's position after the death of Joseph Smith.

When Joseph was murdered in Carthage Jail, with his brother Hyrum, Sidney Rigdon alone remained of the First Presidency.

At that time Thomas B. Marsh, the first of the Apostles, had apostatised ; David Patten had been killed in a fight with the mob ; and, consequently, Brigham Young was now President of the Twelve—he being the next in age. Thus it will be seen that even had he been (which he was not) the most stupid and least fitted of all the Apostles to preside over the Church, his years would nevertheless have given him the leadership.

Up to this time there is no evidence that any idea of becoming head of the Church had ever entered into Brigham's mind. Indeed it is reported that Joseph on one occasion, reproving him, said ironically that if ever the Church had the misfortune to be led by Brother Brigham, he would lead it to—well, a place which is understood to be uncomfortably warm. But Joseph was now dead, and Rigdon alone remained between the Apostle Young and the headship of the Church. Then it was that his eyes appear for the first time to have been fully opened to the advantages of his position.

Now when the ancients took the fox as an emblem of craftiness, it was because they had never known Brigham. Brigham worked cautiously and prudently, for he probably is one of the greatest cowards in existence, both morally and physically, and like all cowards he was perfectly au fait in working in the dark. In accomplishing the removal of Rigdon, Rigdon himself was Brigham's best assistant. A man of prudence, or even of common sense, might have safely held his position against all the Brighams in the world, but prudence and common sense were qualities utterly unknown to Rigdon. He began to have wonderful visions and revelations, announced the immediate ending of the world, and stated that he would forthwith lead out the armies of the Lord to the battle of Armageddon, in Palestine, and then return in triumph, calling by the way, as he said, "to pull the nose of little Vic.!" "Little Vic." was the English Queen—then a young woman—but how she incurred Rigdon's wrath, I do not know. In addition to all this absurd nonsense, he ordained some of his particular friends to be prophets, priests, and kings, and otherwise showed that he intended to carry matters with a high hand.

Brigham watched his chance, and when he considered that matters were ripe for a change, by dint of secret manœuvring, he caused Rigdon to be tried before the "High Council" at Nauvoo. Rigdon sent word that he was sick, and could not come, but the trial went on, and of course it could have but one ending. The result was—as the Mormon papers at the time reported—that: “Elder Young arose and delivered Sidney Rigdon over to the buffetings of Satan, for a thousand years, in the name of the Lord; and all the people said, Amen.”

Poor Sidney! He tried to set up a church for himself, and a good many people followed him, but the attempt was a failure. He is now a very old man, and cannot live long, but he still believes in the truth of Mormonism, as established by Joseph Smith.

Brigham's next step was to declare that the government of the Church was now vested in the Twelve, of whom he was the head. Later still he contrived, by selecting a time when nearly all of the Apostles would be promoted or in some way gratified by a change in the organisation of the Church, to get himself elected President of the Church, in the place of Joseph, with the two Apostles next under him as his associates, under the name of “counsellors;” and they together formed the First Presidency. Thus Brigham became in name, as well as in fact, the head of the Mormon Church.

Every year, Brother Brigham, in common with all the other officers of the Church, is duly re-elected; I need hardly say that the re-election is a matter of course—an opposition candidate would stand but a poor chance of success.

Brigham Young is an uneducated man. For that, of course, he is not deserving of blame, but his opposition to education in others and to all that is intellectual and elevating does him little credit. Only a very few years ago he with his two “Counsellors,”—Heber C. Kimball and Jedediah M. Grant, who were both spoken of as model Saints,—held forth in the Tabernacle, in the most unmeasured language, against schools and scholastic acquirements of every description. They were all three untaught men, and like all persons of small mind who have not themselves received any education, they hated and affected to despise those who had. Thoughtful men, although they may never have enjoyed the advantages of literary culture, never fail to see the great power that it is, either for good or evil; and in most cases they try to secure for their children the blessing of which they themselves have been denied. But the Mormon leaders, while they ridiculed and affected to despise men of education, were shrewd enough to see that if schools were established and the children of the Saints permitted to attend them, the bonds of superstition would certainly be shaken and the fabric of Mormonism undermined. They, consequently, discouraged every attempt at self-improvement, and taught the people to aspire to nothing higher for their children than the rudiments of reading, writing, and arithmetic for the boys, and a knowledge of household, dairy, and farm work for the girls.

Before the "Reformation" a few young men anxious to improve their minds, organised what they called the "Literary and Musical Society." They gave pleasant social entertainments to their friends at which they gave recitations, read essays, poems, and other literary productions, varying the programme with selections of music. The authorities looked upon the whole proceeding with disfavor, and soon broke up the society. Not content with this, and in order to show their contempt, they humiliated the members in every possible way, even publicly pointing them out to ridicule, and appointing a good many of them to be door-keepers in the Tabernacle. Brigham Young, who it is said, never in his life read a book, could not understand that they could find any pleasure in intellectual amusements, and accused them of pride, conceit, and even wickedness. Among the Church leaders it is even now common to speak of any one who has any literary acquirements as "having the big head," and being "next door to apostacy."

Recently greater efforts to obtain a good education for their children have been made by the more intelligent among the Saints, and the Gentiles in Utah have established some very excellent schools. A library and reading-room have also been opened, and the latter has been well attended by the young men, both Mormons and Gentiles. Brigham himself has with his usual inconsistency even gone so far as to give to his own children those advantages which he selfishly denied to his poorer brethren.

Of the Prophet's moral character, the less said the better. He has been remorseless and cruel in his enmities, and he has connived at and even suggested, if nothing more, some of the most atrocious crimes that have ever been perpetrated on the face of the earth. In business matters, in the payment of money—to use a popular phrase—his word is as good as his bond, but in the accumulation of wealth he has evinced an amount of dishonesty which can scarcely be credited. Brigham always meets his obligations, and pays his debts, and gets a lawful receipt:—the prophetic business could not otherwise be carried on; but the way in which he has obtained his wealth would put to the blush the most dishonest member of any “ring” in New York, or elsewhere. When he attended his first Conference, he says he had to borrow certain masculine garments and a pair of boots before he could put in an appearance. Now it would be difficult to estimate the value of his property. He has taken up large tracts of land all over the Territory, he has the uncontrolled and unquestioned command of all the tithing and contributions of the Saints, and from gifts and confiscations, and innumerable other sources, his revenue pours in. It was once rumored that he had eighteen or twenty millions of dollars in the Bank of England; but Brigham said that the report was not true. “The Church,” he added, had a little money invested abroad. The difference between “The Church” and the individual Brigham Young has yet to be determined.

In the year 1852 the “Prophet of the Lord” found that he had borrowed an inconveniently large sum from the funds of the Church. He is “Trustee in Trust” and, of course, legally responsible; but he never renders an account of his stewardship, and no one ever asks him for it. His sense of honesty was, however, so strong that he resolved to have his account balanced, and he went down to the Tithing-Office for that purpose. There he found that his indebtedness amounted to two hundred thousand dollars, and he proceeded to pay it after his own fashion:—the clerk was instructed to place to his credit the same amount "for services rendered." In 1867, he owed very nearly one million dollars, which he had borrowed from the same fund, and he balanced his account in the same way. His contract for the Pacific Railroad is said to have yielded him a quarter of a million, and his other contracts and mining speculations, purchases and thefts of lands, houses, &c., have been very profitable. The expenses of such a family as Brother Brigham's must be something enormous, but the contributions which by honest and dishonest means he has levied have been so large that he must still be one of the wealthiest men in the States.

Brigham is not a generous man. He has given occasionally, as for instance at the time of the Chicago fire, when he presented a thousand dollars for the sufferers, but even then his motive was evident—the affairs of "Deseret" were under discussion in Congress. Without the certainty of a profitable return, Brigham never gave a cent. The story of his sordid avarice and his contemptible meanness in the accumulation of money would fill a volume.

Morally and physically the Prophet is a great coward. When he and other Church leaders were arrested a year or two ago, charged with the very gravest crimes, the effect upon the Prophet was most distressing. He had solemnly sworn in the Tabernacle that he would shoot the man who attempted to arrest him; but when Judge McKean opened court and placed him under arrest he swallowed his threats and played the coward's part. Before this the world has seen wretches who were notorious for their cruelty and tyranny, and who were also remarkable for their cowardice. For many years he has imitated royalty and has had a strong body-guard to keep watch and ward around his person every night. No man has less cause to apprehend personal violence than Brother Brigham, but the voice of conscience, which, as the poet says, makes cowards of us all, suggests his fears.

No one, probably, ever possessed and lost greater opportunities of doing good and leaving behind him an enviable record than Brother Brigham. In him the Saints, from the smallest to the greatest, placed implicit trust, and it was in his power to mould them at his will. The spiritual and temporal welfare of the people was in his hands. The ability to elevate them socially, mentally, and morally was his. A great trust was committed to his charge. But he has basely betrayed that sacred trust, and has not only left undone what he should have performed, but he has been guilty of the most grievous wrong-doing. He has set at nought all morality with his horrible and debasing teachings respecting a "blood-atonement"—in other words, the duty of assassination. He has outraged decency and riven asunder the most sacred social and domestic ties by his shameless introduction of Polygamy. He has sacrilegiously defiled the temple of God, by teaching his followers to worship Adam as their divinity, and has robbed Christ of his birthright by proclaiming that men are the only saviours of their wives and that in respect to women the sacrifice of our Lord was of no direct avail. In a word—both by his preaching and his practice he has set an example so bad as to be utterly without parallel in this civilised age. Kings and emperors there are who hold in slavery the persons of men: hierarchs there are who hold in bondage the souls of the deluded. But the despot meddles not with the eternal welfare of his subject, nor does he pollute the sacred precincts of the hearth and home; and the false priest is not permitted to meddle with temporal affairs. But the Mormon despot—Brigham Young—has played the tyrant in both spiritual and worldly matters,—has meddled with the person, the property, and the lives and the liberty of his dupes; and has at the same time debased and enslaved their souls.

But let it not be supposed that I write this hastily, or without due consideration. People outside of Utah may be deceived, as indeed they frequently are, by representations made in ignorance of what Mormonism and the Prophet really are. But the Gentiles long resident in Utah, the Apostates, and even the Mormon people themselves, if only they would tell the truth, could testify to the truthfulness of the picture which I have drawn of Brother Brigham.

A better people—aside from their religion—than the believing Mormons when they emigrated to Utah, it would be difficult to find. Their fault was in their faith. They were honest, sober, industrious, and ready to sacrifice everything to what they considered religious duty. I cannot think of them and of the implicit confidence which they placed in Brigham, without wondering at his folly in throwing away the noble opportunity, which was once within his grasp, of establishing a happy and contented people. Instead of this he has gathered wealth to himself and family; out of the poverty of his followers he has amassed enormous riches, and with the power to leave behind him a name as one of the benefactors of the human race, he has set the worst example which despot or false prophet ever presented to the world.

THE wives of Brigham Young have always been subjects of interest to Gentiles who visited Zion ; and having spoken of their husband, I think it is only fair that I should say a few words about them.

For many years I have known personally all the Prophet's wives who reside in Salt Lake City, and I wish to speak of them with kindness and respect. They are women whom any one would esteem—conscientious, good, earnest women ; faithful, true-hearted wives, who have devoted their lives to the carrying out of what they believe is the revealed will of God.

When I first knew Brother Brigham, poor man, he had only sixteen living with him in Salt Lake City; and even now he has no more than nineteen! Perhaps I ought to say eighteen, since Eliza-Ann has run away from him and left the poor old gentleman desolate and forlorn. The three whom he took after I came to Utah, were Amelia Folsom, Mary Van Cott Cobb, and Eliza-Ann. But the reader will perhaps be interested in hearing about them all, and so I will state the names and order of the ladies as they at present stand—according to the date of their marriage; making mention of the proxy wives last of all, for the sake of convenience and without reference to date. Of course Brother Brigham has had many more than nineteen wives, but the following are the living ladies: others are dead or have strayed away, no one knew whither, and perhaps, as Brother Heber once said to me, nobody cared.

Allow me to introduce the Mrs. Young.

MRS. MARY ANN ANGELL YOUNG.

[Number One.]

First in order is Mrs. Mary Ann Angell Young, but she is not the first wife that Brother Brigham ever had. Once upon a time, Brother Brigham was a Methodist; but after listening to the preaching of the Mormon Missionaries he became a vile apostate—as he loves to call those who leave his present faith—and he forsook Methodism. In those days, before he apostatised, and long before he ever dreamed of Polygamy, he had but one wife—one only! It must seem strange to the Prophet to look back to that period of solitary existence. His second wife was Mrs. Angell Young; and I call her his first wife because she is the first of those living now. As she was married to him after the death of his first wife, she is, of course, his legal wife, and would be recognised as such in any civilised country. She is a very fine-looking old lady and very much devoted to her unfaithful lord and master, firmly believing in his divine mission. She lives by herself and is seldom troubled with a visit from her affectionate spouse.

Once in a while Brigham brings her out to a party when he has invited any Gentiles, just for appearance sake. Quite a number of persons in Utah believe that she is dead, so very little is seen and known of her. She lives in the White House—Brigham's first residence in Salt Lake City—and is much thought of by those who do know her. Her children are greatly attached to her, and show her a great deal of attention, making up in this way, to a certain extent, for her husband's neglect ; her three sons, Joseph A., Brigham—who it is expected will succeed his father as President of the Church—and John W., as well as her two daughters, Alice and Luna, are all in Polygamy. Each of the sons has three wives ; and each of the daughters has a half-sister as a partner in her husband's affections. Brigham has not the slightest objection to giving two of his daughters to the same husband.

LUCY DECKER SEELY YOUNG.

[Number Two.]

Lucy Decker Seely Young was his first wife in Polygamy. Her former husband was a Mr. Seely. She is short and stout, a very excellent mother and a devoted wife. Her son, Brigham Heber, is now one of the cadets at West Point. The sending of this young man to West Point to be educated, when it was noticed in the public papers, excited some little interest, and the faith of many of the good Mormons was very much shaken by it. They had believed that Brigham really meant what he taught when he told the people not to allow their children to associate with the Gentiles, as it would cause them to lose "the spirit." But they were still further shocked when they learned that several other sons of Brigham were to go to the Eastern States to be educated. They have yet to learn that the Prophet does not intend them to do as he does but rather as he tells them. My own opinion is that Brother Brigham has advocated one course of conduct for the people while he pursued another himself.

CLARA DECKER YOUNG.

[Number Three.]

Clara Decker Young is the third wife. She is a sister of Lucy Seely, and like her is short and stout, but otherwise good-looking. She is more than twenty years younger than her lord, with whom she was once quite a favorite, but like many others, she has "had her day"—to use Brigham's own expression—and is now, as a matter of course, neglected.

HARRIET COOK YOUNG.

[Number Four.]

Harriet Cook Young, is tall, with light hair and blue eyes, and is an intelligent but not at all a refined woman. She is said to have given a great deal of trouble to Brother Brigham, of whom she has frequently said very hard things. In times past she had the reputation of being a good deal more than a match for her husband when she had any cause of offence against him, but in her quiet moments she is a very sincere Mōrmon. She has only one son—Oscar Young—now about twenty-five years of age. When he was born, Brigham kindly announced to her that because she was not obedient she should have no more children, and during more than a quarter of a century he has kept his word. Why she has remained with him so long is a mystery, for she makes no secret of her feelings towards him.

LUCY BIGELOW YOUNG.

[Number Five.]

Lucy Bigelow Young is quite a fine-looking woman—tall and fair, and still quite young. She has three pretty daughters. Brigham has recently sent her to live in southern Utah.

MRS. TWISS YOUNG.

[Number Six.]

Mrs. Twiss Young has no children, but she is a very good housewife, and Brigham appreciates her accordingly, and has given her the position of housekeeper in the Lion House. Women have two great privileges in the Mormon Church—they may ask a man to marry them, if they chance to fancy him, and if they don't like him afterwards they are able to obtain a divorce for the moderate sum of ten dollars, which sum the husband is expected to pay. Mrs. Twiss exercised the first privilege in reference to Brother Brigham, but has not yet availed herself of the last. There are other ladies who thought it would be a great honor to be called the wives of the Prophet, and they have requested him to allow them to be called by his name. This he has done, but he has never troubled them with his society.

MARTHA BOWKER YOUNG.

[Number Seven.]

Martha Bowker Young is a quiet little body, with piercing dark eyes, and very retiring. Brother Brigham acts towards her as if he had quite forgotten that he had ever married her, and she lives in all the loneliness of married spinsterhood.

HARRIET BARNEY SEAGERS YOUNG.

[Number Eight.]

Harriet Barney Seagers Young, the eighth wife, is a tall, fine-looking woman. She was another man's wife when Brigham made love to her. It is not supposed to be the correct thing for a Saint to court his neighbor's wife, but the Prophet did so in the case of Harriet Barney, and in several other cases too. Harriet was married to a respectable young Mormon gentleman, but after she had lived with him some time and had borne three children to him, the Prophet persuaded her to join his ranks, and she did so, believing that the word of the Prophet was the revelation of the Lord to her, but she has since had bitter cause to repent of her folly. To a Gentile mind such an infatuation must appear very strange, but the Mormon people personally understand the powerful influence which their religion exercises over them, and to them there is nothing very singular in all this.

ELIZA BURGESS YOUNG.

[Number Nine.]

Eliza Burgess Young is the only English wife that Brigham has. She fell in love with the Prophet, wanted him to marry her, and even offered to wait, like Jacob, for seven years if she might be his at last. So she served in the family of her lord for the appointed time, and he finally took her to wife as a recompense for her faithfulness. She has added one son to the Prophet's kingdom.

SUSAN SNIVELY YOUNG.

[Number Ten.]

The tenth wife on my list is Susan Snively Young. She is a German woman—smart, active, and industrious. She has no children, but has been quite a help-meet to her husband in making butter and cheese, in which she excels. Smart Mormons have always had an eye to business, and while living up to their privileges have not invariably sought for wives who were only fair and pleasant to look upon, but have frequently taken them for their own intrinsic worth:—one as a good dairymaid, another as a good cook, a third as a good laundress, and a fourth as a lady to grace the parlor—perhaps even two or three of this last kind, if the Saint were wealthy. There is a good deal of practical wisdom in this. Brother Brigham has gathered of all sorts into his net, and has then sorted them out, placing each lady in the place where he considered she would be most useful and profitable to himself.

MARGARET PIERCE YOUNG.

[Number Eleven.]

Margaret Pierce Young is very lady-like, tall, and genteel. She has the appearance of being very unhappy, and it is certain that she has been very much neglected, but not more so than many of the other wives. She has one son.

EMMELINE FREE YOUNG.

[Number Twelve.]

When first I went to Utah, Emmeline Free Young was the reigning favorite, and she was really the handsomest of Brigham's wives—tall and graceful, with curling hair, beautiful eyes, and fair complexion. Brigham was as fond of her, at the time, as a man of his nature, with such a low estimate of woman, could be. But a younger, though not a handsomer, rival soon captivated his fickle heart, and he left poor Emmeline to mourn in sorrow. She has never been herself since then, and probably never will be—she is a broken-hearted woman. She is the mother of quite a numerous family, and doubtless, as she had been the favorite for so long a time, she had come to believe that her husband would never seek another love. But, if this was so, she sadly miscalculated Brigham, for when his licentious fancy was attracted to another object of affection he cast off Emmeline as ruthlessly as he would an old garment. What decent person could refrain from loathing such a man! How often has my heart gone out in sympathy towards that poor, wrecked woman whom he had forsaken; what a pity I deemed it that so much love should be wasted upon a creature who could never understand or appreciate it. And yet Emmeline's fate has been no worse than that of the others; but I was more with her, and saw how keenly she suffered, and I sympathised with her when her sorrows brought her nearly to the point of death.

AMELIA FOLSOM YOUNG.

[Number Thirteen.]

Amelia Folsom Young is now the favorite, and it is supposed that she will continue to be so, for at last poor Brother Brigham has found a woman of whom he stands in dread. It is doubtful whether he loves her, but nobody in Zion doubts that he fears her. It is said that the Prophet has confided so many of his secrets to Amelia that he is obliged to submit to her tyranny, for fear of her leaving him, and exposing some of his little ways which would not bear the light. Be that as it may, it is generally believed that after all his matrimonial alliances he has at last found his master in the person of Amelia. Even good Saints—friends of the Prophet—secretly enjoy the idea of him being at last brought under petticoat government, for it is believed that Brigham used unfair means to obtain her, and that at last he only gained his object by deluding her into the belief that the Lord had revealed to him that it was her duty to become his wife. One thing is very certain—he was as crazy over her as a silly boy over his first love, much to the disgust of his more sober brethren who felt rather ashamed of the folly of their leader. At the theatre a seat was reserved for her at his side, and in the ball-room the same special attention was shown to her. He would open the ball, and, after dancing with each of his other wives who might be present—simply for appearance sake—the remainder of the evening was devoted to her. For all that, his inconstant heart could not remain faithful to her, and old habits and feelings, to all appearance, have come over him again, and he has gone astray.

Julia Dean, the actress, was the first to draw him from Amelia's side, and it would have been a sorry day for Amelia if Julia had favored the Prophet's suit. Then the charms of Mary Van Cott touched his sensitive heart, to say nothing of Eliza-Ann, his last but yet not his best-beloved.

With all this experience, and the constant evidences of the fickleness of Brother Brigham's heart before her eyes, there is no wonder that poor Amelia feels compelled to hold tight the reins, now that they are in her own hands, for, if it is not much to be known as Brigham's wife, it is a great deal to be known as his favorite. As for the future—it is whispered that Brother Brigham has lately been "setting his house in order," and in the ordinary course of nature, Amelia is almost certain to outlive for many years her aged lord, she therefore can afford to wait for the good time coming. But Amelia knows that she would sink into oblivion if he were to cast her off for another before his death.

MRS. JOHN W. YOUNG

WIFE OF BRIGHAMS APOSTATE SON

MARY VAN COTT COBB YOUNG.

[Number Fourteen.]

Mary Van Cott Cobb—who became Brigham's wife after his marriage to Amelia—is a very handsome woman, about twenty-eight years of age. She is tall, slender, and graceful, and has been married to the Prophet about six years. At first he appeared to be very devoted to her, but Amelia soon put a stop to that. Nevertheless, she has since her marriage presented a little daughter to her lord, greatly to the annoyance of Amelia, who has no children, and who is reported to have said some naughty things about the matter, which was very wrong of her, for Mary Van Cott is known by every one to be beyond reproach or suspicion. She is said to be very unhappy, and though Brigham has provided her with a fine house and every comfort, yet she seldom sees him—not perhaps more than once in three months, or so—though it is generally believed that his spirit is willing, but Amelia won't allow it.

ELIZA-ANN WEBB DEE YOUNG.

[Number Fifteen.]

Eliza-Ann Webb Dee Young, whose separation from Brigham Young has attracted so much public attention has told her own story in her own words which, as it forms an interesting page in the biography of the Prophet, I shall now present, exactly as it was written, to the reader :

I was living on my father's farm in Little Cottonwood, when, in the summer of 1867, Brigham Young informed my father that he wanted me for a wife. Brigham, with a number of the Apostles and Elders from this city, was visiting Cottonwood on a Sunday and held two meetings for preaching. It was at the close of the forenoon service on that occasion that he walked up to me and said "Had I not better accompany you home." I said, "Certainly, if you wish to." On the way to my father's house Brigham asked me if I had had any proposals of marriage since I had obtained a divorce from my first husband. I answered him, "Yes, that I had had several proposals." He then asked if there was any one of them that I wished to accept. I said, "No," on which he said that he would like to give me a little advice. He advised me not to wait to marry a person whom I loved, but to marry some good man whom I could respect and look up to and receive good counsel from.

I thanked him for his counsel, and as my home was so near to the place of meeting, the conversation abruptly terminated. I thought nothing further of it. His brother Joseph and George Q. Cannon joined us at the dinner table, and while there Brigham and the others remarked how youthful I had grown since I had got out of my former troubles. As I had much improved in every way I did not regard his observations as any intended compliment or any indication of what afterwards I learned to be passing in his mind.

At the close of the afternoon service he went up to my father, took him aside and talked for at least two hours to him about me, and told him how that he had watched me from my infancy, saw me grow up to womanhood, had always loved me and intended to marry me, but having taken Amelia just after the law was passed in Congress prohibiting polygamy, he feared to take another wife soon after, lest it should make trouble, or he would have taken me then. My marriage with a young man was unlooked-for to him, and when he was made acquainted with it he did not just like to stop it, he said, and so he let it go on, but always hoped that the time would come when he would have me.

He wanted father and mother to use all their influence with me, as it would be the best thing I could do. He asked father if a good house, well furnished, and $1,000 a year pocket money would be enough for me, and added that if it was not enough I should have more. Father answered that he thought it would be sufficient.

Brigham stood two hours or more with father and kept the whole of the carriages that conveyed the party standing waiting till after sundown, and little did I think that I was "the object of interest."

When father came home he told mother by herself; then they told me. I cannot describe my feelings; I was frightened. The thought of it was a perfect horror. I thought father had gone crazy, and I would not believe his statement for hours. When I realised that it was a fact I could do nothing but cry.

The idea of an old man, sixty-seven years of age, the husband of about twenty wives living, asking me, at twenty-two, to be added to the number filled me with the utmost abhorrence, and when I saw that my parents were under his influence and sustained his proposition, I was ready to die in despair. Oh! the horrible hours that I spent in crying and moaning, no tongue can picture.

When father saw that I took it so badly he told me that I would not be forced into it, but if I could bring my feelings to it and accept Brigham it would be pleasing to him, and mother favored it in the same way.

About a month after this I was in the city with an intimate lady friend, and as we were walking near to Brigham's house he came to the gate and waited for our arrival. When I saw him I thought that I would get up courage to tell him that I would not marry him, but I could not say it. That peculiar influence that he throws over everybody when he has a purpose to effect completely overcame me. He did not allude to the subject at all. I shook hands and passed on.

He became very kind to my parents, and saw father frequently. He sent for me to come to the city on several occasions and met me at my father's city residence, and talked to me about marriage; told me how pure his feelings were, and that his only motive was to do me good, save me in the kingdom and make me a queen. All that had no effect upon me ; it only disgusted me the more, and the fear that I dared not resist him never left me. This continued for nearly a year. My eldest brother had had some business transactions with Brigham and one of his sons, which resulted in trouble and ultimately in financial injury to my brother. Brigham had been very angry with him and threatened to cut him off from the Church. I heard of those threats, and believing at that time in Mormonism, I heard them with deep sorrow, and confess that, in hopes of turning Brigham's anger away from my brother, I began to entertain the thought that I would yield to his request. I argued as many inexperienced persons do, that as I had had a sorrowful life and my heart was crushed, my future life was nothing, and if I could sacrifice myself for my brother's interest and please my parents, I would at last submit.

Finally, Brigham named the marriage day and informed me, through my father, that what I required in preparation for my marriage he would furnish ; but I would accept nothing. A day before my marriage he brought me three dress patterns—one silk and two merino—and handed to me a purse with a $50 bill.

On the —— April, 1868, I was married to him in the Endowment House by Heber C. Kimball, his First Counsellor. My father and mother were present, with others. Brigham's brother Joseph also took to himself a wife at the same time. After the ceremony I walked over with him to the conference, and in the evening I returned to my father's house and remained there for a month.

For the first few months I had considerable of his attention ; his visits were frequent ; after that his business cares so occupied him, he said, that he could only call about once in three months. After that he came "just as it happened."

When I was married he wanted my mother to live with me in the city, and a year from the marriage he sent us to take charge of his farm, where we remained till last August, and I removed again into the city. While I was at the farm he came very seldom to see me, and oftentimes while he would visit and look round at the farm he never came into the house. I had caused him no trouble ; indeed, he had said I was the best wife he had, for I had never given him a cross word or look. But for that good temper I take no credit, for my silence was all through fear. I never loved him and never said to him that I loved him. I looked upon him as a heartless despot.

From the very beginning of my married association with Brigham Young his manner of providing for me was of the meanest character. I had to come up, even from the farm, four miles distant, to the commissary of his family, and was glad when I could get five pounds of sugar, one-quarter of a pound of tea, a bar of soap and a pound of candles. That I would get about once a month. About a year ago I complained to him that I had not sugar enough and he allowed me what I required.

When I returned to the city he furnished me a house in a very ordinary way and I continued to live in the best manner I could. But it was the same stingy way. When a beef was killed I got some fresh meat ; but I was frequently months without seeing it.

Tired with this manner of existence, I asked his permission to keep boarders, with the view of aiding myself and procuring for one of my sons a musical instrument, as he was passionately fond of music. The permission was granted, and I kept boarders from last March. My house was small, and the business was not very lucrative. I consequently went to him, six weeks ago, and asked him to aid me—to give me some assistance to make life tolerable. He seemed angry, and complained that he had so many expenses and that he wanted me to keep myself—to take the money that I had saved to buy an organ for my son and keep myself and family with it. I got a stove out of him, but that was all. During the last year I only obtained from him two calico dresses. This interview made me sick and I was in bed for a week, with heart sickness. One of the boarders—who was a lawyer—and his wife, asked what ailed me, and I told the story of my troubles and inquired if there was no redress. He said that he thought that there was and he would consult with other lawyers and see what could be done. During all my sickness, while I was his wife, he showed the utmost indifference. He would hear what I had to say, but make almost no answer. Last fall I was attacked with pleurisy, and I managed to get to his office to see him to tell him how ill I was and that I needed some few things. He appeared to comprehend something and finally called "John," the commissary for the family, and told him to get me two bits worth of fresh meat. He has not been inside my house for nearly a year.

While I was feeling bad I read Mrs. Stenhouse's book, and that showed me things in a clearer light than I had seen them before.

I knew every word was true from my own sad experience, and it encouraged me to leave the hateful polygamic life, and I am glad that I have done it.

About five weeks ago I got very weak. I don't know what was the matter with me—probably general debility from grief and mental suffering. My boarders, seeing my condition, aided me freely and were very kind to me.

I resolved to leave his house, packed up my clothes and instructed an auctioneer two weeks ago to take away the furniture and sell it, as a part of it was my own, and I thought I was entitled to the rest. The suit commenced has been instituted by my attorneys, who have every confidence that I can obtain alimony; but whether I do or not I think the world should know Brigham Young as he is, and my story is a page of his biography.

This is the story of Eliza-Ann—told in her own words. She is the only wife whom Brigham has not supported; but she has been allowed to keep Gentile boarders. I suppose Brother Young had some reason when he made this exception.

"MISS" ELIZA R. SNOW.

[Number Sixteen.]

"Miss" Eliza R. Snow I mention here as I have not followed the order of date. She and the three ladies, whose names I shall presently give, are the proxy wives of Brigham, living with him. Eliza-Ann, who has become notorious of late, is popularly known as his nineteenth wife. She is his nineteenth living wife and the last-wedded, according to date ; but, if the deceased wives were taken into consideration, she might perhaps be about the thirtieth. In this list I have put all the living wives who are sealed to Brigham "for eternity," first ; and thus I count Eliza-Ann number fifteen ; but had I placed the proxy wives,—who are only Brigham's "for time," in the list, she would, of course, be the nineteenth. The newspapers which have written her into notoriety know nothing of "proxy" and "spiritual" wives. All are alike to them. Eliza Roxy Snow, is always spoken of among the Saints as Miss Eliza R. Snow. I have already mentioned her, and need therefore only add that Eliza is the high-priestess and poet-general of the Church ; she is highly thought of by the Saints, and the year before last was one of a company of Mormon missionaries who visited the Holy Land, for the purpose of consecrating it to the Lord. Last summer she travelled through the settlements in Utah, urging the women to enter into the "Celestial Order." She is only a proxy wife to Brigham, and will belong to Joseph Smith in the resurrection.

ZINA D. HUNTINGTON JACOBS YOUNG.

[Number Seventeen.]

Zina D. Huntington Jacobs Young is another proxy wife, and a widow of the Prophet Joseph. She, too, will have to be handed over in the day of reckoning. She has one grown up daughter, of whom I shall presently speak under rather interesting circumstances.

EMILY PARTRIDGE YOUNG.

[Number Eighteen.]

Emily Partridge Young is a tall, dark-eyed, handsome woman, and she also is a "proxy" wife—a relict of Joseph. When Joseph died, Brigham told his wives that they were at liberty to choose whom they would for husbands ; and some of them showed their appreciation of his generosity by choosing him himself. Thus it was that Emily Partridge became Brigham's wife. The Prophet has dealt kindly to his brother Joseph Smith, through her, for she has quite a family of children to be handed over with her. She was young and handsome when the Prophet died, but perhaps it would be wrong to suppose that that had anything to do with Brigham's generosity to his brother, for it is generally believed that he took all those wives of Joseph, from pure principle.

AUGUSTA COBB YOUNG.

[Number Nineteen.]

Augusta Cobb Young is a very fine-looking woman and must have been quite handsome in her youthful days. As I before stated, she formerly lived in Boston, but hearing Brigham preach, she fell in love with him, abandoned her home, children, and husband, and, taking her youngest child with her, went to Salt Lake City, and was married to the Prophet. It was she who, when Brigham began to neglect her, wanted to be sealed to Christ, but was ultimately added to the kingdom of Joseph Smith.

Now these are the Prophet's wives—his real, living wives—nineteen in all. How many spiritual wives he has had it would be impossible to say. Probably he himself does not know their number. Lately, I believe, he has been making his will, and, if so, I suppose he has "taken count of all." He has besides in various parts of Utah many other wives, who are all more or less provided for, but they are of little account, and he seldom or never sees them. The nineteen whom I have named form his family at home, as I may say—are all under his own roof, or at least they live in Salt Lake City, and are known to every one as his wives. The number of his children it would be very difficult to estimate. I can count up by name between forty and fifty, and I think the Prophet's living children are rather under the latter figure. His family has however been much diminished by death, though since I went to Utah this has not been the case so much as I believe it was formerly. One Mormon writer—a very reliable and trustworthy man—says that the children that the Prophet has lost would fill a fair-sized graveyard. This very probably may be true, as in the early days of the settlement in Utah, privation and the lack of proper medical attendance must have constantly proved fatal to the young children of the Saints. But it was before my time, and therefore I cannot speak from personal experience.

A Mormon gentleman one day told me a very funny story in reference to the Prophet and his little family. He said that he had just had occasion to call in at a store in Main street, to make some purchases, when Brigham himself came in and entered into conversation with him. A smart-looking, clever little boy entered the store a few minutes after and handed a note to the proprietor. Brother Brigham seemed to be greatly interested in the child, and asked him several questions in a playful way. Turning at length to my informant he said: "That's a nice boy, Brother —. Whose child is it?" This was a very awkward question, for the gentleman was aware that the child was one of Brigham's own. He did not like to tell him so, so he replied indirectly, "He's one of Mrs. . . . Young's children, President." The Prophet looked somewhat amused, but did not utter a word in reply.

I give this story only for what it is worth and no more. The gentleman who told it doubtless expected to be believed; but knowing the Prophet and his family, as I do, I consider the statement exaggerated, to say the least. It is a heavy responsibility to have five and forty children—most of them girls, too—without being accused of forgetting their personality altogether.

In his habits and mode of living, Brigham Young is very simple, or at least was so until recently. When I first knew him he dressed in plain, homespun, homemade, and every article about his person and his houses, was as plain and unostentatious as could possibly be. But the importation of Gentiles and Gentile goods, since the opening of the railway, has worked a great change. His wives who once carried simplicity of dress almost to the verge of dowdyism, have now acquired a taste for Eastern fashions, and I think if Brigham were a younger man and were likely to live another ten years he would find that wives were more expensive luxuries now than they were in the era of "dug-outs" and sun-bonnets.

The Prophet's first home in Utah was a little cottage which is now known as the White House.—The same house, I believe, which was valued at sixty thousand dollars, and which Brother Tenant supposed he bought:—a more scandalous and barefaced robbery never was perpetrated.

This on the hill-side, north of the Eagle Gate, and is now the residence of his first wife, Mrs. Angell Young. The Bee-Hive House is the official residence of Brother Brigham. There he used to reign supreme as "Governor" Young; and thence he now issues secular and ecclesiastical edicts to all who acknowledge his sway. There is one lady resident in this house—Mrs. Lucy Decker Young—and no one else is permitted to intrude upon its privacy. Here the prophet has his own private bedroom, and here he breakfasts when he has been at home over night.

The Lion House is what ought to be the home of the Prophet, for here nearly all his wives reside. He has, however, many other houses in the city. On the basement floor, the dining-room, kitchen, pantry, and other general offices. The first floor is divided by a long passage with doors on each side. On the right hand, about half a dozen wives with small families find accommodation. On the left, at the entrance, is the parlor, and the other rooms on that side are occupied by mothers with larger families, and ladies who have a little more than ordinary attention. The upper floor is divided into twenty square bedrooms.

There is no extravagance in the furniture or apparel of these wives, but they are comfortable and are kept neat and clean. Again and again, the Prophet has declared that the ten-dollar fees which are obtained from the divorces provide his wives with pin-money. I do not believe a word of this, as the amount thus obtained is far more than the avaricious soul of the Prophet would allow to pass out of his hands for feminine vanities. But I know of another source of income which is open to the wives. They are allowed all the fruit—peaches especially—which they or their children, can gather or dry. This, in fact, is pretty nearly their only “pin-money:” their “lord” is not a generous man, and they have to make the most of trifles.

The Prophet usually dines in the Lion House at three in the afternoon. Mrs. Twiss Young, as I mentioned before, acts the part of housekeeper, and she acts it well. At three punctually the bell rings and the mothers with their children move down to the dining room. They are all seated at a very long table which is lengthened by turning round at the end of the room. Each mother has her children around her. Brigham sits at the head of the table, with his favorite—when at home—vis-a-vis, or on his left, and if a visitor is present he sits at the Prophet’s right hand. The repast is frugal but ample, for Brigham is a sober and exceedingly economical man. This is the first time he sees his family. In the evening at seven o’clock the bell again rings, and the mothers and the children again fill the sides and end of the parlor. When they are all seated, the patriarch enters, takes his seat at the table and chats quietly with those who chance to go in with him to prayers. When all the members of the family are assembled, the door is closed. All kneel down and the Prophet prays, invoking special blessings upon Zion and “the kingdom.” This is the last that his family see of him for the day, unless they have occasion to seek him privately.

With his family Brother Brigham is said to be kind; but it is supposed to be more the awe which his position as Prophet inspires, than the love which they bear him as a man which renders him successful in managing them. At the same time, that sweet familiarity is destroyed which should exist between husband and wife, father and children. With such a number of wives, he cannot possibly wait upon them in visiting, and in the ball-room, and other places of amusement. With the exception of his reigning favorite, whoever for the time she may happen to be, no one expects his attentions. At the theatre a full number of seats are reserved, and his wives attend, or remain at home, as they please. They sit in the body of the parquette, among the rest of the people ; but one of the two proscenium boxes is reserved for him, and beside him is a chair for the favorite Amelia.

When he goes to the ball, the same special attention is shown. He dances first with the favorite, and, if half a dozen more of his wives have accompanied them, he will dance with each of them once in the course of the evening ; but with the favorite he dances as frequently as any youth in the ball-room with his first maiden love. The Apostles and leading men of the community, who dance attendance on him and desire his favor, are sure to seek the pleasure of her hand and place her in the same cotillion with Brigham, who is thus able all the evening to enjoy her company.

Some of the Apostles and Elders look with pain upon this boyishness of the Prophet, and deplore it. Many of them are attached to their first wives, and have shown them consideration and attention which has not always pleased Brother Brigham. I have heard more than one of them express a wish that the Prophet had been a little more attentive to his own first wife. It is only fair to Amelia—the reigning favorite—to state that she has always been kind and respectful to Mrs. Angell Young.

Up to within the last few years the community heard nothing of the Prophet's family but what was strictly decorous and creditable. If there was any wrong-doing it must have been very effectually hidden from the knowledge of outside observers. His wives are kind and faithful mothers, seeking to live their religion and ambitious to increase the glory of their Lord. I know them all personally—some of them intimately ; and, while I have heard from some, with heavy hearts, of their difficulties in bearing "the cross" which all Mormon women have to sustain, they have tried, I know, to be submissive, and I think it due to them that I should make this present recognition of their goodness of disposition and purity of soul.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE ORIGIN OF "THE REFORMATION":—EXTRAORDINARY DOINGS OF THE SAINTS.

FROM time to time, in the course of this narrative, I have had occasion to allude to a certain period of extraordinary fanatical excitement among the Saints in Utah,—a period which was there popularly termed "The Reformation;" and I think that a brief sketch of the terrible sayings and doings of that time, and the causes which led to them, may be interesting to the reader and may help to explain much which to a Gentile must otherwise be very obscure.

The popular idea of Mormonism is that the peculiar feature which distinguishes it from all other Christian sects is Polygamy. To a certain extent this is, of course, true; but it is only a partial statement of the truth. If Polygamy were to be relinquished, it would still be found that Mormonism had really very little in common with other sects, and very much that was completely antagonistic to them.

The confession of faith published by Joseph Smith during his life-time would certainly deceive an uninitiated person ; and it was in consequence of the ambiguity of that very document that so many unsuspecting persons were from the beginning of Mormonism led astray by the teachings of the Missionaries. The convert was told that the Mormon faith proclaimed the existence of one true God, but he was not told that Father Adam was that deity; and that He is "like a well-to-do farmer." He was told that Christ was the Son of God, but he was not taught that the Virgin Mary was "the lawful wife of God the Father," and that "He intended after the resurrection to take her again, as one of His own wives, to raise up immortal spirits in eternity. He was told of faith in a Saviour, he was not told that men were the only saviours of their wives, and that unless a woman pleased her husband and was obedient and was saved by him, she could not be saved at all. He was told that the Saints believed in the Holy Ghost, but he was not told that "The Holy Ghost is a man ; he is one of the sons of our Father and our God. . . . You think our Father and our God is not a lively, sociable, and cheerful man ; He is one of the most lively men that ever lived !"

And yet, although such fearful and shocking blasphemy was, of course, hidden from the convert whom it was desirable to impress with the idea that Mormonism was only a development of Christianity, it was openly taught in the sermons in the Tabernacle before thousands of people, and inculcated in the writing of the highest authorities. The passages, which I have just quoted, were preached in public, were taken down in short-hand, were revised under the superintendence of Brigham Young or one of the chief leaders, were then printed, and published in Salt Lake City, and afterwards reprinted in another form.

The verbal repetition of such blasphemy as this would be simply painful and disgusting to any right-minded person. I shall therefore endeavor to give an idea of some of these outrageous doctrines without entering too closely into details. Should the reader, however, wish to search and see for himself, I refer him to the Journals of Discourses, the files of the Church papers, and the publications of the Mormon writers generally.

One of the first innovations upon the received faith of ordinary Christians was the doctrine of Polytheism. There can be no doubt that, even in Joseph's time, that doctrine was taught, although, as in the case of Polygamy, all knowledge of it was kept from every one but the initiated—the "strong men" who could be entrusted with the inner secrets of the Church leaders. That such a doctrine, however, was beginning, even then, to form part of the faith of the Saints, may be seen in the following lines upon the occasion of the Prophet's murder :

"Unchanged in death, with a Saviour's love,
He pleads their cause in the courts above.

"His home's in the sky, he dwells with the Gods, Far from the furious rage of mobs!

"He died! he died for those he loved;
He reigns! He reigns in the realms above."

Many other instances, even stronger than this, could easily be given.

The Mormon idea of the other world, while in some respects it differed from the teachings of certain modern "Spiritualists" was not altogether dissimilar. The soul was said to be immortal, and it had three stages of existence. The first was purely spiritual—the state of the soul before it came into this world. Spirits in that condition were not perfect, they must first take a fleshly body, and pass through the trials of life, before they could attain to the highest state of existence. Hence it was a solemn duty, as well as their highest privilege, for men to practice Polygamy:—their duty, as by this means, and by this alone, the yet imperfect souls now waiting to come into this world could ever hope to be admitted into the "Celestial Kingdom;"—and a privilege,—as all the souls whom they thus assisted to emigrate would form their own "Kingdoms" in eternity, over which as kings and priests they would reign for ever and ever

The second stage of the soul's existence is the mortal; with which we all are sadly well acquainted. The third is the condition subsequent to the Resurrection, when they believe the flesh and bones will form the raised body, but the blood will not be there; for the blood is the principle of corrupt life, and therefore another spirit supplies its place in heaven. That Christ partook of some broiled fish and part of a honeycomb is evident from Holy Scripture:—the Mormons therefore teach that heaven will be very much the same as earth, only considerably improved. We shall not marry there or be given in marriage; hence it is necessary for us to marry here, and to marry as much as we can, for then in heaven a man will take the wives whom he married on earth, or who have been sealed to him by proxy; they will be his queens, and their children will be his subjects. We shall eat, and drink, and feast, and spend a happy time generally. We shall henceforth never die—hence we shall ourselves be gods!

It was in the preëxistent state, the Mormons teach, that the work of salvation was first planned—but not after the fashion believed by all Christians. A grand celestial council was held, at which all the Sons of God appeared. Michael, the father of all, presided, and stated that he proposed to create a new world, of which he proceeded to give some details. His first-begotten then arose, and made a speech, in which he proposed that Michael, his father, should go down to the world, when created, with Eve, his mother, and do there much after the fashion of what is related of our first parents in the book of Genesis; he himself would descend some thousands of years subsequently, and would lead his erring brethren back, and save them from their sins. Lucifer, the second son, then stood forth and unfolded his plan. Jealous of the popularity of his elder brother, he proposed to save men in their sins.

Great discussion ensued, in which the unnumbered family of heaven divided into three parties,—one under each of the two elder sons, and the third standing neutral. After a terrible conflict, Lucifer, the second son was defeated, and, with all his followers, was driven out of heaven. They descended into the abyss, where they founded the infernal kingdom, of which Lucifer became the chief :—he was henceforth known as the Devil. Adam created his world, and carried out his part of the plan ; and in due time the eldest son, who conquered in heaven, took upon him the form of flesh, dwelt among men, and was known as their Redeemer. The spirits who stood neutral during the fight subsequently took upon them forms of flesh, entering into the children of Ham, and were known as Negroes. Therefore it is, that although the American Indians and all other races are eligible for the Mormon priesthood, the negro alone can never attain to that high dignity.

It is only natural, amidst all this confusion of ideas, to ask, Who then is the real Originator of created things ?

In the eternity of matter, the Mormons have from the first believed ; but they have supposed that the formation of worlds and systems had definite dates, although they are unknown to us. Far away in the immensity of space is "KOLOB"—the great and glorious sun of suns, the abode of the First Principle of Godhead of which we can form any conception. Around that Sun, countless other systems revolve, of which ours is one. That Sun itself may be only one of many other systems whose origin and existence is lost in inconceivable space, and concerning which we can form no just realisation while in this finite state. From the First Source in "KOLOB" other gods have proceeded in precisely the same way as genealogies and "family-trees" have been continued on earth. Each new Patriarchal "god" has formed his own earth out of the aggregation of matter ; and over that earth he reigns.

On the 9th of April, 1852, Brigham Young publicly announced that—

"When our father Adam came into the Garden of Eden, he came into it with a celestial body, and brought Eve, one of his wives, with him. He helped to make and organise this world. He is Michael the Archangel, the Ancient of Days, about whom holy men have written and spoken. He is our 'Father and our God,' and the only god with whom we have to do."

This public declaration gave great offence and led to the apostasy of many. Nevertheless Brigham Young thinks that just as Adam came down to Eden and subsequently became a god, in like manner he also himself will attain to the god-head. Heber C. Kimball, zealous to go a step further declared that Brigham was "God," and that he, Kimball, stood towards him in the same relation as the Third Person in the Blessed Trinity does towards the First.

It will hence be seen that subordination is one of the first principles of the Mormon faith, and this even in the Church organisation of the Saints has been distinctively shown. For the purposes for which it exists the Mormon hierarchy could not be surpassed. Of the Priesthood there are two orders—the Melchisedec and the Aaronic; of which the former ranks first and highest. The lowest rank in the Church is the "Deacon;" he looks after the places of meeting, takes up collections, and attends to other similar duties. Next comes the "Teacher";—he visits the Saints and takes note of their standing—and reports the same:—weakness of faith or backwardness in paying tithing is never overlooked by him. After him is the "Priest," and above him is the Elder whose office it is to preach, baptize and lay on hands. All these belong to the order of the Aaronic—or the Levitical priesthood. "Bishops" are simply Church officers having local jurisdiction.

The lowest grade in the Melchisedec Priesthood is the "Elder." He administers in all the ordinances of the Church. Above him there is no higher rank as respects the priesthood, but in respect to office there are various gradations, as, for example, the "High Priests," the "Seventies," and "Bishops" who occupy positions of authority, although both go on mission, and also the Apostles. The "Apostles" were chosen in imitation of the "Twelve" appointed by Christ; and in the same way the "Seventies," in imitation of the seventy disciples sent forth to preach and work miracles. They claim rank next to the Twelve. The "Quorum of the Apostles" is presided over by the eldest of their number ; the "Quorums of Seventies" are each composed of seventy Elders with a "President" and six "Counsellors." The number of "quorums" is unlimited ; and over them all collectively is another president and six counsellors.

The highest authority in the Church is the "First Presidency"—the three members of which at present are Brigham Young, George A. Smith, and Daniel H. Wells,—who are said to represent on earth the three Persons of the Blessed Trinity !

As, from "President" Young down to the most illiterate "Elder," every one is supposed to be specially inspired, and to be immediately guided by the gift of the Holy Ghost, education is utterly unnecessary to the members of the Mormon Priesthood ; in fact it has always been looked upon as an impediment to its possessor. Obedience is considered the highest qualification, and it was the strict enforcement of obedience on the part of the ordinary people and the lower grades of the Priesthood towards the higher that alone could have made possible that state of affairs which existed during the "Reformation." Hence also it is that Brigham Young and the leaders are rightly held responsible for the deeds of violence and fanaticism which their followers may perpetrate ; for it is well known that no Mormon, in a matter of grave importance, would dare to act upon his own responsibility and without he felt sure that what he did would meet with the approbation of those in authority.

There is another class of Church-officer which I had very nearly forgotten—the Patriarchs. The chief of these is called "The Presiding Patriarch over the Church" ; the rest are "Patriarchs in the Church." The office of these dignitaries is to bless the people and to be paid for their blessings. The price of good blessings is variable. Not long ago, when money was scarce and payments were made in produce, two dollars was considered reasonable ; and if several were wanted for the same family, a reduction was made. Hyrum Smith, the original Prophet's eldest brother, was the first Patriarch ; and to him succeeded "Uncle John," as he was popularly called—the eldest brother of Brigham ;—the present Patriarch is the son of Hyrum ; still a young man, who obtained his office by inheritance—and this, I believe, is about the only office in the Church which Brother Brigham has permitted the Smith family to inherit or enjoy.

Odd as it may seem, some of the people have quite a passion for these "blessings." I knew one old Frenchwoman who was said, like the woman in the parable, in respect to the physicians, to have "spent all of her living upon them." I met her one day with a flannel-petticoat under her arm, which she was going to sell. Upon enquiry she frankly told me that she had given her last cent and had sold every scrap of any value which she possessed, and very nearly all her clothes, in order to obtain "blessings," and as she did not understand English she was now going to sell her old petticoat—the very last article of any value which she now possessed—to pay an old dame, who knew a little English, for her services in translating the "blessings." She was in a state of great sorrow at the thought that now her supply of blessings would be stopped—she would have to do without.

The Patriarchs, however, at no time possessed any particular personal or official weight, and from them never proceeded any of those strange doctrines which excited the people to violence and bloodshed. In a religious sense this outrageous fanaticism was all originated in the first place in Missouri by some of the more prominent men, such as Sidney Rigdon, Dr. Avar, David Patten, and others, doubtless with the connivance of the Prophet Joseph, not long after the organisation of the Church ; and subsequently by the extreme and preposterous doctrines constantly inculcated by Brigham Young and some of the leading Elders, among whom Jedediah M. Grant and Heber C. Kimball were the most conspicuous. In a political sense it was the natural result of the peculiar position of the Saints in Missouri, Ohio, and Illinois, and of the ridiculous threats of Brigham Young against the Federal Government, after the exodus of the Mormons to Salt Lake Valley, together with the idea which had become popular among the people, that a temporal "kingdom" was to be set up among the Rocky Mountains, and that Christ should personally reign and rule there.

The idea of reviving the old Jewish polity was always uppermost in the minds of the first teachers. Hence they revived the Priesthood and High-priesthood in their various forms ; a magnificent temple was built in Nauvoo, just as another temple is now being erected at Salt Lake City ; and so far did they go that it was even determined that the ancient sacrifices should eventually be restored. At the same time, while the minds of the Mormons, newly-converted and fired with zeal, were bent upon founding the Kingdom of the Saints on earth, the people of Missouri, among whom they dwelt, heard that even in social life the customs of the Jews were to be introduced, and that Polygamy was to be practiced. Husbands and brothers trembled for their wives and sisters, and the hatred to the new religion was increased when it was observed that the Mormons in every political movement held all together and voted as one man, thus exercising an influence which no ordinary religious sect could have possessed or wielded ; this, the discipline of the hierarchy, to which I have already referred, enabled them to do.

Ill-feeling was shown on both sides ; in a thousand petty ways at first, with more serious results presently. The Mormons were accused of circulating large quantities of base coin, of cheating and defrauding the Gentiles, as they called everyone—even Jews—who rejected the new religion, and of even being guilty of darker crimes ;—which last charge, however, was at first only hinted at. On the other hand, the Mormons accused their enemies of every possible villainy of which men and women could be guilty. The real fact would appear to be that both the Mormons and their enemies were at that time guilty of much wrong-doing against each other, while, at the same time, much that was alleged on both sides was utterly groundless, and only originated in the natural jealousy which Western pioneers—rough-and-ready frontiers-men, such as the people of those parts then were—would naturally feel when enlisted in two parties, animated by religious and political hatred against each other.

Now came whisperings of still more atrocious deeds. It was alleged that, among the Mormons, a secret body of men had been chosen, who were enrolled, under the most frightful oaths, to avenge every wrong which might be perpetrated against the Saints. This band was said to have originated with Sidney Rigdon and Dr. Sampson Avard, and, as I have somewhere else mentioned, Thomas B. Marsh and Hyde the present chief of the Apostles both made affidavit that such was the case, and that the band was sworn to commit the most shocking acts of vengeance,—and surely Marsh and Hyde ought to know. Various names were chosen for this "death society." First the members were called Daughters of Zion [from Micah iv. 13.] But as it sounded rather ridiculous to speak of bearded ruffians as 'daughters,' that name was abandoned, and the title "Avenging Angels" substituted; and that, with some other names then temporarily used, were subsequently dropped for the name "Danites" [from Genesis xlix. 17,] which has since been retained;—not by the Mormons, for they have ever denied the existence of any such band, but by the Gentiles.

It matters very little what the name of such a society might be, so long as it existed at all; and that it does, and has, existed in some form cannot reasonably be denied. There probably is not at the present time any formally enrolled society, but it is quite certain that for many years past if "The Church" had only dropped a hint that any man's blood ought to be shed, that man would have had a very short tenure of his life. Even Brigham himself said publicly:

"If men come here and do not behave themselves, they will not only find the Danites, whom they talk so much about, biting the horses' heels, but the scoundrels will find something biting their heels. In my plain remarks I simply call things by their own names."

It is beyond a doubt that, notwithstanding all the social changes and improvements of late years, the secret police of

Salt Lake City are in matters of crime, as well as in fact, though not perhaps nominally, the successors of the original "death society;"—many of its members are known to have committed grievous crimes and to have repeatedly dyed their hands in blood. The shocking deeds that every now and then are divulged to the world are all of their doing, and no resident of Salt Lake City, whether Mormon or Gentile, although he might prudently decline to state his opinions, would in his mind question the fact that it is fear of consequences, and only because the Saints are "on their good behavior" in the sight of the Federal Government, that the hands of these wretches are withheld from a continuance of their old enormities.

As might be supposed, the establishment of a secret band of men professedly ready at a moment to steal, to shed blood, or commit any crime at the command of their leaders created great excitement in the whole State of Missouri, and especially in the vicinity of the Mormon Settlements.

Like the Ishmaelites of old, the hands of the Saints were against every man, and every man's hand was against them. They were taught that they were "a chosen nation, a royal priesthood, a peculiar people"—the "Sword of the Lord and of Gideon" was to be theirs; they were to go forth conquering and to conquer; and the Gentiles were to be trodden down beneath their feet.

As might be expected, trouble immediately arose; the people of Missouri outraged the Mormons, and the Mormons in return outraged them. Murders, thefts, and the most shameful atrocities were of daily occurrence, and the history of those terrible doings would fill a good-sized volume. Suffice it to say, that the excitement continued and increased, reprisals being made on both sides; finally the mob was triumphant, and after committing many fearful excesses it was organised into a militia—the leading men in authority declaring that the Mormons must either leave the State or else they must be extirpated by the sword.

Notwithstanding all this, the Mormons, at all times an industrious people, were in one sense successful and prosperous ; the morality, however, of some of their leading men was to say the least very questionable. It was openly argued that the silver and gold were the Lord's, and so were the cattle on a thousand hills. The Scripture says that God has given his people all things richly to enjoy. The Saints were the people of God :—He had given them all the wealth and substance of the earth, and therefore it was no sin for them to help themselves—they were but taking their own. To over-reach or defraud their enemies was facetiously called by the Mormons "milking the Gentiles."

Their city called Nauvoo—The Beautiful,—a name given by the Prophet Joseph and supposed to be of celestial origin, was well laid out and well built, a costly Temple was nearly complete, and the leaders, at least, began to show signs of wealth and prosperity. This however was but the lull before the storm. Writs upon various charges against Joseph and the leading Elders had always been floating about, and the serving of some of the later ones had only been prevented by technical difficulties or the personal fears of the Sheriff. To enter Nauvoo for the purpose of arresting the Prophet was like bearding the lion in his den ; for by this time one of the best-equipped and best-drilled militia regiments under the name of the Nauvoo Legion had been organised, and Joseph had been elected Lieutenant-General. The regiment consisted solely of well-tried Mormons who were devotedly attached to their leader ; besides which, the whole of the population of the city was at his call at a moment's notice.

Into the city of the Saints, as far as was possible to prevent it, no Gentile was allowed to intrude. It was at risk of life and property that any one ventured. One oddly original mode of driving out the devoted stranger is worthy of mention—it was called "whittling a man out of the town !" Opposite the victim's door a number of men and overgrown boys would take up their quarters—each armed with a stout stick of wood and a huge knife. No sooner did the Gentile appear than the whole horde gathered in a circle round him. Not a word was-uttered, but each man grasping firmly his stick in his left hand, pointed its other end to within a few inches of the victim's face, while with the knife in his right hand he sliced a shaving out of the wood in such a way as to bring the point of the knife almost against the face of the unfortunate man. Wherever he turned they attended him, always preserving the strictest silence, and never actually touching him. The intolerable sensation caused by the "whittling" of this strange body-guard—who were in attendance day and night—and the unpleasantness of seeing half a score of sharp knives flashing perpetually within an inch of his nose generally subdued the strongest-minded Gentile—few could endure it for more than a day or so at the utmost : they were glad to leave —“ Whittled out of the town !”

The evil day, however, at last came. The Prophet, fearing arrest, fled, but was persuaded to return and deliver himself up. The charge against him was one for which reasonable bail could be taken : bail was offered, accepted, and the prisoners discharged. Before leaving court, however, the Prophet and his brother Hyrum, the Patriarch, were arrested upon a trumped-up charge of treason—a charge for which it was impossible that bail should be taken ; they were therefore committed to custody in Carthage jail, under solemn promise from Governor Ford of Illinois that the State should be answerable for their personal protection. The same day, however, a mob of over one hundred men, assisted, it is said, by the militia who were left in charge, burst into the jail and assassinated the Prophet and his brother.

As might be supposed this outrage by no means weakened the Mormon cause—their Prophet was now a martyr, and his name more powerful after death than it could possibly have been had he lived. It was, however, clearer than ever that nothing could now reconcile the people of Illinois to the Mormons, and the latter seriously began to think of leaving that State in a body as they had formerly left Missouri.

The terrible doings of those times I have no idea of relating just now—I simply allude to them in order that the reader may understand how, in the excitement produced in that border-warfare, it was possible for such strange events as afterwards transpired in Utah to originate. I may simply add, that the Temple being completed, and the first "Endowments" given there, the people gathered up what little property they could rescue from the mob, and under the guidance of Brigham Young, and amidst privations, sufferings, and outrages of the most painful character, left the city which they had founded in Illinois and set out for the Rocky Mountains, where, beside the Great Salt Lake, they founded their modern Zion.

Free now from the violence of mobs and Gentile enmity, it might have been supposed that the hatred which had so long been part of the Mormon faith would have died a natural death. The contrary, however, was the case. The Mexican war was then raging, and, en route to the Rocky Mountains, the Mormons had received a proposal from the Federal Government that they should supply a regiment, upon highly advantageous conditions, to join the United States troops which were then operating in California. This suggestion was kindly made, for it was thought that the Mormon regiment thus raised would in reality be only marching their own way in going to California, and that the outfits, pay, arms, &c., which were to be theirs, after the year for which they were enrolled had expired, would be of essential service to them. It was like paying men liberally for making a journey for their own benefit.

Notwithstanding all this, Brigham Young and the leaders represented the transaction in quite another light, and the people were taught that an engagement, into which they had entered of their own free will, and from which they had derived substantial advantages, was an act of heartless cruelty and despotic tyranny on the part of the Government. This feeling was fostered, until at length the Saints as a body regarded themselves as a wronged and outraged people, and considered every Gentile—in fact the whole nation as their natural enemies. This was perhaps all the more singular, since, after the vast tract of country, of which Utah forms a part, had, at the end of the war, been wrested from Mexico, Brigham Young had been appointed by President Millard Fillmore the first Governor and Indian Agent of the territory; he was therefore in Federal pay, and bound, as long as he retained office, to support the Government, or at the very least not to stir up disaffection.

Trouble soon arose between Governor Young and the Mormons on one side and the Judges and United States courts and officials on the other. Once an armed mob burst into the Supreme Court, and forced the Judge then sitting to adjourn; at another time a bonfire was made of the books and papers of the District Courts; then a Judge on the bench was threatened with personal outrage; and subsequently a posse summoned by legal (!) process "encamped" for a whole fortnight over against another posse summoned without legal process, the two bodies burning with bitter hatred and breathing out threatenings and slaughter. Such a state of affairs could not, of course, last long. On the one side the wildest statements were publicly made against the Government; threats which uttered by a little band of pioneers against a mighty nation were perfectly ridiculous, stirred up the hearts of the Saints. On the other hand it was pretty certain that Federal troops would have to be sent out to Utah to preserve the peace of the Territory. The Federal Government was nevertheless defied, abused, and derided, and the people, thoroughly blinded by their fanaticism, did not for a moment doubt that should Governor Young "declare war" the United States troops would vanish before the "Armies" of the Saints like chaff upon the threshing-floor. So absurd does all this appear that I should really hardly venture to repeat it were it not that every one in Utah—Mormon and Gentile—knows that I am really understating facts rather than otherwise.

Now came a crisis in Mormon history, for which all these wild sayings and unlawful doings had been so long paving the way:—"THE REFORMATION" was destined to be the crowning point of Saintly folly and Saintly sin.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE "REIGN OF TERROR" IN UTAH:—THE REFORMATION OF THE SAINTS.

Days of Trouble in the Valley—Shedding Innocent Blood—What is Murder? About Killing a Cat—Better than Their Faith—Cutting Throats for Love—The Deeds of the Apostle "Jeddy"—The Celebrated Mule—The Saints Accused—Missionaries Called Home—Their Consciences Accuse Them!—The Blood-Atonement—What was Said in the Tabernacle—Terrible Doctrines Taught—Brigham a "God"!—Fearful Blasphemy of Brigham Young—The Shedding of Blood—"Righteously Murdered"—The Principles of Eternity—Deeds of Darkness—A "Saint" Murders His Wife—A Terrible Story—How Children Were Married—A Petticoat on a Fence-Pole—A Scarcity of Unmarried Girls—Obeying "Counsel"—Propositions of Marriage—A Trifling Mistake—Stubborn Facts and Figures—The Most Fearful Deed of All.

THE people were now thoroughly excited. Their religious antipathy, their political hatred—two of the most powerful passions which move individuals or bodies of men—had been appealed to, and both in public and private they had been stirred up to a pitch of frenzy which it is hardly possible at the present time to comprehend.

There were whisperings now of a most fearful doctrine, calculated not only to strike terror into the hearts of those whose faith was weakening, but even to shock with a sense of horror those who only heard of it from afar—I mean the doctrine of the BLOOD ATONEMENT.

The Saints had all along been taught to distinguish between murder and the shedding of innocent blood—the former being spoken of as a crime for which atonement might be made, but for the latter there was no repentance on earth—it was an unpardonable sin. They were also taught to distinguish carefully between sins which might be forgiven, and sins for which pardon was impossible. Now the difference between murder and shedding innocent blood is this:—the latter is the crime of killing a Saint, which can never be forgiven, but by the death of the transgressor; but the former is of quite a different character. To murder a Gentile may sometimes be inexpedient, or perhaps even to a certain extent wrong, but it is seldom, if ever, a crime, and never an unpardonable sin.

A friend of mine was in a state of apostacy. The Bishop went to her to expostulate, and told her that if he were her husband he would get rid of her and take away her children as well—he would not on any account live with her.

"Perhaps," she said, "you would not allow me to live at all?"

"Certainly not," he replied. "I would think about as much of killing you or any other miserable Apostate as I would about killing a cat. If Brigham Young were to tell me to put you to death I would do it with the greatest of pleasure;—and it would be for your good, too."

Thus, when the famous Revelation on Polygamy says that a man cannot be pardoned for shedding innocent blood, it does not mean that he cannot be pardoned for murdering a Gentile or an Apostate; for that, under some circumstances, might even be meritorious; but that the murder of a Saint by one of the brethren cannot under any circumstances be forgiven on earth, and that his only chance of forgiveness lies in his own blood being shed as an "atonement."

Certain sins cannot be forgiven here on earth—Shedding innocent blood, divulging the secrets of the Endowment House—marital unfaithfulness on the part of the wife—Apostacy;—these are unpardonable. All other crimes which Gentiles abhor may become even virtues, if done in the cause of the Church. I do not, of course, mean to say that the mass of the Mormon people act up to such atrocious doctrines; for although, when among themselves, they would admit that the theory was correct, the better instincts of their nature keep them from even putting that theory into practice. But what I do mean to say is, that such doctrines have, over and over again, been distinctly taught in the plainest words in the public hearing of thousands; that they have been printed and reprinted by authority; that they have been practiced, and the very highest of the Mormon leaders have applauded; and that, even at the present moment, these doctrines form part of the dogmas of the Church. It is this day a matter of fact, and not a matter of question, that if any Mormon Apostate were to commit any of the unpardonable sins which I have mentioned, and if he or she were to be assassinated by a private individual, all zealous Mormons—all the leaders—would maintain that not only was the deed justifiable but even meritorious!

This may seem bad enough, but it is not the worst. The doctrine of the "BLOOD ATONEMENT" is that the murder of an Apostate is a deed of love! If a Saint sees another leave the Church, or if even he only believes that his brother's faith is weakening and that he will apostatise before long, he knows that the soul of his unbelieving brother will be lost if he dies in such a state, and that only by his blood being shed is there any chance of forgiveness for him; it is therefore the kindest action that he can perform toward him to shed his blood—the doing so is a deed of truest love. The nearer, the dearer, the more tenderly loved the sinner is, the greater the affection shown by the shedder of blood—the action is no longer murder or the shedding of innocent blood, for the taint of apostacy takes away its innocence—it is making atonement, not a crime; it is an act of mercy, therefore meritorious.

These were the terrible teachings which the "Reformation" brought to light:—they had been whispered before among the elect, and had been acted upon by the "Avenging Angels," but before this they had never been publicly and intelligibly explained.

As I before said, the Saints had been excited to a condition of frenzy and were ready to engage in any fanatical folly, but the way in which the spark was applied to the powder was as ridiculous as its results were terrible.

Jedediah M. Grant, an enthusiast of the wildest kind; a man without education or mental discipline of any description; one of the First Presidency and high in authority among the Saints, had occasion to attend a meeting which was held at Kaysville, a place about twenty-five miles distant from Salt Lake City, and he invited some of the Elders to meet him there to take part in the proceedings. To one of these, "Jeddy" as he was familiarly called, obligingly lent a mule; he himself did not accompany the party but went on before. These Elders were pretty well mounted and one of them being a good horseman made the rest keep up with him. In consequence of this when they arrived at Kaysville the beasts were heated and tired. The Apostle "Jeddy" watched them but said nothing.

Up to a certain point, the meeting passed off pleasantly enough—the Elders present were "good at testimony" and strong in exhorting their hearers to faithfulness. Jeddy was the last speaker. He began in his usual way, but presently warmed up until he became quite excited and then proceeded to accuse every one present of all sorts of wrong-doing. The Elders who had preceded him came in for their full share; he denounced them for their inconsistency and hypocrisy, and bitterly upbraided them for running his mule and their own beasts in such a manner. The Bishop of the place and his counsellors he accused of inactivity and carelessness; and he called loudly upon every one present to repent and do their first works; threatening them with the speedy judgments of Heaven.

All this was well enough if it had stopped there, for it might have been taken for just what it was—an ebullition of temper on the part of "Jeddy" who was naturally vexed that his mule had been over-heated. But like many other manias and epidemics, this Mormon movement began with a most insignificant trifle, and the spirit of fiery denunciation became perfectly contagious. Another meeting was held in the course of a few weeks, and then the mutual accusations of those who were present became, if possible, more bitter than before; the "Saints" were denounced as the vilest of sinners and they were all commanded to be re-baptized. Accordingly, after the meeting, although it was night and the weather was cold, a considerable number were immersed by the Elders, and Jeddy himself was so enthusiastically engaged in the performance that he remained in the water so long that he got a thorough chill and contracted the disease of which he died.

Sunday after Sunday similar scenes were repeated in the Tabernacle, until, had it not been painful, the whole affair would have been ludicrous in the extreme. Every one had strayed from the path of duty, and the fact was announced in the strongest terms. People were called upon by name to publicly confess their sins, and many were then and there pointed out and accused of crimes of which they were entirely guiltless but which they dared not deny. In the midst of all this, the duty of implicit obedience to the Priesthood and the payment of tithes was loudly insisted upon.

Then Missionaries were sent out all over the territory armed with the full authority of the Priesthood and also a catechism which, on account of its obscene character, has since been bought up so successfully by Brigham that it is doubtful if there is a copy in existence. The Mormons have a curious way of appointing Missionaries. If a man is weak in the faith, a depraved bad man, or even a youth with wild tendencies and inclined to sow his wild oats a little too luxuriantly, he is sent on his travels to preach the Gospel:—nothing strengthens a man's faith, it is thought, more than having to defend it from the opposition of unbelievers, and the enforced good example which the Missionary is obliged to set will, it is said, produce a salutary effect upon the exuberance of youth or the depravity of more mature years. In the present instance many of the Missionaries thus sent forth were known to be as immoral as they were grossly ignorant.

There was one terrible meeting at which Brigham himself was put to the blush. Men of note were there—no one was present who did not belong to the Priesthood. “Jeddy” held forth, and Heber and Brigham were strong upon the occasion. In the midst of the proceedings, Brother Brigham, full of confidence, in the plainest words called upon all who could not plead guiltless of certain crimes to stand up. Three-fourths of those present immediately arose. Utterly shocked, the Prophet entered into explanations; but self-convicted these three-fourths of his hearers stood conscientiously firm. Even Brigham saw the necessity of taking some stringent measures. The Saints were told that if they were re-baptized their sins would be washed away and they could then say they were not guilty of the crimes suggested in the catechism. Subsequently the catechism itself was, as I said, bought up and burnt.

The burden of every sermon was unquestioning obedience, repentance, payment of tithing, and above all the taking of more wives. The Missionaries, without the slightest ceremony, would visit the houses of respectable Saints, examine them out of the abominable catechism, and question husbands and wives in the presence of their children about even their very thoughts, in a manner, and upon subjects, which would amply have justified their being hung up to the nearest tree—Lynch law was in fact too good for such atrocities. Wicked ideas, the utterance of which would have called forth a blush even if heard from the lips of a drunken rowdy in a pot-house, were suggested and explained to young children; while it would have been literally at the risk of life for their parents to have expostulated:—to do so would have shown want of faith, and want of faith would have justified some fanatical scoundrel in using his knife or his pistol for the loving purpose of cutting off his brother’s soul from earth in order to save it in heaven!

Meanwhile, Jedediah did not for a moment cease his exhortations, the work must be done thoroughly: the Blood-Atone-ment must not be forgotten. On one occasion, in the Tabernacle, this crazy fanatic said:—

“I would advise some of you men here to go to President Young, and confess your sins, and ask him to take you outside the city and have your blood shed to atone for your sins."

"There are men and women that I would advise to go to the President immediately, and ask him to appoint a committee to attend to their case; and then let a place be selected, and let that committee shed their blood. . . .

"I would ask how many covenant-breakers there are in this city and in this kingdom? I believe that there are a great many; and if they are covenant-breakers, we need a place designated where we can shed their blood."

"We have been trying long enough with this people, and I go in for letting the sword of the Almighty be unsheathed, not only in word but in deed."

Lest he should be mistaken he said:

"What ought this meek people who keep the commandments of God do unto them? 'Why,' says one, 'they ought to pray the Lord to kill them.' I want to know if you would wish the Lord to come down and do all your dirty work? When a man prays for a thing, he ought to be willing to perform it himself. . . . Putting to death the transgressors would exhibit the law of God, no matter by whom it was done."

Heber C. Kimball, the "model Saint," after a speech to the same effect, in which, as usual, he made use of the most disgusting language, added:

"Joseph Smith was God to the inhabitants of the earth when he was among us, and Brigham is God now!"

But more shocking than any other was the language of Brigham Young himself. On the 21st of September, 1856, in a discourse delivered in the Bowery, Great Salt Lake City, and afterwards re-printed by authority in the Journals of Discourses, Vol. IV., pp. 53-4, he said:

"The time is coming when justice will be laid to the line and righteousness to the plummet; when we shall take the old broadsword, and ask, 'Are you for God?' and if you are not heartily on the Lord's side, you will be hewn down!"

"There are sins that men commit for which they cannot receive forgiveness in this world or in that which is to come; and if they had their eyes opened to see their true condition, they would be perfectly willing to have their blood spilt upon the ground, that the smoke thereof might ascend to Heaven as an offering for their sins, and the smoking incense would atone for their sins; whereas, if such is not the case, they will stick to them and remain with them in the spirit world.

"I know, when you hear my brethren telling about cutting people off from the earth, that you consider it is strong doctrine; but it is to save them, not to destroy them. . . .

"I do know that there are sins committed of such a nature that, if the people did understand the doctrine of salvation, they would tremble because of their situation. And, furthermore, I know that there are transgressors who, if they knew themselves, and the only condition upon which they can obtain forgiveness, would beg of their brethren to shed their blood, that the smoke thereof might ascend to God as an offering to appease the wrath that is kindled against them, and that the law might have its course. I will say, further, I have had men come to me and offer their lives to atone for their sins.

"It is true that the blood of the Son of God was shed for sins through the fall and those committed by men, yet men can commit sins which it can never remit. As it was in ancient days, so it is in our day; and though the principles are taught publicly from this stand, still the people do not understand them; yet the law is precisely the same. There are sins that can be atoned for by an offering upon an altar, as in ancient days; and there are sins that the blood of a lamb, of a calf, or of turtle doves cannot remit, but they must be atoned for by the blood of the man."

One would have supposed that even Brigham had now reached the culminating point of horror and blasphemy. But no;—a month or so later he even surpassed himself when in a Tabernacle sermon he said:

"When will we love our neighbors as ourselves? In the first place, Jesus said that no man hateth his own flesh. It is admitted by all that every person loves himself. Now if we do rightly love ourselves we want to be saved, and continue to exist, we want to go into the kingdom where we can enjoy eternity, and see no more sorrow nor death. This is the desire of every person who believes in God. Now take a person in this congregation who has knowledge with regard to being saved in the kingdom of our God and our Father, and being exalted, one who knows and understands the principles of eternal life, and sees the beauties and excellency of the eternities before him compared with the vain and foolish things of the world, and suppose that he is overtaken in a gross fault, that he has committed a sin that he knows will deprive him of that exaltation which he desires, and that he cannot attain to it without the shedding of his blood, and also knows that by having his blood shed he will atone for that sin and be saved and exalted with the gods, is there a man or a woman in this house but would say, 'Shed my blood that I might be saved and exalted with the gods?'

"All mankind love themselves: and let those principles but be known by an individual, and he would be glad to have his blood shed. This would be loving ourselves even unto an eternal exaltation. Will you love your brothers or sisters likewise when they have a sin that cannot be atoned for without the shedding of their blood? Will you love that man or woman well enough to shed their blood? That is what Jesus Christ meant. He never told a man or woman to love their enemies in their wickedness, never. He never meant any such thing; His language is left as it is for those to read who have the spirit to discern between truth and error; it was so left for those who can discern the things of God. Jesus Christ never meant that we should love a wicked man in his wickedness.

"I could refer you to plenty of instances where men have been righteously slain in order to atone for their sins. I have seen scores and hundreds of people for whom there would have been a chance (in the last resurrection there will be) if their lives had been taken and their blood spilled on the ground as a smoking incense to the Almighty, but who are now angels to the devil, until our elder brother, Jesus Christ, raises them up and conquers death, hell, and the grave.

"I have known a great many men who have left this Church, for whom there is no chance whatever for exaltation, but if their blood had been spilled it would have been better for them.

"The wickedness and ignorance of the nations forbid this principle being in full force, but the time will come when the law of God will be in full force. This is loving our neighbor as ourselves; if he needs help, help him; if he wants salvation, and it is necessary to spill his blood on the earth in order that he may be saved, spill it.

"Any of you who understand the principles of eternity, if you have sinned a sin requiring the shedding of blood, except the sin unto death, should not be satisfied or rest until your blood should be spilled, that you might gain that salvation you desire. That is the way to love mankind. . . . Light and darkness cannot dwell together, and so it is with the kingdom of God.

"Now, brethren and sisters, will you live your religion? How many hundreds of times have I asked that question? Will the Latter-Day Saints live their religion?"

And so, according to Brigham Young, their Prophet, this was the religion of the Saints! And the people acted up to the "religion" thus taught: and the story is so terrible that one dare not even whisper all its details.

It is no secret that all this was understood literally. The wife of one Elder, when he was absent on a mission, acted unfaithfully towards him. Her husband took counsel of the authorities, and was reminded that the shedding of her blood alone could save her. He returned and told her, but she asked for time, which was readily granted. One day, in a moment of affection, when she was seated on his knee, he reminded her of her doom, and suggested that now when their hearts were full of love was a suitable time for carrying it into execution. She acquiesced, and out of love he cut her throat from ear to ear.

In many instances the outrages committed against persons who were known to be innocent were so revolting that no woman—nay, even no right-minded man—would venture to more than just allude to them. A few however, and only a few, and they by no means the worst, of the milder cases, I will just mention.

There was the murder of the Aikin party—six persons—who were killed on their way to California. The same year a man named Yates was killed under atrocious circumstances; and Franklin McNeil who had sued Brigham for false imprisonment and who was killed at his hotel door. There was Sergeant Pike, and there was Arnold and Drown. There was Price and William Bryan at Fairfield; there was Almon Babbitt, and Brassfield, and Dr. Robinson; there was also James Cowdy and his wife and child, and Margetts and his wife; and many another, too,—to say nothing of that frightful murder at the Mountain Meadows.

Besides these there is good reason to think that Lieutenant Gunnison and his party were also victims, although it was said that they were shot by “Indians.” The Potter and Parrish murders were notorious; Forbes, and Jones and his mother, might be added to the same list; the dumb boy, Andrew Bernard; a woman killed by her own husband; Morris the rival Prophet, and Banks, and four women who belonged to their party; Isaac Potter, and Charles Wilson, and John Walker. These are but a few. The death list is too long for me to venture to give it.

One instance I can give from my own personal knowledge. A sister who occasionally does a little work at my house on one occasion said to me: “Mrs. Stenhouse, when first I came to this country I lived in the southern portion of Utah. One day I saw a woman running across the fields towards our house, pale and trembling. When she came in she looked round her as if she were frightened, and she asked if any one besides our own family were present. On being assured that there was no one present whom she might fear, she said:—‘Two men came to our house late last night and asked to see my husband, who had already retired. He was in bed, but they insisted that he must get up as they had a message from “the authorities” for him. When they saw him they requested him to go with them to attend, they said, to some Church business. I became very much alarmed, for my poor husband had been known to speak rather freely of late of some of the measures of the Church, but he tried to reassure me and finally left the house with the two men. In about an hour after they came back bearing between them his lifeless body. They laid him upon the bed, and then one of them pulled aside the curtain which constituted our only cupboard, and took therefrom a bake-kettle and stood it beside the bed, in order to catch the blood that was flowing from a fearful wound in his throat. They then left the house telling me to make as little noise about it as possible or they might serve me in the same way. The men were masked, and I cannot tell who they are, but I spent a fearful night with my poor dead husband.'” This sister added: “Sister Stenhouse, in those more fearful times we dared not speak to each other about such things for fear of spies.”

These were all well-known and notorious instances. I say nothing of those of whose fate nothing—not even a whisper—was ever heard; and I say nothing of the frightful “cuttings off” before the Reformation and in recent years.

Gentile men and women were killed, for hatred; and that “killing” was no murder, for theirs was not innocent blood. Apostates, and Saints of doubtful faith, and those who were obnoxious, had their blood shed—all for love—and that “cutting off” was also no murder, because to secure their salvation by cutting their throats was an act of mercy. Can it be possible that men should thus act and say—and believe—that Jesus, the gentle and merciful Saviour, commanded it when He said: “Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself?”

All through this Reign of Terror, marrying and giving in marriage was the order of the day. It mattered not if a man was seventy years of age, according to Brother Brigham he was still a boy—“the brethren are all boys until they are a hundred years old”—and some young girl of sixteen, fifteen, or even younger would be “counselled”—that is, commanded—to marry him. She might even have a sister no older than herself, and then as likely as not he would take the two to wife, and very probably both on the same day. The girls were told that to marry a young man was not a safe thing, for young men were not tried—it was better to marry a well-tested patriarch and then their chances of “exaltation” in the kingdom of heaven were sure and certain. In this way the life-long happiness of many a girl—little more than a child—was blighted for ever. At the time of which I speak, every unmarried woman, or girl who could by the utmost stretch of possibility be thought old enough to marry, was forced to find a husband, or a husband was immediately found for her, and without any regard to her wishes was forced upon her. Young men, and even boys, were forced, not only into marriage, but even Polygamy, and none dared resist. The marrying mania, in fact, was universal and irresistible—every one must marry or be given in marriage. So evidently was this the case that women in jest said that, if one were to hang a petticoat upon a fence-pole, half a dozen men would flock at once to marry it! Absurd as this may seem it was not very far from the truth. Young men and maidens, old men and children, widows, virgins, and youths—in fact every one whether married or unmarried, it mattered not, was “counselled”—commanded—to marry.

There is above fanaticism a stronger law which, despite every effort of the deluded victim, will occasionally make itself heard—the voice of Nature. Even during that strange time in which every Saint seemed to have gone stark crazy mad, the frightful anomaly of men of fifty, sixty, and even seventy marrying mere children—girls of fourteen, and even thirteen,—forced itself upon the attention of some of the leaders. The question arose—an odd question to Gentile ears—“At what age is a girl old enough to marry?” Considerable discussion ensued, and even in the Tabernacle the subject was taken up. The voice of authority, however, eventually answered the matter, but not in the way that any ordinary civilised person would expect.

In those times, unmarried girls were very scarce—in the settlements it was difficult to find any at all. Not infrequently it happened that a brother was “counselled” to marry, but could not obey, as there was no unmarried woman in the place where he lived. In that case he generally paid a visit to Salt Lake City. But business at the Endowment House nevertheless was pretty lively ; in fact so much so that it was deemed necessary to set apart certain days for the various Settlements. Once, when the "Provo day" was fast approaching, two old brethren from that town who had been counselled to enlarge their families, but who had been unsuccessful in finding partners, began to despair of being able to obey "the word of the Lord!" The day before that appointed for the Endowments and Celestial Marriage arrived, and they were as far from success as ever. Being neighbors, the two old gentlemen met and mingled their griefs, and considered what might be done. It then occurred to them that there was a certain brother who had two daughters, respectively twelve and fourteen years of age, and they resolved to call upon him about these children. As might be supposed, the father at first refused them, giving as a reason that the girls were too young. The old men explained that if they could not marry the children it was impossible for them to "obey counsel," and the father then agreed. The next morning the marriage ceremony was performed in the Endowment House. One of these wretches was sixty years of age, and the other a few years younger. The father of the children was about forty. I am really afraid that the reader will think that I exaggerate or misrepresent facts. I wish it were so, for the case is so outrageously atrocious ; but I am sorry to say that scores and hundreds of instances similar to this, which occurred during the Reformation, might be given.

Not long before this infamous transaction, one of these men looking round in search of a wife, learned that a young English girl was stopping at the house of a certain brother in the neighborhood. He immediately visited that brother, and said he should like to be made acquainted with the girl. It happened that the young sister in question had recently been married, but of that the ancient brother was of course ignorant, and his friend at whose house the lady was stopping, being fond of a little practical joke at times, did not inform him of the fact. The would-be lover in a business-like way at once began with his wooing ; spoke to the young lady about the Revelation ; of the "counsel" he had received ; of his desire to obey ; and finally offered her his hand and heart—at least as much of the latter as remained. He expatiated upon his prospects and possessions :—he had a small house and a large lot, a good farm, a few cows, a yoke of oxen, and a wagon, —another wife was a trifle which he felt himself well able to keep. The sister listened in silence and seemed a little bashful. At last she said that about such a serious matter she must have a little time for consideration, and asked for a week's thinking-time.

Delighted with his success the gentleman withdrew ; but before the end of the week he found out that the lady was married, he saw her husband, he saw the friend at whose house the lady was stopping ; and over the matter he made a considerable fuss.

There are before me as I write, letters, papers, documents of various sorts relative to marriage and the matrimonial affairs of the Saints, at the time of which I speak, that I wish the reader could peep at. I would not like him to read them—in fact, I dared not read them all myself, for some of them are so shameful that the mere knowledge of having read them through would make any right-minded person blush. Taking more wives was the order of the day—how, was of little matter.

The work of "Reformation" was in full progress ; the people were excited to frenzy ; the Federal troops were expected ; men were marrying and maidens were given in marriage ; every one in Utah was looking forward to the time when the prophecies of Joseph, the Seer, should be fulfilled. and the Son of Man should come :—and then, when one would have supposed that every man would have wished that his hands should be pure, was perpetrated a deed which is unparalleled in modern civilised times—a deed at which angels and men have stood aghast with horror.

I FEEL myself utterly inadequate to tell the story of the Mountain Meadows' Massacre—it is so shocking, so fiend-like. And yet it must be told.

While the work of "Reformation" was going on, and when the United States troops were constantly expected in the Valley of the Great Salt Lake, a large train of emigrants passed through Utah on its way to California. The train consisted of one hundred and twenty or one hundred and thirty persons, and they came chiefly from Arkansas. They were people from the country districts, sober, hard-working, plain folks, but well-to-do and, taken all in all, about as respectable a band of emigrants as ever passed through Salt Lake City.

Nothing worthy of any particular note occurred to them until they reached the Valley—that was the point from which they started towards death.

My old friend Eli B. Kelsey travelled with them from Fort Bridger to Salt Lake City, and he spoke of them in the highest terms. If I remember rightly he said that the train was divided into two parts—the first a rough-and-ready set of men—regular frontier pioneers; the other a picked community, the members of which were all more or less connected by family ties. They travelled along in the most orderly fashion, without hurry or confusion. On Sunday they rested, and one of their number who had been a Methodist preacher conducted divine service. All went well until they reached Salt Lake City, where they expected to be able to refit and replenish their stock of provisions; but it was there that they first discovered that feeling of enmity which finally resulted in their destruction.

Now it so happened that the minds of the Saints in Salt Lake City were at that time strongly prejudiced against the people of Arkansas, and for a most unsaintly reason. The Apostle Parley P. Pratt, who was one of the earliest converts to Mormonism, and who so ably defended his adopted creed with his pen and from the platform, had not very long before been sojourning in Arkansas and had there run away with another man's wife. This was only a trifle for an "Apostle" to do, and the husband—Mr. McLean—might have known it. But he was a most inconsiderate man and was actually offended with the amorous Apostle for what he had done. He pursued him and killed him, for in those rough parts it was considered that the Apostle did wrong in marrying the man's wife. Nobody, however, took any notice of the matter or brought the murderer to trial. The Mormon people, of course, took the side of the Apostle Parley P. Pratt. Sensitive themselves to the highest degree concerning their wives and daughters, they considered McLean a sinner for doing just exactly what any Saint would have certainly done. Their opinion, however, would have been a matter of consequence only to themselves, had not such fatal consequences resulted from it. Reasoning without reason, they argued that McLean was the enemy of every Mormon, and every Mormon was the enemy of McLean;—McLean was protected in Arkansas therefore every man from Arkansas was an enemy of the Mormons;—an enemy ought to be cut off—therefore it was the duty of every Mormon to "cut off"—if he could—every Arkansas man.

This appears to have been the tone of thought which actuated the minds of the leaders of the people at the time when this emigrant train arrived in the City.

Weary and footsore they encamped by the Jordan River, trusting there to recruit themselves and their teams, and to replenish their stock of provisions. The harvest in Utah that year had been abundant, and there was nothing to hinder them from obtaining a speedy and full supply. Brigham Young was then Governor of Utah Territory, Commander-in-Chief of the Militia, and Indian Agent as well:—he was therefore responsible for all that took place within his jurisdiction. It was his duty to protect all law-abiding persons who either resided in or travelled through the country. The emigrants, so far from being protected, were ordered to break up their camp and move on; and it is said that written instructions were sent on before them, directing the people in the settlements through which they would have to pass to have no dealings with them. This, considering their need of provisions, was much the same as condemning them to certain death.

Compelled to travel on, they pursued their journey slowly towards Los Angeles. At American Fork they wished to trade off some of their worn-out stock and to purchase fresh,—they also desired to obtain provisions. There was abundance of everything from the farm and from the field, for God had very greatly blessed the land that year; but they could obtain nothing. They passed on, and went through Battle Creek, Provo, Springville, Spanish Fork, Payson, Salt Creek and Fillmore, and their reception was still the same,—the word of the Mormon Pontiff had gone forth, and no man dared to hold communion or to trade with them. Now and then, some Mormon, weak in the faith or braver or more fond of money than his fellows, would steal into the camp, in the darkness of the night, bearing with him just what he was able to carry ; but beyond this they could procure nothing. Their only hope now lay in the chance of holding out until they could push through to some Gentile settlement where the word of the priestly Governor of Utah was not law. Through fifteen different Mormon settlements did they pass, without being able to purchase a morsel of bread. With empty wagons and on short allowance, they pushed on until they reached Corn Creek, where, for the first time in saintly Utah, they met a friendly greeting from the Indians and purchased from them thirty bushels of corn, of which they stood very greatly in need.

At Beaver they were again repulsed, and at Parowan they were not permitted to enter the town—they were forced to leave the public highway and pass round the west side of the fort wall. They encamped by the stream, and tried, as before, to obtain food and fresh cattle, but again to no purpose. The reason why they were refused admission into the town was probably because the militia was there assembled under Colonel Wm. H. Dame—which militia afterwards assisted in their destruction, for which preparations were even now made.

They made their way to Cedar City, the most populous of all the towns of Southern Utah. Here they were allowed to purchase fifty bushels of tithing wheat and to have it ground at the mill of that infamous scoundrel John D. Lee, upon whose memory will rest the eternal curses of all who have ever heard his name. It was, however, no act of mercy—the supplying of this corn. The sellers of it knew well enough even then that it would return to them again in the course of a few days. After all, they had but forty days' rations to carry them on to San Bernardino, in California—a journey of about seventy days. Scanty kindness—miserable generosity !—fifty bushels of corn for a seventy-days' journey, for men, women, and young children, and at least one little one to be born on the road.

They remained in Cedar City only one day, and so jaded were their teams that it took them three days to travel thence to Iron Creek—a distance of twenty miles; and two days were occupied in journeying fifteen miles—the distance between Iron Creek and the Meadows.

The morning after they left Iron Creek, the Mormon militia followed them in pursuit, intending, it is supposed, to assault them at Clara Crossing. That this was no private outburst, and that, on the contrary, it was done by authority, is evident from sworn testimony to the effect that the assembling of those troops was the result of "a regular military call from the superior officers to the subordinate officers and privates of the regiment. . . Said regiment was duly ordered to muster, armed and equipped as the law directs, and prepared for field operations." A regular military council was held at Parowan, at which were present President Isaac C. Haight, the Mormon High-Priest of Southern Utah, Colonel Dame, Major John D. Lee, and the Apostle George A. Smith.

No military council, whether of the militia or the ordinary troops of the line, would dare to determine upon such an important matter as the cutting off of an emigrant train of one hundred and thirty persons without receiving permission from superior authority. Brigham Young was in this case the superior authority—he was the Commander-in-Chief of the Militia:—the inference is obvious. I do not, of course, say that he gave the order for this accursed deed, but that it was his business to bring the criminals to justice no one can doubt or deny.

The regiment which started from Cedar City under the command of Major John D. Lee, the sub-agent for Indian affairs in Southern Utah, was accompanied by baggage-wagons and the other paraphernalia of war, excepting only heavy artillery, which in this case would have been useless. But, at the same time, a large body of the Piede Indians had been invited to accompany them.

An order came from head-quarters to cut off the entire company except the little children. The emigrants were utterly unprepared, and the first onslaught found them defenceless. Accustomed, however, to border warfare, they immediately corralled their wagons and prepared for a siege—their great misfortune was that they had not any water.

Major John D. Lee, finding the emigrants resolute, sent to Cedar City and Washington City for re-inforcements, which duly arrived.

The next morning, Major John D. Lee assembled his troops, including the auxiliaries which he had summoned, about half a mile from the intrenchment of the fated emigrants, and then and there informed them, with all the coolness which such an infamous scoundrel alone could muster, that the whole company was to be killed, and only the little children who were too young to remember anything were to be spared.

The unfortunate emigrants did not know who their foes were. They saw Indians, or men who were so colored that they looked like Indians, and they saw others who were more than strangers to them, but they had no clue to the cause of their detention. To them all was mystery. That Indians should attack them was quite within the bounds of probability, although there was at that time no cause for such an outrage; but that such an attack should be persistent, and should be carried on under the peculiar circumstances in question, was, to say the least, highly improbable.

A flag of truce was sent down to the unfortunate emigrants: but wherefore a flag of truce?—wherefore any conditions of warfare? and wherefore should the militia regiment be militant against them? No answer can be returned to these questions without disclosing secret scenes of sin and shameful iniquity at the mention of which even the souls of fiend might stand aghast.

A message was sent to the emigrant camp—a message not of Christian love and help, but such as might be sent from one foeman to another. A flag of truce was sent, and with it a message to the effect that, if the emigrants chose to lay down their arms and surrender themselves to the militia, their lives should be spared. Consider the atrocity of this. Here was a company of harmless emigrants, against whom not even the slightest wrong-doing had been suggested. Yet, unquestioned, unaccused, innocent of all wrong-doing, the authorised and duly constituted militia of Utah Territory—a Territory claiming even then to be admitted into the Union as the State of "Deseret"—was encamped against those unoffending citizens, with the cruel, the iniquitous purpose of cutting them off.

Who could rightly tell a story so fearful as this? The emigrant train—men, women, and children fainting and famishing for want of bread and meat. In their pockets was money wherewith the necessities of life might have been bought, and the generous hand of the Almighty had that year been open so wide and had scattered those necessities so liberally that nothing but the wickedness of man towards his fellow could have created a dearth. But so it was that darkness and the fear of death—a fearful death even at the door—was all those poor emigrants had standing before their eyes. What right had the Mormon militia to be pursuing, to be hanging about the skirts of any body of emigrants. Their very presence was in itself unauthorised—criminal. The emigrants supposed that they were surrounded by Indians and expected the cruellest treatment in case of resistance—not death, but the outrage and shocking atrocities of savages. They did not know that the red men who threatened their lives and the lives of their helpless wives and infants were brought together at that spot for that same purpose by the counsel of Mormon authorities. They did not know that so many of the appearing red-skins were only painted devils, mocks of humanity, wretches who under the mask of a red-skin's color were eager to perpetrate the foulest of offences—scoundrels a thousand times damned in the opinion of men and by the decree of God.

Day after day went by, and the poor creatures began to despair—who can wonder? The brave men cared little for their own lives ; but there was something fearful in the thought that their darling ones would be scalped, and torn in pieces, and brutally outraged ! Who can wonder that they resolved to sell life as dearly as they possibly could ? They might at least die in defence of those they loved.

So day followed day. The agony of the unhappy men and women who were thus besieged and were in daily, hourly peril of the most frightful of all deaths can be imagined—not told. Meanwhile, what were those atrocious scoundrels doing who were lying in wait for their blood ? Some of them were tricked out as Indians ; some were in their own proper dresses ; and, moreover, real Utes were there. The unhappy victims could not possibly escape—there was time for the murderers to do their work leisurely. Between chance shots, which were intended to, and did, carry death with them, they amused themselves with “pitching horse-shoe quoits :”—such heartlessness is almost beyond conception.

In terrible need of water, they thought that even the Indians who they supposed were their assailants might possibly respect a token of truce ; so they dressed two little girls in white and sent them down to the well. But the fiends—the Mormon militia—shot them down. In the day of doom, the blood of those babes will testify more heavily against Major John D. Lee and Isaac C. Haight, and Colonel Dame, and George A. Smith, and the other wretch who plotted and contrived that fearful iniquity, than any of the base and cowardly crimes which have for years and years blackened their contemptible and miserable souls.

They could not possibly advance. Their corn would not last long. They were famishing for water. How long they could hold out was evidently only a matter of time. Had the train consisted only of men, they might certainly, if with loss, have cut their way through their besiegers and escaped ; but with wives and children, and others bound to them by the tenderest ties, such a thing was impossible. They looked and waited. Savage Indians they supposed were their only enemies. Coldly, strangely as they had been treated at the Mormon settlements, they never for a moment supposed that white men could be in league against them or could meditate their destruction.

Up in the meadows—in the distance—there was a white dusty cloud as if of some person or persons approaching:—the hearts of the emigrants leaped for joy. Was help coming at last? It was evident that a wagon was coming near, and the wagon was filled with armed men;—here was hope. After all the misery of that waitful watching, they were overjoyed, and shouted aloud with gladness, and sprang with open arms to welcome their visitors. Little did they suppose that the fiends who then came down, with pale faces and the manners of white men, were the same as those who, painted and decked out like Indians, had been leagued about their camp with murderous intentions for so many days.

The wagon came near, and was found to be filled with armed men. Surely now, the unhappy emigrants thought, substantial help had come—the authorities of Utah in the neighborhood, whether Gentile or Mormon, had come out in the cause of civilisation and humanity, and succor was at hand.

A white flag was waved from the wagon as an emblem of peace, and in order that the emigrants might know that it was white men and not the red demons of the hills who approached. They did not, indeed, know that these themselves were the monsters who had wronged them all this time and who were even now compassing their death.

Inside that wagon was President Haight, the infamous Mormon Bishop John D. Lee, and other authorities of the Church in Southern Utah. They professed to the emigrants that they came upon the friendly errand of standing between them and the Indians. They said that the Indians had taken offence at something that the emigrants had done, that they were thirsting for their blood, but that they—the Mormon officials—were on good terms with them and had influence, and would use their good offices in the cause of mercy and of peace. After some discussion they left with the professed view of conciliating the Indians. Then they returned and said that the Indians had agreed, that if the emigrants marched back to Salt Lake City their lives should be spared ; but that they must leave everything behind them in their camp, even including the common weapons of defence which every Western man carries about his person. The Mormon officials then solemnly undertook to bring an armed force and to guard the emigrants safely back again to the Settlements.

The emigrants were not cowards, and would doubtless have preferred to cut their way through to the South, but they could not leave their wives and little ones, and any terms, however disadvantageous, were better than leaving those they loved to the tender mercy of those wretches.

This agreement being made, the Mormon officials retired, and after a short time again returned with thirty or forty armed men. Then the emigrants were marched out—the women and children in the front, and the men following, while the Mormon guard followed in the rear. When they had marched in this way about a mile and had arrived at the place where the Indians were hid in the bushes on each side of the road, the signal was given for the slaughter. So taken by surprise were the emigrants, and so implicitly had they confided in these murderers that they offered no resistance. The Mormon Militia—their guard—immediately opened fire upon them from the rear, while the Indians, and Mormons disguised as Indians, who were hidden among the bushes, rushed out upon them, shooting them down with guns and bows and arrows, and cutting some of the men's throats with knives. The women and children, shrieking with mortal terror, scattered and fled, some trying to hide in the bushes. Two young girls actually did escape for about a quarter of a mile when they were overtaken and butchered under circumstances of the greatest brutality. The son of John D. Lee endeavored to protect one poor girl who clung to him for help ; but his father, tearing her from him by violence, blew out her brains. Another unhappy girl is said to have kneeled to this same monster Lee, entreating him to spare her life. He dragged her into the bushes, stripped her naked, and cut her throat from ear to ear, after she had suffered worse at his hands than death itself. About half an hour was probably occupied in the butchery, and every soul of that company was cut off, excepting only a few little children who were supposed to be too young to understand or remember what had taken place. The unfortunate victims were then stripped, without reference to age or sex, and then left to rot upon the field. There they remained until torn and dismembered by the wolves, when it was then thought prudent to conceal such as lay nearest to the road. An eye-witness subsequently visiting the spot said:—

The scene of the massacre, even at this late day, was horrible to look upon. Women's hair in detached locks and in masses hung to the sage bushes and was strewn over the ground in many places. Parts of little children's dresses and of female costume dangled from the shrubbery, or lay scattered about, and among these, here and there on every hand, for at least a mile in the direction of the road, by two miles east and west, there gleamed, bleached white by the weather, the skulls and other bones of those who had suffered. A glance into the wagon, when all these had been collected, revealed a sight which never can be forgotten.

The remains were subsequently gathered together by Major Carleton, the United States Commissioner, who erected over them a large cairn of stones, surmounted by a cross of red cedar, with an inscription thereon: "Vengeance is mine: I will repay, saith the Lord;" and on a stone beneath were engraved the words:—

"Here 120 men, women, and children were massacred in cold blood, early in September, 1857. They were from Arkansas."

It is said that this monument was subsequently destroyed by order of Brigham Young, when he visited that part of the Territory.

The little children, while their parents were being butchered, had clung about their murderer's knees entreating mercy, but none of them finding it save those who were little more than infants. Their fears and cries the night after the murder are said to have been heart-rending. One little babe, just beginning to walk, was shot through the arm. Another little girl was shot through the ear, and the clothes of most of them were saturated with their mothers' blood. They were distributed among the people of the settlements, and when finally the Government took them under the protection of the nation, the people among whom these little ones lived actually charged for their boarding. Two of them are said to have uttered some words from which it was presumed that their intelligence was in advance of their years. They were taken out quietly and—buried! This happened some time after the massacre.

Most of the property of the emigrants was sold by public auction in Cedar City :—the Indians got most of the flour and ammunition, and the Mormons the more valuable articles. They jested over it and called it "Spoil taken at the siege of Sevastopol." There is legal proof that the clothing stripped from the corpses, blood-stained, riddled by the bullets, and with shreds of flesh attached to it, was placed in the cellar of the tithing office, where it lay about three weeks, when it was privately sold. The cellar is said to have smelt of it for years. Long after this time, jewelry torn from the mangled bodies of the unfortunate women was publicly worn in Salt Lake City, and every one knew whence it came. A tithing of it all is reported upon very conclusive evidence to have been laid at the feet of Brigham Young.

This is the story—most imperfectly told—for I dare not sketch its foulest details,—of the Mountain Meadows Massacre. Brigham Young, who was at the time Governor of the Territory and also Indian Agent, made no report of the matter. Let that fact of itself speak for his innocence or guilt. Would any other governor or agent in another Territory have been thus silent? John D. Lee, and Dame, and Haight, and the other wretches have never been brought to trial or cut off from the Church, although their monstrous crime has never been a secret, nor have any endeavors been made to conceal it.

This fearful deed was one of the unavoidable results of the teachings of the Mormon leaders during the Reformation. There were crimes then perpetrated in secret which will never be known until the Day of Doom ; and there were horrors which have been known and recorded, but for which no one has been brought to trial or has suffered inconvenience. There are men in Salt Lake City, who walk about unblushingly in broad daylight, but who are known to be murderers, and whose hands have been again and again dyed with blood under circumstances of the most atrocious cruelty.

There was one cruel murder—but by no means the worst—which came under my own personal observation, and which I have alluded to elsewhere—the murder of Dr. John King Robinson in Salt Lake City—which attracted more than ordinary attention. This gentleman was a physician of good standing, who came out as assistant-surgeon with the United States army, and afterwards began to practice in Salt Lake City. He was known as a man of unimpeachable moral character, and there are to this day hundreds of responsible people who would testify to his fair fame and rectitude ; although he had by some means incurred the dislike of many of the Mormon leaders. He formed the idea of taking possession of some warm springs on the north of the city, and proposed to erect there baths, an hospital, etc. A small wooden shanty was erected for the purpose of holding possession, but the city authorities claimed the spring, and, after some very unpleasant proceedings, the matter was referred to the law courts, and Judge Titus decided against the doctor.

After this verdict had been rendered, Dr. Robinson seems to have acted very prudently, and to have remained in-doors as much as possible during the succeeding days. Between eleven and twelve o'clock on the night of the third day, however, after the family had retired to rest, a man called at the house, and stating that his brother had broken his leg by a fall from a mule and was suffering very much, he, after some earnest persuasion, induced the doctor to accompany him. Anxious as he might be to remain in-doors at such a time, no professional man would refuse to perform an act of mercy. He accordingly went. At a distance of about a couple of hundred steps from the house he was struck over the head with some sharp instrument, and immediately after shot through the brain. His wife, a young girl, to whom he had only been married a very short time, heard the report of the pistol, and witnesses saw men fleeing from the spot. The police were sent for, and the body was carried to Independence Hall, and afterwards to the victim's house. The Mayor of the city was not informed of the murder until ten o'clock the next day, and the chief-of-police who was sitting round the fire with his men when news of the murder arrived, went to bed immediately and did not visit the scene of the outrage for three days.

The following Sunday, Brigham Young, in the Tabernacle, publicly suggested that the doctor had probably been murdered by some of the soldiers from Camp Douglas, who were dissatisfied with his treatment when they were under his hands, or else that he had fallen in some gambling transaction—both of which statements, however, were known by every one present to be utterly false. No one was ever punished for this cruel murder. This murder did not occur during the Reformation, but it was the natural result of the teachings of those times.

I simply mention these facts without any comment of my own. Let the reader form his own conclusion. More of these frightful stories I do not care to relate; and I should not even have presented these to the notice of the reader had it not been impossible otherwise to give any suitable idea of that terrible "Reformation." The Gentile army came in. The Union Pacific Railroad was opened. Changes and chances altered all that had been, and brought into being that which might be, and that which finally really was. Instead of looking to the events of three or four thousand years ago, men began to act up to things which were—to think and act in the present, not to dream of the past. The day has gone by—but not far—when the perpetration openly of such deeds was possible; but it is still boasted that when "Deseret" becomes a State the "Saints" will "shew still greater Zeal for the Lord!"

CHAPTER XXIV.

WAYS AND WORKS OF THE SAINTS:—THE PROPHET'S MILLINERY BILL.

Life in Zion—Introduced to Brother Heber—"Have you got the Blues!"—A wife's trials: Counselling to take Another Wife—The Tabernacle Sermons—The Crowning Glory of a Man—Spiritual Food—"Filled with the Devil"—Face to Face with Polygamy—Winter in Salt Lake City—A New Position—I Produce My Treasures—My "Talkative Friend"—Comforting Visitors—"I don't like Crying Women—Afraid of Opposition—Paid in Salt Chips and Whetstones—Creating a Business—"Something Like Home"—A Bonnet for Brigham's Favorite Wife—Running up a Little Bill—How the Honest Prophet Paid It—Has He any Conscience?—My Whole Fortune Gone.

WHEN I arrived in Utah I found that nearly all the Elders with whom I had formerly been acquainted had more than one wife there. Many of these brethren called to see me, and kindly insisted that I should visit their families; but this I felt was almost an impossibility.

My whole nature rebelled at the thought of visiting where there were several wives; for, in defiance of all the teaching that I had listened to and the tyranny to which we had submitted, human nature would assert itself, and my womanly instincts revolted against the system. I could not endure the thought of visiting those families in company with my husband. I thought that perhaps sometimes I might venture alone; but, Oh, not with him,—no, not with him. It was bad enough and humiliating enough for me to witness by myself the degradation of my sex; but to do so in the presence of my husband was more than I could calmly contemplate. I knew that I should not be able to control myself, and might probably say some very unpleasant things, which I should afterwards regret; for I so thoroughly loathed even the idea of Polygomy at that time that I was filled with a desire to let every one know and understand just what my feelings were on that subject.

I had left New York against my will, although I had not openly rebelled. I had never reproached my husband about it, for I felt that his lot was irrevocably cast with the Mormons: I knew that when I married him, and it was of no use now for me to repine. I must go on to the end—there was no help for me. The journey across the Plains, and all the discoveries which I had made, had not tended to soothe my rebellious heart, and I am not quite sure that I did not sow by the way a little discontent among the sisters. The idea, however, that such was the case did not, I must admit, fill me with much repentance. To my husband I had said very little, but I think he would bear me witness that what I did say was said effectively. Now when I was brought face to face with practical Polygamy and could observe it in its most repulsive phases, I hated it more than ever.

One day, not long after our arrival, as we were taking a walk together, I saw across the road a man gesticulating after an eccentric fashion and beckoning to us. Mr. Stenhouse said: "that is Brother Heber C. Kimball;" and I looked again with interest to see what that celebrated Apostle was like. I had both heard and read a great deal about Brother Heber, and what I had learned was not at all of a character to impress me favorably—he had been so severe in his denunciation of every woman who dared to oppose Polygamy. On the present occasion his conduct was, I thought, anything but gentlemanly; and when we crossed the road to him,—which on account of his position in the Church—next to Brigham himself—we, of course, were compelled to do,—my face must have betrayed my feelings I am sure, for almost his first words after shaking hands were: "Have you got the blues?"

My answer was ready in a moment—"I have had nothing else ever since I came here."

"Well," he replied, "It is time that you should get rid of them, and I am going to talk to you some day soon, for I rather like your looks."

I did not like his looks much, however, nor was I at all pleased with his manner. I do not say that I was altogether without blame in feeling thus, for I was prejudiced. Of course I was prejudiced. From the first moment when I heard that Polygamy was a doctrine of the Church, I was predisposed to be dissatisfied with everything:—I was henceforth not myself, for the terrible apprehension of my own fate in the "Celestial Order" had changed my whole nature, and that change of itself was a great source of grief to me. I keenly realised that I was no longer the light-hearted pleasant companion to my husband that I had been, and many a time and oft I wished for his sake that I could die, for I felt that I never could be happy in Mormonism again.

How many times have I knelt by my husband's couch when he was unconscious of it, and have wept bitter tears of sorrow, earnestly praying to the Lord to subdue my rebellious heart, and, if it were necessary, rather than I should be a continual annoyance to my husband whom I loved with all my soul, that every particle of love in my heart should be withered, so that I might perchance, if without love, be able at least to do my duty. I fully realised that in Polygamy there could be no real love; and while my affections were still placed upon my husband, it was torture to live in a community where I was compelled to listen to the "counsels" which were given to him, day after day, regardless of my presence, to take another wife. I was too proud to notice any ordinary allusion that was made to the subject before me; but when the conversation was turned in that direction by those who professed to be sincere friends and to entertain a kindly interest in my welfare, I was compelled to listen and reply.

In my unhappy condition, I thought that perhaps I might derive some consolation from the sermons in the Tabernacle—something that might shed a softer light upon my rugged pathway. But instead of obtaining consolation, I heard that which aroused every feeling of my soul to rebellion and kindled again within me the indignation which I had been so long struggling to conquer. I heard that woman was an inferior being, designed by the Lord for the especial glory and exaltation of man, that she was a creature that should feel herself honored if he would only make her the mother of his children—a creature who if very obedient and faithful through all the trials and tribulations in life, might some day be rewarded by becoming one of her husband's queens, but should even then shine only by virtue of the reflected light derived from the glory of her spouse and lord. He was to be her "saviour," for he was all in all to her; and it was through him alone and at his will that she could obtain salvation. We were informed that man was the crowning glory of creation, for whom all things—woman included—were brought into being; and that the chief object of woman's existence was to help man to his great destiny.

Not a sentence; indeed, not a word did we ever hear as to the possibility of womanly perfection and exaltation in her own right; and not only so, but, as if this were not enough to crush all ambition out of our souls, we were instructed in some new views of marriage. The great object of marriage, we were told, was the increase of children. Those diviner objects—the companionship of soul; the devotion of a refined and pure affection; the indissoluble union of two existences—were never presented to the yearning hearts of those poor women who listened to the miserable harangues of the Tabernacle: such aspirations had nothing to do with the hard, cruel facts of their life in Polygamy.

And this I found was how the women of Utah were spiritually sustained. Seldom, indeed, was taught anything better, but frequently much that was worse. If Nature, asserting its right to a full return of love, should manifest itself and inspire some of these poor wives to rebel against the lives which they were compelled to lead in Polygamy, then it would be said, in the language of the Tabernacle, that the women were "filled with the devil," and that unless they repented speedily, they would "apostatise and go to hell;"—an assurance which was scarcely necessary, for many of those poor souls were enduring as much as if they were there already. Or if some woman was found objecting to Polygamy on account of its crushing and degrading effects upon women generally, then, as I just said, she was told in the coarse language of Brigham Young himself that "such women had no business to complain; it was quite enough honor for them to be permitted to bear children to God's holy Priesthood."

I found, therefore, that the sermons in the Tabernacle were not calculated to help me much spiritually. I had neither friend nor counsellor on earth to whom I could turn for help—my God alone remained to me. But, ah, how different were my ideas of God then, from those which I entertained before and since. Once I could look upon the beauties of nature and the varied experiences of human life, and while my soul was lifted up with devotion and gratitude, I could see the loving hand of my Heavenly Father in everything around me. Now there was neither light nor beauty before my eyes—all was dark and dreary; there was nothing to draw away my heart from such sad thoughts as these. It was painfully clear to my understanding, then as now, that in Mormonism woman was to lose her personal identity. All that Christianity had done to elevate her was to be ruthlessly set aside and trampled under foot, and she was instantly to return to the position which she occupied in the darkest ages of the world's existence.

I had at that time the daily and hourly cares of a family devolving upon me, and had not therefore much leisure to spend in visiting my friends even if I had desired to do so. Notwithstanding that, however, I had abundant opportunities of observation; and thus my experience of Mormonism and Polygamy in Utah is much the same as that of any Mormon woman of ordinary sense; I only tell what others could relate if they had the inclination to do so. It was not possible for me to live in Salt Lake City without being brought face to face with Polygamy in some shape or other every day of my life. Had it been otherwise, and if remaining at home would have kept it from my view, I probably never should have had the courage to enter a house where it was practiced. To those who know nothing of that degrading system this may seem rather an exaggeration of feeling; and yet, even at that early day, I had seen so much of the folly and weakness of the Mormon brethren, both in London and New York, before we went to Utah, and had witnessed so many evil results of their teachings, that it was with the greatest difficulty that I could control my feelings sufficiently to call upon any family where there was more than one wife. And yet what I knew then was nothing in comparison to what I afterwards witnessed—yes, that I myself endured.

During the winter, although I visited very little, I attended a good many parties at the Social Hall; but I did so more from a wish to be agreeable to my husband than from any pleasure that they afforded me, for life had lost its charm to me, and I was not happy. How many times have I gazed wistfully at those lofty mountains which surrounded the city, and felt that they were indeed my prison walls. How bitterly have I realised that I should never be able to go beyond them. But in a new country, with a family to provide for, a mother has not much time to waste in pining, even if it be for liberty itself, and I would willingly draw the veil over that portion of my life.

As my husband had been on mission for so many years and had spent all his time in the service of the Church, with the exception of a few brief months before we left New York—when he was engaged on the staff of the New York Herald—I naturally enough thought that when we reached Zion his occupation would be gone. There would be no need of preaching to the Saints: on the contrary they would be able to teach us; and we should have to find out what we could do in this new country to support ourselves and our children. In this I was not mistaken.

Now among the “absolutely necessary” things which I had brought with me from New York, were about three hundred dollars' worth of millinery goods, which I had secreted among our other properties, thinking that they would very probably come in useful to the fair daughters of Zion—notwithstanding that the Elders had told me of fiery sermons delivered by the Prophet himself condemning all feminine display, and that the sisters would scorn to wear Gentile fashions. I knew my own sex too well to believe that all this was strictly true, and I felt certain that I should find, even among the Saints, some weak sisters who would appreciate my thoughtfulness in bringing such articles for their use. I had also noticed that the American Elders themselves would frequently enquire where they could buy the best gloves and the prettiest ribbons and laces, and that looked a little suspicious.

Quite a number of such articles, therefore, found their way into my list of "absolute necessities," and I know that my husband was secretly quite at a loss to know what had become of a certain sum of money which he was aware I had obtained from the sale of some of our things in New York. But my foresight in this instance was very useful to us when we arrived in Zion.

One day when Mr. Stenhouse was absent seeking employment, I thought I would make a display of my treasures and surprise him on his return. Accordingly, with the assistance of our faithful domestic, whom I had brought with me across the Plains, and who had also lived with me in Switzerland, we contrived to place two or three planks in such a way as to make a rough table on which to display the goods. I had been secretly at work for about two weeks, trimming the bonnets and hats, and making a number of head-dresses, such as were worn in New York when we left; and, although we had been three months on the Plains, and quite a month in Utah, yet those bonnets and head-dresses were of the very latest style to the ladies of Salt Lake City.

My Swiss girl was quite a carpenter, and when my temporary table was arranged, I placed a pretty-looking cloth over it to hide its defects, and then began to arrange the various articles. I found that I had a much finer assortment than I had imagined, for I had bought them at different times, and had packed them away hurriedly, lest Mr. Stenhouse or some of the other Elders—for there were generally one or two in the house—should object to my taking them. When my table was filled, and I found that I had still more to display, I was very much pleased, for I saw in my hats and bonnets, flour, meat, and potatoes for my children, and I felt hopeful, for one of the sisters had assured me that I should be certain to sell them. The next thing to do was to advertise my stock. After some reflection, I remembered another of the sisters, who was quite a good talker, and who felt very kindly towards me. I had known her in England—she had been in Utah about three years, and her husband had by that time been blessed with two other wives. She used to say that she had no patience with a set of grumbling women who did not know what was good for them. I do not think that the blessedness enjoyed by her husband was shared by the two wives, for more forlorn-looking women I never saw. My husband, however, told me that this was none of my business, and I believed him, of course, after the fashion of all good wives.

But to return. This good sister, besides being an excellent talker, had really nothing else to do besides visiting her neighbors, for the other wives now took entire charge of all the household duties. So I made her a present of a new bonnet, as I knew that then in two days my goods would be quite sufficiently advertised; and in this I was not mistaken.

Almost the first visitors who called to see me were a lady and her daughter. I talked freely to her and answered her enquiries, and she told me that she herself had had some experience in the business. "In Salt Lake City," she said, "I think you will not be able to sell those goods; they are too fashionable for the people here, and there is no encouragement given to any one in this business. I am afraid you will be disappointed."

I believed every word she said, and felt all my airy, hopeful castles begin to crumble away. Before she left, however, she very kindly offered to purchase all my goods at a low figure and thus relieve me of the anxiety and trouble of selling them. But I had had a little experience in the world,—although probably I appeared to her somewhat innocent,—and I thought that if she could sell them, there was a chance at least that I also might be able to do so. At-any-rate, I resolved to try, and I told her so when she left me with many kind wishes for my success. But what she had said during her visit had chilled my enthusiasm, and I pictured all my pretty newly-made articles becoming soiled and faded, with no one to buy them; while the little ones, barefooted—like so many children in Utah then—were running about crying for bread which I could not buy them. I felt bad, and—if I must confess it—I sat down and had a good cry.

Just at that moment I heard a knock at the door, and hastily drying my eyes, I opened it, and there stood my talkative friend.

"Stop crying!" she exclaimed, "What is the matter, my dear? Oh do stop crying. I don't like crying women: we see so many of them among the Saints of God that it is really a shame and a disgrace. Tell me what is the matter? Has your husband got another wife, or are you afraid that he won't be able to get one? Come, tell me!"

All this was uttered in a breath, and without the possibility of my putting in a word by way of reply or remonstrance. At last I told her that I had just had a visit from one of the sisters and her daughter, whom I described.

"I know," she said, "I met her as I was coming here. Do you know who she is?"

"No," I replied, "I do not think she told me her name; she simply came to look at the goods."

"And did she tell you that they would sell well, and that they are the best investment that you could have made?"

"Quite the contrary," I said, "She discouraged me so much that I could not help shedding tears."

"Well now," she answered, "that was Mrs. C, one of our milliners here; and you suppose she was going to encourage you to set up an opposition shop, do you? If you do, why, you've got something yet to learn." Indeed I felt that I had got a great deal to learn.

"Now I have come to tell you quite a different story," she said, "This very afternoon you will have at least a dozen ladies here; and ladies, too, who have got the money to pay for what they have, and who won't pay you in salt chips and whetstones."

"Do they ever pay in such things?" I enquired.

"Why certainly they do. That is the kind of pay that the good Saints generally expect their poor brethren and sisters to be satisfied with, and to feed their hungry children upon. But I say that this is wrong. Not that I want to set myself up as a judge in Zion, or that I should criticise the actions of the brethren—God forbid! But when I see the rich brethren grinding the faces of the poor in that way, why, I say that it is wrong. But you must not take any such pay as that. You may not always get money, but you can at least get flour, potatoes, and molasses. Now, I tell you that you are going to sell every article that you have got, and I shall take pleasure in recommending you and talking about it. Why, I've been to about two score people already;—but, there! I see your husband coming, and I must go!" My husband, indeed, was there. He was not very fond of my talkative friend, and passed her by with a polite salutation only; but when he saw what I had been doing the light dawned upon his mind—he no longer wondered what had become of the dollars in New York, and—astonished at my success—he congratulated me upon the good use to which I had put them.

After this interview I felt quite encouraged, and I very soon found that my friend's predictions were correct. I had no difficulty in selling, and I created quite a little business, although we lived a considerable distance from Main Street. And what with my efforts, and some employment which my husband obtained, we contrived to get through our first winter in Salt Lake City.

But I anticipate.

One day my husband informed me that there was a house about to be vacated shortly, and that Brigham Young had told him we had better take it. It was pleasantly situated near the Tabernacle, and, as houses then were, it was quite a desirable residence. We had it thoroughly cleaned, and then moved in. When I arrived in the evening I found that Mr. Stenhouse, with the assistance of our faithful Swiss girl, had arranged everything as the goods arrived from the other house ; and the place looked so clean, and there was such a bright fire burning that I felt that we now had really something like a home, and my heart was filled with gratitude.

Soon after our establishment in our new home, Brigham sent for me and asked me to make a handsome bonnet for his then favorite wife Emmeline. He left it entirely to my taste ; I was to make just what I pleased, so that it suited her and gave satisfaction.

I made my bonnet ; and when I presented it, Brigham Young was so pleased that he immediately gave me an order to make one for each of his wives. I was very much pleased at this, for we needed furniture and many other necessities very badly, and I thought that this would enable me to get them. I expected, of course, that my account would be paid in money, for I did not suppose that the Prophet of the Lord would offer me chips or whetstones :—he could afford to pay cash, and, of course, would do so. He had furnished me with some material out of his own store—for Brigham Young had a dry-goods' and grocery store of his own at that time—and I was to furnish the remainder. It was very little indeed that he supplied, and therefore my account was likely to amount to a considerable sum, for almost every wife had at least one bonnet which she wished made over with new trimmings, besides the new one.

I worked constantly for three weeks, with the assistance of two girls, to each of whom I paid six dollars a week besides board. This was a difficult thing for me to do at that time in Utah, for money was seldom seen there then ; but I was rejoicing in the prospect of the comfortable new furniture which I should have when it was all done. Furniture at that time was very expensive ; there was nothing better than white pine articles—stained or painted. The commonest kind of wooden rocking-chair cost fifteen dollars, and common painted wooden chairs were six dollars a piece, with everything else in proportion. This being our first winter, we had not been able to get much, and I thought I would devote the proceeds of the work I was doing for Brigham to fitting up the house a little ; and, with what I earned from my other customers, I contrived to pay my help, so as to have all the rest clear.

All was completed, and great satisfaction expressed at the result of my labors. So I asked my husband to present my account and, if possible, get it settled—it amounted to about two hundred and seventy-five dollars, although I had dealt very liberally with the Prophet, and had charged for the goods but little more than they cost me. When he returned, I hastened to meet him, for I had partly selected the furniture and I wanted to go and purchase it. But I was like poor Perrette, the milkmaid, who counted her chickens a little too soon ; for Mr. Stenhouse told me that Brother Brigham had given orders that the amount should be credited to us for nothing ! What a shock this was to me ; for that sum, small as it may appear, was my whole fortune at the time, and it was gone at one sweep ! “Can it be possible,” I said, “that he can be so mean as that ? Where can his conscience be ? or has he any ; to deprive me of my hard earnings in this way. He shall not do it—I will make him pay me.”

My indignation was so great that I did not reflect how imprudent I was to talk thus of the Prophet of the Lord ; but my husband said : “What can you do ? You cannot help yourself. You can do nothing but submit. Let us try to forget it ; or, if not, it will perhaps be a lesson to us.” But I did not forget it and never could, although I tried very hard ; and when many months had passed, and I no longer suffered from the effects of my loss, I still remembered it—and I always shall remember the way in which Brigham paid for his wives' bonnets.

MYSTERIES OF THE ENDOWMENT HOUSE:—FEARFUL OATHS AND SECRET CEREMONIES.

Saintly Privileges—The Origin of the Endowments—The Fraternity of the Saints—Story of the Mysteries—Shocking Doings in Days Gone By—Whisperings of Terrible Deeds—How the Mormons Mind Their Own Business—The Temple Garments—Inside the Endowment House—The Book of Life—Our Robes and Our Oil Bottles—The Washings and Anointings—The High-Priestess—Invoking Blessings—The Mysterious Garment—A New Name—The Garden of Eden—An Extraordinary Representation—The Duplicate of the Devil—The First Degree—Terrible and Revengeful Oaths—The Punishment of the Apostate—Pains and Penalties of Betrayal—Grips and Pass-words—The Mysterious Mark—Singular Apostolic Sermon—The Second Degree—Secret and Significant Signs—Behind the Veil—The Third Degree—Celestial Matrimony—Eight Hours of “Mystery”—I Justify Myself.

NOT many weeks after our arrival in Salt Lake City, my husband told me that we might now enjoy the privilege of going through the Endowment House.

This was intended as a great favor to us, on the part of the authorities, for most people have to wait a long while before receiving their Endowments; but my husband's influence and position in the Church was, I presume, the reason why we were admitted so soon.

Now, I had heard so much of the Endowments and the Endowment House that I quite dreaded to pass through this ordeal. The idea of the whole ceremony was, that thereby we should receive the special grace of God; be united—man and woman—making one perfect creature; receive our inheritance as children of God; and, in fact, be made partakers of the plenitude of every blessing.

All this sounds very well as a statement, but it is only the statement which would be made from the ideal Mormon standpoint. I had heard other things about the Endowments which did not present such a favorable impression, and although I do not wish to record all the absurd stories which were, and are, current among the Gentiles, I think it only right that I should state what my own views were before we received our privileges.

Joseph Smith, the Prophet, and very many of his early associates belonged to the ancient and honorable order of Freemasons. When he was initiated into the mysteries of that society, and what position he attained therein, I do not know; but one thing is certain, that when he, under the influence of his own peculiar religious fanaticism, endeavored to engraft upon Freemasonry some of the leading ideas of the new religion, he and those connected with him were publicly disavowed by the lodges in the West. I cannot without some trouble give here any documentary evidence, but I may be permitted, perhaps, to state that I have myself seen newspapers of that period—and the West then was a very primitive country—which contained formal official declarations duly signed by respectable persons, stating that Joseph Smith and others were no longer to be considered in fellowship with any of the Western lodges.

The idea of a bond of brotherhood—secret and indissoluble—seems ever to have been present in Joseph's mind. Whether the germ of this idea was derived from Masonry, or not, is of little moment. Gentlemen who certainly ought to know have assured me that such a notion was altogether ridiculous; but of that, as a lady, I am, of course, not competent to judge. It is, however, quite clear that the clannish or fraternal spirit among the Mormons has always pre-eminently distinguished them, and is just as noticeable at the present day as it was in Joseph's time.

It has always been commonly reported, and to a great extent believed, that the mysteries of the Endowment House were only a sort of imitation—burlesque, it might be—of the rites of Masonry ; but I need hardly say that this statement when examined by the light of facts is altogether ungrounded and absurd, as the reader will presently perceive. Still, the notion that some deeply mysterious ceremony was celebrated by the initiated has always possessed a charm to Gentile as well as Mormon minds, and the most extravagant statements have been made in reference to the Endowment House ;—in fact, to such an extent has this been the case, that most, if not all, of the Saints who have passed through the House have looked forward to the period of their initiation as a most impressive and painful ordeal, and the influence of this feeling I myself fully realised.

I knew well that no marriage was considered binding unless it had been celebrated in that place. I knew that the Saints, however long they might have been wedded, were under the necessity of being reunited there before they could be considered lawfully married and their children legitimate. According to the highest Mormon Authority no marriage is valid unless the ceremony is performed in the Temple. The Temple is not yet built, and as Joseph, the Prophet said, “No fellow can be damned for doing the best he knows how,” the Saints meanwhile do “the next best thing,” and are married in the Endowment House. I knew that there and then the faithful were said to be “endowed” with their heavenly inheritance. I saw how absolutely needful it was that my husband and myself should become partakers of those mysteries ; but I was influenced by the strange stories which I had heard of unhallowed and shameful doings in that same Endowment House, and consequently I feared to enter in.

My fears were not, however, altogether groundless or visionary. It has been whispered—falsely perhaps—that in that Endowment House scenes have been enacted so fearful that words would falter on the lips of those who told the tale concerning them. I have heard of such things from men of integrity and honor; but they were not eye-witnesses of what they related, and they could not, or would not, give me their authorities. One thing I am certain of;—if such horrible deeds were ever perpetrated within those walls there remains no living witness to testify of them. The lips of who alone could tell the whole truth are sealed in silence which the trump of doom alone shall break.

When I refer the reader to what I have already spoken of the Blood-Atonement, and of the “Reformation,” I think that that plain statement of facts renders it clear to any ordinary intelligence, that, if in the Endowment House no such deeds of darkness were ever perpetrated, it was not because such things were contrary to the spirit of Mormonism as taught by Brigham Young and the Apostles, nor was it because such things had never been done with the full approbation of the leaders of the Church, but on account of some accidental reason, into which it is needless to enquire.

It was, of course, no fear of any personal violence or any painful disclosures in that respect that made me reluctant to receive my Endowments, for at that time I was by profession apparently a good Mormon;—if I had my doubts and misgivings, I had them in common with nine-tenths of the Mormon women, and had therefore nothing to fear. The true cause of my reluctance was of a more delicate and personal nature. I had been informed that, if I refused to go, my husband could not go alone, he would be compelled to take another wife and go with her. This was not all. I found that it was quite common for the Elders to take a second wife when they took their first Endowments, and thus, as they coarsely expressed it, “kill two birds with one stone.” Moreover, I had heard of men who feared to introduce Polygamy into their households, presenting to their wives, while going through the House, a young girl as their intended bride, feeling sure that the wife would not dare to make a scene before the Assembly. How could I know that my husband also had not such an idea in his mind? True, I trusted him implicitly, and did not believe it possible that he could deceive me. But had not men who were universally known for their integrity and honor acted in the same way to their wives ; and with so many evidences of the best and most honest natures being corrupted by the unrighteous teachings of their religion, could I be blamed for doubting him whom I loved best ? Wives out of Utah doubt their own husbands, and very frequently have the best of reasons for doing so, but what woman, other than a Mormon, ever lived in constant dread that her husband, who she knew was devotedly attached to her, would do to her the cruellest wrong that man can inflict and woman can endure, for the sake of his religion and in the holy Saviour's name ?

My mind was agitated by conflicting thoughts. Sometimes fear and apprehension, sometimes indignation and hatred would make me feel perfectly reckless. Then love to my husband, and thoughts of our little ones calmed my troubled mind, and I was tranquil, until excited by some injury which I witnessed, when once more brooding over the cruel wrongs which, in God's name, had been inflicted upon the women of Utah, my anger would revive again.

There was also another reason why I particularly objected to passing through the Endowment House. I had been told many strange and revolting stories about the ceremonies which were there performed, for it is said that in the Nauvoo Temple the most disgraceful things were done. About what was done at Nauvoo I can say nothing, as it was before my time, but still it is only fair to say, that people who in every other relation in life I should have deemed most reliable and trustworthy were my informants respecting those strange stories. Of the Endowments in Utah I can, of course, speak more positively, as I myself passed through them ; and I wish to say most distinctly that, although the initiation of the Saints into "The Kingdom," appears now to my mind as a piece of the most ridiculous absurdity, there was nevertheless nothing in it indecent or immoral ;—of which the reader himself shall presently be the judge.

It is an invariable rule among the Mormons, as I have before intimated, for every man or woman to mind his or her own business, and nothing else. In this respect they certainly present a good example to the Gentile world. Thus it was, that until I myself went through the Endowments, I was totally ignorant of what they were ; although, of course, so many people with whom I had daily intercourse could so easily have enlightened me if they had been thus minded. With apostates, I, of course, had nothing to do ; and, had it been otherwise, it is most probable that they would have been so much ashamed of the folly of the whole performance that they would not have spoken explicitly about it. Besides this, every Mormon's mouth was closed by the oath of that same Endowment House—the penalty of breaking which was death—a penalty which no one doubted would be sternly enforced. Thus, totally in the dark, and remembering only the strange stories told about “washings” and “anointings” and an imitation of the Garden of Eden, with Adam and Eve clothed in their own innocence alone, it can be no wonder that any modest woman should wish to evade all participation in such scenes.

I spoke to my husband about it, and he tried to reassure me, but what he said had rather a contrary effect.

Before we left England, when speaking of these ceremonies, my husband told me that they were simply a privilege and a matter of choice. But what a choice ! I might go or refuse to go ; but, if I refused, he must—if he went through it all—take another wife in my place—and, as I knew, there would be no difficulty in finding one. I should in consequence be known as a rebellious woman ; annoyance and indignity would be heaped upon me ; while within my own home I should be compelled to occupy the position of second wife—as the one who is married first in the Endowment House is considered the first wife and has the control of everything. My husband told me that now he was most anxious to go :—he had already been notified three times that such was his privilege, and there were, he said, good reasons why we ought gladly to accept the opportunity. It was an honor, he said, for which many people had waited for years.

My husband reminded me that we had been married by a

Gentile and while living among Gentiles, and that—as I said before—our marriage was not valid, and our children were not legitimate. Only those children of ours who were born after the ceremony in the Endowment House would be legitimate,—the others were outcasts from the “Kingdom” unless we adopted them after our initiation, and thus made them heirs. In any case, poor children! they could never be considered the real heirs—they could only be “heirs by adoption.”

So I agreed to go, trying to persuade myself that it was a sacred duty; for although my faith in Mormonism had been roughly shaken, I still believed that its origin was divine.

As we had been but a few weeks in Utah we had not prepared our “Temple garments,” not thinking that we should be called upon so soon to go through. We had therefore to borrow, as most people do, for the occasion.

The Temple robe, which is a long, loose, flowing garment, made of white linen or bleached muslin, and reaching to the ankle, had been placed upon us just before we took the oaths. It was gathered to a band about twelve inches long, which rested on the right shoulder, passed across the breast, and came together under the left arm, and was then fastened by a linen belt. This leaves the left arm entirely free. The veil consists of a large square of Swiss muslin, gathered in one corner so as to form a sort of cap to fit the head; the remainder falls down as a veil. The men wear the same kind of under garment as the women, and their robes are the same, but their head-dress is a round piece of linen drawn up with a string and a bow in front, something after the fashion of a Scotch cap. All good Mormons, after they have received their first Endowments, get whole suits of Temple robes made on purpose for them so that they may be ready for use at any time when they are needed. All marriages in the Endowment House are performed in these robes, and in them all Saints who have received their Endowments are buried. Besides our robes we were instructed to take with us a bottle of the best olive oil.

At seven o'clock in the morning of the day appointed, we presented ourselves at the door of the Endowment House, and were admitted by Brother Lyon, the Mormon poet. Everything within was beautifully neat and clean, and a solemn silence pervaded the whole place. The only sound that could be heard was the splashing of water, but whence the sound proceeded we could not see. In spite of myself, a feeling of dread and uncertainty respecting what I had to go through would steal over my mind, and I earnestly wished that the day was over.

We waited patiently for a little while, and presently a man entered and seated himself at a table placed there for that purpose, upon which was a large book. He opened the book, and then calling each person in turn, he took their names and ages and the names of their fathers and mothers, and carefully entered each particular in the book. Our bottles of oil were then taken from us, and we were supposed to be ready for the ceremony.

First we were told to take off our shoes and leave them in the ante-room, and then to take up our bundles and pass into another room beyond. This was a large bath-room which was divided down the middle by a curtain of heavy material placed there for the purpose of separating the men from the women. Here my husband left me—he going to the men's and I to the women's division. In the bath-room were two or three large bathing tubs supplied by streams of hot and cold water. We were as much concealed from the men as if we had been in an entirely separate room, and everything was very quiet and orderly.

Miss Eliza R. Snow, the poetess, and a Mrs. Whitney, were the officiating attendants on that occasion. The former conducted me to one of the bathing tubs, and placing me in it, she proceeded to wash me from the crown of my head to the soles of my feet. As she did this she repeated various formulas to the effect that I was now washed clean from the blood of this generation and should never, if I remained faithful, be partaker in the plagues and miseries which were about to come upon the earth. When I had thus been washed clean, she wiped me dry, and then taking a large horn filled with the olive oil which we had brought, she anointed me. The oil was poured from the horn by Mrs. Whitney into the hand of Eliza Snow, who then applied it to me. The horn was said to be the horn of plenty which, like the widow's cruse of oil, would never fail as long as the ordinance should continue to be administered. In addition to the crown of my head, my eyes, ears and mouth were also anointed; my eyes that they might be quick to see, my ears that they might be apt at hearing, and my mouth that I might with wisdom speak the words of eternal life. She also anointed my feet, that they might be swift to run in the ways of the Lord. I was then given a certain garment to put on.

Now this garment is one peculiar to the Mormon people. It is made so as to envelop the whole body and it is worn night and day. I was told that after having once put it on, I must never wholly take it off before putting on another, but that I should change one half at a time, and that if I did so I should be protected from disease and even from death itself; for the bullet of an enemy would not penetrate that garment, and that from it even the dagger's point should be turned aside. It has been said that the Prophet Joseph carelessly left off this peculiar garment on the day of his death, and that had he not done so the rifles of his assassins would have been harmless against him.

When thus arrayed, I proceeded to put on a white night-dress and skirt, stockings, and white linen shoes. A new name was then whispered into my ear, which I was told I must never mention to any living soul except my husband in the Endowment House. This name was taken from the Bible, and I was given to understand that it would be the name whereby I should be admitted into the celestial kingdom. This was of course very gratifying. A circumstance, however, occurred which took from me all the pride which might have been mine in the possession of a new name. There was among our number a deaf woman; Mrs. Whitney had to tell her her name once or twice over, loud enough for me to hear, and thus I found that her new name, as well as mine, was Sarah. To make the matter worse, another sister whispered: "Why that is my name too." This entirely dispelled any enthusiasm which otherwise I might have felt. I could well understand that I might yet become a Sarah in Israel, but if we all were Sarahs, there would not be much distinction or honor in being called by that name. As a matter of course I supposed that the men would all become Abrahams.

Our washing and anointed being now over, we were ready for the initiation—there were about fifteen couples in all.

A voice from behind the curtain asked Miss Snow if we were ready, and was answered in the affirmative. We were then arranged in a row, the curtain was drawn aside, and we stood face to face with the men who had, of course, on their side of the curtain been put through the same ordeal. I felt dreadfully nervous, for I did not know what was coming next, and I could not quite dismiss from my mind the stories that I had heard about these mysteries. But in spite of my nervousness, curiosity was strong in me at that moment—as it was, I suppose, in the others; for, as soon as the curtain was drawn aside, we all cast our eyes in the direction of the men. They, as might be expected, were looking in our direction, and when I beheld them, I must say that my sympathies were drawn out towards the poor creatures. However little vanity or personal pride they possessed, they must have felt it unpleasant to have to appear in the presence of ladies in such a dress—or rather undress; and notwithstanding the solemn meaning of the ceremony, there was just the ghost of a smile upon our faces as we looked at each other and dropped our eyes again. To any one who did not feel as we did the religious nature of the initiation, the scene must have appeared perfectly ludicrous. In fact, some of us felt it so. One sister, just as the curtain was drawn up and we came in full view of our lords, cried out: "Oh dear, oh dear, where shall I go? What shall I do?" This, as may be supposed, caused a laugh which was, of course, immediately suppressed.

We could see how the men looked, but of our own appearance we could not so easily judge. Certainly, we must have looked anything but handsome in our white garments and with the oil trickling down our faces and into our eyes, making them smart and look red. There was nothing, however, for us to do but to submit quietly and make the best of it we could. Ashamed as I was, I thought I might venture to look at my husband—there could be no harm in that;—but when I saw his demure-looking countenance and his efforts to keep his clothing in order, I thought I should be compelled to laugh outright, for I could see that his thoughts were more occupied about his personal appearance than with the solemnity of the occasion. The men were all dressed in the same kind of garment as the women:—drawers and shirt all in one—very much like those which are used for children to sleep in—and over that an ordinary white shirt, such as men always wear;—that, with socks and white linen shoes, completed their toilet.

Clad after this interesting fashion, we sat opposite to each other for several minutes, and then my husband and myself were instructed to come forward and kneel at the altar while all the rest remained standing. It is the custom thus to select two persons, and we were either picked out by chance, or it might be, as my husband was thought a good deal of by the authorities, that they considered he would feel honored by the preference.

Suddenly a voice was heard speaking to some one, who also replied. This voice from the unseen was supposed to be the voice of Elohim in conversation with Jehovah, and the words that were used were much the same as those contained in the first chapter of the book of Genesis describing the creation of the world. Finally, Jehovah and Elohim declare their intention to come down and visit the earth. This they do, and pronounce all that they behold very good; but they declare that it is necessary that one of a higher order of intelligence than the brute creation should be placed in the world to govern and control all else.

Michael the Archangel is now called, and he is placed upon the earth under the name of Adam, and power is given him over all the beasts of the field, the fowls of the air, and the fishes of the sea. Moreover the fruits of the earth are all given to him for his sustenance and pleasure, but he is strictly charged, as in Bible-story, not to eat of one particular tree which stands in the midst of the garden. This tree is represented by a small real evergreen, and a few bunches of dried raisins are hung upon it as fruit.

It is now discovered that it is not good for man to be alone; Elohim and Jehovah, therefore, hold another conversation upon that subject, and they finally determine to give a companion to Adam. They, therefore, cause a deep sleep to fall upon Michael—or Adam as he is now called—and they prepare to operate upon him. Here we were all instructed to assume the attitude of deep sleep by dropping our heads upon our breasts. Elohim and Jehovah then came down and go through the motions of removing a rib from the side of the sleeper, which said rib appears immediately upon the scene in the person of Eliza R. Snow. Elohim and Jehovah are generally represented by two of the Twelve Apostles. When Brigham is present he plays a prominent part.

And now the devil makes his appearance in the person of W. W. Phelps. Phelps used always to personate the devil in the endowments, and the rôle suited him admirably. He is dead now, but whether it has made any difference in his status, I cannot tell, nor do I know who has succeeded him in his office. The devil wears a very tight-fitting suit of black muslin, with knee breeches and black stockings and slippers. This dress had all the appearance of a theatrical costume, and the man himself looked as much like one might imagine the devil would look, as he possibly could. He began by trying to scrape acquaintance with Eve, whom he meets while taking a walk in the garden. The innocent, unsuspecting woman is fascinated by his attentions. Father Adam—who seems to have had a touch of the Mormon about him—perhaps was not the most attentive of husbands; or he may have fallen into the same error into which many of his sons have fallen since —neglecting to pay the same attentions after marriage as he was wont to before—and left his young wife to the mercy of the tempter. However that may be, Satan and Eve are soon discovered in conversation together, and Eve appears to be particularly pleased with Satan. At length he offers her some of the fruit of the forbidden tree, and after some little demur she accepts it and eats thereof.

Then the devil leaves her, Adam makes his appearance, and Eve persuades him also to eat of the fruit of the tree. After this they make a dumb show of perceiving their condition, and an apron of white linen is produced, on which are sewn pieces of green silk, in imitation of fig leaves, and in these they both attire themselves.

Then all the brethren and sisters produced similar aprons which they had brought with them on purpose, and these they put on, as Adam and Eve had already done. Elohim now appeared again, and called Adam ; but Adam was afraid, and hid himself in the garden with Eve. The curse was now pronounced upon the serpent—the devil—who reappears upon his hands and knees, making a hissing noise as one might suppose a serpent would do. We were then all driven out of the Garden of Eden, into another room which represented the world ;—and this ended the “First Degree.”

We were now supposed to be out in the world, earning our daily bread by the sweat of our brows, and we were informed that although we had been driven out from the presence of the Lord, yet a plan of salvation would be devised for us, by which we should be enabled to return to our first estate. We were to wait patiently until this plan should be disclosed to us.

There was here such a mixture of persons and events that I could not exactly follow the idea that was intended to be conveyed,—if there was any idea at all. Men representing the ancient prophets entered, and gave instructions to the people to prepare themselves for the first coming of our Saviour upon earth. Then we were taught certain pass-words and grips ; and then we were all arranged in a circle. The women covered their faces with their veils, and we all kneeled down, and, with our right hands uplifted towards heaven, we* took the solemn oath of obedience and secrecy. We swore that by every means in our power we would seek to avenge the death of Joseph Smith, the Prophet, upon the Gentiles who had caused his murder, and that we would teach our children to do so ;—we swore, that without murmur or questioning, we would implicitly obey the commands of the priesthood in everything ;—we swore that we would not commit adultery—which was explained to mean the taking of wives without the permission of the holy Priesthood ;—and we swore that we would never, under any circumstances, reveal that which transpired in the Endowment House.

The penalty for breaking this oath, which was worded in the most startling and impressive way, was then explained to us.—The throat of the traitor was to be cut from ear to ear ; his heart and tongue were to be cut out ; and his bowels were—while he was yet living—to be torn from him. In the world to come, everlasting damnation would be his portion.

Let not the reader think that this was merely an imaginary penalty, or that it was expressed merely for the purpose of frightening the weak-minded, for I have already shown that punishments quite as horrible as that have been deliberately meted out to the Apostate, the Gentile, and the suspected Saint by the Mormon Priesthood. The innocent blood which cries for vengeance against Brigham Young and some of the leaders of the Church is sufficient to weigh the purest spirit which stands before the throne of God down to the nethermost abysses of hell.

After these fearful oaths had been taken, with due solemnity, we were instructed in the various signs representing those dreadful penalties ; and we were also given a “grip” peculiar to this degree.

* I myself made a movement with my hand—for I believed that my life was at stake and I dared not do otherwise. The words of the oath I did not utter. [See explanation at the end of the chapter.]

We were next entertained by a long address from the Apostle Heber C. Kimball. Never in my life—except from Brigham Young—had I listened to such disgusting language, and I trust I never shall be compelled to listen to anything like it again. Brother Kimball always used to pride himself upon using "plain" language, but that day I think he surpassed himself; he seemed to take quite a pleasure in saying anything which could make us blush. The subject of which he discoursed was the married life in the "Celestial Order;" he also laid great stress upon the necessity of our keeping silence concerning all that we had witnessed in the Endowment House—even husbands to their wives, and wives to their husbands were not to utter a single word. With the sermon ended our "Second Degree."

We were now taken to another room for the purpose of passing through the "Third Degree" of the Order of the Melchisedec Priesthood. When we were all arranged on one side against the wall, a number of individuals entered who were supposed to represent the ministers of every denomination and religion upon the face of the earth. The devil also makes his appearance again. The ministers set forth the various claims of their respective creeds,—each one striving to show that his is the purest and the best,—but the devil sows division and hatred among them, and a good deal of confusion ensues.

Then came in personages representing Peter, James, and John, the Apostles, and they commanded ministers, devil, and all, to depart. They then appeared to organise a new Church in which the true principles of the Gospel were to be taught; our Temple robes were also all changed from the right shoulder to the left, indicating that we were now in the true Church, and that we were to be absolutely and in every way dependent upon the priesthood. Another grip was then given to us, and thus we received the third degree of the Order of Melchisedec Priesthood. In that room was a division made of bleached muslin; in the division a door and in the door a hole, with a lap of muslin over it, through which to pass the hand. Whoever was on the other side could see us, but we could not see them. The men first approached this door. A person representing the Apostle Peter appeared at the opening and demanded who was there. He was told that some one desired to enter. Hands came through the opening in the muslin curtain, and mysterious fingers cut a mark on the left breast of the men's shirts—one mark also over the abdomen, and one over the right knee—which marks the women religiously imitated upon their own garments when they got home. The applicant was then told to put his hand through the opening, and give the last grip belonging to the "Third Degree," and mention his new name. He was then permitted to enter. This was called "going behind the veil." When the men were all admitted, the women were suffered to approach, and were passed through by their own husbands. When a woman has no husband she is passed through by one of the brethren, and to those who are not going to be married or sealed for eternity here the ceremonies end.

Now, as I before stated, according to Mormon ideas, we had never before been legally married. It was therefore necessary that we should now pass through that ceremony. We accordingly were conducted to a desk where our names were entered and we were then passed into another room. In that room was a long, low altar, covered with red velvet, and an arm chair placed at one end of it, in which sat Brigham Young. My husband knelt at one side of the altar and I at the other, with our hands clasped above it in the last grip which had been given to us. Then the ordinary formula of marriage was gone through with, and we were informed that we were sealed for time and for eternity.

Thus we passed through the mysteries of the Endowment House, and at three o'clock in the afternoon we found ourselves at liberty to return home. The various ceremonies had occupied eight hours.

When we reached home, my husband said: "Well, what do you think of the Endowments?" But I did not dare to answer him truthfully at that time. Had I done so, I should have told him that I was ashamed and disgusted. Never in all my life did I suffer such humiliation as I did that day; for the whole time I was under the impression that those who officiated looked upon us as a set of silly dupes, and I felt annoyed to think that I dared not tell them so. So I told my husband that I would rather not speak about it, and we never have spoken of it to this day. What were his own feelings about the matter, I do not know, for Mormon wives are taught never to pry into their husband's feelings or meddle with their actions. But notwithstanding all my feelings in reference to the Endowments, so foolish was I, that when I afterwards heard the brethren and sisters talking about the happiness which they had experienced while going through, and saying how privileged we ought to feel at being in Zion among the Saints of God, secure in His Kingdom where we could bring up our children in the fear of the Lord, I began again to think that the fault was all in myself, and that it was I who was wrong and not the Endowments. I wondered how, with such a rebellious heart, I should ever get salvation, and I mourned to think that I had not accepted everything with the simplicity of a child.

Some time after our initiation I met the Apostle Heber C. Kimball, and he asked me how I felt upon the occasion. I frankly told him all, but added that I regretted feeling so. He said: "I shall see if you cannot go through again; it is not just the thing, but I shall try and make the opportunity." Nothing more, however, was said about it. But that which troubled me most was the fact that while the oaths were being administered, I dropped my hand and inwardly vowed that I would never subscribe to such things, and at the same time my heart was filled with bitter opposition. This, although I did it involuntarily—my better nature rising within me and overcoming my superstition—I thought at the time was sinful. I now, however, rejoice that such was the case; for not having actually vowed to keep secret those abominable oaths, I can say, without any cavil or equivocation, that I have broken no promise and betrayed no trust by the discoveries which I have just made.

I wish distinctly to make this statement. Others have more or less divulged the oaths of the Endowment House, and have excused themselves with much doubtful sophistry. I NEVER really took the oaths, although present, and therefore no one can charge me with treachery.

At a later date, some of the sisters kindly suggested that the spirit of the Evil One had entered into me at that time. But this was at least a very inconsistent statement, for the Mormons believe that no evil spirit can enter into the Endowment House.

Of one thing I am certain—I was then indeed a miserable slave, with no one to stretch forth a kindly hand and strike away the fetters of my mental degradation and lead me forth into light and liberty.

CHAPTER XXVI.

SECRETS OF SAINTLY SPOUSES :—A VISIT FROM MY TALK- ATIVE FRIEND.

NOT long after I had received my Endowments my talkative friend, of whom I have already spoken, came to see me and to offer her congratulations. She was quite enthusiastic upon the subject, spoke of the honor which had been conferred upon us, and promised to call frequently to “build me up.” She was particularly anxious to learn whether I did not feel much better and happier now.

On that point I could say little, for to have answered her truthfully would have provoked discussion, into which I did not care to enter. I knew, too, that anything I said to her would soon be known to everyone else. So I told her that I was feeling well enough.

“‘Well enough!’” she said, “Is that how you feel ? Come now, I thought you would have got over all that when you had been through your Endowments. You remind me of what Brother Brigham says,—We have so many whining women in Zion that it is quite a reproach. I do hope that you are not going to become one of them. Let me give you a bit of advice : The wisest thing you can do is to look out for another wife for your husband, and get him to marry her."

"Oh My!" I said, "What are you talking about? You surely cannot be in earnest."

"I never was more earnest in my life," she answered. If you had persuaded your husband to take another wife when you went through your Endowments you would have got over all your troubles at one time. The anticipation is ten times worse than the reality."

"I do not see it in that light," I said. "My own opinion is that my troubles in that case would only then have begun. I do not think that you yourself are really happy."

"Oh, nonsense!" she exclaimed. "Why you can see how happy I am. My husband has two other wives, besides myself, and a more comfortable family could not be."

"You never told me," I said, "how your husband managed to get those wives. I should like to hear."

"My husband managed! Why he did not manage at all; it was I who arranged everything for him, and I'll tell you how it was done.

"During the Reformation," she continued, "you, of course, know the men were constantly urged to take more wives; but my husband was rather backward, and used to tell me there was plenty of time and not the slightest occasion for him to be in a hurry. I had my own opinion of the matter and did not agree with him, for you see I was afraid that after all, he would pick up some young girl or other and fall in love with her, and all my plans would be disarranged. It is you know much the best for the first wife to look out for some girl who will look up to her and respect her, but not love her husband too much, and then they are likely to get on well together. If the first wife selects the other wives, it has the effect of showing them that the husband thinks much of her judgment and is willing to abide by it, and that they will have to do the same. This, of course, is as it should be. But if she lets her husband choose his own wife, he is almost certain to take a fancy to some one whom the first wife does not like at all, and consequently her authority is undermined. The first wife ought to keep all the power in her own hands."

"Well," I said, "I should not care much, I think, who ruled in my home if another wife was there."

"You think so now," she replied, "but when you get used to Polygamy you will feel quite otherwise. People get used to it—the women as well as the men—and then they leave off fretting and become less selfish. But I was going to tell you how I managed my husband.

"I was very anxious, as I told you, to find another wife for him, and I took into consideration all the suitable girls I knew. There was some objection to almost every one. Some were too pretty and I knew I should detest them; and others were not good-looking, and those my husband could not bear. So I waited patiently, but did not give up the hope of succeeding eventually. At last I met with a girl who I thought would do. She was certainly not bad-looking, but she was very young and I thought I should be able to manage her. The name of this girl was Alice Maynard; she was a neighbor of ours, and one of a large family. She seemed to me to be a quiet, modest little creature, and I knew that she had to work hard and received very little in return. In fact, she led at home a life of drudgery, and even her very clothing bore witness to the poverty of the family. Her mother had often told me that she felt badly for Alice, for Mr. Maynard had three other wives and it was more than he could do to support them all properly

"I called one day upon Mrs. Maynard to broach the matter to her. She received me very kindly and entered into my views at once. She was anxious, she said, for Alice to get married, for then she would be better off. I asked her how she would like her to marry my husband, and told her that we were very comfortably off, as you know we are, and that my husband owned his house and lot and was doing a very good business, and, of course, ought to take another wife. Would she agree to my proposal and let me mention Alice to him?

"She said, she herself, had no objection, but that perhaps my husband might not like Alice, or Alice might not like him.

"I felt indignant at the idea that any girl should hesitate to marry my husband, and I told Sister Maynard that there could not possibly be any hesitation on Alice's part. 'I'm sure I have no objection,' she said, 'if Alice has none. I should only be too happy to see my child in a more comfortable home.'

"Well then, we'll consider the matter settled, I said, and asked if I could see Alice; so her mother called her in, and I proposed to her for my husband. You can guess, perhaps, how astonished I was when she actually laughed in my face and said she should like to consider the matter! I did not, however, show her what I thought, but assented to what she said, and invited her to come and take tea with us.

"My husband had often told me, when I was teasing him about taking another wife, that he would willingly marry any girl I might choose for him; and I felt pleased at this for it showed confidence in my judgment. So when he came in, later in the day, I told him I had found a wife for him at last, and that I knew he would like her. 'Why, Ann,' he said, 'I do believe you are going crazy over the wife question; but if you are I do not want you to drive me crazy also. I really thought this was too bad, after all my trouble for him; but nevertheless I was resolved that the marriage should take place.

"Three days after that, in accordance with my invitation, Alice came to take tea with us, and I fixed her up to look nice. When she was ready, I took her into the parlor to introduce her to my husband who was sitting there reading. Henry, I said, this is Miss Maynard—the young lady of whom I spoke to you the other day. He looked up from his paper, and, to my astonishment, said, 'Why, Alice, my girl, how do you do? How are mother and father?'

"What ; I said, do you know Alice, Henry ?

" 'Certainly I do,' he answered, 'Alice and I have met many times before this, haven't we, Alice ?'

" 'Yes, sir,' she said, and, oh, so demurely. Why, Sister Stenhouse, I began to think that I had actually been deceived, and that while I had innocently supposed that I had found out the girl myself, it was the very one upon whom my husband had had his eye for a long while past. I watched them, however, very narrowly, for I was determined that if my husband had really taken a fancy for the girl he should never have her."

"Why, that would have facilitated matters, would it not ?" I said.

"Do you think," she replied, "that I would have allowed them to marry, if they loved each other ? No, indeed ! The Saints marry from principle and not from love, as Brother Brigham has often told us. I hope you believe me, dear, when I say that I'm not at all a jealous woman, but if my husband dared to fall in love with a girl and to hide it from me, I could not stand it I am sure. No ! principle is the only thing,—there can be no love in Polygamy. If a man loved his wife do you think he could have the heart to pain her by taking another ? On the other hand, it is because of the love which still remains in their hearts, and which they weary themselves to crush out, that so many of the first wives are miserable. But I was going to tell you about Alice. I was mistaken in thinking that my husband had been paying her any attentions. It appeared that he was acquainted with her father and mother, and that at their house he had frequently seen the child Alice, but never supposed she was the Miss Maynard of whom I had spoken. But now they had come together at last he took to her kindly and she to him, and really I sometimes almost thought that they wished to ignore me altogether.

"I did not let them waste much time fussing with one another, but they got on very rapidly, nevertheless ; and before I had had time to arrange matters properly, my husband told me that to please me he was going to marry Alice. Only fancy me being pleased at him marrying Alice! Why, it wasn't to please myself that I introduced the child to him, but simply because, if he must have another wife, it was certainly best for me to choose one whom I could manage. However, they were married not long after, and really I think I never was more disgusted in my life than I was on that occasion. I was not jealous, but I do think he might have paid her a little less attention. In fact I quite regretted, when it was too late, that I had ever brought them together.

"The Mormon men always do make themselves silly over their new wives, and I did not expect my husband to be an exception to the rule; but I was perfectly astonished at the change that took place in Alice. Instead of the quiet, modest girl she used to be, she put on all sorts of airs, and treated me as if I were of not the slightest consequence. I couldn't stand that, and I resolved, if it were only to take the pride out of her, I would get my husband to marry another wife still. He wouldn't object, I knew, for he takes life very easily and he has a great respect for my opinion. Besides which, he is quite well enough off to support three wives, and as a matter of duty, if nothing else, he ought to do so. That would soon bring Miss Alice to a proper state of mind, and she needed something of the sort, for, do you know, she had actually made that silly husband of mine think that she ought to be treated with the same consideration as myself."

"Well but," I said, "if the principle of Polygamy is of God, it is only just that all the wives should be treated alike. If my husband were to marry another woman, much as it would pain me, I should certainly treat her as an equal."

"Then," she replied, "if you do so you will find that the first wives will have nothing to do with you. You will find, when you come to be better acquainted with the people here, that the first wives do not waste much love over the polygamic wives; and, of course, as a rule, the polygamic wives detest the first wives. Then the plural wives get together and talk all manner of evil about the first wives, who do pretty much the same in respect to them. It is only natural that they should do so.

"But I was going to tell you," she continued, "how I selected the third wife. There was an emigrant-train expected in every day; and you know, when the emigrants arrive, all those women who want wives for their husbands, and all those men who want to choose for themselves, go down to the camping-ground, and if they see a girl who takes their fancy, they ask her if she has got a place to go to, and if she has not they offer to receive her themselves. There are hundreds of young girls who arrive here without any one to look after them, and who are only too glad to accept a home for the winter. Now this was exactly what I did. I went down to the camp and looked round for myself, and at last my eyes rested upon a young woman of about thirty or thirty-five years of age, who I thought would be a more suitable wife for my husband than that giggling chit that I chose for him at first. I decided at once that she would do, so I went up to her and asked her if she had any friends. She said she had a brother living in the City; but when I explained to her how we were situated and said that I should like her to come and stay with us till she could look round a little for herself, she agreed at once. Now—I thought—Miss Alice, we shall see whether you are going to have things all your own way any longer!

"I told her, however, as well as my husband, that I had brought home a sister to stay with us awhile, and they received her very kindly, and she soon made herself very useful and agreeable to us all. The Bishop came and talked to my husband, and he made no difficulty at all in acceding to my wishes, and before long he made our visitor—wife, number three; and Alice, as a matter of course, lost a good deal of her influence over him. For my own part, I am much more comfortable. The two plural wives do nearly all the work, and I have little else to do than superintend the household and enjoy myself. My husband is one of those quiet sort of men who never interfere with domestic affairs, and I have matters pretty much my own way now. The only thing that annoys me is his fondness for Alice who makes herself appear most amiable to him, deceitful thing! I can't break him of that, but I often tell him that he will find her out some day. He tells me that he looks upon her as a child and feels like a father towards her; no woman, he says, can ever have his love but me. That sounds all very well, but as for believing it, that is quite another thing:—I keep my eye on them and watch them well."

"But," I said, "it appears to me that it would have been far better if you had never given him another wife at all. You would have been saved from annoyance, and the privacy of your home would not have been disturbed. I am the more surprised, as your husband did not himself desire it."

"When you understand better the order of the kingdom, you will not speak in that way," she said. "Do you suppose that I should be satisfied to be the wife of a man who could not exalt me in the celestial kingdom—a man with only one wife? Why I have often told my husband that if he did not get other wives I would leave him. It is necessary for a man to have two wives at least if he would enter into the celestial kingdom. That is why I have been so anxious to get wives for my husband. At the same time there is no necessity for him to fall in love and act in a silly way over them. The only way in such a case is to set one to watch the other, and then they are pretty certain to keep the old man straight. You think, perhaps, that I don't feel all this, but you must not be deceived by appearances. I try to do the will of Heaven with a smile on my face; and the brethren have often told me that if the other sisters were more like me they would not have so much difficulty in establishing Polygamy. But, dear me, Sister Stenhouse, what a long talk we've had! I'll come and see you soon again, but I must hasten away now, for my husband will be home to supper by this time."

So she left me wondering over her strange story of a woman's experience in supplying her own husband with wives.

CHAPTER XXVII.

SOCIAL LIFE IN SALT LAKE CITY:—BALL-ROOMS, "WALL-FLOWERS," AND DIVORCE.

Seeking for Old Friends—In the Ball-Room—Social Life—How Brother Brigham Built a Theatre—Short-Sightedness of the Prophet—Poets and Polygamy Disagree—What a Woman Would Think—The Ideal of True Love—Unpleasant Comparisons—Bearing the Cross—Rather Old Boys—Subduing a Wife and Getting a Wife—What the Wives Say in Secret—Introduced to An Apostle's Five Wives—"I'm Afraid You are Not Too Strong in the Faith"—The "Model Saint"—Improved Prospects—An Old Friend Discovered—Another Victim to Polygamy—A Divorce for Ten Dollars!—Pin-Money for Brother Brigham's Wives—Four Husbands of a Girl of Twenty-One!—How Will the Knot be Untied?

SPRING opened bright and beautiful, and I began to feel more at home in Zion and more contented with my position. I do not, however, mean that I was satisfied with Polygamy or that I contemplated calmly the prospect of my husband taking a plurality of wives; but that I had begun to adapt myself to the manners and customs of the Saints, and had already formed many of those pleasant intimacies which lend such a charm to life.

My talkative friend was a constant visitor at our house; and her strange views of life and of that all-absorbing subject—the management of man under the plural wife system—together with her lively conversation and unceasing flow of spirits, made her visits acceptable; and she often banished from my mind thoughts which, if unchecked, would have made my life unbearable. Her husband, too, poor creature, sometimes followed in her train, and on one occasion she actually brought Alice with her that I might see what sort of a girl she was. I found her quite good-looking, intelligent, and as pleasant a little body as one could wish to know ; but at the same time I detected in the expression of her features—lively and self-reliant as she was—too many traces of that look of subdued sadness which casts a cloud over the countenance of every woman living in Polygamy.

Other friends, besides, I had, too numerous to mention—friends whom I had known in England, with whom I had wept over the horrors of Polygamy when it was first announced ; and dear Swiss friends, not a few, who had come to Zion before us and were now quite settled and at home.

Two faces I longed to see, but of their owners I could at first get no tidings. Poor, dear Madame Bailiff—my old Swiss friend, who in past days had shown me so many kindnesses and whom I had so tenderly loved—where was she? Somewhere, I knew, in Zion, but not in Salt Lake City ; and to the chapter of accidents, I felt that I must leave it, whether I ever saw her again or not. And there, too, was Mary Burton, with all her sweet, winning ways—she whom I had known as a child ; whose early womanhood had been darkened by apprehensions of that accursed abomination—Polygamy ; who had suffered that terrible martyrdom upon the Plains ; who, for aught I knew, might at that very time need most my sympathy and sisterly love—Oh, where was she? Poor Mary! Might it not be, that worn out with the fearful sufferings which she had endured, she had gone to that peaceful rest which she had so vainly sought on earth? I had asked every one who came across my path, who was likely to know, whether they could give me any information as to where she was ; but I could learn nothing more than that, not long after their arrival, she and her husband had left the city and had gone to one of the Settlements in Southern Utah. I had, therefore, to wait in uncertainty for any chance which might accidentally bring us again together.

I was very glad that the winter was over, for we had had rather a rough time during our first few months in Salt Lake City, and the various associations of our life had tended rather to strengthen than to relieve my apprehensions respecting the future. The ball season, which, of course, I cannot pass by in silence, had been a source of annoyance, and, I may say, disgust to me. I had seen so much that was unpleasant at those balls; and although what I witnessed did not then affect me personally, yet it was painful to see others suffer, and to hear poor women, whose hearts were crushed and broken, tell to each other in whispers the sorrow which had blighted their existence.

Dancing was always very popular among the Saints, and the leading men among them have wisely fostered a taste for it. When the people first went out to Utah, as may be supposed, life was hard and amusements were few. The Mormons, as a body, are examples of industry and diligence; to them labor is one of the cardinal virtues; and like all other pioneers they found plenty of employment for their energies. Houses had to be built, land prepared for cultivation, the commonest necessities of life to be manufactured or raised; and busy hands were perpetually engaged in a thousand useful industries. But when the day was over, and the dust of toil was washed from the careful brow, it was but natural that the need of a little recreation should be felt.

So in very early days Brigham built a theatre, and a very fair amount of histrionic talent was developed among the Saints. The Social Hall, in which were held balls, public entertainments, and other amusements, was used for histrionic performances before the theatre was built. Brigham owned the theatre. Money was to be made out of it; and the chance of making money Brother Brigham never permitted to slip through his fingers. Brigham's eyes were sharp enough to see that a theatre would be to him a source of profit, but he did not look far enough. That theatre,—under the immediate direction of the Prophet; with his own daughters acting in it; with the plays which were performed under his own censorship—has been one of the many causes which have perceptibly, although perhaps indirectly, shaken the hold which Mormonism had upon many a woman's mind.

A man would probably witness the performance of a play and return from the theatre with no other thought than the remembrance of an hour's amusement. But not so a woman. To her the play suggested something more, and her daughters would share her thoughts. Daily and hourly, it might be, the effects of Polygamy would be brought under their notice as a matter affecting themselves personally. They might be firm in the faith, but the observant instincts of their sex could never be wholly crushed. They would notice the neglect which wives endured even from good husbands; they would see a man leaving the wife of his youth, the mother of his children, and careless of the cruel wrong he did her, leave her in lonely sorrow while he was spending his time in love-making with some young girl who might have been his daughter. They would see a wife crushing out from her heart the holiest impulses which God had implanted there, striving to destroy all affection for him whose dearest treasure that affection should have been, because, indeed, Polygamy could not exist with love. They would see, and know, and themselves personally feel, the degradation and misery of the "Celestial Order of Marriage"; and that to them would be the practical picture of life.

But in the theatre—short-sighted Brigham, to allow it to be so!—another picture would be presented for their consideration,—a picture, it might be, ideal in its details and surroundings, but true to the letter in the lesson which it conveyed and the thoughts which it suggested. The disgusting, the brutalising cruelties of Polygamy were never represented on the stage. Thoughts so coarse, so sensual, could never inspire the true poet's pen. No; the tale of love as the poet tells it, is all that is refined, and chaste, and delicate, and pure—the commingling of two souls, the unison of two loving hearts, the hopes, the aspirations, the tender joyful sorrows of two fond natures—of two alone! Such is the picture presented as the ideal of the beautiful and of the good. Then, too, the delicate attentions of the devoted lover—his happiness even in the shadow of a smile from her,—the lofty pedestal upon which to his imagination she stands, a queen and peerless ;—or the confiding love of the heroine of the story—blushingly confessing to herself that there is one heart on earth which is all her own and in which none but herself can ever rule or reign.

The Mormon women are not devoid of common sense, nor are they destitute of those quick perceptions which under all circumstances distinguish their sex. They see on the stage representations of the happiness attendant upon love and marriage, such as God ordained, and such as finds a response in every heart ; and they compare such pleasant pictures with what they know and have witnessed of Polygamy, and they draw painful inferences therefrom. Their faith may be proof against apostasy, but the impression left upon their minds produces its effect notwithstanding.

Another institution was the dance. Brigham and the leaders knew that it would never do to leave the people without amusements of some kind, and thus the balls and social gatherings were originated. The idea of Prophets, Apostles, High-Priests, and Patriarchs attending a ball and joining in a dance must appear grotesquely incongruous to the Gentile mind ; but out among the Mormons it is quite the thing ; and to the men those balls and parties were very pleasant.

I do not think that many of the Mormon women enjoyed the ball season, and I know to some of them it was the most painful part of their lives. It is a cruel thing for a woman anywhere to know that her husband's affections are divided, that she is not his only love, and that his heart is no longer all her own. But far worse is the lot of the wife in Utah. She has to see and be present when the love-making is going on, when her husband is flirting and saying soft nonsense, or looking unutterable things at silly girls who are young enough to be her daughters ;—nay, her own daughters and her husband's may actually be older than the damsel he is courting for his second wife! Such an outrage upon the holiest feelings of womanhood would not for a moment be tolerated in any civilised community; but among the Saints women are taught that this is but one part of that cross which we all have got to bear. Cross-bearing is all very well, and I do not doubt that sorrow and trial have a sanctifying influence upon the soul, but by all means let us have a fair division of the burden. It is not just that the heaviest end of the beam should be placed on poor, weak woman's shoulders, and that her "lord" should even find pleasure in that cross which weighs her to the dust and crushes out from her weary soul the last sparks of love, and happiness, and hope! How sweetly did the men preach patience and submission to the will of Heaven. I wonder where their own patience and submission would have been had matters been reversed and their wives had been taught that it was their privilege and a religious duty to court, and flirt with and marry men younger and handsomer than their husbands!

The brethren never forget what Brother Brigham once said about the Mormon men being all boys under a hundred years of age, and they do not neglect their privileges. Here in the ball-room you may see men of three-score years and even older joining in the dance with girls of sixteen and even younger—making love to them, flirting with them, marrying them. Age or plain looks are nothing with such men; the girls are taught that they can exalt them to greater honor and happiness in heaven than young and untried men could, and that they ought to feel honored by receiving tender attentions from the chosen servants of the Lord. One wife, or even half-a-dozen, if they chance to have so many, of course will not stand in the way. The husband is the lord and master, and a woman's wishes count for nought.

In the ball-room the company of the first wives and, in fact, of many of the plural wives,—once worshipped, but who "had had their day"—was not so much sought as that of young and interesting maidens; and after having stood up with their husbands in the first dance, as a matter of form, many of those forlorn wives might be seen sitting along the sides of the hall, keeping each other company and talking over their sorrows. We used to call these poor ladies "the wall-flowers." Sitting there watchful, noting all that their husbands did or said, those poor women were in themselves a touching protest against the cruelty of the system, such as none but a Mormon heart could have resisted.

But for that horrible system, these balls and parties would, of course, have been extremely pleasant. With the feeling of fraternity which exists among the Saints, such gatherings ought only to be a source of pleasure; but Polygamy blighted everything, and it is with feelings almost of hatred that I recall some of those occasions. How many an aching heart has there felt weary—felt so weary as to long for death. No change of feature might betray the mental struggle, but the bitterness of the soul was all the same. And I have seen wives there whose husbands paid them marked attentions, so that the girls to whom they were making love might notice their devotion and draw favorable auguries for the future in case they married them. And the wife has known all this, and has valued her husband's attentions accordingly. And yet the poor deluded women persuade themselves that this system is right and in accordance with the revealed will of God; and they think that the evil—poor creatures!—is in their own hearts and that they deserve to suffer.

The Mormon men sometimes would be rather surprised, I think, if they could hear what their wives say of them at those balls. I have seen very obedient wives so goaded to anger by the conduct of their husbands that they have said very bitter things indeed; and what was not spoken, was felt, I know, by every wife in whose nature the last traces of womanly feeling had not been altogether crushed out.

At one of those balls the Apostle Heber C. Kimball came up to me and said in his jesting way that he would introduce me to his wife. He brought up five or six ladies of various ages, one after the other, and said: "There now, I think I'll quit now, for I'm afraid you're not too strong in the faith."

"Are these all you have got?" I asked.

"Oh dear no," he said, "I have a few more at home, and about fifty scattered over the earth somewhere; but I've never seen them since they were sealed to me in Nauvoo, and I hope I never shall again."

Heber was called the model Saint!"

But the ball season passed, and the spring came on and our prospects began to brighten. My husband not only found remunerative employment for his pen in Salt Lake City, but was also engaged as special correspondent to the New York Herald, and several of the California papers.

One morning, a countryman, roughly dressed and looking the picture of care, called at our house and asked to see Mr. Stenhouse. I gazed at him for a moment, for I thought there was something familiar in the sound of his voice. He looked at me and I at once recognised him—it was Monsieur Baliff himself, in whose house we had lived in Switzerland. But, oh, how changed he was! Once a refined, handsome, gentlemanly man; now a mere wreck of his former self—careworn, rough-looking, poorly clad. He and his family had been in Utah six years, and had suffered all the ills that poverty can induce:—the change which was wrought in him was so great, that for some moments I was so overcome by my feelings that I could not utter a word. In the few short years which had elapsed since I saw him in his own bright and happy home, he had become quite an old man. I hardly dared to ask about his wife, for I feared what his answer might be; but after a little while he told me that she had sent her love and would like to see me whenever I could find an opportunity to call upon her. They lived some miles from the City, but I told him that I would not fail to visit them whenever it was possible for me to do so.

I talked a long while with Monsieur Baliff, and was much interested in what he told me. He made no complaints; he had still firm faith in Mormonism, and said that if the brethren had not dealt fairly by him they would be answerable to God for what they had done. "Besides," he added, "I do not blame them so much, for they are Americans and would not be happy if they did not get the advantage in some way."

I was anxious to ask him if he had been induced to take another wife, as he had been in Utah during the "Reformation," and I did not see how it was possible for him to have escaped ; but while I was thinking how I might put the question delicately, he saved me the trouble by himself telling me that he had married the young servant girl whom his wife had taken from Switzerland with her. This information was quite a shock to me, for I well knew the proud spirit of his wife and I could realise what anguish this second marriage must have caused her ; I did not, however, like to question him on the subject. So I turned the conversation into another channel, and when he went away I sent kind messages to Madame Baliff, saying that I would seize the very first opportunity of hearing from her own lips the story of all they had gone through.

Here again I found the trail of that monster—Polygamy. This time in the home of my dearest friend. From the moment when she and I had mingled our tears together, in Switzerland, over that abomination, life had been to me one long, weary, sickening battle with my own heart, one futile attempt to fully convince myself that Polygamy was right and that I was wrong. I certainly did believe, or thought that I believed, the doctrine was true. But at times Nature prevailed in the struggle, and womanly indignation and anger rose in arms against Faith. These feelings were, however, at once and unhesitatingly subdued ; Faith returned triumphant and I was again convinced that the Revelation must have been the will of the Lord, and that my duty was to submit but not to question. In moments of comparative self-control I had even tried, as a Missionary's wife, to justify it to others, but only to witness an outburst of sorrow and anger, and to feel still more the weakness of my position. That had been my own experience ; but how had the time passed with my dear old friend ? She must, no doubt, have been as greatly disappointed as I was when she came to Zion and saw things as they really were, and not as they had been represented to us.

My own eyes had certainly been opened not a little since my arrival. Instead of finding the people enjoying the comforts and blessings of life, which we had been taught were strewn around them in profuse abundance, we found among all but the leading families the greatest poverty and privation. The majority of the people were living in little log or adobe houses, of one or at the utmost two rooms, of most primitive construction, and without the slightest convenience of any description. Their food was bread and molasses, and it might be an occasional morsel of meat; but many of them scarcely even indulged in the latter or in any article of grocery, for months at a time. Their floors and walls were bare, and their clothing poor and scanty; and yet, destitute as they were of all the comforts and conveniences of life, they were conscientiously endeavoring like good Saints to practice Polygamy, because, as they believed, the Lord had commanded it.

In respect to education they were in even a worse position. Books, pictures, and periodicals of any kind there were none, with the exception of that dreary organ of the Church, the "Deseret News,"—the soporific influence of which some wicked Apostate has likened to a dose of Winslow's soothing syrup;—Brigham Young, himself an illiterate man, and the leading Elders frowned upon every attempt to raise the intellectual status of the people; and so little encouragement was given that no one could afford to keep school. The consequence was that the boys and girls grew up with little more education than their own sense of necessity taught them to acquire for themselves, and it was not until very recently that any suitable efforts were made to supply trained teachers and to open schools in which a thorough education could be afforded.

I have already mentioned the sermons in the Tabernacle, and observed how little calculated they were to elevate the character or cultivate the minds of the people. I have before me as I write a choice morsel extracted from one of the sermons of Heber C. Kimball, which I think I must give for the reader's benefit.

Fancy an "Apostle!" thus addressing a large and mixed congregation of men, women, and children :

"Here are some educated men jest under my nose. They come here and they think they know more than I do, and then they git the big head, and it swells and swells until it gits like the old woman's squash—you go to touch it and it goes ker-smash ; and when you look for the man, why he aint thar. They're jest like so many pots in a furnace—yer know I've been a potter in my time—almighty thin and almighty big ; and when they're sot up the heat makes 'em smoke a little, and then they collapse and tumble in, and they aint no whar."

This was Heber's style in general. Next to making modest people blush, nothing pleased him better than to annoy or ridicule any one who had the smallest pretensions to education ; and yet naturally Heber was a kind-hearted man. Brigham's style is very little better, and the substance of his discourses quite as bad. I will give a very favorable specimen taken from a sermon on Polygamy, delivered some years ago, touched up and corrected, and published in the official organ, the Deseret News :

"Men will say—'My wife though a most excellent woman has not seen a happy day since I took my second wife.' 'No, not a happy day for a year, says one ; and another has not seen a happy day for five years.

"I am going to set every woman at liberty, and say to them, Now go your way—my women with the rest ; go your way. And my wives have got to do one of two things ; either round up their shoulders to endure the afflictions of this world and live their religion, or they must leave ; for I will not have them about me. I will go into heaven alone rather than have them scratching and fighting around me. I will set all at liberty. 'What, first wife too!' Yes, I will liberate you all. I know there is no cessation to the everlasting whinings of many of the women in this territory ; I am satisfied that this is the case ; and if the women will turn from the commandments of God, and continue to despise the Order of Heaven, I will pray that the curse of the Almighty may be close to their heels and that it may be following them all the day long. And those that enter into it (the celestial order) and are faithful, I will promise them that they shall be queens in heaven and rulers to all eternity.

"Now if any of you will deny the plurality of wives, and continue to do so, I promise that you will be damned."

This was sweet language for a Prophet and a Saint to utter, and yet it is not half so coarse or improper as some whole sermons that I have listened to from the lips of Brother Brigham and the other leaders of the Church.

The Apostle Orson Pratt is the only one who has dared, in the presence of Brigham, to say that education was a proper thing, and that there were many books which would be of good service to the Saints, if they obtained and studied them. On one occasion, Brigham arose in ire, and said :

“The Professor has told you that there are many books in the world, and I tell you that there are many people there. He says there is something in all these books ; I say each of those persons has got a name. It would do you just as much good to learn those somebodies' names as it would to read those books. Five minutes revelation would teach me more truth than all this pack of nonsense that I should have packed away in my unlucky brains from books.”

But the Prophet has changed with the times, and there are now in Utah very good schools, both Mormon and Gentile, but none of them are free-schools. Bishop Taylor once said in a public lecture that they were “destructive to the best interests of the community ;”—and the Bishop's “lord” in the Lion-House is exactly of the same opinion, for he has repeatedly declared that “there shall be no ‘free-schools’ within his Saintly ‘Kingdom’ on earth.” Nevertheless, Brother Brigham and his “Infallible Priesthood” are at last beginning to discover that although the night of ignorance and superstition may hate the clear daylight of truth and knowledge, when the great Ruler of All commands the light to come forth, it is not in the power of man, with all his boasting, to forbid the sun to shine upon the dark places of the earth.

Balls, parties, and the theatre provided amusement for the people in Salt Lake City itself ; but in the Settlements there was little else in the shape of recreation than idle gossip or the harangues of the Tabernacle. In the city, of course, this has all been changed of late years, but in the Settlements of Utah there is the same lack of civilisation as there was fifteen or twenty years ago.

At the time when we went to Utah, Mormon society was slowly recovering from that terrible marrying mania which had set in during the “Reformation,” and a season of divorce was the result.

The authorities at that time—as I have already observed—had urged every person, without distinction, into Polygamy.

Men and women had been forced to marry one another without any respect to affection or fitness, and the result was that hundreds of marriages were entered into which made those who contracted them miserable for life, but the consequences of which they could not avoid. At the same time not a few were divorced almost immediately after they were married, and these things were a matter of daily occurrence. Brigham Young, with his eye perpetually on the dollar, finding that his marrying scheme, like many other of his "divine" plans, was a failure, saw at once that quite a nice little sum might be realised by charging a fee for divorces. Nothing was charged for marrying; but if the people insisted on having divorces—why, the best, and certainly the most profitable, thing was to make them pay for them. When we first went to Utah, the Prophet was doing quite a flourishing business in that line. Any one could get a divorce for ten dollars; and Brigham publicly in the Tabernacle jested about it and said that the money thus obtained came in very conveniently as pin-money for his wives—though I doubt if they ever received a dollar of it. He added, that so far as "eternity" was concerned, these divorces were not worth the paper they were written on,—the people had married for eternity, and in eternity they would have to live together, whether they liked it or not. He says the same to-day; but still he sells his divorces and gathers in the ten dollars.

All this is an anomaly, although the people do not appear to see it. While, more than any other community, they profess to regard marriage as a sacred institution, they marry and are divorced in a more careless fashion than the people of any civilised country. I could mention instances which would be really ludicrous were they not so shocking.

I know a young woman in Salt Lake City, who is not over twenty-one years of age. She is a very pretty girl and has engaged quite extensively in the divorce business, for she now lives with her fourth husband. She was in my employment after she left her third, and I had an opportunity of studying her character. I noticed that she was frequently visited by a certain young man who seemed to make, himself very agreeable to her, and feeling a great deal of interest in her—for she had left her father and mother in England, when a mere child, in order to gather to Zion under the paternal care of one of the Elders—I asked her why the young man came so often to see her.

“He is my intended husband,” she replied.

“Why,” I said, quite astonished, “you have only just been separated from your last husband, and after so much ill-treatment I should have thought you would have been afraid of trying another—at-any-rate, so soon as this.”

“You’re wrong there,” she replied, in quite a serious, earnest way, “I am determined to marry until I get the right one, even if I have to do so a dozen times. Don’t you think I am right?” This really seemed so shocking that I did not know what to say.

The most absurd point in all this was, that of her three former husbands, one was a Gentile, and two were Mormons. The Gentile, of course, would have no chance in the world to come, but to each of the two Mormons she was sealed for eternity. Now if Brigham’s divorces are of no force in the next world, and if his marriages are binding, what will this young woman do between her two Mormon husbands—to say nothing of the two other Gentile ones, who “do not count!”—for the Mormons, though they are so generous to themselves in the matter of wives, will not allow a woman to have a couple of husbands, either here or in eternity.

What nonsense is all this: what blasphemy to ascribe it to “the Lord!” How different I found the Mormon “lord” from that great and glorious Being—source of all goodness, holiness, and truth—to whom in the days of my childhood I had looked up and adored! The “lord” of whom they so flip-pantly spoke, was not the same with Him to whom things in heaven and earth do bow, by whom, and in whom, are all things. He never blighted the heart of woman, or cursed her with a perpetual curse; but to Him, since I escaped from the cruel thralldom which once blighted my existence, day by day my soul goes out in love and gratitude. Would that I could infuse into the worn and weary hearts of the women of Utah the knowledge, that God has given freely to all His creatures—to woman as well as man—no cruel law to torture their souls, no wretched "Revelation" to embitter their lives, but a Gospel of peace, and gentleness, and love, which makes perfect those who walk therein.

WHAT WOMEN SUFFER IN POLYGAMY:—THE STORY OF MARY BURTON.

ONE bright summer morning, about six months after our arrival in Salt Lake City, I was sitting in the work-room busy with my girls, when a light tap was heard at the door, and the next instant a lady entered, and coming straight up to me was about to kiss me.

I started back a step, held out my hand, looked her full in the face, and in a moment we were in each other's arms. It was my old friend Mary Burton!

I could with difficulty find words to express my astonishment when I recognised her, so greatly was she changed in every respect. From the very first, whenever we met after a long separation, I had noticed a more than ordinary alteration in her appearance. But it must be remembered that at the time of our first reünion she had grown out of childhood into womanhood; when I met her again in New York she had passed through the most interesting phase of a woman's life,—she had forsaken maidenhood for matrimony,—and now I met her once more after she had endured those horrors on the Plains,—of which the reader has already heard,—and she had entered into a life of sorrow worse than any she had known before. No wonder then, that now, as upon previous occasions, I noticed quite a startling change in her appearance. Her dress was of the coarsest and plainest kind, but neat, as was everything she touched,—yet not so carefully arranged as in the old time in England. She used formerly to have a way of adjusting a dress or a bonnet so that it set her off ten times better than it would a girl who had not naturally the same taste; but now, although, as I said, her clothes, if coarse, were neat, she evidently had not taken any pains to set herself off to the best advantage; and in a woman what a story did that simple fact tell! But it was in her features and manner that the change was most remarkable. In looking at her face you would have been puzzled to say in what the alteration consisted. Her cheeks were thinner and sadly pale, but that was not the cause of her appearing as she did. Had she been older, I verily believe the anguish she had passed through would have blanched her hair and left upon her brow deep marks of thought and suffering. As it was, however, though no one feature in particular was very greatly altered, the whole expression of her face was that of one whose heart was utterly crushed and broken; and when her eyes met mine, I could hardly refrain from tears as I saw the mournful look of subdued pain, which told in them the terrible conflict which her heart had endured.

I took her to my own room—poor girl, how my heart bled for her!—and again and again I held her in my arms and tried to comfort her, for she was very weary; and at last she wept. I was glad to see that passionate flood of tears, for I knew it would relieve her, and in that I was not mistaken.

She threw her arms round my neck, and kissing me repeatedly, sobbed out: "Don't blame me, Sister Stenhouse, don't blame me very much, I cannot help it."

"There, there, Mary," I said, "be calm and you will soon be better. You must tell me all your troubles, and I will do all I can to help and comfort you."

"There is no help, Sister Stenhouse, no comfort for me—I'm past all that," she answered.

"Don't say that, Mary," I said, "I know that you have passed through a terrible amount of suffering, and have had much to trouble you in every way; but your husband is still alive, is he not?—and there may be many years of happiness before you."

"It is the thought of him that makes me so wretched," she said, "oh, I could have borne death a thousand times rather than this. I would gladly have seen him die rather than see him changed as he is now. You do not know, Sister Stenhouse, how my whole soul was wrapped up in that man, how I almost worshipped him. When we suffered so much together on the Plains, I felt happy in comparison with what I feel now. I remember that terrible night when I believed he was dying,—I remember the anguish that I felt; but, oh, I knew then that he loved me and that his heart was all my own. Had I lost him—if I could myself have lived—I should have felt that he had never loved another beside me; I should have known that we would meet together again in heaven and be happy in each other's love. After all we went through together, I loved him more and more; we seemed to live with one life; we had the same thoughts, and hopes, and pleasures. I leaned upon him, and I loved him—Ah, so fondly!—and, Sister Stenhouse, I know he loved me then. We were getting over the effects of our sufferings on the Plains, and I was gaining strength and was looking forward to the time when my child should be born. It was then that they came and taught him that devils' doctrine and led him away from me.—Oh dear! I cannot bear it, Sister Stenhouse, I cannot bear it—it will drive me mad!"

She buried her face in her hands and sobbed again.

"Mary dear," I said, "Don't talk like that—he cannot have ceased to love you, I am sure; he used to almost worship you, dear."

"It is because I know that he did once, that drives me crazy. You do not know what I feel, what I have to bear!"

I did not utter a word—my own sorrows were hidden in my own heart—The heart knoweth its bitterness, and a stranger intermeddleth not in the matter. "You have been through the Endowments?" she asked. "So have I. We went through, Sister Stenhouse, about three months after we came to Utah, and never since then have I known a moment's peace. I do not know what they said to my husband, but whatever it was, it produced a great effect upon his mind, and changed him altogether—he has been an altered man from that very time. I have no doubt that they told him that it was his duty to take another wife, and they would say that no promise made to me before our marriage is binding if it comes in opposition to our religion. You know how devoted he is, how firm his faith is. Why, I do believe that he would obey counsel even if it broke his heart and cost him his life. Did they say anything to you or your husband, dear?"

"Certainly they did, Mary—we have heard it daily and hourly, and my husband is constantly being counselled about it. I am wretched, Mary, you know I must be; I feel just as you do, but how can we help ourselves?"

"No, we cannot help ourselves—there is no hope;" she said; "but it is a cruel wrong. You know well enough how determined I was never to marry a man who would take another wife. When I thought that Elder Shrewsbury might be influenced by his religion, I made him go to the Apostle and get counsel, and then he solemnly vowed to me that he never would enter into Polygamy without my consent—which, of course, was the same as saying that he never would do so at all. Until we went through our Endowments, he never even hinted at such a thing. But they spoke to him then; and one day after he had been having a long consultation with the Bishop, he came and spoke to me. He was not unkind in the least. In fact he seemed to be as much pained at all mention of the subject as I was. He said that the Bishop had been urging him to live up to his privileges, and had explained to him how great a loss in the celestial world it would be, both to him and to me, if he did not take more wives. He was told that now while he was young was the time, and that I would soon get over any pain that I might suffer. Yes, they actually said so. Fancy tearing out the very affections of one's heart and blasting every hope and happiness in life, and then saying that I should soon "get used to it!" I tell you, Sister Stenhouse, a true woman never can "get used" to this hideous system. If the hearts of some are dead and cold, it is a curse to them and a curse to their husbands and their children; and if a wife seems careless or callous, as the case may be, it is because love for her husband has first died out in her heart. She feels no jealousy because she has no love; but if a woman has but a spark of love for her husband she will hate with a deadly hatred any other woman whom that husband loves."

"But what did Elder Shrewsbury say when they told him to enter into Polygamy?" I enquired.

"At first he told them it was utterly impossible," she replied, "and he mentioned his promise to me, and said we were very happy together, and that he wished for nothing more. But they knew his weakness and that he would do anything for his religion, and they urged him on that point. It was even a sin against me they said, for if he had no more than one wife he could never exalt me in the Celestial Kingdom,—that I ought to be treated like a child—a very dear, but spoilt child,—and if I refused what was for my own and my husband's benefit and everlasting welfare, he ought to act up to what he knew was right, and leave the consequences with the Lord, who would order all things for the best. My husband told me all this very sadly at first, but I could see that it had an effect upon his mind. They saw it, too, and did not let the subject drop. Every day they spoke to him of it, and at last he gave way—for my sake, he said! This was the cruellest wrong of all.

Then one day he told me very firmly and very coldly, as if he had steeled his heart to do so, that he had made up his mind to take another wife."

"What!" I exclaimed, "After the solemn oath he swore never to do such a thing? Why, I could not have believed it of Elder Shrewsbury!"

"I reminded him of his promise," she said, "but he told me that the Revelation justified him in breaking it; that it said in the second clause that 'All covenants, contracts, and oaths not sealed by him who is appointed on earth to hold this power in the last days are of no force after the resurrection'; that for this cause we had been married again for eternity, and that now he was free from his oath. I knelt down before him, and I wept and prayed as if for life itself—I entreated him, if no more, to wait and put off all thoughts of another marriage for a few months, until he had time to consider the matter carefully. He had already thoroughly thought it over, he said, and could not go back now, for the Bishop had chosen a wife for him and had arranged everything. He even told me who it was—a young girl named Wilbur, about fourteen years of age—a mere child. I prayed him if he would be so wicked as to perjure himself and wrong me so foully, at least not to add to his sin by injuring a poor innocent child. He was very indignant with me for that, said that he was doing the child the greatest good he possibly could by marrying her; that he was ensuring her salvation as well as mine; and that he expected to receive the blessing of God."

"Mary," I said, "this system is a fearful curse."

"Curse!" she exclaimed, "Curse is a heavenly word to apply to such a system. Why there is nothing in hell so hateful, so vile, so detestable. It is blight and ruin to everything that is fair and good—I never pass a day but I curse with the bitterest hatred the men who devised it. Women can hate bitterly when they choose; but I hate them more than ever woman hated before."

"Hush! Hush, dear," I said, "You mustn't talk so, Mary!"

"I mustn't talk it perhaps—it's dangerous, I know;—but I may think it. There is not a true-hearted woman in Utah who does not feel as I do this day. Do you think that when they have ruined all our hopes for time and for eternity we shall love them still? Here, but for this wretched system, I should have been a happy wife and mother, and now see what I am—husband, child, all lost—all lost!”

“Is the child dead, Mary?” I asked, very gently, for I feared to pain her.

“Yes dear,” she replied, “in fact I believe it never lived—the one I was thinking of. I was ill, very ill indeed, after what my husband had told me. They thought I should die, and I think he was sorry, for he became very kind and tender to me, but that only made me feel worse. Then my child was born, but I never saw it, for I was unconscious for more than a week after, and then they told me that it was not alive, but my husband would never speak to me about it. As I grew better, his cold, stern manner returned, and then at last he married that girl Wilbur, and since then he has married two more, for he is doing very well in business. I think that all his love for me has gone. At first he thought of marrying again because it was a religious principle; and as it was the time of the Reformation he did not dare to refuse; but now his heart is grown hard and cold. You see a change in me, Sister Stenhouse, but I think you’d see a greater change in him. I know, of course, that I used to look at him with the eyes of love, and of course did not see him as other people did; but that is not the only change—it isn’t in his face alone; his whole nature seems altered. It quite pains me sometimes to see it.”

“Do you feel any happier now—any calmer, Mary?”

“Yes,” she said, “Yes, and no. I do not love him as I used to—how could I? But when I look into my heart I find, if I tell you the truth, that a little love does remain there. If only I could quite cease to love him I think I should be happy; but when I pet and play with my little girl—for we have had one child since that dreadful time—some of my love for him comes back again, and I sit down and have a good cry. Sometimes that isn’t enough to calm me and I shut the door and walk up and down the room and swear ;—there, don't look so horrified, Sister Stenhouse ! I cannot help it ; if I did not give way to my feelings now and then I should die outright ;—and sometimes I break a few things,—but he never knows it, and it does me good. We came into the city yesterday on a visit, and we shall stay for a few days. He brought me, I believe, as a matter of form ; but I found out where you lived, and I came to see you. You never answered my letter, and I did not know whether you had left New York yet. I really am glad to see you, Sister Stenhouse. And it is true that Brother Stenhouse has not taken another wife yet ? ”

“ Not yet,” I said, “ But, as I told you, he has been spoken to about it, and I cannot tell what he may do. As you say, Mary, the Mormon women have not much to make them happy.”

I took her in then to get some refreshments, and I asked her to stay for the day. She said that she had a message which some one had left for Elder Shrewsbury ; that she would go and leave it, as it was of some importance, and that she would come back again.

In about an hour she returned, and somehow, although I had intended to talk of quite another subject, we got back to our common grievance again. I do not wonder at this for it was the perpetual theme of all our thoughts. Queen Mary, of unpleasant memory, is said to have fretted over the loss of the town of Calais until she believed that after her death that name would be found written upon her heart ; and I really do think, were such a thing possible, the word ‘ Polygamy ’ would be found indelibly engraved upon the heart of many a wretched wife in Utah.

Mary gave me a great deal of information. In that she was quite herself, as I knew her in by-gone days. Nothing escaped her observation. She sat down with me and told me all her troubles and I need hardly say how deeply I sympathised with her. So I tried to comfort her, and spoke about her child, but even respecting that poor little thing she felt no hope. “ Why when it grows up, she said, it will be as miserable as I am—I can see no prospect of happiness in the future for it." We agreed that the only way whereby we might prevent our children from experiencing sorrow and misery similar to our own, was to teach them from the very first that Polygamy was the natural and proper, as well as the revealed, order of marriage—in fact to "bring them up" in the system. What a miserable resource was this for a mother who loved her children!

"One thing, Mary," I said, referring to her own personal experience in Polygamy—"one thing I do not quite understand. You, of course, had made your husband specially promise before you married him that he would never take another wife, and he was therefore bound, as a man, by every moral obligation, not to do so. But other women have not been situated as you were, and they have exacted no promises from their husbands. Yet it always seemed to me that your doing so was quite superfluous, for you must be aware, Mary, that the Revelation says that before a man can take a second wife he must have the full consent of the first. The Elders in Europe used to make a great deal of that point, as you may remember, for they said that this provision took from the Revelation any harshness or injustice which it might otherwise appear to show. I know many women who submitted on this account, for they argued that if their permission was necessary, they could always, by refusing, save themselves from any further trouble. Now if that was so, how came your husband to take another wife against your will? I say your husband, because I should have no difficulty in many other cases. I have been repeatedly told that husbands never troubled themselves about the Revelation when they wanted another wife, unless it was to silence the first wife with it, if she rebelled. But I always regarded Elder Shrewsbury as a conscientious man, and I firmly believed that he would never willingly give you a moment's pain. When he made that promise to you, he had the Revelation before him, and had also the Apostle to go to if he needed the 'Word of the Lord.' He was therefore bound by that promise, notwithstanding anything that the Revelation might say to the contrary; and even had he made no promise, the Revelation was on your side. We are told that every woman must first give her consent."

"That is all very true, Sister Stenhouse," she said, "to a certain extent. The theory is as you say, but you have not heard the whole. I know the Revelation pretty nearly by heart and so I can tell you exactly what it does say. The first wife is said to hold the keys of this power, by which is meant that she can refuse. But then it goes on to say that when her husband has taught her the law of the Priesthood—that is Polygamy—" she shall believe or she shall be destroyed, saith the Lord your God, for I will destroy her." You see there is no loophole of escape for the woman. Her husband is to teach her the law and she shall believe; and if she does not—and of course people have no power to make themselves believe what they please—she is to be destroyed, and God will destroy her! Do you know, Sister Stenhouse, there are stories whispered here of women who did refuse and who stood in their husband's way, and it is said that the Priesthood did not wait for the Lord to destroy, but carried out the law themselves.

"My dear Mary, we really must not talk in this way," I said—"it's quite wicked. My husband would never forgive me if he knew what we have been talking about. He says that all these stories are untrue, and that they are all exaggerations or fabrications of the Apostates who wish to bring scandal on our religion."

"I do not wish to shake your faith, Sister Stenhouse, but my own is pretty well gone," she replied. "Of course I never speak to my husband about these things, nor do I dare to talk to any one else; but I feel it quite a relief to see you and to be able to say what I think, for I know I can confide in you. But we have wandered sadly from your question. You were talking about the first wife giving her consent?"

"Yes," I said, "and you were about to tell me whether it was really and practically necessary in every instance. You have been here longer and have seen more than I have."

"The wife's consent is by no means necessary, Sister Stenhouse. It may be asked sometimes as a mere matter of form, and, of course, in the Endowment House, when she gives the other wives to her husband, she may be said to give her consent to his marrying them. It is nothing but a piece of folly to talk about women having the power to withhold their consent, and it is simply an insult and a mockery for their husbands to ask it; they well know before they ask that their wives dare not refuse to give it. But it enables them to boast to the Gentiles that they do not take other wives until their first wife gave her consent. This is what is meant by 'the liberty of the Gospel,' I suppose, about which Brother Brigham talks so much. But every one knows perfectly well that this is all a farce, and that he would take other wives all the same however stoutly the first wife might refuse. She would only make herself miserable, even if she got off as well as that. The idea really is that in Polygamy there are four who must give their consent: Brigham Young must first receive a revelation from the Lord stating that he approves of the proposed marriage. Then the first wife's permission must be obtained. Then the consent of her parents. And, last of all, the girl herself is to be asked.

"This all sounds very fair," she continued, "but in practice it is quite otherwise. Without President Young's consent there can be no marriage at all; but if it is the will of Brigham, the refusal of the first wife and the parents and the girl herself do not for a moment signify."

"But did your husband, Mary, act in this way?"

"Well, not quite. He told me that if I refused it would make not the slightest difference; and as I believed him, I, of course, went, and did not make a scene. It would have only made matters worse. Some of the older sisters came round and talked me over, and explained and insisted, and "labored" with me as they called it, until I hardly knew what to think or do—my mind was quite unsettled. Eliza R. Snow is quite great at that sort of work. When my husband took his other two wives, he did not consult me at all, but simply told me that on a certain day I must go with him to the Endowment House. We went, and he married two sisters on the same day, but it did not do him much good. They are handsome girls, but have very bad tempers and we often have a very unpleasant time. The second wife, poor child, suffered most when he married the other two. She did not seem to like me very much at first, which was quite natural, but when the other two were brought-home she seemed quite to cling to me, and I have, strange to say, taken quite a fancy to her. In all our disputes she always sides with me, and in return I always stand up for her, as a matter of course. I am getting used to this wretched life ; I have stifled all my love ; and I am sorry to say that sometimes I almost hate every one around me, including my husband. Now and then the old longing for some one to love, for some one to confide in, comes over me. I felt like that this morning when I came here, and that is what made me act so badly."

"Say nothing of that, Mary ;" I replied. "I wish you would stay with me while you are in the City."

"No," she said, "We shall be here for a day or two, but I do not think my husband would like me to stay here altogether. He knows that you are aware of his attachment to me once and his promises in the old times, and very likely he would be a little ashamed to meet you. He'll make business an excuse, and in fact he is busy all the day. So I'll come round alone as much as I can, and we'll have a good talk again."

I saw her to the door, and then she turned and said, "I'll come again and see you, Sister Stenhouse, before we leave the city. I know you think me very wicked ; but, there ; don't be shocked, dear !—I'm not so very bad, after all."

Thus saying, she kissed me, laughed with the ghost of her former merry ways when first I knew her, and said good-night. I watched her till she was lost in the darkness, and then I closed the door, saying to myself, with a sigh, "Ah me ! can this be the Mary that once I knew?"

Kimball Pays Me a Special Visit—“Plenty of Wives Around the Town”—A Morning drive with the “Model Saint”—A Lesson on Children’s Dresses—Good “Counsel” Thrown Away—Heber Suggests a Wife for my Husband—How Love is Developed in Mormon Wives—“The Finest Thing in the World”—The Shadow of Coming Evil.

NOT long after this, I was enabled to visit my Swiss friend, Madame Baliff. Ever since her husband had called upon me in Salt Lake City, I had watched anxiously for an opportunity of seeing her, for I felt much interested in learning how time had passed with her since we parted in Geneva.

I found her in a little log-cabin of two rooms, with bare walls, bare floor, and miserably furnished; and in this wretched abode Poverty and Polygamy had wrecked the life of my poor friend, whom I had known under such different circumstances. Here, together with their five children, lived also the second wife, with her two children. It was with difficulty that I could recognise in the poor, careworn, broken-spirited, and ill-clad woman who stood before me, the once gay, light-hearted, happy, and elegantly-dressed lady whom I had known in Switzerland. Mormonism had in her case utterly blighted her existence. It seemed to me hardly possible that so great a change should have been wrought in her in such a few years as had elapsed since last I saw her. What suffering she must have endured, I thought, what mental agony, what physical pain, to write those wrinkled lines of care upon her once handsome face ; and, Ah ! what a pang I felt at the remembrance that I myself had been instrumental in leading her into Mormonism and Polygamy. Self-reproach I did not feel, but sorrow I did. I had thought to lead her into the way of holiness and heavenly peace by winning her to the religion of the Saints, but that which I in my enthusiasm had believed would be the greatest blessing which one poor mortal could communicate to another, had turned to a curse, and instead of the happy wife and mother which she once had been, she had become a victim to that faith which in its very existence is an insult to womanhood.

In temper and disposition she was, however, just the same ; her affectionate nature was unchanged. No doubt she read in my features the painful surprise which I experienced in witnessing her altered circumstances ; but she met me with not a single word of reproach for my being the cause of her leaving her own dear country. I should not have blamed her had she hated me, though she knew, of course, that I had wronged her innocently.

She told me of the difficulties which they had had to contend with after their arrival in Utah, and how they had been compelled to part with almost everything they had, in order to provide bread for their children. When they left London, they took with them several handsome carpets, china, glass, and a large quantity of silver ware, besides bedding and clothing of every description, for they were well-to-do in the world, and had quite enough for themselves, after they had liberally assisted the poorer Saints to emigrate. Upon their arrival in Utah, the husband—good man that he was—was willing to come down to the level of his brethren and to go farming among them. A brother who knew him in his own country, and imagined, I suppose, that he could afford to lose, sold him a farm that he himself had become disgusted with, though, of course, he did not say so, and when my inexperienced friend, Monsieur Baliff, found that nothing could be done with it, he supposed that the land was good enough but that he himself was not competent to work it. No one ventured to hint that he had been cheated, as it was one of the Church authorities who had sold him the land. After spending upon it all that he possessed, he was finally compelled to abandon it. They were now very much straightened in circumstances, and my poor friend told me that she had frequently been compelled—as they were entirely destitute of money—to take a silver spoon or fork to the butcher's market to trade with, and there they drove a hard bargain with her, and she obtained next to nothing in exchange for her silver. Her crystal and plate now grace the table of a certain rich man in Utah. Every article they possessed went in this way at a most ruinous sacrifice, until nothing remained, and then the husband was forced to engage in manual labor, while the poor wife employed herself in whatever feminine work she could obtain; they receiving in return just what people chose to pay them. In the midst of their troubles the husband was "counselled" to take another wife.

"But why did he not refuse to do so?" I asked.

"If you had been here during the Reformation you would not ask me such a question as that. Sister Stenhouse, you ought to thank God that you were not here then. There were shocking things done at that time, and the men were all crazy about marrying. They married every woman who was single, and even little girls who had scarcely reached their teens; it was a time of terror, and no one dared to rebel."

She then told me that her husband had been, as one might say, compelled to marry a young Swiss girl whom they had brought out to Utah with them as a domestic. This girl had been a very faithful servant and Madame Baliff had become very much attached to her. During the Reformation the Bishop visited them and "counselled" Monsieur Baliff to take a second wife. The girl was also "counselled" to marry, and when she said that she did not know of any one to whom she would like to be married, the Bishop told her that he himself would find a suitable man.

"My husband told me what the Bishop had urged him to do," said Madame Baliff, "and we talked the matter over in a practical way. We knew that the girl would be forced to marry somebody, and that then she would have to leave us, which would put us to the very greatest inconvenience, for situated as we were we could hardly get on without her assistance. At the same time, he also would be compelled to obey counsel, and we came to the conclusion that as there was no way of evading the difficulty altogether, it would be better for him to marry the girl than to bring a stranger into the house. So he asked her, and she accepted him, and they were married." She is a good girl and tries to do her best, but it is a great trial to me, and one which I trust you may never be called upon to bear. My husband is as kind and gentle a man as ever lived, and he has done all he could to keep me from feeling unhappy; had it been otherwise I dare not think what I should have done—I believe I should have gone mad or died. In our household arrangements, of course it made very little difference, but it was inexpressibly painful to me, and though I suppose I shall remain a Mormon till the day of my death I have learned to hate Mormonism."

Poor Madame Baliff! Hers was a life of privation and sorrow, of late years. Happy as woman could be in her youthful days; she little dreamed what Providence had in store for her ere her earthly course had run. With a faithful and devoted husband; with a charming little family growing up around her; with all that could make life fair and beautiful. But that accursed thing—Polygamy—came and poisoned all her happiness, and blighted all her hopes; and when, but a few months ago, worn out and weary of life, she left behind her all her sorrows and all her misery, I could not weep that she had gone to a better land beyond the veil, but I thanked God that at last, poor soul, her days of trial were for ever over and she had entered into her eternal rest.

One day Brother Brigham sent me word that he wished to see me.

I went to him, and he told me that he wanted me to become acquainted with a certain young girl in whom he took a great interest. She was the daughter, by his first wife, of Jedediah M. Grant, the famous Apostle of the "Reformation"—her name was Carrie, and she was now an orphan. Brother Brigham wished me to have her with me every day, for she was not "feeling well," he said, and he thought I might do her some good. This "not feeling well" I afterwards discovered meant that she was almost ready to apostatize. If she desired it, I was to teach her my business; not that she needed to follow any profession, for, as President Young explained, she had a good home; but her mind needed occupation, and he did not care how she employed her time, so long as she was with me every day and could be made to "feel well."

I listened to all that Brother Brigham said, and accepted the trust in good faith—not only to please him, but because the girl was an orphan, and my heart went out towards her even before I had seen her.

Before I returned home, I called at the house where Carrie was stopping, and arranged that she should come every day to see me, under pretext of learning the business. Now it so happened that we each conceived a liking to the other the very first moment we met; we made friends together at once, and she wanted to begin coming to me the very next day. She was a sweet-looking and intelligent girl, fair but fragile, and with a peculiar expression of melancholy sadness dwelling upon her features, which gave her a painfully interesting appearance. I never, before or since, met with a young girl who habitually looked so unhappy; and I thought that perhaps physical weakness might be the cause, for it was evident that in constitution she was extremely delicate—I almost feared consumptive.

The first day we spent together she told me that her parents had been among the pioneers to Utah, that her only sister had died on the Plains, and that she had lost her mother soon after they had arrived in Salt Lake City. As the only remaining child of her mother, she had been a great pet with her father, but he too had died about four years previous to the time of which I speak, and she had never been happy since. "I often long to die," she said, "that I might join my mother and father; no one loves me here, and I have nothing to live for." Her father had married four wives after her mother's death, and they were all very kind to her, but she did not feel that she had a home. She told me, that about six months before she came to me, she had started to go east, to her mother's friends, for they had frequently written to her urging her to come to them, and that when she was about two weeks' journey from Salt Lake City, Brigham Young sent after her, and she was brought back. "But," she said, "I shall never be happy here, Sister Stenhouse, I know I never shall; and why should they not let me leave and go to my relatives?"

I knew very well that it was of no use for her to try to get away, for we had no railroad then, and escape was almost impossible. I therefore tried to make her more cheerful, and told her that a girl as young as she was—for she was scarcely seventeen—had much to live for. But her unhappiness had become almost a settled melancholy and she seemed to be interested in nothing. Besides which, the task I attempted was all the more difficult as I was not at all happy myself.

One day the conversation happened to turn upon Polygamy, and in a moment I saw that all her trouble arose from that miserable doctrine, and from that alone. We had not exchanged many words upon the subject when she exclaimed: "Oh, how I hate Polygamy! God forgive me; but I cannot help it, Sister Stenhouse! I do hate it; and yet I believe that it is true." Poor child! I understood her too well, for her position was exactly mine ;—from that moment we were fast friends.

Here was the child of one of the greatest fanatics that Mormonism has ever known, one of the wildest advocates of the "Celestial Order of Marriage," perfectly loathing the system ; and yet, poor girl, believing it firmly, and believing too that she could not obtain salvation unless she entered into it. How I pitied and loved that poor girl!—and yet what strength or consolation could I offer her, being myself as painfully situated as she was. Our mutual sorrow united us still more closely in loving companionship. I had rarely met among the Mormon girls with one so thoughtful and observing, so kind and gentle. She had not been with me many weeks before she had entwined herself so completely round my heart that I was lonely when she stayed away and I tried to keep her with me altogether. I tried in every way to make her feel at home when at my house ; and noticing her delicate health, and thinking that she did not always get those little things to tempt her appetite which an invalid should always have, I found out many trifles which I believed would please her, and always tried to get them for her. She seemed to think much of these little attentions, and I have always believed that she loved me very dearly.

Some of my neighbors began to whisper pretty plainly to me that Brother Brigham had an object in view in asking me to interest myself in Carrie's welfare. They told me they believed that my husband, if he had not already been counselled to marry her, would be before long. Knowing, as I did, Carrie's aversion to Polygamy, these suggestions did not trouble me very much ; but I begged my informants not to speak of the matter in my young friend's presence as it would only disturb and annoy her. I was the more anxious on this point as her health had by that time began very perceptibly to improve, and sometimes she seemed to be almost joyous and light-hearted. Sometimes she would sew, and sometimes she read or played with the children, of whom she was very fond, and I always allowed her to do just as she pleased.

One day my talkative friend called to see me. She had not been near the house for several months, and I think, at her last visit, she must have taken offence at my telling her that I thought she had not acted wisely in procuring wives for her husband. She had, however, now an object in coming which I soon discovered.

She was shown in, and as soon as she was fairly seated, I observed that, while talking to me, she was inquisitively scrutinizing Carrie's face, as if trying to discover her character or read her thoughts. Suddenly—she did everything impulsively—she interrupted the conversation, saying: "Sister Stenhouse, I want to speak to you privately." I asked her to come with me into the next room, and she did so, but before I had time to close the door, she exclaimed: "Allow me to congratulate you: you have done very wisely!"

"Congratulate me upon what?" I asked.

"Upon the excellent choice you have made for your husband," she replied; "I knew very well you would ponder over my good counsel and seek another wife for Brother Stenhouse, and I am certain that my example and my faith and prayers have helped you, for I have asked the Lord to strengthen you to do just what you are doing."

"Doing!" I said, "What am I doing? I really don't understand what you mean."

"Oh nonsense!" she exclaimed, "But I understand, if you don't. You wish to keep it a secret, I suppose, until the happy event takes place. And you are quite right in that, for there are so many busybodies here, and they do interfere so much in their neighbors' affairs that it isn't pleasant. But, of course you needn't fear me—I shouldn't think of breathing one single word of the matter, unless you wished me to do so."

"I'm really at a loss to know what you mean," I said, very much annoyed with her.

"Oh," she said, "If you think that I am interfering, I will not say another word, for I should very much dislike to be considered meddling. But you know, my dear Sister Stenhouse, the great interest I have always felt concerning you ; from the very first when I knew you in England I always prophesied great things of you, but I was a little afraid when I saw your opposition to Polygamy, and I cannot tell how happy I felt when I heard yesterday that you had found a wife—and a good wife too—for your husband.

MY TALKATIVE FRIEND.

"I find a wife for my husband!" I exclaimed. "That I never would. I dislike Polygamy far too much to do so. No ; if he ever wants another wife, I shall never help him to find her—he'll have to get her himself. Besides which, I don't believe he does think of ever taking more wives."

I believed what I said. During our residence in Utah, my fears had calmed down, for my husband very seldom mentioned Polygamy in my presence, unless the brethren or sisters introduced the subject. I naturally concluded that, now he had seen so much of the practical results of the doctrine, he, like myself, had become disgusted with it. But my talkative friend, of course, knew nothing of my thoughts. "Who is that young girl, then, that I saw just now?" she asked ; "Is not that Miss Grant?" I replied that it was.

"Well," said she, "I was told that you had asked her to marry your husband."

"There is no truth in the report," I said, "I am sure that she has never thought of such a thing, nor have I, nor has my husband ; and I would not have such a thing spoken of for the world."

"Well," she replied, "I am really quite disappointed. You have a splendid opportunity, and I do believe that that was what Brother Brigham meant when he asked you to see after her. In fact, I was told that it was his only motive, all along."

"Then Brother Brigham will soon find out his mistake, I can assure you," I answered, "for I never will ask her ; and, moreover, if I thought for a moment that she would ever wish such a thing, much as I love her, I should then hate her."

"My dear Sister," she said, "how do you expect ever to get salvation ? I suppose you think that is none of my business, and that I should leave you in the hands of the Lord. But before I go, let me ask you to see Eliza Snow as soon as you have an opportunity. She will build you up, and do you a world of good."

I told her I needed no "building up;" all I wanted was that my husband and myself should be left alone, and that people should not meddle with our affairs.

She apologised for what she had said, and we returned to the sitting-room, and she asked me to introduce her to Miss Grant. I did so, although I feared that in some way or other she would be the means of interrupting the pleasant relationship which had hitherto existed between us.

After she had gone, her conversation troubled me a great deal. What did it all mean? Had the busybodies been trying to bring about an alliance between my husband and Carrie? Had Brigham Young been working all along to this end? However it might be, I resolved that, at least, Carrie should know nothing of the matter from me.

One morning, the Apostle Heber C. Kimball called in his carriage. It was very early, being only about seven o'clock. Mr. Stenhouse went out to see him, but in his blunt way he said: "I do not want you, I want Sister Fanny to take a ride with me." My husband brought him into the house and he told me he wanted to have a talk with me, "You must not fix up," he said, "or I won't ride with you. Come along in your wrapper and slippers, and just put on your sunbonnet."

I told him that I never went out in a sunbonnet. "Well then, do it for the first time," he said.

I suggested that I had had no breakfast, and asked him if he would wait and have some with us.

"No," said he, "I have plenty of wives around this town, and we will find breakfast somewhere." So I started just as I was, and he told the driver—who, I think, was one of his own sons—to call round and see "the folks"—meaning his wives. Then, turning to me, he said: "You never looked prettier, Sister Fanny, you ought always to wear a sunbonnet, but you like dress a great deal too much—you will keep your husband poor—and then how will he be able to carry out the commands of God? Did you ever think of that? Then, again, you dress your children too much; it must take pretty well all your time to make their clothes; and, see, what it must cost. Now, I'm going to give you some good advice. Do what my folks do. I tell them to make a linsey dress for each of the children, in the spring, and let them wear it all the summer, and then, when the winter comes, it will be so full of grease and dirt that it will be sure to keep them warm. Now I'm sure you won't consent to do that with your children, so it is good counsel thrown away." I knew well enough that Brother Heber was only jesting, for apparently he provided very well for his family, although he allowed them no luxuries. He went on to say: "But that isn't what I wanted to speak to you about; I had something else to say. When is your husband going to marry Miss Grant? That girl has got to be looked after by some good man and woman, and I think that you and Brother Stenhouse would do first-class. What do you think?"

"I should not like my husband to marry her," I said.

"And why not, Sister Fanny?" he asked.

"Because I myself love her," I replied.

"Why that is the very reason why he ought to do it the sooner," he said, "and you would continue to love her, and love her all the better, too, when she belonged to your husband, and when you saw how much he loved her." He laughed outright as he said this, and told me not to look so solemn. "Why," he said, "it's the finest thing in the world to develop love in the women; a man never gets so much attention in his life as when he has got several wives all trying their best to please him."

"That may be," I said, "but who is to pay attention to their wives?"

"Things have been all upside down in the world, Sister Fanny," he answered, "and the Priesthood is going to set them all in order. It is the women's place to minister to the men, and the men, in return, will save them in the Kingdom, if they are good girls."

By this time we had driven round several of his fields in the lower part of the City, and at last we stopped at the house of one of his wives. She very kindly prepared breakfast for us ; after which we called to see two or three other wives, and then returned home. On the way back, he tried to get me to promise that I would persuade my husband to marry Miss Grant. This I positively refused to do, although it would have been dangerous for me not to acquiesce had it not been that Brother Heber was attached to me and allowed me to say what I liked against Polygamy, laughing at me and telling me to "hold on" when I became too much in earnest.

This constant reference to Carrie began to trouble me seriously, although, so far, I had not yet spoken about it either to her or to my husband, and did not intend to. I felt sure that Carrie, poor child, was perfectly innocent ; she had refused to go to several parties with us, and had otherwise declined to accompany my husband, and I believed that I had no cause for uneasiness.

Thus time passed, and more than a year flew by, and Carrie still remained with me. Lately I thought that her manner was changed and that she was a good deal altered. I noticed that she was shy when in the presence of my husband, and that she rather avoided him. For a long time I had not suspected that anything was wrong between them, and the knowledge that Carrie was troubled, and that my husband was the cause, came upon me suddenly. She began by staying away for several days at a time, and at last she told me that she was going away for a while to visit a friend in the country. She looked so unhappy that I felt sure that all was not right, and begged her not to go, but she would not listen to me. It was necessary for her to go, she stated, and would say no more. She bade me good-bye, and for two months I heard nothing of her, supposing that she was in the country, and then I was surprised to learn that she was visiting with a friend in another part of the city, and that she was very ill indeed. I immediately went to call upon her, and she was much pleased to see me, and then I discovered that she had not been in the country at all, but had been there in the City with her friend.

I could not at the time understand her conduct, but as she, in common with most other delicate people, was rather capricious, I allowed it to pass without any comment. She told me that as soon as she felt a little better she would come and see me, but she never came, and I was somewhat offended at her supposed neglect, and thought that before I visited her again I would wait and see whether she first came up to our house.

All this time, a friend of Carrie's was in the habit of looking in very frequently upon some trifling errand or other, and I noticed that she always waited for the return of my husband, and then made some excuse to go out with him, and they had long conversations together. There was some mystery, I clearly perceived, and as a wife and a woman I determined that it was my duty to find out what that mystery was.

CHAPTER XXX.

TAKING A SECOND WIFE :—THE EXPERIENCE OF THE FIRST.

A Mysterious Errand—Going a Courting—Silence and Obedience, a Wife's Duty—Kept in the Dark—Mistaken Kindness—The Conflict Between Faith and Reason—A "Rebellious Woman"—My Poor Friend Carrie—Women Advocating Polygamy—Finding a Wife for My Husband—The Poor Victim—An Unusually Loving Husband—A Consultation with Brother Brigham—The Curse of a Whole Life—The Fiat of the Prophet—The Penalties of Disobedience—"I Can Only Consent"—A Message from Eliza R. Snow—The Bad Logic of the Poetess—An Unwilling Sacrifice—An Unalterable Decision.

I DID not presume to ask my husband what it was that he had to talk about with Carrie's friend, but I instinctively felt what it might be, and I was so much troubled in mind that I thought I would never go to see her again.

By that time I had learned, as every Mormon wife does learn, never to ask questions. The wife of a Saint never dares to ask her husband whither he is going or when he will return. She is not expected to know or care what business her husband may have on hand when he leaves home in the evening, after making a most elaborate toilet, with frequent admiration of himself in the mirror. If the poor wife feels that she must say something, to give vent to her overwrought feelings, she simply asks in a conscious, guilty way, when he will be home again ; wishing too often in her secret heart that he might say—Never. Her duty is to be silent and unobservant ; and though some poor women have, when their outraged feelings were overcharged, inadvertently betrayed curiosity respecting the movements of the absent ones, they have soon been sternly taught their duty, and those loving husbands have given them good cause to repent of their inquisitiveness.

And who can blame these disconsolate, lonely women if thus they feel? Their religion alone is to blame. It has been the destruction of that sweet confidence which should exist between husband and wife, and it has divided hearts and interests which should inseparably have been for ever one. This, slowly but no less painfully, I was beginning to understand. However earnestly I might try to combat the idea, my life was wretched with the one continual fear of what I might see or hear of my husband. I tried to drive away such thoughts, and I called to mind all the acts of kindness and devotion which he had shown whose love my heart held dear. Sometimes, arguing with myself, I said : No, my husband will not deceive me ; no matter what other men may do or be with their wives, my husband will be frank and true with me.

So I thought then ; but I was destined to realise in my own experience how utterly impossible it is for any man, no matter how honest and truthful he may naturally be, to practice Polygamy without becoming a hypocrite ; and the more he loves his wife, the greater hypocrite he will become, trying to deceive her with the foolish notion that half his cruelty is done in attempting to “ spare her feelings.”

Up to this time I had been able, with some effort, to banish those doubts which would, against my will, intrude upon my mind. I had schooled myself to believe, that when it was really necessary, my husband would frankly and freely speak to me about that subject which was ever uppermost in my heart, and I knew my own nature sufficiently well to feel sure that I could grapple with any difficulty, if once I looked it boldly in the face. All that I feared was deception on my husband's part. That, I felt, would be more than I could endure. In the whole course of our married life hitherto, I had never known him to deceive me, and even now, although influenced by the counsel of the Elders, he thought of bringing to our home another wife, I well knew that he sympathised with me ; for he knew the deep, deep sorrow that the dread alone of Polygamy had for years brought to my heart, and he might well be apprehensive of what the practical reality would be. At a later period, I knew that he fell into that error, common among Mormon men, of keeping "it" from their wives until all was settled. This was not the kind of treatment calculated to inspire me with confidence ; it may suit some natures, but I doubt even that. Men frequently imagine that they understand a woman's nature better than she does herself, and acting upon this belief, and full of good intentions, they err most fatally.

My husband thought that he was acting kindly to me when he said nothing of all that transpired between him and Carrie ; but when I saw the visits of Carrie's lady-friend so frequently repeated, I began to suspect the truth and was much troubled. I was, however, too proud to question him on the subject, at the risk of getting an evasive answer, and it was evident that the two persons most intimately interested in the matter intended that I should be kept in the dark. I saw through all this and it did not tend either to restore my peace of mind or to make me more pleasant in my intercourse with Carrie or my husband. In their conduct I could see nothing but deception, however good their intentions might be, and I felt that they were treating me as a child. The thought was very painful to me, and it was only with a great effort that I suppressed it.

In fact, I dared not think ; but when doubts and fears crowded themselves upon my mind, so that I was compelled to give them utterance, I would lock myself in my room or wander away to some lonely spot and there vent my feelings in indignant words. At other times I did think over the wrongs which Polygamy inflicted, until my feelings were almost beyond endurance ; then in those moments of anguish

I would prostrate myself in humility and repentance before the Lord, and would plead for strength to endure and submit to His will. Then again, I would pace the room, my soul filled with rebellion, and heartfelt curses against a system which had so withered and blighted all my life and had taken for ever the sunshine out of my existence. For ever! Ah! how those words lingered in my thoughts; how they chilled my heart, and left me utterly without hope; for we were told that eternity would be but a repetition of this life on earth. Polygamy, we were taught, was to be practiced in eternity; it was to be the "Celestial Order of Heaven"; it was an eternal law. But if it was so loathsome now, how should I ever become reconciled to, and happy in, it? Then too we were told by the Elders that we should have no other heaven than that which we began on earth, and I was at a loss to conjecture what sort of a heaven mine would be. It may appear strange that such absurdities should ever seriously have found a place in my mind; but when one at starting accepts a system as true—however absurd that system may be—and learns to regard all that is connected with it as beyond the shadow of a doubt—after years of discipline, the mind is ready to receive almost anything that may be offered to it from the same source. In my own case, I was so convinced that, however reason might object, all that we were taught was true, that I was utterly without hope, and would have felt happy could I have believed that death was annihilation. Of earthly happiness I had given up all expectation.

These painful feelings, of course, had a marked effect upon my daily life. I grew weary, and my health failed, I became thin, and my features were marked with care and anxiety. When people came to see me, I said little to them and their very presence I felt irksome. Mechanically I went through the daily routine of duty, but my heart was in nothing that I did. I dared not even trust myself to speak to any one, for fear of becoming the subject of conversation and attracting the attention of the authorities, which was not at all desirable, for the position of a "rebellious woman" in those days was anything but pleasant. I stood alone. Upon my husband I looked with suspicion ; my children were too young to understand me ; Carrie, whom I had taken to my heart, to whom I had confided my sorrows, whose own welfare had been so dear to me, had, as I thought, turned against me, like an adder, and there was no one in whom I could trust. It seemed to me too cruel for Carrie to treat me so, and yet I could not doubt that she was acting unfaithfully towards me.

Surrounded by my children, living under the same roof with my husband, my heart was, nevertheless, filled with a sense of utter loneliness and desolation. There was no one in whom I could confide, to whom I might tell my sorrows, and from whose counsel or strength I might derive comfort. I dared not even go and lay my griefs before God, for I had been led to believe that all my suffering was caused by an arbitrary decree which He willed to be enforced. How false a notion of that loving heavenly Father whose tender care is so manifestly shown in his gentle dealings with the weakest of His creatures !

It was now about six months since Carrie left my house, and I was under the impression that all that time certain well-intentioned sisters had been doing all they could to bring about a marriage between her and my husband. Her health, however, was so bad that sometimes for weeks together she did not leave her room. At the time, of course, I knew nothing of this, but I afterwards heard of it. When I called upon her, which I did when I found that she was too ill to come to see me, I thought she was greatly changed in her manner, but when I thought of her lonely position my heart warmed towards her and I forgot all my suspicions. Certainly, I wanted to ask her one plain question relative to my husband, but my pride would not allow me to speak to her on that subject unless she first mentioned it to me. One day I thought that she was about to make a confession. Talking indifferently of ordinary matters, she suddenly said, "I am surprised you ever wish to see me ;" but when I asked her why, expecting that she would now explain what had so long troubled me, she answered evasively, and nothing more was said.

I shall always believe that I myself was not the only person interested at that time about Carrie's feelings. There are some of the sisters who—strange as it may seem—spend their lives in promoting the practice of Polygamy. When once these good sisters have set their hearts to get a man a second wife, they do not let a trifle discourage them ; if they do not succeed with one girl, they try with another, and it is seldom that they fail of meeting with their reward.

In Carrie, at this time, they found a subject of peculiar interest. If her failing health put an end, for a time, to all thoughts of her own marriage, that was no reason why my husband should not select a second wife elsewhere. Poor victim ! He, of course, had no pleasure or interest in the matter ; his religion alone compelled him ; he suffered as much as I did ! To look round on all the young and pretty girls he knew ; to select one and pay his court to her, was painful enough I dare venture to assert ; but he seemed to bear it very well indeed, and the "Revelation" appeared to agree with him nicely.

With Carrie's absence from our house, the rumors about her which had troubled me so much somewhat subsided. Nothing could silence the secret apprehension which continually held my soul in dread ; but the fear of my young friend's influence once removed, I was comparatively at peace. It was, however, but the lull before the storm. I soon learned that in losing Carrie I did not lose Polygamy, and from about that time I can date my husband's desire to sustain his brethren in the performance of their duty and his wish to act as they did, especially in reference to the "Celestial Order of Heaven." Just at that time the "Cullom Bill" for the suppression of Polygamy was presented to Congress, and all true Mormons were made to feel that it was their duty to stand by their leader ; and though, in itself, they might see nothing desirable in Polygamy, yet, if they had not already multiplied wives, it was their duty to do so without any delay.

Ever watchful as I was, I noticed little changes in my husband, which under ordinary circumstances would have escaped my observation. By this time one all-absorbing idea had taken possession of my mind, and my husband's thoughts, I believe, were turned in the same direction—only our wishes did not exactly coincide. Polygamy was the thought common to both, but upon its desirability we entertained dissimilar views.

A man with Polygamy upon his mind was then a creature which I did not understand, and which I had not fully studied. Some years later, when I had a little more experience in Mormonism, I discovered several never-failing signs by which one might know when a man wished to take another wife. He would suddenly awaken to a sense of his duties ; he would have serious misgivings as to whether the Lord would pardon his neglect in not living up to his privileges ; he would become very religious, and would attend to his meetings—his “ testimony meetings,” singing meetings, and all sorts of other “ meetings,” which seemed just then to be very numerous, and in various other ways he would show his anxiety to live up to his religion. He would thus be frequently absent from home, which, of course, he deeply regrets, as he loves so dearly the society of his wife and children. The wife, perhaps, poor simple soul !—thinks that he is becoming unusually loving and affectionate, for he used not, at one time, to express much sorrow at leaving her alone for a few hours ; and she thinks how happy she ought to feel that such a change has come over her husband, although, to be sure, he was always as good as most of the other Mormon men.

My husband was a good and consistent Mormon, and very much like the rest of his brethren in these matters ; and the brethren, knowing themselves how he felt, sympathised with him, and urged him on, and, by every means in their power, aided him in his noble attempts to carry out “ the commands of God !”

One evening, when he came home, he seemed preoccupied as if some matter of importance were troubling his mind.

This set me thinking, too. I saw that he wanted to say something to me, and I waited patiently. "I am going to the ball," he presently remarked, "and I am going alone, for Brother Brigham wishes me to meet him there." I knew at once what was passing in his mind and dared not question him. He went and saw Brigham. What passed between them, I do not know, but when my husband returned he intimated to me that it had been arranged that he should take another wife.

The idea that some day another wife would be added to our household was ever present in my mind, but somehow, when the fact was placed before me in so many unmistakeable words, my heart sank within me, and I shrank from the realisation that our home was at last to be desecrated by the foul presence of Polygamy. The very effort which my husband made to break the news gently to me made my heart more rebellious.

What intelligence could be more terrible to an affectionate wife, the mother of a family, than this. In my girlhood, as the reader knows, I had forsaken all for the sake of my husband and his religion. We had toiled together and suffered together. For fifteen long years our interests and our affections had been one and inseparable. Nothing, but the fear of Polygamy, had ever come between my husband and myself;—but for that horrible apprehension, and the unhappy feeling which it occasioned, no wedded pair could have been more truly united than my husband and myself, but that, certainly—that only—had cast a shadow over the bliss of our domestic life. Our little ones—a mutual care—had grown up around us; they had occupied all our thoughts and all our attention, and in them our own love seemed to be renewed. They were now, at least the elder ones, fast ripening into manhood and womanhood and gave promise that they would be the glory and blessing of our old age. Our home was never disturbed by any of those petty dissensions and divided interests which make so many families unhappy. When in the evening we gathered round our peaceful fireside, in the pleasant interchange of thought, in intelligent conversation, and domestic amusements, and in little loving courtesies, we realised, as far as could be realised in this imperfect state, the meaning of that household expression—"a little heaven upon earth." In a word ;—while God had abundantly blessed us in basket and in store,—my husband's tender affection had ever been to me the same as it was on our marriage-day ; my heart, with all the true deep love which a woman can feel, had found its only happiness in him ; while our children, bound to each of us alike by the fondest ties, formed a family, which for unostentatious, but true, affection, and for unity of thought and aim, could not anywhere have been surpassed.

But now all this was to be changed. Let a Gentile mother think how she would feel if she heard her children talk of "Father taking another wife ! " Let her think what it would be if another woman—however good and pure she might be—were brought home to take her place in the family circle, to divide with her her husband's affections, to come, after years of undivided love, between herself and him who had so long been all in all to her ! And yet, all this I felt, and, oh, much, much more than I could ever express ; for who can tell in words the deepest bitterness which the heart too sadly feels ?

Everything around me changed. Every one I met reminded me of the miserable idea which had taken possession of my thoughts. All that before had seemed so bright and beautiful now revolted me, and my soul itself seemed filled with unavailing and unnatural hatred. I hated Mormonism, I hated the Revelation. I hated myself, and I hated my husband. All that had been influenced by, or in contact with, the detested and accursed thing I utterly abhorred. My woman's soul within me made me feel that I should gladly stand aloof from that degrading horror, and shake even from my clothes the touch of any one, or anything, that had been polluted by any connection with it.

Almost fainting, now that the truth came home to me in all its startling reality, I asked my husband when he proposed to take his second wife.

"Immediately," he replied, "that is to say, as soon as I can."

We were silent for some time. My mind was troubled. Had I been able to consider the whole affair as an outrage upon humanity in general, and an insult to my sex in particular, I should have replied with scorn and defiance. Had I implicitly believed in the divinity of the Revelation I should have bowed my head in meek submission. But I did neither of these. The feelings of my heart naturally led me to hate with a most perfect hatred the very mention of the word Polygamy, while at the same time I still believed, or tried to make myself believe, that the Revelation was from God, and must therefore be obeyed. Such was the strange and contradictory position in which I was placed.

I tried to reason with myself. My husband and the Elders had taught me that the fault was not in Mormonism but in my early Gentile training; and I believed them, and thought that all the inconsistencies which I had heard of, or seen, in Brigham Young and the other prominent men, should be attributed to the weakness of human nature; and not to the system. Still, doubts would suggest themselves; only, however, to be immediately suppressed, for it was by slow degrees that the truth dawned upon my mind. It was only natural that I should hesitate. I was a wife and a mother, and I could not consult my own wishes or desires. It was my duty, I knew, to do what was right, at whatever cost to my own feelings, and I dared not think of open rebellion. Had I then rebelled, I must have renounced all that in life I held dearest—husband, children, all. I knew my husband's devotion to the faith and that he would not hesitate to make any sacrifice for it. He would even glory in giving up what men hold dearest, for the sake of the Church, and we had both been taught that whosoever forsook husband or wife for the sake of the Church, it should be accounted to them for righteousness. I saw around me daily and hourly the effects of this teaching upon the unfortunate wives and children, but I nevertheless strove—how painfully none but myself could tell—to banish from my mind every doubt, and to esteem the natural questioning of my heart a sin.

"Are you not satisfied that it is right for me to take another wife?" my husband asked.

"I have never yet really doubted that the Revelation was from God," I replied, "for I cannot believe that any man would be so blasphemous and wicked as to set forth such a revelation in God's name, unless he received it as he said he did. If it is from God, of course you are right to obey it; but if I were to consult my own feelings I would never consent to live in Polygamy. I would rather risk salvation, and tell the Lord that He had placed upon me a burden heavier than I was able to bear, and that I regarded Him as a hard taskmaster. But when the salvation of my husband and children, to say nothing of my own, is at stake, my wishes and happiness go for nothing, and I can only consent."

From that moment, I felt like a condemned criminal for whom there was not a shadow of hope or a chance of escape. Could I possibly have looked upon the sacred obligations of marriage as lightly as Mormonism taught me to regard them, I believe I should have broken every tie and risked the consequences. But I had vowed to be faithful unto death, and if this second marriage was for my husband's welfare, and for the salvation of us and of our children, I resolved to make the effort to subdue my rebellious heart, or die in the attempt. For the first time in my life, I thanked God that I was not a man, and that the salvation of my family did not depend upon me; for if fifty revelations had commanded it I could not have taken the responsibility of withering one loving, trusting heart. I felt that if such laws were given to us, our woman's nature ought to have been adapted to them, so that submission to them might be as much a pleasure to us as it was to the men, and that we might at least feel that we were justly dealt with.

Not long after this, my husband brought me a message from Eliza R. Snow. She wanted me to take tea with her and he urged me to accept the invitation. I did not want to go, for I knew too well her object in sending for me. She had been talking with my husband about me, I felt sure, and that was how she came to send the message by him. I went, however, and, as I anticipated, she wanted to talk with me about Polygamy, and to try to convince me that it was for our best interests that my husband should take another wife, and that it was quite time he did so.

I told her that he was not yet in a position to do so. "We have quite a family," I said, "and I think he should at least be allowed to wait until he has accumulated a little before he embarrasses himself with new responsibilities."

"And where would the kingdom of God be," she asked, "if we had all talked in this way? Let your husband take more wives, and let them help him, and you will feel blessed in keeping the commands of God."

"There would be no good in my husband taking another wife," I said, "while I feel as I do now. To be acceptable to the Lord, a sacrifice should be made willingly and in a proper spirit, and I do not think that under present circumstances it is proper for him to do this thing."

"Let him be the judge of that," she replied; "do not seek to control him; he alone is responsible, and therefore let him do as he thinks best."

"But," I said, "he himself does not want another wife yet." But I spoke with hesitation, for my heart misgave me.

"You are mistaken;" she answered, "your husband is a very good man and desires to live his religion, and it is a great grief to him to know that you feel as you do, and you really must try to overcome your opposition. If you had a loaf of bread to make, and you made it, and it was pronounced good, do you think it would be of the slightest consequence what feelings agitated your mind while you were making it, so long as it was well made? So it is with the Lord. He does not care with what feelings you give your husband another wife, so long as you do so."

This was a miserable attempt at reasoning, to say nothing of its falsity; and notwithstanding all she said, I still felt that no blessing would even attend an unwilling sacrifice, and I told her so. She spoke to me very kindly, however, and tried to encourage me, and suggested that Carrie would be a very proper person for my husband to marry. I had now no longer any doubt in my mind that it had been all "arranged," and that opposition on my part would be all in vain. I was indignant at this, for I believed that, as the Revelation itself said, I—the first wife—ought first to have been consulted. This, however, I subsequently found was as false as the system itself. I believed that I was the victim of a conspiracy, and I did not intend to submit without giving them some trouble.

I returned home, pondering over what had been said to me, with a feeling of intense weariness oppressing my heart. I did not know what to think. It appeared to me that every one had determined that Carrie should be my husband's second wife, and I now believed, with my talkative friend, that Brigham Young had certainly intended it from the beginning. I felt that I would rather that he should marry almost any one else than her; for I felt certain that I should hate any woman whom he might marry, no matter how much I might have loved her before.

But my mind was soon relieved of its trouble respecting poor Carrie, for, as I before mentioned, her failing health forbade all thoughts of marriage, and my husband, after a short time, never spoke to me about her. The real cause of my distress, however, was by no means removed—it was determined, without appeal, that my husband should, notwithstanding any impediment to the contrary, take another wife, whoever that chosen one might be,—my apprehensions, therefore, were not removed, they were only turned in another direction.

THE next day my husband proposed several young girls for my consideration, but I felt that it was of very little consequence to me upon whom his choice might fall.

It is a custom among the Mormon married men—those at least who make any pretensions to doing what is right and who wish to spare the feelings of their wives as much as the degrading system will allow—to make it appear as if the second wife were chosen by the first, and they go through the form of consulting with her as to who shall be selected. The husband will mention the names of several eligible young ladies, among whom is sure to be the one upon whom he has already set his affections. If the wife should try to make herself agreeable by suggesting one or another of these young ladies, some objection is sure to be raised. One is too thoughtless; the relations of another are not quite so agreeable as they might be; and the temper of a third is said to be not very good. In this way, one after another is taken off the list, until only one remains—the bright particular star of whom all along the husband has been thinking,—and if the wife should make any objections to this one, the husband, of course, has a ready answer. In most cases her extreme youth is an excuse for everything; she will have plenty of time to learn, and will be the more ready to be taught.

When once they have obtained the reluctant consent of their wives, it is astonishing how bright and cheerful these Mormon husbands become. Notwithstanding all that they have said to the contrary, it is evident that Polygamy is no trial to their faith. They say that it is as great a cross to them as it is to their wives, but somehow or other they take very kindly to it.

It was soon settled who should be the honored maiden to whom my husband should pay his addresses. Her name was Belinda, and she was the daughter of the Apostle Parley P. Pratt, whom I have already mentioned as coming to an untimely end in Arkansas. I, of course, was not expected to ask any questions or evince any curiosity respecting the girl or my husband's relations towards her. I had given my consent, I had acted my part, or at least all the part that was expected of me; I had fulfilled my duty as a Mormon first wife when I agreed to another wife being taken, and, henceforth, all that transpired was—so the Elders would have said—no business of mine.

Mormon domestic matters are to the Gentile looker-on a perfect mystery. No one outside of Mormonism can realise the position of a wife, in her husband's own house, waiting for him to bring home to her another wife. But the Mormon women understand and feel it all. They know what it is to watch the course of a husband's courtship and note how he progresses with his wooing; and they could, if they dared, tell the painful feelings that rankle in their breasts at such a time.

Nor is the new wife much happier. The girl against whom the first wife now feels so bitterly, will, in all probability, some day be as unhappy as she is now. In due course of time, when the wooing is over and the maiden is won, she will be brought home, and will have her little day of triumph until her lord and master deems it necessary to add another "jewel" to his crown, and then her heart will be rent, as the first wife's was, and another crushed and degraded victim will be added to that list of suffering women who have become martyrs to this heavenly order of marriage!

Intent on his wooing, the husband is, of course, particularly attentive to his personal appearance, and spares no pains to render himself attractive to the young lady whose affections he proposes to win. Business, and domestic duties, of course, give place to the more important claims of love, and everything must be sacrificed upon the altar of that blind divinity. The wife sees all this, but she is not expected to feel. She remembers the time when her husband used to find his greatest pleasure in paying to her those little endearing attentions which love demands, and finds its reward in rendering. She remembers the time when he vowed at the altar to be faithful until death, and how often afterwards he has reiterated that vow and declared that no other woman should ever win from him a thought that would be disloyal to her.

It is impossible for any man to act justly—to say nothing of acting with affection—towards his wife while his thoughts and wishes are wandering towards a younger rival. Words are uttered, which in themselves perhaps are trifling, but which, under the circumstances, have a meaning bitterly cruel; and little things are done which, like the worm at the root, gnaw the heart itself and embitter the whole existence. Women whose minds were said to be strong, have written and spoken much of late years in an endeavor to unsex themselves. That men and women should be morally and socially equal, no right-minded person can for a moment doubt, but a woman never was and never will be a man. In sentiment and feeling, her mind is utterly the reverse of masculine, and no man, however refined or sensitive he may be, can ever fully understand a woman's heart. A man may be faithfully and devotedly attached to his wife, but she can never be to him what he is to her. Every thought and affection of her soul is centred in him. He is the life of her own existence. In her eyes he is all that is noble and good and true. He is her idol, her love, her all. Horribly then, Ah, a thousand times horribly and cruelly do they sin against the holiest principles of human nature, who crush with coldness and unkindness those warm and tender sentiments of affection which in her heart a woman cherishes towards her husband. How often have I mourned in secret some careless word, or cold, indifferent look which my truant husband has thoughtlessly bestowed upon me when leaving the house to visit his intended bride—words, which, to him, had no particular meaning, perhaps, but which pierced my heart :—I knew too well that he could not love two at once. It was evident which way his thoughts were wandering, although he, like the rest of his brethren, assured me that principle and religion—and no other motive—attracted him so often to the side of his more youthful and, of course, more pleasing companion.

My husband's intended certainly was very young—almost too young for a bride she would have been considered in any other community—and I must in fairness allow that she was very handsome. It is of the utmost importance that a Mormon girl should marry young. Women everywhere are never anxious to grow old, but among the Mormons age is especially dreaded by the women, for when years have robbed them of their personal attractions, in most cases they lose all hold upon their husband's affections and find themselves obliged to give place to prettier and more youthful rivals. A woman's position in the world to come, as I have before mentioned, depends, so the elders say, very much upon the number of children she has borne in this ; it is, therefore, a consideration of the very first importance that she should marry as early in life as possible, and this obligation is never for a moment overlooked by the refined and pure-minded Mormon men.

And now began the "painful task" of wooing the young lady. My husband told me that it was "a very painful duty," and as an obedient wife I felt bound to believe him. It was, of course, no pleasure to him to pay his addresses to an interesting young girl; it was no anxiety to be with her which made him hasten away to the damsel's house of an evening. Oh dear no! it was pure principle, love for the kingdom of God, and "a very painful task!" He seemed, however, to bear it remarkably well, and manifested a zeal which was perfectly astonishing to me considering the circumstances. In fact, I felt it my duty to restrain him a little for the sake of his health, for he seemed so anxious to perform his "task" properly that he could scarcely spare time to take his meals; but regardless of his own feelings he did not pay much attention to my suggestions.

But deeply as I sympathised with my husband, there were times when I felt that mine was indeed no imaginary sorrow, and that nothing could lull the storm that had gathered in my breast. The affliction which I had so long dreaded was now right at my door, and the most painful feelings agitated my mind. Sometimes I shut myself up in my own room and tried to reason with myself; then I would kneel, and pray, and weep with passionate emotion; and again I would pace the floor, my heart overflowing with anger and indignation. I never, at that time, knew what it was to be happy, for I felt that I was a burden and hindrance to my husband and I longed to die. I had loved him so devotedly that I could not even now cast him from my heart, and though I felt bitterly my position, I believed that he would not willingly wound me and that he was acting from the purest of motives. But it was all in vain. I could not change my nature, and my heart would rebel.

The courtship was continued for months, and the end seemed as far off as ever; for on account of the youthfulness of the bride elect my husband wished the marriage indefinitely postponed. It would be impossible for me to tell the thousand annoyances and indignities to which I was forced to submit—trials which might appear too trifling even to name, but which to a wife, under such circumstances, were crosses which she found it hard enough to bear. My husband knew nothing of these things, and, had he done so, it is more than probable that he would have considered it weakness in me to be troubled about matters of such small consequence—little actions and foolish words which he would have said I ought to have treated with contempt. It was easy to say that, but not so easy to do. Let any wife picture to herself how she would feel, if after schooling her heart to submission, after realising that she was no longer to be first and dearest in her husband's affections, she were to be constantly hearing the friends and relations of the young girl to whom her husband was engaged boasting of his devotion to her and openly expressing their belief that he had never loved before! How would any wife be pleased if, whenever her husband's intended received a valuable present from him, she were particularly informed of the fact, and a thousand little aggravating details were added to make her, if possible, more miserable. I do not know how such things would appear to a man's mind if matters were reversed and the wife took a couple of husbands to her heart, but I have noticed that "the lords of creation" are generally—and, no doubt, justly—sensitive enough, even if they only suspect their wives of engaging in a trifling flirtation; and I know that, however silly she may be considered for doing so, a woman in her heart feels all these things.

A woman can nerve herself to endure almost anything, and outwardly she may conceal her feelings, but there are limits beyond which endurance is not possible. A chance meeting with the girl who has superseded her in her husband's love; or worse still, should she chance to surprise the affectionate couple tête à tête, is sufficient to dispel all her good resolutions and to destroy that tranquility of mind which she finds it so difficult to preserve. She becomes sick at heart, nervous and entirely unfitted for her duties. I have frequently heard Mormon women say that, notwithstanding their husbands had been for many years polygamists, they could never see the other wives without a feeling of anger and indignation arising in their hearts. I know that in my own case I never became reconciled to the system.

My husband was called away to the Eastern States upon business, and his marriage was postponed, as I have already mentioned, to give the bride an opportunity of growing a little older first. I thought that the present would be a good time to show her some little attentions, which I believed it was my duty to do. The idea of coming in contact with her was certainly not at all pleasant, but I felt that it was only right for me to act in a friendly manner towards her, however painful it might be. She was the cause of much sorrow to me, but I could not blame her, for she had been born and brought up in the system, and, of course, supposed it true; but, for all that, it is utterly impossible for any woman to think complacently of another who is weaning from her her husband's affections, however innocent that other may be of intentional wrong.

Belinda was a very nice girl and, under other circumstances, I believe I should have liked her very much. I looked upon her as little more than a child, and my husband has frequently told me that he also regarded her in that light, but to me it was of small consequence that he thought of her as a child, so long as he acted towards her as a woman. Now that he was away from home there was no danger that she would meet him, so I invited her in a friendly way to call upon me. She came, and I had one or two other ladies present, for I was not like my husband in that particular—I had no anxiety to be alone with her. My effort to cultivate a friendly feeling towards her was not very successful. There was a coldness and restraint on both sides which we could not overcome, and I felt not a little relief when the evening was over. Subsequently I renewed the attempt, but to no purpose; her very presence in my house and among my children seemed in itself an insult to me.

It was not strange that I should feel thus. Think what the feelings of any wife would be under such circumstances. A family of children was growing up around me. Anxious for their future welfare, I surrounded them with the best influences which I could command, and my constant effort was to train them so that they should blush at everything that was not honorable and upright. I had daughters of my own—one of them quite growing up into womanhood. Had my husband been a Gentile, and had he gone astray, his wrong-doing would not have been introduced into my home itself, nor would it have been a subject of conversation among my children. But under Mormonism how was I situated? Why, I was compelled to drain the cup of degradation to its very dregs—the sanctity of my home itself was invaded, and I felt ashamed to think that I—wife and mother as I was—was entertaining my husband's affianced "wife" (!)—a child no older than my own eldest girl; and before long she would be brought home in my presence and among my children! Oh, detestable and unnatural desecration of the sanctity of home! Oh brutalising and immoral burlesque upon religious faith! How could I ever have deluded myself into the idea that such a profanation of all that is good could by any possibility be right, that such an outrage upon decency and propriety, such a violation of the laws of reason and religion could be pleasing in the sight of an all-pure God?

During my husband's absence, my poor friend Carrie Grant had been daily growing worse in health. I had once asked my husband if there was any truth in the rumors that I had heard of his attachment to her, but he had assured me that there was no foundation for them. Subsequently I learned from Carrie's own lips that this was not exactly true. She said he had deceived me for the sake of sparing my feelings, but I did not appreciate such kindness. Mormonism is full of deceptions. Men deceive their wives, and in return the wives deceive their husbands; and it is all for the sake of the kingdom of God.

Poor Carrie! Her's was a short and unhappy life—even her little dream of love was overclouded by disappointment. She was now constantly confined to her room, and whenever it was possible I used to call upon her, and attempted to make her feel more happy and cheerful. She used to ask me to talk with her about Mormonism. "You know," she said, "that I have never known any other religion, and I believe that this is right though it does not make me happy. My father loved Mormonism so much that I feel it must be right; the fault is in my own evil nature that does not bend to the will of Heaven."

One day she said to me: "I am getting worse, Sister Stenhouse, and I am glad of it, for I shall die. I am of no good here—there is nothing for me to do; if I lived, I should only cause trouble; it is better as it is."

"Carrie," I said, "You must not talk like that. You are still very young and probably will live for many years, and you do not know what future may lie before you."

"Do not blame me too much," she replied, for I am not the only unhappy girl in the city. I know many girls who are very miserable. Married women think that they are the only ones who suffer, while we girls know that nowhere upon the face of the earth can be found such an unhappy set as we are. Why did Brigham Young keep me from going to my friends in the East? I should have been happier then—I should have felt better. But now I want to die, and I am weary waiting for death."

In this melancholy mood I found her one day when she appeared particularly sad. She had been ill then about ten months; but her loving blue eyes were just as bright as ever, and I could see very little change in her, except that she was not able now to leave her couch without assistance, and she spoke as if it fatigued her very much. It was quite impossible to arouse her from the state of melancholy into which she had fallen, and it seemed to me that she could not last long. I offered to take her to my house, and said I would nurse her there and take care of her; but she said she was very kindly treated by her father's family and did not wish to change. She seemed to cling to me as if she could not bear that I should leave her, and she told me she had something on her mind that troubled her; she wanted to have a long talk with me about it, but not that day, she said. I went home that evening with tears in my eyes.

As the end was fast approaching, she one day said: "I want to tell you now, Sister Stenhouse, what I spoke of before, if you are willing to listen and will not be angry with anything I say. Remember, I am dying, or I never would speak to you as I am going to."

I told her of my great love for her, and that nothing that she could say would change that love.

"You do not know what I want to ask you, or you would not say so," she replied; "and I so dread to lose your love that I am afraid to tell you what is in my mind. But you know that I am dying and you will not be very hard with me."

She was then silent for some time, as if too much fatigued to continue the conversation. "No: I cannot tell you to-day," she said at last, "I want you to love me one day longer."

I urged her not to doubt that my love towards her could never change, and told her that it was better for her to speak at once and relieve her mind. She took my hand, and looked long and tenderly at me, and then she said: "I will tell you all, and if your love can stand that test, then indeed you do love me."

I encouraged her, and she began: "Would you hate me if I told you that I loved your husband?"

"No," I replied, "I would not hate you, Carrie." I said no more, for it seemed to me that it would be wrong of me to tell her of my suspicions and all that I had suffered at the thought that my husband had conceived an affection for her.

"Can you possibly answer me as calmly as that?" she said; "I thought that the very mention of such a thing would almost kill you, for I saw how much you loved your husband, and, Ah, how I have suffered at the thought of telling you. But that is not all I wanted to say, or I need never have spoken to you at all. I wanted to ask you to do me one last kindness, and then I think I shall die happy. You know that we have been taught that Polygamy is absolutely necessary to salvation, and if I were to die without being sealed to some man I could not possibly enter the celestial kingdom. My friends wish me to be sealed to one of the authorities of the Church, but I cannot bear the idea of being sealed to a man whom I do not love. I love your husband, and I want you to promise that I shall be sealed to him. If I had thought that I should recover, I never would have let you know this, for I would not live to give you sorrow. But, when I am gone, will you kneel by your husband's side in the Endowment House, and be married to him for me? Will it pain you much to do that for me, Sister Stenhouse?"

I felt so strangely as I listened to all this that I could not utter a single word, and she continued: "We shall then be together in eternity, and I am happy at the thought of that, for I think I love you even better than I love him. And then I believe we shall have overcome all our earthly feelings and shall be prepared to live that celestial law, and perhaps we may prefer it, for no doubt we shall know no unhappiness there."

The exertion of talking seemed to be too much for her, and she remained silent for some time. I felt ashamed that I had allowed my feelings to influence me at such a moment, for while she had been speaking I had allowed my thoughts to travel back over the past year, and, now that she admitted her love for my husband, very many circumstances came painfully to my recollection and confirmed all that she said. I resolved, however, not to question her, but to allow her to tell me just what she pleased. So I knelt down by her side and whispered into her ear a solemn promise that I would do all that she desired. Poor girl: how I felt for her! When I had given her this pledge, she appeared much relieved and told me freely all that had passed between my husband and herself, and she said she had left my house simply because she could not endure to cause me any sorrow. I told her of my husband's contemplated marriage with Belinda Pratt, and she appeared a good deal troubled at it. "Let me be second," she said, "for then I shall feel that I am nearer to you, and I want you always to think that, when you die, if I have the power, I shall be the first to meet you and take you by the hand."

Thus we talked together for a long time, and it was with painful interest that I listened to what she said. It was a singular interview;—a wife receiving from a young girl the confession that she loved her husband; that he had fully returned her affection, and had even talked with her about marriage: the girl requesting the wife to be married for her to her own husband, and the wife, full of tender love towards the girl, freely giving her a promise that she would do so. In my sorrow at parting from her, and the great affection that I felt towards her, all feelings of jealousy were utterly forgotten. Before I left I said: "Carrie, whether you live or die, you shall be married to my husband, if he ever enters into Polygamy; and I say this although I do not doubt that he will do so, and at the same time I think that you will live."

I really believed that she might recover; for now this burden was off her mind, I thought she would have strength to subdue her sickness, and at first it seemed as if this would really be the case. The next day she appeared so much better that her friends all became hopeful, and when I told her that I had written to my husband and had told him, that since he had made up his mind to go into Polygamy, I wished him to marry her, she appeared so happy and showed her joy in so many innocent ways that I could not be angry.

"How do you think he will feel," she said, "when he gets your letter?—Do I look pretty well to-day? And do you think that if I continue to get better I shall have regained my looks before he comes home."

"Oh," I said, humoring her, "You will look quite pretty by the time he returns, I shall be really jealous of you."

In an instant the thought of how much all mention of her in connection with my husband must be painful to me, occurred to her mind, and she begged me to forgive her for her carelessness. "No," said she, "I will try never to give you pain, and you must always love me."

For some days this improvement in her appearance continued, and I thought, and hoped, that we should soon have her round again. I really wished her to live now, for if it was absolutely necessary that Mr. Stenhouse must practice Polygamy, I would prefer that, rather than any other woman, he should marry her, for I felt that she would understand me as no one else could.

Thus, after all, I really had selected a second wife for my husband!

But the change in poor Carrie's looks was altogether deceptive. News came to me one morning that she was very much worse, and I hastened to see her. As I entered the room, her eyes brightened, and she said: "I'm glad that you have come, Sister Stenhouse, for I feel that I am going soon. Then, after a pause, she added, holding up her hands—"Do you know what that means?" The finger nails were turning blue.

"That means death," she said; "and it is better so." After this we conversed together for some time upon various topics of special interest to her in the position in which she then was, and presently she said, as if asking a question,—
"You will keep your promise, I know."

"Carrie," I answered, "if there is anything that I can say or do that will make you feel more certain that I will keep my promise, if I live to do so, tell me, and I will do it."

"I am afraid," she said, "that, after all, he never loved me. He pitied my lonely situation and was so kind and good to me that I learned to love him, and those meddling sisters tried to get him to marry me, but I would not be false to you. Then we both thought it was best not to tell you, as it would make you grieve, although it never could take place. Even now, had I not known that I was dying, I never would have told you. But you will not love me less when you think of me after I am gone?"

I told her that my affection for her would never change, and I talked with her, and tried to soothe her dying moments, and to make her feel less lonely; and thus the morning passed away. In the afternoon she was silent and apparently unconscious, and before another day dawned she had passed away to her rest.

MARRIAGE FOR THE DEAD—ENTERING INTO POLYGAMY— THE NEW WIFE.

Memories of My Poor Friend Carrie—The Last Untroubled Sleep—Her Hopes and Mine—Alone in the Night—A Mysterious “Presence”—“I Plainly Saw Carrie Leaning Over Me”—The Wedding-Ring—“The ‘Presence’ in the Room Was Gone”—Troubled About the Ring—Beside the Coffin of My Dead Friend—I Place the Ring on Her Finger—My Husband’s Gift for Carrie—“He Considered it was Only a Dream”—Waiting for the Event—The Saddest Day of My Life—My Husband’s Second Marriage—I Give Away the Bride!—Fulfilling My Promise—I Am Married to My Husband or Carrie—Brigham’s Decree: The Claims of the Living and the Dead—Married for Eternity—The Bride and Bridegroom—After the Wedding—Loneliness and Grief—A Night of Darkness and Sorrow.

THE following evening I went round again to the house, to gaze once more at the form of my dear friend. She was lying in her coffin, dressed for the grave, and I looked at her long and tenderly as she rested sleeping there. Her features were peaceful and natural as if in slumber; an expression of calm tranquility hovered around her countenance, and in the repose of death she seemed almost happy. Poor girl! her life had been short indeed, and she had known but little pleasure, but I believed that she was now beyond the reach of earthly sorrow and earthly disappointment, happy in that land where suffering and tears are all unknown. “There shall be no night there,” the Lord of that other life had said. Sorrow and sighing shall flee away from that bright and glorious land; and the grief and pain which on earth are the portion of so many tried and weary hearts, shall find no entrance into that eternal rest which our Father in heaven has prepared for us beyond the floods of death.

Oh, better far, I thought, it is that thus she should pass away. True, she has seen but little of life, and has not tasted many of its joys ; but, as a compensation, how much has she been spared. She was so gentle and so sensitive, so unfit to battle with the stern realities of existence, that I felt she had gained rather than lost in being taken away in the morning of her life. Those anxieties, trials, and cares, which are more or less the portion of every one of us, would never weary her now ; and, especially, she was for ever beyond the reach of those painful thoughts and feelings which are the lot of the Mormon women alone. Certainly, she thought, as also did I, that in that other, future life, after the resurrection, we should live together a life much like that which we lived on earth, only more glorious and happy. We could not marry or be given in marriage in the world to come ; but those who had been united on earth for eternity, whether personally or by proxy, would, in heaven, lead a married life together and fulfil all the duties and obligations of that position. Carrie believed firmly, that if I were sealed to my husband for her, she would be his second wife in heaven ; and the reason why I had promised to be married for her before my husband was united to other wives was, that by so doing, she would rank before all the rest. I, as first wife, would be queen in my husband's kingdom, if I continued faithful and very obedient : Carrie, as second wife, would rank next to me ; and the others who might afterwards be added would be placed according to the date of their marriage. We none of us doubted that all this was true ; and the thought that by her marriage with my husband she would be sure of " exaltation " in the celestial kingdom had comforted the last hours of my poor friend.

I was musing sadly over these things as I returned home that evening, resolved that nothing on my part should be left undone which might ensure her future happiness, and I presume that in my mind her death, and the promise which I had made, were the all-absorbing thoughts. Certain it is that a little incident occurred to me, which produced a vivid impression upon my mind, then and for a long time after. I believed that I was visited by my departed friend.

Now, I was not naturally superstitious, and I would not, on any account, have the reader think that I was a believer in the very extraordinary claims of modern Spiritualism. At the time of which I speak, I knew absolutely nothing of the "manifestations" and "communications" received at séances—I had, in fact, been so isolated, and was so ignorant of the doings of the world in general, that I had never even heard of such things. I certainly did not believe that apparitions of the dead returned to trouble us with communications of any kind; but, nevertheless, I was that night convinced that Carrie's spirit stood beside me, and spoke to me, just as in life she might herself have done. Even now, after the lapse of several years, I hardly know what to think of the matter, for it made such a powerful impression on my mind. Probably it was all a dream—a vivid and life-like dream, but nothing more. The reader will remember that at the time I was in a very delicate condition of health, my mind was quite unsettled with trouble and anxiety, and for some time past my thoughts had been constantly fixed upon poor Carrie and her sad fate. These circumstances combined might perhaps have shaped my ideas and raised up before me that strange vision. To me, however, at the time, it had all the force of reality; and while I leave it to the reader's common-sense to determine what really were the facts of the case, I think I should not be justified in altogether omitting an incident so singular, which, at such a critical period of my life, so strongly affected me.

I was sitting alone in my room, and reading, when suddenly I felt as if some one had opened the door and entered, and I looked round to see who it was. I felt a "Presence," if I may so speak, but I saw no one. So, thinking that I was nervous, and resolved to control my feelings, I took up my book again and tried to interest myself in it. A few minutes elapsed, and then I was startled again, for I felt sure that some one was leaning over me, and I seemed almost to hear them breathe.

Quite certain now that the events of the preceding day had unsettled my mind, I laid aside my book and prepared to retire for the night. But still I could not get rid of that feeling which we all experience when some one is near us whom we cannot see but of whose presence we are instinctively aware. After disrobing, I lay down and began to read until I was sleepy; I then turned down the light, without entirely extinguishing it, when, immediately after, the "Presence" seemed to stand beside my bed, and I lost all power over myself. I was not, I believed, asleep, but at the same time I did not seem to be perfectly awake. But the "Presence" was now no longer invisible—I plainly saw Carrie leaning over me.

"Is that you, Carrie?" I said.

"Yes," she answered, or seemed to answer, "I want something from you." Then pointing to a gold ring upon my finger—not my wedding ring, though it was a wedding ring—she said: "I want you to give me that ring."

"You shall have it," I answered; and she then bent over me and kissed my cheek. I distinctly felt the coldness of her lips as she touched me; and in another instant she was gone.

I was wide awake, but trembling, and covered with a cold perspiration, for I felt certain that Carrie's spirit had been with me, and now that she had spoken to me I felt that the "Presence" in the room was gone. I could sleep no more, although all fear had left me, and I lay awake for hours thinking over the matter and trying to explain it away.

In the morning, I persuaded myself that it was all a dream or the effects of a disturbed imagination; but as I had promised—whether dreaming or awake it mattered little—to give her the ring, I resolved to keep my word and put it on her finger secretly as she lay in her coffin. With that intention I went to the house, some time before the funeral was appointed to take place, but, as there was constantly some one in the room, I felt ashamed to carry out my purpose, lest they should think me silly to do such a thing.

As the time approached when they should carry her to the grave, I became so troubled about the ring that I could not rest, so I went into another room where one of Brigham Young's wives, and a plural wife of Carrie's father, were talking together; and I told them of my dream; for so I called the vision of my dead friend, although it seemed to me reality.

They urged me to lose no time but to go instantly and put the ring on the finger of the corpse. "If you do not," they said, "You will never feel happy; she will never rest, but will be sure to come back to reproach you." So I went and did as they said. Without any one noticing me, I stood beside the casket, and raised the beautiful hand which looked so pure and wax-like, but oh, so cold!—and I placed the ring on the wedding finger, and then covered it with the other hand. Then again, beside the dead body of my friend, I vowed to be faithful to the promise that I had made to her; and after that I felt at peace.

Not long subsequently to this, my husband returned home. The following morning he took from his pocket a very beautiful ring which he presented to me, asking me to wear it for his sake. Directly after, he held up another—a plain gold ring—and asked me if I knew who that was for. I thought that I knew, for, as he was soon to be married to Miss Pratt, I supposed it was for her. My pride, however, would not allow me to say so. I therefore simply replied that I did not know, feeling, at the same time, very much inclined to add, "You had better give this one with it, whoever it is for;" for I thought it unkind of him to show Belinda's ring to me.

I was silent, however, and he then said: "This one I bought for Carrie when I received your letter."

"Then I shall have to wear it now," I said; and then I told him all that I have just related, but I think he considered it was only a dream or the fancy of a troubled imagination.

I now expected very soon to be called upon to undergo the most painful ordeal that any wife can be required to pass through: I was to give my husband another wife—such is the sacrifice demanded of every Mormon woman.

The thought of doing this was worse than death to me. I felt injured, humiliated and degraded by it, and yet I still tried to believe that it was the will of God, and must therefore be right. To me, this outrage upon all the purest feelings of womanhood seemed more like the will of men—men of the basest and most unholy passions. It was repulsive to me in whatever form it was presented, but still I reproached my own rebellious heart for feeling so, for I had been told that the ways of the Lord were past finding out, and however unlike Him this Revelation might appear, we Mormon women had been taught that it was our duty to bend our wills and to suffer in unquestioning and uncomplaining silence.

As the time approached, I felt like a condemned criminal awaiting the day of execution. A sense of apprehension, a dread of coming evil, was ever present to my mind, and everything appeared to me through the medium of my griefs. To a certain extent, my husband also suffered, for it would be impossible, I think, for any man to see his wife suffering so intensely without feeling for her, and I sometimes believed that his sympathy for me was so great, that, if he had dared, he would even then have refused to obey the counsel of the Priesthood.

Then, too, he had a little trouble of his own, for he began to realise that this innovation upon the sanctity of our home would make a great change in his future—his freedom would be gone.

However gratifying it may be to a man's feelings to know that there is no limit to his privileges, and that he is always at liberty—no matter how many wives he may already possess—to fall in love with every pretty girl he meets, and marry her if she consents ; yet every intelligent man must be conscious that it can be no easy matter to keep peace between many wives in one house, and that, if he wishes to act rightly by all, he must train himself to be scrupulously just, never showing any partiality in look or deed, or even by a word. There are many such men among the Mormons. They are conscientious and good men, who try to live their religion, but who at the same time desire to act kindly towards their wives. My husband began to realise the great responsibility that he was about to take upon himself, and seeing his thoughtful and troubled look, I tried to hide my own feelings ; for every true wife knows that nothing so powerfully arouses a woman to struggle with her own sorrows as the knowledge that her husband is unhappy.

The dreaded day at length arrived, the day which for so long, and with such painful forebodings, I had anticipated. I had spent a very wakeful and unhappy night, and felt very sick and nervous, for I was about to become a mother, and my health was anything but strong. I hardly felt as if I should have courage to go through that day. I was, however, compelled to nerve myself to the task, and I began to make my preparations for going to the Endowment House. The only thing that gave me strength was the thought that my husband had consented that I should go through the ceremony of being married to him that day for Carrie ; for even then I supposed that those who would be married in heaven must first be married on earth, and that, too, by those who had received authority from on high.

Ever since I had first embraced Mormonism I had been entirely cut off from Gentile society, although living in the Gentile world. Abroad, and also when in New York, the cares of a family kept me very much at home, and the continual state of apprehension in which I was, rendered me averse to visiting among friends. Thus it was that I never conversed freely with any one who could have informed me truthfully of the origin of Mormonism, and consequently I brooded over my religion as a melancholy fact ; but, though with moments of weakness and wavering, I never thoroughly doubted its divine origin. The terrible sacrifice which was about to be required of me, might, I thought, be painful to make, but it was no less the will of God. I must submit, whatever the effort might cost me.

The morning was bright and lovely—a morning calculated to inspire happy hopes and pleasant feelings; but to me it brought nothing but fear and trembling. Even the innocent prattle of my children annoyed me, and they not knowing how deeply I was suffering looked at me with wonder in their eyes. Oh, I thought, surely my husband will at length comprehend the greatness of the love I bear him; surely he will now appreciate the sacrifice I make for his sake and for my religion. Even now, if I did not know that he believes this doctrine to be true, and he would feel condemned if, through any opposition of mine, he were not allowed to practice, I would at the last moment dash this bitter cup from my lips and take my chance of the consequences in a future state!

Utterly cast down and broken-hearted, I felt almost as if the Lord himself had forsaken me, and there was no one to whom I could look for aid. I could not go to my husband in that hour for sympathy; for I well knew that his thoughts must be with his intended bride, and that my sorrows would only trouble him at a time when he must desire to be at peace. Besides which, I was too proud to plead for love at a shrine that I felt should rightfully be all my own. And then, too, I knew not but what he might tell her of my feelings; and it would be too great a humiliation for me should she think me jealous of the position which she now occupied, and her influence over my husband.

With such feelings I went to the Endowment House. There at the altar I was to give proof of my obedience and of my faith in my religion, by placing the hand of the new wife in that of my husband. The thought was almost madness. To have followed my husband to the grave would have been a terrible blow to me; but to live to see him the husband of another woman was something that seemed to me beyond en-duration. Notwithstanding every effort of faith, doubts would arise, and in bitterest anguish I thought—this is more like the work of cruel man than of God. Why should man have this power over woman, and she so helpless? Surely a just and impartial God can have nothing to do with this! There was a darkness before my eyes, and struggle as I might, I could see no ray of light. No glimmering of hope.

First, my husband was married to Miss Pratt; and then to me for Carrie. Thus I fulfilled my pledge to my departed friend. Later in the day, I placed the ring which my husband had bought for her upon my finger, instead of the one which I had put on her wedding-finger in the coffin. I shall always wear it in remembrance of her, although among the Mormons at that time wedding-rings were never thought of, and to this day are only used by the more educated and refined who cling to Gentile customs. I had found before going to the Endowment House that I could not have Carrie sealed to my husband next to me, for Belinda had objected, and her mother had appealed to Brigham Young about it. They told me that he had said that the living had claims before the dead, although my own feelings would have led me to think otherwise. Brigham Young performed the ceremony. He sat at the end of the altar and we three knelt down—my husband on one side and Miss Pratt and myself on the other. Speaking to me, Brigham Young asked: "Are you willing to give this woman to your husband to be his lawful wife for time and for all eternity? If you are you will signify it by placing her right hand within the right hand of your husband."

I did so; but what words can describe my feelings! The anguish of a whole lifetime was crowded into that one single moment. The painful meaning of those words, "for all eternity" withered my soul, and the unending contract which my husband had made with another woman was practically a divorce from me. I had now laid everything upon the altar of sacrifice, for I had given away my husband. What more could the Lord require of me that I was not prepared to do?

I was bewildered and almost beside myself, and yet I had to hide my feelings. Hope was for ever banished from my life. To whom could I look for sympathy among those who were around me? They were most of them men who had ruthlessly wrecked the lives and lacerated the hearts of hundreds of women before my turn came, and the sight of an unhappy wife was so common in their experience that it was more likely to awaken their anger than their pity. I felt this instinctively, and I resolved that they should never know how much my poor heart was torn. My husband, it is true, was there. My husband! Was he not now the husband of another woman, and, therefore, no longer belonging to me. I knew that I never could overcome my early teaching sufficiently to feel that this was right, though, such was my wretched fanaticism, that I mentally and verbally assented to it. I felt that now I stood alone—our union was severed. There could never be any copartnership between that other wife and myself—no, never. Salvation or no salvation, it was impossible that I could ever love her. From that day I began to hide all my sorrows from my husband, and it was but very seldom that I uttered a word of discontent, and when I expressed what I felt, it was in anger; but never in sorrow, seeking sympathy.

I remember when we returned home—that home which had now lost its charm, for the young wife was to live there—my husband said to me: “You have been very brave, but it is not so hard to bear, after all, is it?” I had hidden my feelings so well that he really thought that I was indifferent. But during the remainder of the day how I watched their looks and noticed every word! To me their tender tones were daggers, piercing my heart and filling me with a desire to revenge myself upon the father of my children. Oh, what fanatics we Mormon women have been ever to have believed for a single moment that a just and loving Father and God would have given a command that in almost every instance has produced such fearful results upon those who should have been happy wives and mothers, and consequently upon their children. Indeed, even then it made me feel that there was no justice in heaven, if this love which is the best part of woman’s nature—this love that we had always believed was a part of divinity itself—this principle, without which there would be nothing worth living for—if this had been made our greatest curse, and the woman who showed herself most actuated by this gentle influence was to be the greatest victim.

I felt that day that if I could not get away by myself alone, and give expression to my overcharged feelings, I should certainly lose my reason. I was utterly miserable. It was only in the dead of night, in my own chamber, that I gave way to the terrible anguish that was consuming me. God and my own soul can alone bear witness to what I suffered in that time of woe. That night was to me such as even the most God-forsaken might pray never to know ; and morning dawned without my having for a moment closed my eyes.

DOMESTIC ARRANGEMENTS OF THE SAINTS:—POLYGAMY FROM A WOMAN'S STANDPOINT.

I WAS now to realise personally in my own home life what Polygamy actually was. Hitherto I had observed how other women suffered and how other men treated their wives; but now the painful reality had come to my own door, and I was to experience the effects of the system upon myself, and instead of noting the conduct of other men I should be able to observe the change which Polygamy might work in my own husband.

How little do the Mormon men know what it is in the truest sense to have a wife, though they have so many "wives" after their own fashion. Almost imperceptibly to the husband, and even to the wife herself, a barrier rises between them from the very day that he marries another woman. It matters not how much she believes in the doctrine of plural marriage, or how willing she may be to submit to it; the fact remains the same. The estrangement begins by her trying to hide from him all her secret sorrows; for she feels that what has been done cannot be undone now, and she says, "I cannot change it; neither would I if I could, because it is the will of God, and I must bear it; besides, what good will it do to worry my husband with all my feelings? He cannot help me; and is he not another woman's husband?" Then comes, perhaps, the painful thought, "I have no longer any desire to confide in him." Or it may be that she detects some familiarity between her husband and the other wife; and she feels bitterly towards both, for strive as she may, human nature cannot be altogether crushed out.

Before long the wife begins to feel her husband's presence itself become irksome to her—even his touch makes her shudder. She strives to hide all this; but, oh, with what anguish of soul! She may keep up an appearance of tranquility, and when spoken to about plural marriage may lead people to believe that she is happy, and even her own husband may think that she has become "used to it;" but women never "get used to it" until they have in a great measure, or perhaps entirely, lost their love for their husbands.

This was a mistake that my own husband made in respect to me. He realised, I know—as much as the generality of men ever can realise of a woman's feelings—that I was suffering intensely, and he tried in every way to make my burden lighter. But, like his brethren, he thought that, because he was getting used to it, I was also. I can truly say I never did get used to it, and never could.

That was a time of great misery to me, much as I tried to control my feelings. Day by day I strove to hide from my heart even the knowledge of my own unhappiness, and when I could no longer endure, I would lock myself in my room and give vent to the anguish that was consuming me. I realised, however, that this continual conflict of feeling was unfitting me for my duties. Everything was becoming a trial to me. I could not bear to be spoken to; the prattle of my children that had always been so dear to me, was now discordant to my feelings; and all their little questionings were irksome. I determined that this should no longer be the case; I would battle with my own heart; I would henceforth devote my whole life—worthless as that life appeared to have become—to the welfare of my little ones. This was a conclusion that hundreds of wretched Mormon wives have arrived at, and when this is the case there is some hope for them. But many give way to despair, and go down broken-hearted to their graves.

How much of true affection do the Mormon husbands lose! A man may have a dozen wives; but from them all combined he will not receive as much real love and devotion as he would from one alone, if he made her feel that she had his undivided affection and confidence. How terribly these men deceive themselves! When peace, or rather quiet, reigns in their homes, they think that the Spirit of God is there. But it is not so. It is a calm not like the gentle silence of sleep, but as the painful stillness of death—the death of the heart's best affection and all that is worth calling love. All true love has fled, and indifference has taken its place. The very children feel it. What do they, what can they, care about their father, whom they so seldom see? Of course, as in everything else, there are exceptions to the rule; but I am speaking now of Polygamists in general.

Some wives, afraid of creating a prejudice against themselves and of being forsaken altogether, deceive their husbands, and make them believe that they are satisfied. It must be admitted that, in acting thus, these wives are not always actuated by a fear of losing the society or love of their husbands, for, in Polygamy, love dies a natural death; but it is galling to a woman's pride to have it said that she has been cast off for another. Then, too—and some women would consider this the most important reason of all—the best provision is usually made for the home where the husband stops most frequently; and the wife, if not for her own sake, at least for her children's, will be anxious to have a well-provided house. This is only natural. The "divine" plan has always been worked out in a very human way.

When a man has several wives, there is, of course, no necessity for him to stay with an unhappy or mopish one, as he can always find a more pleasant reception elsewhere. Men who can really believe that women are satisfied and happy under such a system must be entirely ignorant of human nature. And yet I have known many gentlemen from Utah who, when asked how the Mormon women submitted to Polygamy, have answered: "Oh, very well. They are perfectly happy, for they look upon it as a religious duty, and are satisfied and contented with it."

How false is all this! What an incorrect idea does it give of the wives of Utah! Some of these very men, to my certain knowledge, know better than this, and have had a very different experience in their own families. I have in my mind a prominent man from Salt Lake City, who told a reporter of the New York Herald how happily his own wives lived together, while every one at home knows that they could not well be more miserable, for his wives do not wear the mask. I could name many other families in which it is just the same.

There is a class of women in Utah who act as a sort of drill-sergeants to the other women; these form what is called "The Female Relief Society;" they take the lead among the Mormon women, get up memorials to Congress against anti-Polygamic bills, and otherwise spend their time in advancing the interests of the "Celestial Order." To the good brethren these ladies are invaluable helpers when they desire to add to the number of their wives; and going from house to house to gather contributions for the Society, they have ample opportunities for discovering the feelings of those who are rebellious, and giving a great deal of "counsel" which frequently produces very painful results. The members of this Relief Society—even the poorest—are, without exception, expected to contribute to its funds—if it be only a skein of yarn or a spool of thread. They make their visits fortnightly, and gather in contributions with such success that in more than one ward they have been able to build a fine store, have filled it with goods, and have had a surplus in hand, which was duly handed over as a present to Brother Brigham. Brother Brigham is always ready and willing to receive gifts, whether large or small. There was an instance of this which fell under my own observation, and which, though I was still in the Church, annoyed me very greatly. An old lady applied to me for sewing, and, as I was in need of some one, I employed her. She suffered a good deal from asthma, and finally became so bad that it was with the greatest difficulty that she could even walk. She told me frequently that a cup of tea was "such a comfort to her;" but she would not allow herself that luxury, as she was resolved to put by all that it might have cost her for tea, and sugar, and other little luxuries, and make a present of the money to Brother Brigham. I learned subsequently that she did save up as much as $20, which, in the presence of witnesses, she presented to the Prophet—and he actually took it! I was told that in a sermon delivered at Ogden, a short time after, he gave the poor woman great credit for having performed a good deed, and recommended others to go and do likewise!

It is difficult to discover how the poor are benefited by the Relief Society, and yet it was ostensibly for their welfare and assistance that the Society was called into existence. I know of many instances where poor persons have applied for help, which has either been refused them, or else has been offered in such a way that it could not be accepted.

It must not be supposed that all the Mormon women who belong to the Relief Society are as great admirers of Brother Brigham as the ancient dame of whom I have just spoken. Some belong to it because they cannot help themselves. One of these very sisters once told me that when they got up the ladies' petition to Mrs. Grant, praying her to use her influence with the President in favor of Mormon husbands practicing Polygamy, they did not give themselves the trouble to call upon all the ladies who belonged to the Society, but took their names from the books, without even obtaining permission first. Another lady told me that when they came to her house to get the signature of herself and daughters, they asked her if she had any dead daughters, as, if she had, it was just as proper to sign for them as for the living, for they would be certain to believe in Polygamy now they were in heaven, whatever might have been their condition on earth. This is the way in which elections are conducted, and memorials and petitions are got up in Utah.

Moreover, it must not be imagined that those who are most zealous in signing petitions and forcing them upon their sisters, are necessarily the greatest believers in the "Celestial Order." No; in not a few of these women are seen some of the worst effects of the system. One of these very ladies told me that she had "seen enough of old Brigham and Polygamy in this world, she hoped she would never set eyes on him in the next." And yet this lady was very highly spoken of for her zeal in getting up the petition in favor of Polygamy. These are the women who, finding their own happiness wrecked, are not satisfied until they have dragged every other woman they meet with into the same snare. They appear to have no mercy upon their own sex, and when persuasive words fail to soften the "rebellious" wife they will repeat to her that portion of the "Revelation" which says that the wife who refuses consent shall be destroyed; and thus they work upon her fears and her devotion to her religion. It is painful to see women so hopeless themselves that they find a satisfaction in making others equally miserable.

An utter disregard to the feelings or happiness of individuals is one of the distinguishing features of Mormonism. Polygamy hardens the hearts of both men and women towards those whom they should love most tenderly; what wonder then that the less sacred ties of friendship and common humanity should be disregarded? "Do I not furnish you with breadstuffs?" the wealthy Bishop or Apostle has often said to a neglected wife, "what more do you want?" She had perhaps complained of neglect, but his coarse nature could not comprehend that her soul craved its daily food as much as her body—that a true-hearted wife needs the love and companionship of her husband; and that she ought to feel that he is living for her and for her children, just as faithfully as she is living for him.

Any idea of mutual obligation between husbands and wives has, I believe, never entered the mind of Brigham Young and the leaders who most nearly imitate him. He himself has forsaken wife after wife, giving them no love, no companionship; nay, scarcely even a thought. They have gone out of his life as completely as if they had never possessed the slightest interest in his eyes. He has, however, continued to give them “breadstuffs,” clothing and shelter, which he could so well afford; but it was for appearance sake, and certainly not for love.

When a man has more than one wife, his affections must of necessity be divided; he really has no home in the truest sense of the word; his houses are simply boarding-places. Should he have all his wives in one house, as is often the case, they are then all slaves to the system, each one is watching the others—and they know it—trying to discover something that can be secretly told to the husband to draw away his affections from the rest. What more miserable position could be imagined?

There is, however, no fixed principle regulating Mormon men in the management of their families—every one is at liberty to do as he thinks best, and scarcely two families are governed alike. When Salt Lake City was first settled, the people had to live as best they could, and a man was glad to get even one roof under which he and all his wives might be sheltered. Now, when the husband is wealthy he generally provides separate homes for his wives. Some wealthy men, however, still have all their wives and families together.

I have in my mind, as I write, a very prominent Mormon, who has half a dozen wives; and he divides his time among them after this fashion. The first week he stays with the first wife; the next week he is with the second; then he goes back to the first. The fourth week he passes with the third wife; then he returns for another week to the first. And thus he continues to give one week to the first wife, and the next to one of the other five in turn, until he has blessed them all with his presence. Now, it would at a casual glance appear that this first wife has by far the largest share of her husband's society; but if the truth must be told, it must be admitted that the husband is not quite so generous as he appears. The last wife of this good man is a young and pretty girl, and she lives with the first wife, and thus his devotion to the latter is rewarded by the presence of the former. Each of the other wives has one week of his society and attentions in every eleven—about five weeks apiece of companionship with their husband in the course of a whole year. Other men with the same number of wives pass constantly between one house and another; they can never be found when wanted; their lives are one eternal round, and they may be said to have no real abiding place.

In every settlement in Utah, long, low-roofed houses may be seen with a row of doors and windows alternating. Even in Salt Lake City, much as it has changed of late years, such houses may still be found. To every door and window there is, of course, a wife; and the furniture of her room consists of a bed, three chairs, and a table. Then, if the man is a very devout Mormon and wishes to increase his kingdom by adding another wife to the inhabitants of the long many-doored house, a wagon-box is so arranged as to form a sleeping apartment for the new comer; or, what is more likely, one of the old wives is put into the wagon-box, and the new one takes her place.

A house with two wings is rather a favorite style with those men, who, to silence their conscience and the priesthood, conclude to take "just one extra wife," and no more. The wives, with their children, occupy, respectively, each a wing; and the entrance-door opens into a parlor, which serves as a reception-room for both families. The husband in this case spends a week on one side of the house and a week on the other, alternately ; and thus, by an impartial division of his attentions, he preserves peace in his family. A man who is comfortably off can, of course, arrange his domestic affairs so as to avoid, as far as is possible, the inconveniences of the system, but a poor man is forced to submit to circumstances. Many men have entered into Polygamy, with two, three, and even four wives, all, with their children, living together under one roof—in one room—in the most disgraceful and barbarous manner ; but even for this the leaders were really more to blame than the poor deluded men themselves ; for the command to "Build up the Kingdom!—build up the Kingdom!"—in other words, take many wives and raise up large families—has been so constantly and imperatively insisted upon that good sense and propriety have at last been entirely overlooked.

In a very large house, with many wives, there is greater safety and peace for the husband than in a small house with only two wives. When there are only two apartments, the husband, if not in one is supposed to be in the other, and the neglected wife frequently expresses her opinion of her rival in the opposite room in very powerful language. Scenes may be witnessed in such households which are too shocking to disclose. Brigham Young was conscious of this when he said he "would stand no more fighting and scratching around him"; and yet, in the face of all this, he dares to tell the people that this is the "Order of Celestial Marriage." With many wives living together in a large house there are many advantages. The whereabouts of the husband is not so easily discovered, and the unhappy or jealous wife is at a loss to know upon whom to vent her ire. On this account even men with small means prefer to have three wives instead of two, as each wife, not knowing which of the other two she ought to hate the most, divides her jealousy. It takes, however, a wise man to know how to live in Polygamy, so as to balance all the conflicting interests and obtain a little peace, if happiness is out of the question.

Where the husband is a rich man and has abundant wealth wherewith to supply the wants of his numerous wives and children, and to furnish all the necessary accommodation that a growing family demands, much of the jealousy and ill-feeling inseparable from Polygamy can, to a certain extent, be avoided. But when poor men, as I myself have witnessed, live with several wives and a whole army of children, huddled together in a miserable room or two, it is painful and inconvenient in the extreme. And yet such is frequently the case. I know one man, otherwise very respectable, who lives with three wives and eleven children in two wretched rooms no better than a stable, and they think that in this they are pleasing God.

Some men have entered into Polygamy so poor and unprovided for that their dwelling consisted of just one sitting room and one sleeping apartment, for the two wives together with the husband ; and it is quite a common thing to see two or even three wives living together in one very small house. A family was pointed out to me, which consisted of two wives, one son about sixteen years of age, a daughter of fifteen, and numerous other younger children ; and all lived together in two small rooms and a shed.

It would be quite impossible, with any regard to propriety, to relate all the horrible results of this disgraceful system. It has debased the minds, and degraded the lives, of good and honest men and women, while those who naturally had a tendency towards evil have become a hundred times worse. Marriages have been contracted between the nearest relatives ; and old men tottering on the brink of the grave have been united to little girls scarcely in their teens ; while unnatural alliances of every description, which in any other community would be regarded with disgust and abhorrence, are here entered into in the name of God, and under the sanction of a " Revelation " supposed to proceed from the pure and holy Saviour.

I was much shocked and disgusted when first I went to Utah, to find a man whom under other circumstances I had known in London, living with two sisters whom he had married in the manner I have just described, and, strange as it may appear, it was not with them a matter of necessity. When I knew the husband in Europe, I considered him a man of education and refinement, but I certainly was mistaken, for no man whose nature was at all sensitive would have lived as he did. His wives, too, who had been considered highly respectable English girls, were not ashamed of their degraded position—they professed to believe in bringing the world back to its primitive purity and innocence.

It is quite a common thing in Utah for a man to marry two and even three sisters. I was well acquainted with one man who married his half-sister ; and I know several who have married mother and daughter. I know also another man who married a widow with several children ; and when one of the girls had grown into her teens he insisted on marrying her also, having first by some means won her affections. The mother, however, was much opposed to this marriage, and finally gave up her husband entirely to her daughter ; and to this very day the daughter bears children to her step-father, living as wife in the same house with her mother !

In another instance, a well-known man in Salt Lake City, who has several wives and married daughters, married a young girl of fifteen years of age whom his wife had adopted and brought up as her own.

Men who do such things as these have no excuse in their religion. It is pretended that the Mormon Prophet received a Revelation sanctioning Polygamy, but no one ever supposed that it was therefore necessary for persons so near akin in blood to marry ; when such disgraceful alliances have taken place they have been the result of the brutal passions of men, and cannot be charged directly to their religion. Their religion is to blame for debasing their minds and destroying in them those pure feelings which would have rebelled against these shameful marriages ; but their religion only enjoined them to marry many wives ; it never taught them to select those wives from their own households.

The women, in Polygamy, as might be expected, have all along had to bear the heaviest part of the burden. It is painful to see how some of them will strive to maintain a hold upon their husband's affections. They may, perhaps, feel bitterly their lonely and neglected position, and they may detest the system, but they try, nevertheless, to make their homes as pleasant and attractive as possible. Some do this for one reason, some for another; but in most instances the chief motive is a desire to draw away the husband from the other wives;—not that they particularly wish for his company or his love, but they like to show their power over him. I know some of these Mormon men whose wives "manage" them in this way. They think not a little of themselves, and believe that they are indeed the lords of creation, and can have everything their own way; while, all the time, they are perfect objects of ridicule to every one who knows them, on account of the way they are "managed" by their wives. Such men fancy that they govern absolutely in their households, and with head erect they will boastfully say to their neighbors, "See how I manage my women"—little thinking that it is the women who are "managing" them.

Other good women make their homes pleasant from a sincere desire that their husbands should be happy, and will study the most rigid economy while living alone, so as to save out of their frequently poor allowance sufficient to entertain the husband well when it comes to their turn to receive a visit from him. Many a woman has thus earned the flattering opinion of her husband for economy, and it has very materially strengthened her influence over him. I knew a lady, who by a little management of this sort so pleased her spouse that he placed her at the head of his household, and the other wives had to go to her for everything. This was all the glory she had ever dreamed of or desired.

Women of years and experience act thus; but young and thoughtless wives frequently try an opposite experiment, and when their husbands come to see them they are always poor, always needy—they never have enough of anything. This attempt to excite sympathy is seldom or never so successful as the other plan. The pleasant home and smiling welcome are more attractive to the Mormon husband than the complaints of a dissatisfied wife. Many a good Saint, although, of course, he would scorn to acknowledge it, is well known to make his principal home with the wife who is the best cook, notwithstanding that affection may not run in the same direction ; but when the wife who sets the best table is also the wife best beloved, the husband is a happy man indeed.

Quite a number of the leading Mormons have wives in the various settlements ; and this is very convenient to them if they have to travel much. If the wives are old and experienced, as wives who are sent into the country generally are, they can then look after and manage a farm ; and if they have growing boys, the farm can be worked upon a very economical plan. The younger wives in the city can be supplied from them with all the butter, cheese, vegetables, &c., that they require. It takes considerable shrewdness to manage women in such a way as to turn all their abilities to good account and to make them profitable. American men, I have always found, were most successful in this experiment ; the English, as a general rule, are not smart enough, though I have known instances where smart Englishmen with several wives have so arranged as to live entirely without working themselves. They managed matters to perfection ; getting all the labor that was possible out of those unhappy women, and in return breaking their hearts with unkindness and neglect.

Mormon men say, "Do not the Gentiles do just as bad?"

No ; they do not ! There are bad men everywhere, and, as every one knows, there are among the Gentiles men whose cruelty to their wives could not be surpassed. But those men do not attempt to hide their sins under the mantle of religion ; they do not crucify their wives in the name of God. Bad men among the Gentiles support a woman—whether wife or not—so long as they care anything about her ; and do the Mormon men do anything more ? Hundreds of discarded wives in Utah could bear me witness that when they grew old, or their husbands grew tired of them, they cast them off quite as ruthlessly and with as little compunction as any unprincipled Gentile man ever discarded a mistress who no longer had any place in his affections. In one respect certainly the Mormon men bear off the palm for cruelty; for they add insult to injury. The sins of wicked Gentiles are hidden from their wives; but the Mormon men flaunt their sins in their wives' faces, and in the faces of their grown-up sons and daughters, and style their iniquity "The Celestial Order of Heaven!"

Let me ask the good brethren who read this, to act for once impartially, and try to put themselves in a woman's place; and let me for their benefit draw a little picture for them to contemplate.

It is evening, and the family are all assembled in their pleasant home—a home made happy by the kind and thoughtful care of a loving father. Peace and tranquility dwell in every heart, and the father is happy in being surrounded by his children, to whom he is fondly attached. He listens to the prattle of the little ones, or the music and songs of the elder children; and for a time he is forgetful of everything save the happiness of the hour.

Suddenly his wife—the mother of his children—whom he dearly loves, rises from her seat beside the fire and retires to her own apartment. There she arranges her toilet with irreproachable care, sees that every straying curl is in its place, and gives every touch to her appearance which she thinks is likely to render her attractive in the eyes of a man. She now descends the stairs, ready to leave the home of this, her first husband, for she is going to see her second husband, or some young man to whom she has taken a fancy, and who she thinks would be suitable for a third. She kisses her children good-bye, and is about to take an affectionate farewell of their father when she suddenly discovers that he is not looking happy. "What is the matter now?" she says; "Is not your home a pleasant one; have I not taken pains to train your children in a proper manner; and have I not remained an hour longer than usual with you?" What folly it is for you to be moping in this way: this is not the way to live our religion, if we expect to get the blessing of God. You know very well it is very painful for me to leave you and my children; but we must be obedient to the commands of God, and I owe attentions to my other husband as well as to you!"

Can any man be supposed who would for a moment endure such an outrage upon decency and common-sense—such a violation of all that is sacred in the human heart? And yet this is only reversing the case; and just as any Mormon man can suppose he would feel, if the wife he loved were to act in the way I have described, so do Mormon wives feel—only as much more acutely, as women are more sensitive in their affections than men. I remember painfully the bitterness of soul which I experienced when there was only one wife besides myself; and thousands of women in Utah could bear witness, if they would, to the hopeless misery which the system causes, and the desolate void which it creates in the heart of every thoughtful and affectionate wife.

MY life was now one continued series of deceptions, as was also that of my husband, and we began habitually to wear the mask when in each other's presence. It cannot be otherwise in Polygamy. To avoid wounding the feelings of the first wife, the husband, if he cares for her, affects an indifference for the second wife which he does not really feel; and the first wife is not deceived by it, for she knows he is only acting a part, and that as soon as her eyes are off him he will be transformed into the most ardent lover.

If affectionate before and demonstrative in his love towards his wife and children, he has to suppress it all now, lest he should arouse jealousy in the heart of the other wife and be thought partial. He can never now manifest a husband's or a father's love; hence his own nature becomes cramped, and the affections of his heart are dwarfed. His children grow up ignorant of what he really is, and, although he is living in the same house with them, it might truthfully be said that they do not know what it is to have a father. Consequently, their love for him is very limited; they know nothing of those spontaneous effusions of tenderness which link the heart of the child to its parent; and themselves, in their own experience, ignorant of that domestic happiness which in childhood is the charm of home, and, in fact, never knowing what a home should be, when they, in their turn, marry and have children of their own, they set up another of those cold and soulless homes with which Polygamy is cursed.

But let me lift the curtain and give an illustration from the family of Brigham Young himself. In that family I have seen the practical working of the plural-wife system exemplified under its most favorable aspect. I have conversed with Brigham's wives as a sister in the same faith, and I know how they feel; but I am compelled to confess that, notwithstanding all the order and system which characterise the Prophet's household, and the fact that his wives are, on account of his great wealth, free from the troubles and inconveniences entailed by Polygamy in poverty, and although they are, taken collectively, as amiable and good women as any in Utah—their lives are unhappy and they themselves are miserable. They have never known the meaning of domestic happiness, and though to the casual observer they may appear contented with their lot, secretly they mourn over the constant struggle in their hearts between the system and their own womanly nature. Even the most favored of them lead cold, mechanical lives; joy and affection they have never known. Many of them have been cast off for years, and all are neglected except the favorite of the hour.

The Mormon leaders teach that a woman's exaltation in heaven depends upon the number of her children, and yet Brigham has wives who might be mothers of large families, but whom he has neglected for years. They are called the wives of Brigham Young, and they live under the same roof with him ; but they have no real husband, and their children no father in the dear sense of that word as ordinary Christians understand it. They know nothing of the sweet familiarity, the loving interchange of thought and feeling which belongs to true married life. Once a day they are honored by the presence of their lord and master at their table ; and this privilege is, of course, only enjoyed by those who live in the same house with him,—those who live in other houses very seldom see him more frequently than once in two or three months. They bask in the sunshine of his presence for about half an hour in the evening when the family assembles in the Lion House for prayer. But in the theatre, the Tabernacle, and the ball-room, the majority of them only see and worship him at a distance. They are but pensioners upon his bounty ; all their individuality is destroyed, and they are completely lost in him. They have no position in society—he is the only person ever seen or talked of. People in Salt Lake City neither know nor care any more about Mrs. Young the first or the nineteenth than they do about the wives of any other Saint. In their home life they have to bear all the bitterness and heartburnings which, patient, pious women as they are, the silly and licentious favoritism of their “husband” for the last new wife, whoever she may be, always produces. I think that no man in Utah so recklessly wounds the feelings of his wives in this respect, or acts as if he thought it was a woman’s duty to crush every feeling and bring herself to submit without a question to her husband’s will, as does Brigham Young. And yet his wives, whose withered and blighted existence is a reproach to humanity, are very good specimens of what the Celestial Order of Matrimony can produce. What, under less favorable conditions, Polygamy is, I leave the reader to imagine.

Let us look at the family life in some of the country settlements where the husband—without any order or system in his nature, and without the means or even the idea of providing for the comfort of his family—is seeking in his coarse way to imitate Brother Brigham and to work out his own idea of Celestial Marriage. There we shall find the same repression of all womanly feeling, the absence of any sanctifying or refining influence, while at the same time the hard lot of the wives is unrelieved by even the solitary recreations and the personal comforts of Brigham Young's wives. This is the condition of many a poor, weary wife in Utah.

These are the women who Brigham Young has said should be "damned" if they murmured or rebelled. What hope is there for them or for their children? Between the two extremes—Polygamy as it exists in the Prophet's household, and as it is in the homes of poor Mormons in the Settlements—the celestial order of marriage can be found under all conceivable circumstances of poverty and wealth, ignorance and culture. It had been told us frequently and emphatically that the "privilege" of Polygamy was reserved for those who had demonstrated their purity by a life of goodness; and the idea that it was denied to the wicked and licentious was very reassuring to the minds of many. But we soon discovered that if only a man was obedient to the Priesthood, his moral character had little or nothing to do with his obtaining more wives. Assassins and inebriates like Porter Rockwell, and even murderers like Bill Hickman and John D. Lee, and other wretches, had as many wives, and even more, than some of the best men in the community. It is, I believe, true that John D. Lee had several wives sealed to him after it was known that he had taken such an atrocious part in the Mountain Meadows' Massacre.

It is a fact that Polygamy among the Mormons has been entered into by people of every kind, under all circumstances, and from every conceivable motive—from the basest to the purest. But its effect has invariably been to develop the weaker side of human nature. At the same time, like other institutions which for religious purposes have suppressed true manly and womanly instincts, it has in exceptional cases produced much that was noble and generous. Many faithful first wives, seeing in the practice of the celestial order the prospective glory of their husbands, have borne the heavy burden of life patiently and uncomplainingly, and even, while daily suffering that which was worse than death, have sought to be kind and loving to those very women, who under a false belief have invaded the sanctuary of their rights and stolen from them that which they held most dear. While I know of very many polygamic wives who have sacrificed themselves continually, receiving the most meagre show of love and attention, hoping and striving to harmonise matters ; on the other hand I could tell of many first wives who have urged their husbands into Polygamy, merely that the plural wives might become the household drudges while they themselves took their ease and pleasure. Then, again, there are polygamic wives who have taken the power into their own hands, grasping every comfort and monopolising every attention, while the first wife pined away unnoticed and crushed with domestic cares. With men, too, there was the same variety. Some have delayed entering into Polygamy for years, and then they have taken every precaution to avoid giving pain to their first wives ; while others, on the contrary, have been perfectly indifferent as to what pain they caused their wives, relentlessly trampling under their feet every sentiment of delicacy and affection.

In my own case, my husband did all he could to spare my feelings as much as possible ; but it was, nevertheless, a hard task for me to subdue my own heart, and I found that all that I had anticipated in imagination was nothing compared with the realisation. Feelings of degradation, disgust, and humiliation filled my heart constantly and without ceasing. From the day of my husband's second marriage, I could never look upon him with pleasure—he was no longer my husband, and I now felt no desire to confide in him. Even the very sight of him filled my rebellious soul with the bitterest feelings, although, at the same time, I knew and felt that he tried in every way to smooth my rugged pathway.

Strange as it may at first appear, had it been otherwise my burden would have been lighter, for, if he had treated me with cruelty and neglect, I should have withdrawn all affection from him and would have cast him out of my heart for ever. It is a painful thing for a wife to think thus of the father of her children.

It may have been wrong, perhaps, but I confess that for my husband's intended bride I felt such a detestation that I could not endure her presence, although I knew that she was not to blame. I believed that I should not have felt it so much if she had been a little older ; but to have a mere child placed on a level with me, and to be compelled to treat her with all the respect due to a wife, was so terribly humiliating to me that at times I thought that I could not endure it another day. She, of course, expected to be treated with all the consideration which is proper to a wife, and to be consulted in everything by my husband, as a wife should be. She was not, however, competent to undertake any household duties or wifely cares, and was herself an additional responsibility to me. Young and inexperienced as she was, she had everything to learn ; but, at the same time, she stood so much upon her dignity that it was anything but a pleasant task to teach her. It, of course, devolved upon me to instruct her in everything, and I found it anything but a congenial task. I soon began to look upon her simply as a boarder, and expected nothing more from her than I should if she had really been such.

She took very kindly to this position, and would spend her days in her own room, reading and otherwise amusing herself, and, of course, was always pleasant and well-dressed to receive her husband. But this did not suit me. In fact I do not know what would have suited me at that time, for I was disposed to be displeased with everything. And yet a visitor to our house would, I have no doubt, have said, How very pleasantly those two wives get along together. This has been said of scores of women in Utah by casual observers—Gentiles who thought they “understood” the system. How little do they know the aching void and the bitter hatred which exists in the hearts of those wives—the detestation which they have of one another. How little can they know, when everything is so carefully hidden, even from their husbands. It is a shameful thing that women—faithful wives and mothers—should be placed in such a position.

How many times during the day have I been compelled to leave everything and rush to my chamber, and there on my bended knees supplicate for strength to endure, thinking all the time that, in ordaining this Revelation, God had given us a burden greater than we could bear.

Then, in the evening, when we were assembled together in our cosy parlor, as we were wont to be, all traces that remained of the terrible struggle which I had endured were a sad countenance and perhaps the deepening lines upon my brow, which contrasted unpleasantly with the bright and cheerful face of the young wife, and made my husband feel that I was getting very sour in my disposition, as, indeed, was probably the case.

I was totally ashamed of these thoughts, at times, and felt that it was very wrong of me to feel so unkindly towards this young girl, whose only offence against me was that she had acted up to the religious teachings that had been instilled into her mind from infancy. I reminded myself that, for aught I knew, my own dear child might be placed in a similar position; and then how should I feel? How prophetic this fear proved eventually, the reader will presently see.

Such thoughts as these would soften my heart towards the young wife, and although she probably never dreamed that I had felt unkindly towards her, yet, to silence my conscience, I would strive in every possible way to show her some kind attention. I could but feel and know that she was a good but inexperienced girl; and I am bound to say that both she and my husband tried to conduct themselves in such a way as to give me as little offence as possible. Situated as I was, however, nothing escaped my observation, and I felt most keenly. Had I been treated with the cruelty and neglect which has fallen to the lot of so many unfortunate women in Utah, I should probably have been in my grave to-day, or in that Asylum, which has been provided by the Church—situated on a lonely hill at a sufficient distance from the city, so that the cries of the unhappy, ill-treated, insane women should not be heard.

Things and actions, which at another time I should have considered too trifling to notice, had now a painful significance to me. On one occasion, not long after the wedding, my husband asked me to take a walk with him, and I consented. Among the Mormons it is a custom to take their wives out together very frequently. Their object, I presume, is to display the "jewels" in their crowns before the eyes of their less fortunate brethren. I had resolved that I would never submit to this—if my husband would not take me out alone I would stay at home. On the occasion I mention, when I came out of my room ready dressed, I found him and his wife, Belinda, waiting and chatting pleasantly together and looking unutterable love at each other. At least, so I thought, and I felt greatly insulted and annoyed, and told them I did not wish to go. I carefully avoided showing any outbursts of temper before the young lady which I thought would be undignified, for I desired at least that she should respect me, though I did not want her love. If I had expected that they would urge me to accompany them, I should have been greatly mistaken, for my refusal appeared to be just what they wanted. They tripped off together as light-hearted and happy as children, while I remained rooted to the spot, tearing my pocket handkerchief to pieces, and wishing I could do the same with them.

I used sometimes to wonder whether it would be the same in the Mormon heaven, where this Celestial Order of Marriage is expected to be carried out in all its fullness, and I felt troubled for myself. These dreadful feelings would, I believed, be the ruin of my soul, and I thought it was impossible for me to obtain salvation until I had entirely subdued them, and that I had not power yet to do. I had, however, so concealed what I felt that my husband believed that I was becoming used to this new life, which I am happy to say I never did. Sometimes I felt that it was useless for me to fight against the will of Heaven, if this indeed was a divine law, and as yet I dared not take upon myself to say it was not, although in my secret heart I had at last begun sometimes to question in earnest. My poor, benighted soul was looking anxiously at that time for a ray of light to guide my faltering footsteps. I did not wholly believe, but I dared not rebel, for fear of drawing down the wrath of an offended God upon my innocent children and upon my husband, who I was firmly convinced was actuated by a sincere desire to do the will of Heaven.

There were, however, sometimes, little things which did not quite harmonise in my mind. I remember once saying to my husband, when he was telling me that nothing but a firm belief in the divinity of the Revelation would induce him to take another wife and that he would do so from principle alone, that I thought, if that were the case, an older and more plain-looking woman would do quite as well, and that he could dispense with so much courting. "You are compelled to wear dresses," he replied, "but you do not allow those dresses to occupy all your thoughts. Nevertheless, you take some pleasure in selecting them, and you desire that they should be pretty and look well. So it is with men seeking wives."

This mode of putting the case was, I have no doubt, very convincing to my husband's mind, and, at the moment, I could not answer him. But calmer thought would have told me that while wearing and choosing dresses was by every right-minded person considered perfectly legitimate, taking other wives was by no means regarded in that light. The wrong was not so much in the way the thing was done as in doing it at all and under any circumstances. Logically speaking, the argument was good enough, but the premises were utterly unsound.

Day after day my rebellious soul was agitated by the same troubled feelings. There was no rest for me—nothing upon which I could stay my mind. My husband was painfully aware that there was a coldness and restraint existing between his young wife and myself, and I know that he was grieved by it, for he had tried in every way to create a friendly feeling between us. I felt, however, that it was utterly impossible that I could ever be affectionate towards his other wife, much as I might strive. I would do my duty, but I could not love her, or, in fact, him either for that matter, when he was associated with her. I regret to be obliged to confess such a truth, but from that time, and as long as I remained in Mormonism, the sentiment that was uppermost in my mind was an utter detestation of the whole system. I despised myself for being the abject slave that I was. Why could I not have the moral courage to set everything at defiance—Revelation and all—and free myself from the bondage that enthralled me?

I know this day scores of women in Utah who think and feel exactly as I did then, who suffer wrongs against which their hearts daily and hourly rebel, but who, like me, dread to cast aside the yoke of the oppressor.

At that time, in respect to pecuniary matters we were very comfortably off. Almost immediately after our arrival in Utah, Mr. Stenhouse had found employment on the staff of the Deseret News. Before long, he obtained the appointment of Postmaster for Salt Lake City, and before his marriage with Miss Pratt, he had started the Telegraph—the first daily paper that was ever published in Utah. From the beginning it had been remarkably successful, for Brigham had counselled the people to sustain it, knowing very well that he himself would in return be supported by my husband. Brigham had no more devoted follower than Mr. Stenhouse was then, for the scales had not yet fallen from his eyes, and he believed the Prophet was really what he claimed to be—a faithful servant of God. True, we had frequently talked together of his very mean actions; but my too generous, or perhaps too credulous, husband had attributed all that to the weakness of his human nature, and would not believe that it affected his priesthood. He therefore sustained him strongly and consistently before the public; not for gain, for he had given too many instances of his devotion to be suspected of that; but I may say from pure attachment, for I know too well that at that time he was almost ready to lay down his life for the sake of his religion.

The Telegraph soon became the leading journal in Utah, and in a little while we were surrounded by every comfort and luxury which at that time could be procured in Salt Lake City. No family in the Territory was better provided for than was ours, not excepting Brigham Young's. I had always believed that if my husband were left alone, untrammelled by the Church, to make his own way, he would do so successfully. In this I was not mistaken. We now owned a fine dwelling-house, a valuable city lot and house, where the paper was printed, and also another very desirable lot, near to Brigham Young's residence. This last lot was my own; it was very beautifully situated, and we expended on it upwards of three thousand dollars. Everything that my husband undertook at that time seemed to prosper—not excepting his love affairs.

Just then a great deal was whispered privately about certain murders which had been committed, all knowledge of which was strenuously denied by the authorities. When any case was so notorious that it could not possibly be altogether hushed up, we were told that the murdered persons were dangerous people and had been killed in self-defence by those whom they in the first instance had attacked.

My husband, like hundreds of others, was never in the confidence of the Church authorities in these matters. He believed firmly in the divine mission of Joseph Smith, and shut his eyes to the actions of Brigham Young, thinking that he alone would be responsible to the Lord for his misdeeds. When I drew his attention to the inconsistency of Brigham's conduct, as on more than one occasion I did, he said we had enough to do to look at home and see that we ourselves did what was right. This, of course, was true, but I thought, nevertheless, that a little more consistency on Brigham's part would not be amiss.

I recollect a gentleman named Cook, for whose memory I entertain the most sincere respect, wishing my husband to take a contract to furnish grain for the Overland Mail Company, and how he urged him to do so for the benefit of his family. Not long before that, however, Brigham had denounced in the Tabernacle all those who took contracts or who had any dealings with the Gentiles in any way whatsoever. One merchant in particular he singled out, and before the whole congregation, showered upon him all his wrath—going so far as to call him a thief, and saying that he “would apostatise and go to hell.” Yet Brigham to-day is associated in business with that same man !

Another gentleman, a Mr. Street, who constructed the first telegraph line from California to Salt Lake City, acted a very friendly part towards my husband, and wished to advance his interests. He one day came to me and said, “Mrs. Stenhouse, let me beg of you to use all your influence with your husband, and, if necessary, even insist upon his taking this contract which I have offered him. He is doing wrong to his family by refusing, for he would make twenty thousand dollars, with very little trouble. I have urged him until I am tired, and unless you insist he will refuse from fear of doing wrong, after all that Brigham Young has said upon that subject ; though I told him that Brigham would take it himself and jump at it, if I were to offer it to him.”

I had urged my husband before, and I felt certain that he would not listen to my counsel. The contract was offered to Brigham Young, and he did jump at it, and made his thousands out of it. Even at that time I could not see why it would be a sin for my husband to make the money, any more than for Brigham to do so. But this inconsistency was observable in everything. Many of the farmers' wives have frequently told me that their husbands had been called to account severely for taking their provisions to Camp Douglas to sell to the Gentiles, while at the same time they had seen many of Brigham's own teams there with produce

I felt it my duty to keep such things always before my husband's eyes ; but he was what is vulgarly called a “hard-shell” Mormon and it took a great many raps to crack the shell and let in a little light. He, of course, would deny this ; but wives, I think, are not generally mistaken in such matters. I never neglected any opportunity, and when once I perceived the slightest signs of weakness, I went to work with a will, until I got him to admit frankly that he was dissatisfied with many things. But for all that, he still held to the belief that Mormonism was true, whatever Brigham might be. To get him to admit that Brigham was not right was a great deal, and it gave me hope for the future. I tried hard to enlighten his understanding, but made very little progress. The difficulty, I believe, was that Mormonism possesses charms for the men that it never has for the women. I firmly believe that they willingly close their eyes to that which it does not suit them to see. However that may be, notwithstanding all my efforts, my husband still continued to sustain Brigham, and worse still, before long he began to evince an earnest desire to sustain one of Brigham's daughters also—of which I shall say more presently.

My talkative friend called one day to speak of a very serious subject.

"I have come, Sister Stenhouse," she said, "to talk to you about a matter of great importance, but I don't want to offend you, and you must promise beforehand to forgive me."

I readily promised, and she added: "I thought I should find you very unhappy, Sister Stenhouse, about poor, dear Carrie Grant, and I think if you are so you deserve it, but I don't like you to be miserable, and so I came to comfort you."

"But, Sister Ann," I said, "I don't want to be comforted in the way you seem to mean. I have been very sad indeed at losing Carrie, but you know I did everything I could for her, poor girl, and I have nothing to blame myself for."

"Nothing to blame yourself for?" she exclaimed. "Why, Sister Stenhouse, you have everything to blame yourself for. If poor Carrie has less glory it is all your fault."

"How so?" I said.

"Why," she answered, "if you had not held back and expressed your dislike, Carrie would have married your husband, and would most likely have been alive now. She would have had her family, and would have added to your husband's glory; while now, although she is your husband's wife, she has no children, and, of course, must have less glory in the Kingdom."

"Well, Sister Ann," I said, "I never thought of it in that light. I loved Carrie very much, and I tried to make her love me. It was not until almost the last that I knew of her love for my husband ; but if I had known before, I am sure my own heart would have rebelled against my husband taking another wife. I did, however, ask him to marry her, and after she was dead I was married to him for her."

"That's all very well, Sister Stenhouse," she replied, "but for all that, I think you have committed a great wrong against that poor orphan girl. You ought to be thankful that at last you were able to repair a little of the mischief which you did. I don't want to vex you, but I am really sorry that you had such an antipathy to your husband having Carrie. However, I suppose now he has really got another wife you are not so much set against Polygamy. You must find it quite a blessing to have Miss Pratt—I beg pardon, I mean Mrs. Stenhouse, number two—with you now."

I did not answer her, for I had my own opinion about the matter. She went on without hesitation: "Well, you must not be vexed with me, dear ; I say it all for your good, you know ; but I do wish you felt a little more as I do about these matters. Why, do you know, I have been trying to show my faith and zeal in every possible way ever since we came to Utah. It was only last week I was baptized for Queen Anne."

"Queen Anne!" I exclaimed. "What can you possibly mean?"

"Exactly what I say, Sister Stenhouse—I was baptized for Queen Anne, and if you like I'll tell you all about it. It is only just what every one else has been doing, only they were baptized for other people. I don't think you've ever thought much of this, and so I'll explain myself. You see, Sister Stenhouse, the Elders teach us that the whole world is lying in darkness and sin, and has been so, ever since the apostolic gifts were lost ages ago. Now there is no salvation outside the Church, and you may remember that Christ Himself went and preached to the miserable souls in Paradise."

"In Paradise?" I said, "why I thought that was a happy place."

"Oh, no, Sister Stenhouse," she said, "not very happy. The souls of those who have not heard the Gospel, and have not been baptized, go there, and it's a sort of prison for them until they are brought out again through the kindness of some believer. The thief on the cross went there, and Christ went there and preached to the spirits in prison, and when the Elders die they go on mission to Paradise and preach to them also. All your people and my people, our fathers, and mothers, and grandfathers, and so on, right up to the apostolic times, are waiting in Paradise with millions and millions of souls to be released and be admitted into the Celestial Kingdom. All the good brethren and sisters have been doing their best to get out their relations and friends, and I know many of them who have sent over to England and have spent large sums of money in tracing their pedigrees and genealogies, in order to find out the right names and to be baptized as proxies for the dead who owned those names. I have been baptized for a good many of my own relations, and I mean to be baptized for scores more; and many of the brethren, too, have been married as proxies for their own friends, and for distinguished people besides, so that they might be admitted into the celestial kingdom and raise up patriarchal families of their own. The poor souls, if they were released from Paradise by a proxy baptism, could not, of course, have been married in heaven, as there is no giving in marriage there; so some one was married for them as proxy to some one else, and now they can begin to establish their own celestial kingdoms."

"And have you been proxy in this way, Sister Ann?" I asked.

"No, and yes," she replied, "I haven't yet been proxy in marriage for any one, but I was proxy in baptism. When we were children I remember we used to have some rhymes about Queen Anne, and as it was my own name I always thought a great deal of her. It seemed to me that it would be very nice, and at the same time very charitable, if I were to help her out of Paradise—It quite struck my fancy, for it was no small thing to have a real queen thankful to you for so much. So I went and was baptized for her, and now she is out of Paradise and has entered the Celestial Kingdom. But that isn't all. There was my old friend, George Wilford, who heard all about the matter, for I see him frequently, and he at once said that he would be baptized for Prince George of Denmark, Queen Anne's husband, and he means to do so, and, after that, we'll be married by proxy for them here on earth, and then they'll both be happy."

"Why, Sister Ann, what a droll idea," I said.

"Sister Stenhouse," she replied, quite seriously, "It's very wrong of you to talk so. Some of the best Saints have stood proxy in this way. There was one lady who stood proxy for the Empress Josephine, and her son stood for Napoleon, and some one else for Washington. Queen Elisabeth, too, has been baptized by proxy. And now Napoleon and Washington are both Mormon Elders, and I suppose some one will be married for Queen Elisabeth, and she'll enter into Polygamy. Do you know, Sister Stenhouse, there was one brother who out of pure kindness said he would be baptized for the thief on the cross, for he supposed that no one else would take pity on him, and a sister who was present said she would be baptized for his wife, if Brother Brigham thought he ever had one. I've been persuading my Henry to be baptized for Henry the Eighth, for I'm sure he needed baptism for the remission of sins; and he—I mean my Henry—has promised me to do so; but he says that he means to ask Brother Brigham first before he is married for him—if ever he is—as King Henry was almost a polygamist in his way, and my husband thinks there is not much need to be married for him at all."

"I can't help being amused," I said. "Of course I have often heard of being baptized for the dead, and I know the Elders say that St. Paul spoke of it in one of his epistles, but I never thought of it in that light; I always thought we should have to wait till the Temple was finished."

"That's true, Sister Stenhouse;" she replied,—“all the marriages of all the Saints—of every one, in fact, on the face of the earth—ought to be solemnized in the Temple here in Salt Lake City, and every one ought to receive their Endowments in it; but as it is not yet finished, the Lord permits us to be married, and everything else, in the Endowment House. But you know yourself that there's a Record kept, and that when the Temple is finished, the ceremony will be all gone through with again. I've heard it said that many of the Elders and their wives will live there, and that day and night perpetually the ceremonies will be going on. You ought to be baptized, however, now for as many relations as you can think of.”

“I think I shall wait, Sister Ann,” I said, “until I can find a Queen Fanny, and then I'll be baptized for her.”

She did not like me saying this, for she evidently thought I was jesting. I was not jesting, however, but I felt greatly amused, for this peculiar doctrine of the Saints had never struck me in such an odd light before. Sister Ann was shocked at the way in which I viewed her strange stories, but “I'll come again in the course of a day or two, Sister Stenhouse,” she said, “and put you all straight.”

CHAPTER XXXV.

THE more I saw of the practical working of the system in Utah, the more did I learn to detest Polygamy; for although I hesitated to reject Mormonism altogether, I could not for a moment believe that many things of which I heard, and many which came beneath my own observation, could under any circumstances be considered right.

About that time, I made the acquaintance of a sister whom I shall call Mrs. W——. Her husband was on mission and had left his family without any suitable provision. She herself was a remarkably neat and lady-like woman; but she appeared to be delicate in health, and spoke with so much languor and despondency that, directly I saw her, I was led to suspect that her house also was haunted by that spectre—Polygamy.

She complained of poverty, and told me that her courage was really failing; for, after she had striven so hard to provide a home for her children, her husband had taken a young wife, who seemed to think she had as much right in the sister's house as the sister had herself. "She does not assist in the least towards getting a living," she said, "and we have been left entirely unprovided for, as the Church takes no care of the Missionaries' wives. What is the use of slaving as I do to prolong such a life as mine? My husband is coming home soon, and he is sure to bring one or two girls with him. They all do so."

During our conversation, she told me that some of the dignitaries of the Church had intimated to her that the wives of Missionaries who were obliged to be absent for several years had duties to perform which ought not to be neglected. It devolved upon them to see that their husband's "kingdom" did not suffer during their absence, and that if she herself were more complying in this respect, her pathway would be rendered smoother. I had heard it hinted before that such abominable suggestions had been thrown out, but this was the first time that I had met with any one to whom they had personally been made. There are bad men in every community, and the Saints are no exception. It is but fair to state that the great mass of the Mormon people would be as truly horrified at such doctrines and practices as any Gentile man or woman could be.

The constant anxiety of this lady, of whom I have been speaking, was such that she often threatened to poison herself and thus put an end to her misery. Her husband began to pay his addresses to a young English girl who came in with the hand-carts, and he made as great a simpleton of himself as it is possible for a man to do when he is in love. He was scarcely ever at home; and often of an evening the wife would see the young girl walking towards the house waiting for her—the wife's—husband, and on two occasions the girl threw a little stone at the window to indicate that she was there. The poor wife never dared to say a word against Polygamy in the presence of her husband. When she felt so utterly miserable that she could no longer contain herself, and ventured a word of remonstrance at his cruel neglect of her and her five little ones, he would tell her—quoting the brutal language of Brother Brigham—that "she had had her day, and that it was nothing but right that his future wife should now have some attentions paid her. She must round up her shoulders and submit to the cross which we all have to bear!"

One day he brought the young girl home to tea without saying a single word previously to his wife about it, and it was as much as she could do to be civil to the girl. She mastered her feelings, however, sufficiently to treat her properly; but during the evening she had her temper tried to the uttermost. Her husband sat all the time beside the girl, talking in an under-tone, and toying with her curls. At last the wife's feelings were worked up beyond endurance, and she told her husband that, if he did not instantly desist, she would leave the house. "You can go when you please," he said, "there are plenty more women in the world, I guess. I suppose you are jealous that you are not getting the same attention yourself."

Then he turned to the girl and said, "Come, let us take a walk; the old woman is full of the devil—she will get better after awhile."

To say nothing of the man himself, what can be thought of a girl who would marry a man who treated his wife in this manner in her presence? And yet many Mormon girls think that such men have simply been unfortunate in their first choice of a wife, and will never treat them so.

This was another home, the happiness of which I saw wrecked. In England, that poor wife had been gay and happy, and her husband was as faithful and attentive to her as a husband should be. Now, utterly broken-hearted, without any interest in this world, and without hope for that which is to come, she was going to her grave, forsaken by man and, as she poor woman also thought, forsaken by her God.

Often at parties and at pic-nics I met with unhappy wives who unfolded their griefs to me, and some of the things which they related were of a very painful nature. There were instances of downright brutality and cruelty which would not admit of repetition. There were also hundreds of cases in which wives suffered, not so much by any one particular act of wrong, as by innumerable daily and hourly trials, which came upon them at all times, and made existence itself a curse to them.

I remember once, at a pic-nic party, meeting with several first wives whom I had known before I came to Utah, and the stories which they told me were really shocking. At those parties, which, of course, were intended for pleasure and amusement, there was much that was painful in the conversation of the women among themselves, but which would never have been noticed by a stranger. Pic-nics are generally understood to be held in the open air, and in the country ; but we used to call the ward-parties which were held in the Social Hall by that name. The Social Hall was built for this and similar purposes, and was provided with a kitchen and other necessary offices, for the preparation of suppers and other refreshments. It was in this building that plays were acted before the theatre was erected.

The pic-nic parties are quite an institution. Rich and poor, young and old, babies and all, assembled at them to have "a good time." They take their own "pic-nic" with them, set their own tables, make their own tea and coffee, and nurse their own babies. On the occasion to which I allude we went rather early, and thus I had an opportunity of watching the arrivals. Some of them presented a very amusing appearance. There was the Bishop of the ward and all his wives. Two of his boys went in front of him, carrying a very large clothes basket full of "pic-nic," as the eatables were called. Then, straggling after him, came four women and a bevy of noisy children. The wives were all dressed in grey linsey skirts, blue muslin sacques, and green sunbonnets. When they took off their bonnets I found that they all wore wreaths of roses or some other flowers. On entering, I found that quite a number had already assembled and were sitting bolt upright along the sides of the hall, as whist as mice—the women on one side, and the men on the other. At the further end of the hall I saw an old lady sitting whom I recognised as one of my neighbors. She struck me as looking so strangely that I went over to see what was the matter with her. She was pleased to see me, asked me how I thought she looked, and said that this was the first party she had attended since she came to the Valley. She had supposed that it was absolutely necessary for her to wear something white, and had therefore arrayed herself in a white night-dress which answered the purpose of a loose sacque. Sacques and skirts were all the rage at that time. She had on also a little white muslin nightcap, and altogether she looked very neat and clean, but certainly not fit for a party. I did not, of course, like to tell her so, but I felt sorry to see her dressed in that style.

Brigham Young was there, and kept his hat on all the time, as was his custom; and Heber C. Kimball sat during the evening with a red pocket-handkerchief thrown over his head, while the Apostle George A. Smith, a cousin of Joseph, the originator of Mormonism, had a similar article thrown carelessly round his neck. Heber once said publicly in the Tabernacle, when speaking of the wearing of hats, and the proper degree of respect which ought to be shown to the Prophet: "I never feel as though I wanted to wear my 'at when Brigham is present. I consider that the master should wear his 'at, or 'ang it on the peg that God made for it, which is his 'ead, of course." All these things, however, have been changed since Brigham came under the gentle control of Amelia.

On the occasion of which I speak, Heber came up the Hall, soon after we entered, with five or six of his wives following him. The wives always follow the husband. In fact, everything that is done, whether in word or deed, impresses one with the conviction that the Mormons are determined to make the women feel and fully understand that they are inferior beings. Even in the dance the man takes the lead. In all the chasses and promenades he precedes his wives and all other women. In a special council, held in Salt Lake City, Brigham Young once said: "For a man to follow a woman is, in the sight of Heaven, disgraceful to the name of a man." They have a curious kind of dance in Salt Lake City, called a double cotillion, in which one man dances with two women. This is done in order to accommodate those who have many wives. On entering the hall, a number is given to each man, and he is not expected to dance until his number is called. When that is done, they come like a streak across the hall to the ladies' side, to get partners; and when the dance is ended they conduct them back to their seats, and then all retire as they came, with the exception of a few love-sick swains who are reckless enough to break through this rule, in order to enjoy the society of their lady-loves between the dances.

It is only old and hardened Saints, however, who will venture to set at defiance long established regulations and endure the scrutinizing gaze of the brethren on the opposite side of the hall. All this has a very unsociable and stiff appearance to those who attend one of these parties for the first time.

At the particular pic-nic of which I speak, I met a Swedish lady whom I had known in New York. She had come out to Utah, believing fully all that had been told her of that new Zion. She was not very young or good-looking when she arrived, but she had a good deal of money, and consequently was much troubled with offers of marriage. Finally she consented to become a second wife; but she very soon discovered that her husband thought more of her money than he did of herself. He gave her no peace until he got it all into his own hands, and then he neglected her utterly; scarcely ever even coming to see her.

This poor woman, quite deserted by her husband, was obliged to live in what they call in Utah a "dug-out." A "dug-out" is a large cellar, or hole, excavated in the ground, just like the place formed in digging the foundation for a house. It generally is only one fair-sized room, roofed in on the top with boards, and with a few steps in front by which to descend. Sometimes in such a place a man lives with a couple of wives and a host of children, and this is one phase of the order of "Celestial Marriage."

The Swedish lady, of whom I speak, had been well brought up in her own country and was well educated ; she could, however, speak but little English, and therefore found it very difficult to find employment, after the good brother had relieved her of her property. So she worked in the fields, or did anything else which she could get to do. She lived a wretched sort of life, and, finally, poisoned herself ; but no one seemed to care much about it, for very little attention is paid to the death of a woman in Utah, unless she is a favorite wife. No one troubles himself to make any investigations in such a case : —the woman was neither young nor handsome, and she might just as well die as live !

The visitor to Utah is only allowed to see the holiday, outside manners of the people. If he thinks he sees more, he is in most cases, deceived. But any one who really knows the great mass of the Mormon wives as they really are, would confess that a more weary, worn, and dejected set of women could nowhere be found.

How could it possibly be otherwise ? The whole system is radically wrong. How could men act properly to their wives when they marry as many as three, four, five, and six in one single day ? Such things have actually been done, absurdly impossible as it may seem. There was the Apostle Franklin D. Richards, of whom I have previously had occasion to speak. He married five wives. George Grant—the brother of Jedediah M. Grant, the Apostle of the Utah "Reformation"—married four women at one time. They owned some very fine property, and ill-tempered people said that Brother Grant had an eye principally to that. But he, good soul, would tell you that he did it altogether from principle. They all do, and I presume they ought to know best.

When Franklin D. Richards married the five or six widows of his uncle, Dr. Richards, some people said that he was actuated by the same motive ; but his friends said that his only wish was to be a father to the fatherless and a husband to the widow ! Brigham is always very willing that any of the brethren should marry the widows of deceased Apostles or other dignitaries ; but as for their property, that is quite another thing. He himself always has an eye to that, and whenever it is possible, the net of the Prophet draws into its meshes all that is valuable, whether small or great.

As for Brother Brigham's own iniquities, it would take a book much larger than this present volume to tell them all. He lives, in fact, and has lived, for years, in a condition of such constant antagonism to all right and honorable principles, that I really believe that at last he hardly knows when he is doing wrong. He does not like his actions to be scrutinized, and he has always taken special pains to prevent the people from intermingling with the Gentiles, who he feared might excite in them a spirit of inquiry.

When the United States army went to Utah, in 1857, one half of the old Tabernacle was appropriated to the sisters, and the other half to the brethren. The centre of the new Tabernacle is now devoted exclusively to the sisters, and no husband or brother is permitted to sit near them. This is done for the purpose of avoiding the slightest opportunity for any Gentile to converse with them ; for the Mormons, as a rule, have not the slightest confidence in their wives, and are very jealous of them. I suppose this is natural, and that the men, knowing their own frailty, judge their wives from their own stand-point of morality. Brigham Young is the most distrustful of them all. He not only guarded the women in the Tabernacle, but when the theatre was built, he arranged so that it would be impossible for Gentiles to mix with the families of the Saints. The Mormon families occupied the parquette, and the Gentiles had the first circle. The poor among the Saints are, of course, regarded as the common herd, at all times, except when a collection is required, and then they are solemnly reminded that they are a sanctified and peculiar people. It is not therefore necessary that any trouble should be bestowed upon them, and no effort is made to preserve them, in the theatre, from contamination with the Gentiles. Gentiles and Mormons sit together in the second and third circles, and no one is expected to take any notice of it, as the theatre is Brigham's own property.

If the theatre had been owned or conducted by any one else than Brother Brigham, it would have been a sin for the Mormons to have mingled in it with the Gentiles. The people would have been "counselled" to remain at home, if they could not sit by themselves exclusively. But the fact that Brigham is the owner of the theatre does away with any sinfulness in the people attending it and sitting side by side with the Gentiles.

In the same way, when Brigham made whiskey, the whiskey was sanctified. Joseph Smith gave a "revelation" which he called "The Word of Wisdom," enjoining those who among the Saints would be most saintly, never to touch any kind of strong drink; not even tea or coffee, or anything warm. This revelation, as I before mentioned, we ourselves followed while on mission, as, in fact, did all the members of the Church in Europe. It was only when we saw the American Apostles and Elders—more fond of creature comforts than obeying the commands of the Prophet—that we thought it was needless for us abstain any longer; and accordingly followed their example, and ceased to deny ourselves many of those things which are generally considered to be among the necessities of life. The Saints in Europe were not backward in imitating the Apostolic example; and thus the "Word of Wisdom" has fallen into disuse.

This I do not think was a matter to be regretted; for originally this revelation was, I believe, given not for the promotion of sobriety, but simply to get the people to save their money, so as to bring in more to the coffers of the Church.

Its disuse enabled many a poor soul—old men and sick women to whom a cup of warm tea or coffee was the greatest comfort of their lives—to partake of those beverages without fear of committing sin against the “Word” of the Lord.

Whether Brother Joseph himself kept his “Word of Wisdom” may very well be doubted, for his own son, Alexander, says, “There are those who say that the Revelation [on Polygamy] was received over a five-gallon keg of whiskey.” Certain it is that Brother Brigham, seeing that even among the Saints every one did not care to keep this “Word of Wisdom,” turned the weakness of the people to profitable account.

A certain Mr. Howard set up a whiskey-making establishment in Salt Lake City, and was doing a very good business in that line; but Brother Brigham declared that no more should be made, and Mr. Howard was told to go on a mission to preach the Gospel. Soon after he left, the establishment was again running, and a great quantity of whiskey was sold; but as it was dispensed at a store surmounted by an imitation of the All-seeing Eye, over the inscription, “Holiness unto the Lord”—the sign of Zion’s Coöperative Institution—nothing was thought of the matter. The nature of the whiskey was, of course, changed. Some said, however, that it was not changed for the better, and that Brother Brigham’s whiskey was much inferior to Brother Howard’s, and much weaker. Probably, Brother Brigham thought that strong drinks were not good for the people, and made the whiskey weaker out of pure love to them.

Many young Mormon boys, otherwise respectably brought up, have been ruined by the too free sale of whiskey by the Church. I know one young man, in Utah, who told me that this had been the case with himself and several others. He always silenced his conscience by saying that he had never tasted anything but what was made at Brother Brigham’s establishment and sold at one of the Church stores. Finally, seeing the inconsistency of these things, he turned away from Mormonism, Brigham, and whiskey, all at the same time, and then became a respectable and steady young man.

"CHURCH" STORE—MUST BE RIGHT!

When we went to Salt Lake, the Saints were not permitted to keep Gentile boarders. If they did so they lost their standing in the Church. Those who persisted in doing so created great scandal, and were themselves attacked without mercy in the Tabernacle sermons. They were told that intercourse in any shape with the Gentiles would cause them to lose the spirit, and they were, therefore, warned against it. Since then, however, so greatly have matters changed, that two of Brigham Young's own wives have taken in Gentile boarders; and more than one of his daughters have taken in Gentile sewing in order to provide a little extra pocket money for themselves—money which they spent in what their father calls “wretched Gentile fashions.”

While the Prophet himself, and Daniel H. Wells, his counsellor, the Mayor of Salt Lake City, have made themselves conspicuous in denouncing everything that was not Mormon, some of their wives, and also their own sons and daughters, are at this moment aping every Gentile who comes within sight, and have done their very best to dress according to the very latest Gentile style. The people, when they see Brigham and his family themselves leading the way, think that there can be no great sin in following; and the more so as they are able to purchase all the finery that their hearts can desire at the dry-goods store of “the Prophet of the Lord!”

AFTER I had consented, and in reality had given my husband a second wife, my status in Mormon polygamic society was very considerably improved. First wives who lived in, and firmly believed, this "Order of Celestial Marriage," tried in every way to make me feel that I was one with them; and those who had not much faith felt more kindly towards me, because I had been caught in the same snare with themselves.

Every polygamic wife—whether first, second, third, or tenth—no matter how much or how little she may believe in "Celestial Marriage"; no matter how refined or how coarse and degraded her nature may chance to be; cannot help feeling that her position is inferior to that of a monogamic wife. On this account, many of the Mormon women are never satisfied until they have drawn every woman of their acquaintance down to their own level. The influence of this supposed "Revelation" is by no means elevating or refining.

I was now upon an equal footing with other first wives. They had, therefore, no hesitation in confiding to me their griefs; and situated as I was, I had abundant opportunities of hearing stories of cruelty, wrong, and suffering, under the "Celestial" system—many of them so utterly revolting that I would not dream of relating them again. Polygamy among the Mormons is so involved in disgusting and disgraceful details, that a modest woman would not dare to relate all she knew. In this book I have endeavored to be true to my title and to "tell all," as far as such a thing was possible. But there are thousands of horrible incidents, too degrading for mention, which form part and parcel of the system of Polygamy, but which no woman who had any respect for herself would think of putting upon paper.

Previous to the time when my husband took his second wife, although I had learned too much, I had to a certain extent been kept in the dark respecting some of the vile and loathsome practices of Polygamy; but after that, by slow degrees, I was thoroughly initiated into the system.

Visitors to Utah would perhaps notice in the faces of the Mormon wives a dull, careworn, weary expression, altogether the reverse of that contented look which is seen among "Gentile" women. But those very women would never disclose to the stranger the depth of that sorrow which is wearing away their lives. Some few, indeed, have been led to speak of their troubles; but they have afterwards found that the very persons in whom they confided most, distorted and exaggerated every word that they had uttered, for the sake of making a good story for the press. In many cases, the names of those who were thoughtless enough to expose their sorrows, together with little personal matters which should never have been made public, were put into print; and when the matter came before the Church authorities—as in course of time it was certain to do—there was a great deal of trouble and unpleasantness. Women, consequently, as a rule, tell nothing; and book-makers and people connected with the press, while they give to the world astonishing stories of what they have heard know really nothing of the truth. When a smart man, or a man connected with the press, comes to Utah, the Church authorities take him in hand at once. He is carried here and there, and treated with the utmost deference; a pair of Mormon spectacles is placed by Brigham, or one of his numerous factotums, upon the visitor's eyes, and through them he looks at all that transpires. Then comes a glowing account in the papers, or else apocryphal stories appear in the visitor's last new book; and unsophisticated people, who innocently suppose that all that is in print must be true, begin to think that the stories of the evil-doing of the Prophet, which from time to time have crept out, were only scandalous reports, and that Brigham Young—like Somebody else who shall be nameless!—was, after all, not quite so black as he has been painted.

The intelligent Saints, however, are not thus deceived. They may hold to Mormonism, and may regard Brigham in his priestly capacity as a Prophet; but they are not blind to his sins. I could, from my own personal knowledge, mention the names of men in whom Brigham Young has the fullest confidence and who are in daily communication with him. Their faith, in most instances, has really fled, although in name they are still "Saints;" they bow the knee before the Prophet's throne, but in their hearts they despise him; for years of intercourse with him have taught them what he really is.

This is, however, carefully hidden from the outer world. A gentleman, who had for five years resided in Salt Lake City, said to me a few months ago: "Mrs. Stenhouse, when I had been here about three weeks I thought that I knew enough of Mormonism to write a book; when I had been here three months I began to think that I did not know quite as much; and now, after five years, I have come to the conclusion that I really know nothing at all. I have lived in a Mormon family for the past year, but that has not increased my knowledge. They are constantly upon their guard. They treat me kindly, but they never let me know any thing."

This, I believe, has been the experience of nearly all the Gentiles resident in Salt Lake City. Gentlemen had no chance of learning anything, and the opportunities of ladies were only a trifle better.

Up to this time I had said very little to my children about my doubts and fears. With the exception of my daughter Clara, they were all too young. Clara was just budding into womanhood and day by day gave promise of more beauty and interest in her future life. I dreaded to cast a cloud across her way by telling her of my own apprehensions in respect to Polygamy. If that were the "Order" of "Heaven," she would certainly have to live in it; and in any case it was the "order" of Brigham Young, and my child could not escape from it, for no one, unless at peril of life, could flee from Zion, in those days. I kept, therefore, from my daughter all my own troubles, feeling that she herself would soon enough have trials of her own. She saw how much I suffered, and no doubt knew the cause; and, although she could not fully enter into my feelings, her companionship was a great consolation to me, and I loved her all the more because I felt that my own heart was widowed. How often I prayed that she might be spared such a life as that which I lived.

We had lived together in Polygamy about a year, when my husband told me that his young wife desired to have a home of her own, and that he intended to provide her with one. This was very pleasant intelligence to me; for the sight of that other wife constantly before my eyes—sitting at my table, in the midst of my family, walking in the garden with my husband in the evening, or tête-à-tête with him in the parlor—was more than I could bear. I began to feel, whether justly or not, that my presence was a restraint to them, and that they felt annoyed when I was with them. This feeling was so strong with me that I constantly avoided them, and I finally concluded to spend the evenings in my own room with my children, for then, being out of their presence, I should perhaps be at peace. All this time I hoped that my husband would urge me to come back again to the parlor, and several times he did so, but I thought that I was de trop, and remained in my room. He thought that I was making myself quite disagreeable, and such probably was the case, for no wife could be pleasant or happy, situated as I was.

This, however, was all changed when my husband established a second home. I did not mind being deprived of his society so long as I could get rid of her. Personally I had no ill feeling towards her, for she had always treated me with respect; the only reason why I hated her was because she was his wife; even her presence was painful to me, and when she was near me I hardly felt able to breathe.

Just at that time, the marriage of my daughter Clara first began to be talked about seriously. One day my husband being out driving with Joseph A. Young, the eldest son of the Prophet, the subject was discussed between them, and Joseph A. made a proposition of marriage. This, to me, was the cause of considerable uneasiness, as Joseph A. was a polygamist, and at first I altogether refused to listen to the suggestion. At that time Clara was not fifteen years of age, and not only did I consider her altogether too young to think of marriage, but I was shocked at the bare idea of her becoming a polygamic wife. I almost hated Joseph for asking for her.

Personally I had no objection to Clara's lover. I had known him for several years. He was an intelligent, generous-hearted, and handsome man, of very good standing among the Saints, and wealthy. As a friend, I valued and esteemed him; but that he, a polygamist, should wish to marry my darling daughter was very repugnant to my feelings. Clara was then growing old enough to understand my more serious thoughts and sentiments, and her companionship was very precious to me. The thought of her marrying into Polygamy was to my mind almost as painful as the thought of her death would have been.

My husband agreed with me that she was too young to marry; but on that point he could not offer any great objection, as his own wife although very womanly in appearance was but very little older in years. I told Joseph A. of my reluctance to the proposed marriage and he fully entered into my feelings. I could not absolutely refuse him, but I wished to gain time. Every day found me more and more weak in the faith, and I thought that, if I could only postpone my Clara's marriage for a few years, something might transpire which would relieve me of my difficulty.

Joseph promised to wait just as long as we thought proper, if only we would allow him to speak to Clara and explain to her the sentiments with which he regarded her. In this he acted in a way very unlike the Mormon men generally, and I respected him accordingly. I promised him that I would not influence my daughter, but would let her decide for herself. This, after much careful consideration, I came to the conclusion was all that I could do. My mind at that time was in a very troubled state. Day by day my doubts respecting the plural wife system became stronger and stronger, and I felt that before very long some great change must take place, both in my faith and in my life. At the same time, outward circumstances gave no promise of any such change. My husband gave no signs of apostacy, and, as a Saint, I knew he would never think of undertaking anything without the permission of Brother Brigham. We did not even dare to leave the city without consulting the Prophet. In times, then very recent, it was at the risk, and sometimes, indeed, at the sacrifice, of life, that any one left Salt Lake Valley without permission; and even at the present moment no good Saint who values his standing in the Church would dream of going East without first obtaining the approval of Brigham Young. I could not, therefore, at the time of which I write, foresee the great changes which have since taken place. To refuse my daughter to the Prophet's son, would, I knew, be utterly useless. By partial submission I might gain some advantages; and the longer I postponed the marriage, the greater chance there was that "something" might turn up, which we all more or less look for when we are placed in circumstances which admit of the exercise of very little choice or effort.

My only objection against Joseph A. was, as I just stated, that he was a polygamist ; but so long as we remained in the Church I could not openly allege this in opposition to the proposed marriage. If my Clara married a single man, there was every chance, if not an absolute certainty, that after a while he would take another wife, or wives. This had been the case with other girls with whom my child was acquainted. They had married single men, trusting that their influence over them would be sufficient to retain their affections ever to themselves alone ; but they had soon reason to see how groundless their expectations and hopes had been. If, on the other hand, I gave my daughter to a polygamist, there was certainly no reason why Joseph A. should be refused. I felt surrounded on every side by difficulties, and out of them all I endeavored to choose the least.

One day my husband told me that Brigham Young had seriously spoken to him about the matter, and had "counselled" him to let the marriage take place at once, saying that my Clara was quite old enough. After this, objection on my part would have been utterly unavailing. Everything was settled at the fiat of Brigham ; and the feelings and judgment of a father and mother in respect to their own daughter were, of course, of not the slightest consequence.

The wedding-day was therefore fixed, when the sweet flower of my own quiet garden was to be transplanted to another home.

We went to the Endowment House—my husband, myself, and our daughter, together with some friends of the family. There we met with Joseph A. Young, the expectant bridegroom ; his father, Brigham Young ; Joseph A.'s first wife—Mary Young ; and several of the brethren. The bride and bridegroom, and the bridegroom's first wife, were all dressed in their Temple robes. We then entered a small room where the altar, of which I have already spoken, is placed. At the end of the altar, Brigham was seated in a large arm-chair covered with crimson velvet. The altar was also crimson. Brigham officiated. Joseph A.'s first wife, Mary Young, knelt in front of the long crimson altar; and my daughter Clara knelt beside her on a sort of faldstool or ledge, arranged for that purpose. Behind the altar, knelt Joseph A. Brigham said: "Joseph, are you willing to take Clara Stenhouse to be your lawful and wedded wife for time and for all eternity?" Joseph answered, "Yes." Then Joseph's first wife was told to place the right hand of my daughter in the right hand of her husband, in token that she was willing; and then Clara was questioned, as Joseph had been. When she replied in the affirmative, Brigham said, "I pronounce you man and wife in the name of the Lord. Amen." They were now married; and Brigham Young, Joseph A.'s first wife, and a few other friends came home to the wedding breakfast, after which my daughter went to her own pleasant home.

Thus my worst fears were realised—my own daughter had become a polygamic wife—she was the fourth wife of her husband, Joseph A. Young.

It is a source of sorrow to any mother who really loves her children to lose them, even if it be for their own good and happiness; but in my own case there were reasons why I felt the loss of my daughter more than I should have done under ordinary circumstances. I felt quite desolate without her; for when left all alone, when my husband took his second wife, and when I had no one else to turn to, my little daughter had entwined herself about my heart in a thousand sweet and loving ways. She knew how great an influence music had over me, and how much I loved to hear her play and sing; and when she saw how sad my heart was, or caught me in tears, she would go to her piano, and lure me to her side by some sweet song which she knew was dear to my memory. But, with her went all that love and gentleness which in my time of deepest trouble sustained me and kept me from absolute despair.

I have often wondered whether Joseph ever realised how great, how dear, a gift I bestowed upon him when I gave him my little Clara. But in saying this I do not mean to cast the shadow of a doubt upon his true-heartedness and love towards her. He was always kind and thoughtful, considering her comfort in everything; and although they have now been married seven years, he has never changed, but is the same to her as on the first day of their marriage. A good, kind, and gentle husband he has ever been, anticipating her every wish, tenderly and carefully guarding her from even a painful thought. My only regret has been that he is a polygamist, and she a polygamic wife.

Not long after this, my husband one day told me that a select few had been chosen to receive their Second Endowments, and that we were to be honored with the same privilege. This I was told was one of the highest honors that could be conferred upon us, as the Second Endowments had never been given to any one since the Mormons left Nauvoo.

The glory of this privilege I did not myself, however, feel; and, notwithstanding any respect which might be intended by our names being added to the list of chosen ones, I refused to see the slightest good in the whole affair. I am afraid I was naturally perverse,—or was it that the light was now beginning to dawn more clearly upon my mind? I know not. But I raised every possible objection, feeling, though I did, that all opposition on my part was useless. I knew that I should have to go, but I felt a dismal satisfaction in letting every one know how much I hated the system.

Our second wife;—I say “our,” because I had been taught that my husband and myself were indissolubly one, even in the matter of taking wives;—“our” second wife seemed the happiest of us all when the day arrived, and I believe she considered that we were very highly favored. After preparing our Temple robes, we started for the Endowment House. The reluctance which I felt caused me to lag behind, and I was gently reminded several times that I was making myself very disagreeable. I did not, however, feel much remorse, for my husband had still one good, obedient wife walking at his side, who I knew would sympathise with him; and that, as every one is aware, is more than falls to the lot of every man.

When we reached the Endowment House, we ladies were shown into one room and our husband into another. We then proceeded to array ourselves in our robes, caps, and aprons—the same as when we received our first Endowments—and when all was ready we were ushered into another room by one of the brethren, who was also dressed in his Temple robes. There we met our husband and several other brethren, all dressed in the same way. We sat down, and oil was then poured upon the head of our husband, by two of the brethren—Daniel H. Wells, and another—and he was then ordained a King and Priest to all eternity. After that, we two wives were anointed in like manner, and ordained Queens and Priestesses, to reign and rule with our husband over his kingdom in the celestial world.

Had I ever solaced myself with the notion, which some Mormon women entertain, that first wives are queens over all the rest, I should have been sadly disappointed when I heard “our” second wife ordained to the same high office as myself. As it was, however, my faith was so small that I should have been quite contented had they consecrated her alone queen for Eternity, so long as they would have allowed me to rule and reign by myself in my own home for Time.

The ceremony did not last long; but it all appeared to me such folly that I was anxious to leave the place, and though I dared not say so, I was truly ashamed to be seen coming out of the House. While going through these Endowments I was filled with a thorough contempt for everybody and everything around me, and I suppose that my feelings were visible upon my countenance, for, after leaving the House, I remember the Apostle John Taylor asking me if I did not feel well, and I told him as plainly as I dared what really was the matter. He spoke to me very kindly, and tried to re-assure me, but the scales were now falling from my eyes, and all his arguments availed nothing.

Notwithstanding all this, I was not ready yet to cast off the yoke, and a few months after our Second Endowments I again gave evidence of my faith. An event occurred in the other branch of my husband's family which produced a strong impression upon my mind—a little daughter was presented to him by his second wife. I was, of course, expected to go and visit the young mother and child, and I thought I could never bring my mind to do that.

It would be impossible for me to define my feelings at that time ;—loathing and hatred for him and for her, and even for the poor innocent babe, on the one side ; and, on the other, thoughts of what I considered was my duty towards God, my husband, and his other lawful wife. I was bewildered.—My heart said, Do not go ; but my conscience said, It is your duty to treat her kindly, for she believes she has done you no wrong. Then I thought—She is a young mother, and without you frowning upon her, sorrow will come swiftly enough to her door.

I saw that my husband was troubled as to what my feelings might be, although he had not had courage to tell me himself of the interesting event. He was afraid of paining me and sent a lady friend with the intelligence. I spoke to him myself and told him that I would go and see Belinda and her child. He thanked me and said, "God bless you for that." Then I went to see her ; but I was thankful when the visit was over, and although I went again many times, and tried my very best to treat her kindly and even affectionately, I could never get over the painful feelings which agitated my mind when in her presence.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

REALITIES OF POLYGAMIC LIFE:—ORSON PRATT : THE STORY OF HIS YOUNG ENGLISH WIFE.

I DO not think that Polygamic wives feel the anomalies and cruelties of the “Celestial Order” half so keenly as the first wives, or they would never enter into it.

The position of the plural wives—second, third, fourth, or twentieth, it matters not—is but a mockery, after all; and in many respects they are more to be pitied than the first wives. The first wives have known, if only for a little while, a husband’s love and care; but that has never been felt by the second wives. They are, in fact, in many respects little better than slaves; and if they are sensitive girls, their position must be extremely painful, for they must realise at all times that they are receiving the attentions of another woman's husband ; and in many instances they are even afraid to be seen speaking to their husband for fear of bringing down the wrath of the first wife upon their heads. Others, who are not so sensitive, assert their own rights and are defiant.

I am well acquainted with a pretty young Welsh girl who was a second wife. Her husband had converted her to Mormonism while he was on a mission to Europe, and, when they reached Salt Lake, he married her. I saw her first two years after her marriage, when one day she came to me in the greatest distress. She asked me if I would give her some employment, and, greatly surprised at the request, I asked her how she came to need anything to do, as I knew her husband could well afford to support her.

"I have left my husband," she answered, "for I could stand no longer the ill-treatment that I received. I endured it until, as you see, my health is failing and I am broken-hearted. The creature I married has no manhood in him. He has allowed me to be treated like a slave, and has himself half-starved me and has acted towards me with the greatest inhumanity. When I married him," she said, "I was willing to make myself useful in the family, and I did so. But one thing after another was given me to do until I became a regular drudge—they would not have dared to treat a hired girl in the way they treated me. I was put into a miserable little back room, and was never allowed to see any of my friends ; I had to work early and late. When at last my position would not admit of my working quite so much, they punished me with all sorts of petty unkindnesses, and nearly starved me, giving me only a little flour or a few potatoes every day.

"At last," she continued, "I went to Brother Brigham to know what I should do. He sent for my husband and talked to him a long time, and he promised to do better if I would go back with him. Brother Brigham counselled me to do so, and try him again ; and I went. Soon after that, my babe was born, and then they treated me with worse unkindness."

"Who do you mean by they?" I asked.

"I mean my husband and his wife," she replied; "They did not seem to look upon me as a wife at all, and, even in the coldest mornings and immediately after my child was born, they used to make me get up first and light fires and prepare breakfast and begin work generally, and I was only too glad if I escaped with a little fault-finding. I stood it as long as I could, because Brother Brigham had counselled me to do so; but now I have left them again and do not mean to return." This was the story of one poor girl's troubles.

Now the man who did this is a good Mormon in good standing in the Church to-day. He is employed by the authorities and his poor young wife is now working for the Gentiles—a much happier woman, if her face speaks truly, since her separation, although she has to support herself and child. She, like hundreds of other young girls, came to Utah without friend or relative, and this is how a good brother "took care" of her.

But I must be permitted to relate a still more painful story—the story of a poor innocent girl allured from her happy home in England by one of the most distinguished of the Mormon Apostles; brought over by him to Utah as his wife, and there suffered to die in misery and neglect.

The Apostle Orson Pratt, who is called among the Saints "The Champion of Polygamy,"—a man who has devoted his life to Mormonism, and whose writings have done more than the labors of all the other Apostles to win converts to Polygamy; a man who on more than one occasion has boldly stood up against many of the absurdities and blasphemies of Brigham Young; a man upon whom, on account of his independence, Brigham has frowned, and who has consequently never attained to the wealth of his more obsequious brethren; a man who in all the ordinary affairs of life would command the respect of every one around him.—This was the man who perpetrated the atrocious villainy which I am about to relate; and much against my own personal inclinations I feel compelled to tell the story, as it shows how shockingly this debasing system can pervert an otherwise upright mind.

Orson Pratt married the young girl of whom I speak, in Liverpool, by special dispensation from Brigham Young, and her parents—themselves devout Mormons—thought that their daughter was highly honored in becoming the wife of an Apostle. She was very pretty and attractive, and for a time he paid great attention to her, and brought her over to Utah as his bride. Arrived there he utterly neglected her, and she experienced all the horrors of polygamic life.

The Apostle was living in Salt Lake City. He had left his young wife and her children in Tooele—a place about forty miles distant. There they lived in a wretched little log-cabin, the young mother supporting her little ones as best she could. When her last child was born she was suffering all the miseries of poverty, dependent entirely upon the charity of her neighbors. At the time when most she needed the gentle sympathy of her husband's love that husband never came to see her.

One morning there was literally nothing in the house for herself and her children, who, knowing nothing of their mother's sufferings, cried to her for bread.

The poor mother quieted them with a promise that they should soon have something to eat, and then she went and begged a few potatoes from a neighbor; and upon these they subsisted for three days. She then took her children with her, for they were too young to be left alone—her babe was only three weeks old—and she went round to see if she could get work of any kind to do. In this she was not successful; and at length, worn out by continual anxiety and privation, and heart-broken by the neglect which she had experienced, she sank beneath a fever which promised very soon to prove fatal.

For some time the neighbors nursed her; but they, of course, had their own families to attend to, and could not give her quite all their time, and thus occasionally she was left alone. One evening, when such was the case, she got up in a state of delirium, and barefooted, and almost destitute of clothing, took her children, and wandered forth with them into the snow. The good people of Tooele went out over the prairie, anxious to find and bring back the poor maniac, but for a long time their search was in vain. At last, not knowing whither she went, she wandered to the house of Brother Eli B. Kelsey—a "vile apostate" as Brigham Young would call him; but known to every one else, Saint, Apostate, or Gentile, as one of the best and kindest-hearted men that ever lived. In Brother Kelsey's house, she and her little ones were kindly received by him and his good wife—from whose lips I first heard this painful story—and their wants attended to. They were clothed and fed, and were then carried back to the log-cabin which they called their home.

Next day the Mormon Bishop of Tooele assembled the people, and money was collected and sent to Salt Lake City, to Orson Pratt, begging him to come immediately, if he wished to see his wife alive. But the Apostle did not come. At that time he was actually engaged in taking another bride, and he wanted to hear nothing of his dying wife.

Then the good Bishop sent a young man, who rode all night, to compel him immediately to take the coach for Tooele—the young man paying his fare so that he might have no excuse. Then, at last, he came.

Arrived at the little town where his poor wife lay dying, Orson conducted himself like the philosopher he professes to be. Before him stood the hovel, within which were his deserted little ones—wailing, as if sensible of the great loss of a mother's care which they would soon have to sustain;—and there, on her dying bed, was that poor wife and mother tossing in wild delirium. But he, the cause of all that woe, passed by that wretched hovel and its death-scene to the comfortable home of a well-to-do brother, at whose house he first obtained his supper, and then calmly returning, entered the place where his wife was lying, and for a moment surveyed the scene. Then he quietly remarked to one of the sisters present: "She has a good deal of fever."

Another sister who stood by, impulsively exclaimed, "Good God!—Brother Pratt, this is more than fever—she is dying."

"Oh dear, no, sister;" he calmly replied, "she will recover."

It was evident, however, to all but Orson that his wife was dying, and that no earthly power could save her.

The next day she was still raving, and it was told me that in her wild frenzy she even attempted to strangle her babe. Orson essayed to hold her, but she caught his gold chain and snapped it in two. His touch and the sight of the chain recalled her for a moment to her senses, and she said reproachfully—"You are puffed up with pride, Orson, with your gold chain and rings, while you leave me and my babes to starve. Poor little lambs! where are they?"

For a moment the yearning of a mother's heart for her children conquered the fever that tortured her mind, and she listened to her husband's attempted words of comfort, as he said, "I am with you now Eliza, and I will take care of you."

Steadily, for a moment, she looked up into his face, and, with tears in her eyes, said mournfully: "It is too late, Orson—It is too late!"

These were the last sane words which she uttered in this life, although she still lingered on insensible.

The next morning, the Apostle Pratt resolved to leave for Salt Lake City and his young bride. The Bishop, however, called a council and summoned him to remain until his wife was dead. Nevertheless he did not wish to stay, and, being an Apostle, he overruled the council. At the last moment before his intended departure, one of the sisters said: "Brother Pratt, should she die, what shall we do with her?"

"Oh, she won't die," he replied.

"But should she," the sister urged.

"Then bury her with her children," he answered.

After much solicitation, he was prevailed upon to remain for a few hours, and the next morning his wife died. The language of her last moments, as she raved and tossed in mad delirium, showed how terrible had been her mental agony, and how much she had suffered from this frightful system.

DESPAIR!

But one might easily fill a large volume with stories quite as cruel as this. It is simply absurd to expect that it should be otherwise. Men and women can train and discipline their minds, they can crush out the affections of their hearts if they will; but no effort of man can change man's nature entirely or root out altogether humanity from the soul. Women may endure, as that poor woman did whose story I have just related, but they never can get perfectly adapted to the system of "Celestial Marriage." The nearer they approach to its requirements, the further they recede from all that is held good and noble in womanhood, and as for the men, they are brutalised by every effort which they make to conform with it.

During the summer, about three years ago, a young-looking woman, very shabbily dressed, came frequently to my house with heavy baskets of fruit which she entreated me to buy. One day she said: "You do not remember me, Sister Stenhouse, I think, and I do not wonder for I am so changed. I have to work very hard now, for all I have to live upon is what I can make by selling fruit, or any little work that I can get my neighbors to give me to do; and if my husband could prevent even that I believe he would. I am obliged to gather my fruit at night and hide it from him, and that is why I urged you so to buy, for I never know when I may meet him."

I was very much surprised at this, as her husband, I knew, was getting a good salary, and appeared to be a most gentlemanly man. His first wife, I was aware, had left him—it was said, on account of cruelty and neglect—and he had married this one just after her arrival from England. I had every reason to believe that she had been a good wife to him, and a mother to his motherless children; but he had taken another wife since he married her and had cruelly neglected this poor woman, leaving her his first wife's children to take care of. She said that he was again paying his addresses to another still, and she expected that he would soon marry her. And yet this woman [his second wife] told me that all he had left for her and the children to live upon was a sack of bran and about fifty pounds of corn meal. Everything else had been taken to the third wife, even to the best articles of furniture.

She said: "One evening I had been sitting in the porch in my rocking-chair, when he came in and remained about an hour. As soon as he left, I went out to bring in the chair, and was just in time to see him carrying it off;—I knew where he was going with it." I saw this poor woman frequently, and bought her fruit often when I did not need it, for it grieved me to see her carrying such heavy loads in her then delicate situation. After a time I lost sight of her, and then I heard that she was dead. One day her own daughter,—for she was a widow when she married this man,—came to me before leaving the city. "I am going away to some friends," she said, "for I will never live near that man—he killed my mother; he kicked her so severely that she never recovered, and when her child was born, they both died from the effects of the blows which she had received—and I hate him."

Nothing was ever done to this man—his wife was his own property. He is still regarded as a good Mormon; and when he went to Washington, about two years ago, he took with him letters of recommendation from the leading men in the Church, and the Washington papers spoke of him as being a very gentlemanly and intelligent man. I would give his name, but that I hardly think it would be fair to single him out from his brethren, of so many of whom I could tell just as shameful stories. My Mormon friends, however, will know very well of whom I speak.

Another first wife of one of the Mormon authorities told me how her husband whipped her because she would not consent to his stripping their home of everything that was either useful or handsome in order to furnish a house for his second wife. Finally he shut her up while he took her entire parlor furniture away. She was a fragile little woman and perfectly helpless when in the power of a strong man, and therefore was forced to submit, as there was no appeal to law in Utah.

It is a very difficult thing for a woman after listening, day after day, to such tales of woe and misery, and knowing them to be true, to retain much respect for a polygamist, whoever he may be. For my own part I regard them all with such feelings of loathing—for I cannot forget my own sufferings—that I can hardly speak civilly of them, and would prefer never to speak to them. I know scores of ladies—married ladies—Mormon ladies, who in secret feel and speak just as I do upon this subject.

For many years past, the American Elders have derived a rich harvest from Britain, and Scandinavia. After the introduction of Polygamy, an Elder was seldom known to return from mission without bringing with him one, two, and sometimes three young girls, or else arranging in some way for their emigration. The Missionaries, however, preferred, whenever it was possible, to bring the girls with them, for if they trusted them to the care of a brother returning before or after, he very frequently turned traitor, and carried off the prize himself.

The Elders were not permitted to marry these extra wives while on, or returning from, a mission, unless they had special permission from Brigham Young. But quite a number of the poor weak brethren were so impulsive and so anxious to be married, that they could not wait for the ceremonies of the Endowment House. One conscientious Swiss brother, named Loba, who could find no one willing to take the responsibility of marrying him while crossing the Plains, said that as he was an Elder he could just as well marry himself, and be under no obligation to anybody; and he did so. He had fallen in love with a little miss—a mere child, about one quarter of his own age.

Many men have married wives, and have brought them home, before their first wives knew even that they were in love. They had not had courage to introduce the subject, but believed that when the wife found that it was done and could not be undone, she would see the uselessness of feeling badly, and would soon get over it. But no wife who has been thus treated ever did "get over it." What can a man know of woman's nature who would dare to act thus towards her, and think that she would become reconciled to such treatment?

What strange ideas the Mormon men must have of woman's nature if they believe that women can submit to such treatment as this and still love them! What folly to think even of love! Can they not discover, if by nothing else, by the changed manner, the almost cold indifference, of those who were once gushing over with affection, whose winning and endearing ways captivated their hearts—that something must be wrong—that love has ceased to exist in the hearts of their wives, and that a cold, stern sense of duty and religious obligation has taken its place?

It would be very wrong for me to say that there are no men who try to be just in the practice of Polygamy, for I know many who try their very best to act impartially to all their wives, but this is not really the result of their religion about which some of these men appear to care very little. I feel sure that if they are good men, notwithstanding the evil effects of Mormonism upon them, they would have been much better men without it.

On the other hand, I have known men who, before they became Mormons, were reputed good husbands and fathers, but who afterwards became cold and harsh in their natures, cruel to their wives, and neglectful to their children,—it seemed as if they thought of nothing else but courting the girls and taking more wives, altogether regardless as to whether they could support them or not.

Some of the Elders, finding that they might not marry plural wives before they reached Utah, have bound the foreign girls by solemn vows and covenants to marry them when they arrived in Salt Lake Valley; and the poor girls, believing, that because these men were Missionaries, all they said and did must be right, have often—in fact, in almost every instance—to their own great injury, kept their "covenants" and married the men to whom they were vowed. I have known personally and intimately several sisters who have in this way ruined their prospects and blighted the hopes of their whole lives, and sadder stories than theirs could not be told.

My husband had again left Salt Lake City, and had gone to "the States,"—as we then called "going East;" for it was such a long journey that we felt ourselves altogether out of the pale of civilisation. I felt, therefore, comparatively free; for I could now, whenever I desired to do so, walk out, or visit a friend, without the constant dread of meeting him and his wife. It always humiliated me to see them together, although I believed that it was perfectly right that my husband should show attentions to his other wife. It was not now jealousy that I felt—the day of jealous feeling was long past;—I felt disgusted, and I was humbled at the sight of them. At one time, for nearly six months I remained at home, never going further than my own garden,—simply for the reason that I feared to meet her in the presence of any of my friends—particularly any of my Gentile friends; or worse still, with him. I felt sure that, had we met, I should have tried to avoid them or have passed them by unnoticed, which would, of course, have been an insult, and would have caused remarks from strangers, and ill feeling, which, of all things, I felt most anxious to avoid.

There is no privacy in a polygamic family where the wives live together, and very little indeed when they live in separate houses; for each wife finds pleasure in telling all the little weaknesses of the other wives to her own "particular friends,"—and those "particular friends," in turn tell their "particular friends," until in due course it becomes known to some kind-hearted busybody who considers it her duty to go to the wife whose foibles have thus been bandied about from one to the other, and tell her "how shamefully she has been slandered." Then it is the poor husband's turn to hear the whole burden of trouble,—never, of course, exaggerated in the least,—and he is expected to make peace, if he can, among his numerous wives.

Perhaps all this fuss has been caused by the husband himself—he never intending it, all the time. Not unlikely he gave a new dress or some article of wearing apparel to one wife or her children, and the others have noticed it. It may be that, perhaps, he did not think that the others needed it, and probably they did not ; but that does not matter in the least. Jealous wives do not stop to consider such a trifle as that. The poor man is told that he must be just and fair to all, and when he gives a dress to one, he must give dresses to the others also, whether he can afford it and they need it, or not.

These wives are lynx-eyed, and each one notices every article of clothing that the others wear ; and, no matter how economical one wife may be, or how extravagant another, the careful one must never look better dressed than her less saving rival, or the husband will certainly be blamed for favoritism.

After living in Polygamy and observing all these things, I came to the conclusion that the men who tried to act justly were, after all, greatly to be pitied ; and I had no doubt in my mind that many of them would only be too happy to be monogamic husbands once again. At one time I believed this of my own husband. He appeared to be annoyed when “duty” compelled him to leave my home and family circle, and go to his other “home.” I half fancied that he had at last come to think that Polygamy was a most unnatural condition of affairs, and that he would be very glad if it were not compulsory. Of course, I drew my own conclusions, but I by and by found that they were somewhat premature.

I had supposed that, possibly, his young wife was not so attractive to him now as she had been ; and this I must confess, did not grieve me very much. But, notwithstanding all that, so great had been my fanaticism, that I had still remaining sufficient faith in the unholy practice to make me feel that if we expected ever to get a blessing from heaven through compliance with the “celestial” command, it was necessary that my husband should be just to his other wife and treat her kindly and considerately.

As I said before, from the moment when he first selected another wife, his society lost every charm for me, and therefore I was not so very generous, after all, when I urged him to spend as much time as he possibly could with Belinda. I felt that if I had lost everything in this life for Polygamy ; and if Polygamy, after all, by any chance, might turn out true ; I might as well strive to get a little glory in the next world. But, after all, it was but a poor soulless attempt, and so miserable did I feel that I frequently wished that I could be completely annihilated after death.

My husband's cares were also increasing, for his young wife had already presented him with three daughters. I presume, if at any time she was cross at his long absences, the children were influenced by her spirit, and when my husband did visit her, his reception was probably either too warm or too cool, and, in any case, more lively than suited his quiet tastes. He assured me that he never spoke an unkind word to her, but would listen to all she had to say in a meek and quiet spirit, feeling all the time that she was young and inexperienced. This no doubt was all very well, but what woman can bear to see a man listening quietly to all she has to say, when she herself is in anything but a calm state of mind? We like men to feel what we say.

I have known many husbands in Polygamy who made it a practice not to say anything to their wives when they were recounting their wrongs, but preferred to get up and leave without a word—showing them no sympathy whatever, but teaching them, with all that cold indifference which in time chills the most loving heart and silences the voice of affection for ever, what their position really was.

I have also heard husbands say : " I provide my wife with all she needs or can wish for, and surely she cannot suppose that I will allow her or any other woman to dictate to me as to what I shall do with myself or how I shall spend my time. I shall follow in the footsteps of Brother Brigham, and go where I please, and stay as long as I please, and come back when it suits me."

The Mormon men are very much to blame in this respect. They take young innocent girls from the warm and happy influence of home, and after a few brief weeks of devotion, they leave them in the cold atmosphere of the world, to battle single-handed with new cares and new duties, to bear sickness and solitude with what courage they may, and thus, disconsolate and alone, go their way into the tangled mazes of life. This the Mormon husbands do, without a thought of the solemn vows they break and the heavy responsibilities which they evade; for they never for one moment reflect, that if there is incompatibility; it results in most instances from the fact that they have acted worse than foolishly in choosing girls so young and inexperienced that they could not possibly be fit companions for men who might in point of age have been their fathers, and even then have had a very fair margin of years to spare.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

“OUR” HUSBAND’S FIANCÉE—A SECOND WIFE’S SORROWS—STEPS TOWARDS APOSTACY.

AT one time, as I have already stated, I had almost begun to think that my husband had seen enough of the discomforts and heartlessness of polygamic life, and that his eyes were looking back wishfully to the time when, as the old Scotch ballad says:

“One loving heart was all his own,
But there as king he reigned supreme.”

My faith in my own acuteness and perception was, however, very considerably shaken when one day he told me that he thought it was about time for him to think of taking another wife. I suppose he expected that I should express some astonishment or offer objections, for he proceeded to give me excellent reasons for what he was about to do.—His greatly improved circumstances ; his desire to sustain his brethren ; and, above all, the necessity that he should “ build up a kingdom ! ”

There was no gainsaying all this. The Lord had certainly very greatly blessed him in basket and in store ; it was, moreover, praiseworthy in him to wish to sustain his brethren ; and nobody could deny that he ought to have a “ kingdom ! ” To crown all, the young lady whom he proposed to honor this time could not possibly be objected to by any loyal Saint, for she was of the seed royal of the modern Israel—a daughter of the high-priestly house of Brigham Young!

I suppose, if I had been a right-minded woman, I should have felt the great glory that there was in this proposed alliance. But, in point of fact, such is the perversity of human nature, I did not feel at all pleased, although I could say nothing in objection. I had had some slight suspicion that my husband's eyes, to say nothing of his heart, had lately been inclined to wander in a certain direction, for he had become so particularly regular in his attendance at the theatre. I mentioned the matter to him once or twice, but he answered, that as an editor it was a matter of necessity for him to attend, and that he ought to be there always. This I might, perhaps, have believed, had it not been that it was now several years since his paper was first established, and hitherto his personal attendance at every representation had not been considered absolutely indispensable—reporters had been able to do all that was necessary.

His proposal to marry this young lady, now it was openly stated, shed light upon many things which had before appeared to me rather obscure. Her name was Zina, and she was the daughter of Mrs. Zina D. Huntington Jacobs, whom I have already mentioned as one of the Prophet's wives. She was one of the actresses in the theatre—for many of Brigham's daughters at that time took part in the representations—and I had frequently observed very pretty little notices of her in the Salt Lake Daily Telegraph. Sometimes it had occurred to me that these notices were not quite merited, for other actresses in the same play had really appeared more proficient ; but that, of course, was only my own private opinion. Somehow or other, my husband's opinion seemed always to clash with mine whenever there was a lady in the question ; and in this case I had again and again differed from him in opinion concerning this same young lady, long before I suspected that he had a more than friendly interest in her.

Strange as it would have appeared to any one unused to the ways and works of Mormon Polygamy, my husband consulted me about the matter ; and it was agreed that he should propose to the lady in question. I offered little objection, except mentioning that I thought he would have quite as well fulfilled the commands of God if he had taken an older and plainer-looking wife. These things are generally fully determined before any mention of the matter is made to the first wife, and opposition on her part is seldom of any avail. Besides which, I did not much care now how many wives my husband took,—he might as well have twenty, as the one too many which he already had,—his marriage to another could not possibly make me feel any worse, provided I was not compelled to associate with her. I had resolved that I would never live on familiar terms with his other wives—not because I might disrespect or dislike them personally, but because I could not overcome the purer and better teachings of my early life.

My husband in due form proposed, and was accepted ; and it was soon rumored abroad that he was going to marry one of the “President's” daughters,—Brigham is always spoken of as “President” Young among the Saints. In the course of a day or two they were formally “engaged,” and a more loving couple could not possibly have been found. The young lady herself afterwards told me that their love was of no ordinary kind ; and I'm sure I did not doubt her word. But consider how pleasant such intelligence must have been to a wife !

Zina's friends who wished to cheer me up and make me happy, told me that my husband's love for her was perfectly engrossing, they “thought he could never have really loved before”—there was something very beautiful in their loves !” I need hardly say that I saw these things in quite another light. Of course, when I saw the letters which were constantly passing to and fro,—brought to my house by persons who evidently knew they were bearers of missives of love,—and when I witnessed their effect upon my husband, and saw such anxiety evinced that I should not see them, I did not for a moment doubt their affectionate devotion to each other, but I must admit that to me there was very little "beauty" in it.

The young lady, I believe, regarded my husband's second wife and myself with a great deal of sympathy; for she thought that, however affectionate he might have been to us, she was his first real love. It is a most astonishing fact, that if a Mormon man has ten, fifteen, or even twenty wives, he will be certain, when courting the twenty-first, to make her believe that "he never really loved before;" and then, if afterwards he took a twenty-second, you may be quite sure that she too would be persuaded, or would persuade herself, into a belief in the very same statement. With the last wife, it is always an article of faith that she is the husband's first and only love. It is a curious question:—If a man of many wives starts with as much love for his first wife as ordinary one-wifed men have for theirs, and goes on increasing his love with each additional wife, so that he can always say to the last that "he never really loved before;" how much love will he have when he gets to the tenth or the twentieth? At that rate, Brigham, who in the course of his life has had—say, thirty wives, must have a "30-love" power of affection for the last. The extent of his devotion must be something utterly astounding; by this time the old man must be a perfect Vesuvius of love!

Zina pitied us, I know, when she realised that we could never know the great depth of our husband's love for her. She spoke and acted as if this were how she felt; and I have no doubt that she intended, after her marriage with our husband, to treat us with great kindness and consideration, as a sort of recompense for what we never had truly known, and never could know now—our husband's love! This was very kind, certainly, but I fear it was not at all appreciated by Belinda or myself.

As is almost always the case when the husband takes a third wife, a better state of feeling was brought about between my own husband's second wife and myself. Belinda no longer centred all her jealousy in me, and I, of course, had to divide mine. She now, to a certain extent, began to realise what I had suffered when my husband courted her; she felt badly, and I really did sympathise with her when I remembered how young she was and that she was the mother of three little children. She had her moiety of a husband, it is true; but, like all other polygamic wives, that was her misfortune rather than her comfort or strength. Many a wife would be happier were she a widow; in fact, widows are the happiest class of women in Utah, for they realise that it is far better to have a dead sorrow than a living one.

Now, our husband always maintained that he was not in love with Miss Zina, but that in making love to her he was acting entirely from principle. So all the brethren say; and I have never yet heard of any one of them ever confessing—except, of course, to the maiden herself—that he was in love. To the maiden herself he says, not only that, but a great deal more. But if our husband, at the time of which I speak, was not in love, the saints forbid that I should ever see him in that condition! I am sure when I heard his fiancée speaking of their devotion to each other, and of the fond attachment of her heart to him (for she felt no delicacy in speaking to me—his wife—about such matters,) I came to the conclusion that I had never known what it was to really love, and that my nature was too crude and unrefined to understand the mysteries of the tender passion. There was no love in the case, our husband repeatedly told us—all pure duty!—There are some men, especially among the Mormons, and at certain times, who find this kind of “duty” quite a pleasure.

Long courtships had become quite fashionable among the brethren in Salt Lake City, and I dreaded a long courtship more than anything else, for there is so much that is humiliating, and I might even say disgusting, to a wife when her husband is engaged in love-making to another woman, that I hoped, as much as possible, to be spared passing through such an ordeal a second time.

As the accepted lover and affianced husband of Brother Brigham's daughter, our husband was, of course, constantly in attendance at the Prophet's house. But he was not the only good brother who spent his evenings in Brigham Young's parlor; for it was then—and I suppose it is to-day—a regular rendezvous for middle-aged and young men, and even boys; and there the Prophet's little girls, as well as those who were grown or growing up, obtained an excellent training in the art of flirting and courting.

It has always been said among the Saints that Brigham's girls and the daughters of Daniel H. Wells were the boldest and least retiring maidens to be found in Salt Lake City, and that they presumed greatly upon their imaginary high position; which position nobody but themselves cared anything about. It is well known that the very people upon whom they look down are those who rightly should receive their warmest gratitude and respect, on account of the more than liberal support which they have given to their father, even to the detriment of their own children. But too much must not be expected of young girls brought up in Polygamy.

When first I heard that my husband had set his affections upon one of these girls, I felt convinced that he could not have made a very wise choice. Men are never very wise in such matters, but when they are influenced by the peculiar motives which actuate the Mormon men they become doubly silly; and I could not help dreading that the mere fact of my husband having selected a daughter of the Prophet as his future wife would bring trouble upon us all. What shape that trouble would take, I could form no conjecture, but I felt sure that a change of some sort was fast approaching. My faith was almost gone—I felt the degrading position in which the "Celestial" system placed me and my children, and it seemed to me that I could no longer endure it. My children I could not, and would not, leave, but it was impossible for me to continue to live as I had been living—nor would I think of bringing up my children any longer to believe and live a religion which had so cruelly blighted all my own life. It was for them that I feared now,—I felt that for their sake I must break away from this horrible system.

My own life, I thought, was not worth caring for, but the idea of my little girls growing up and following in my footsteps and enduring as I had endured, was more than I could bear. Something must be done to save them from such a fate.*

About this time I procured a copy of the "Revelation on Celestial Marriage," and read it through carefully and calmly, from beginning to end. The reader may, perhaps, remember that when a copy of it was first given to me, in Switzerland, years before, I was so angry and indignant that when I had got only partly through it I cast it from me in disgust as an outrage upon all that was good and true. From that time, although I had heard portions of it quoted and read, I had never perused it as a whole. On two occasions, at least, my friend Mary Burton was very near reading it through with me, and had we done so, I have not the slightest doubt that my eyes would have been opened to the absurdity and wickedness of the whole system, and years of wretchedness would have been spared me.

Such, however, was not the case. It was not until I had almost drained the cup of sorrow and degradation that, at last, I found an antidote in the deadly thing itself which had been the source of all my unhappiness. I was acting upon the homœopathic principle—"similia similibus curantur,"—and using a dose of poison to cure a disease caused by that poison ;—but if the reader has perused the "Revelation" I think he will admit that it was a pretty big dose for any woman to swallow.

As I read, I saw plainly from the wording of the document that if ever it was given to Joseph Smith—no matter by whom, it was given long after he had practiced Polygamy—or something as bad—and to sanction what he had already done. I had read in the Book of Mormon :

"David and Solomon truly had many wives and concubines, which thing was an abomination before me saith the Lord. Hearken to the Word of the Lord : for there shall not any man among you have, save it be one wife ; and concubines he shall have none." [Book of Mormon, p. 118.]

In the Book of the Covenants, given through Joseph Smith, and held sacred by every Saint, I had read :

"Thou shalt love thy wife with all thy heart, and cleave unto her and none else." [Book of Covenants, p. 124.]

And yet when I turned to the "Revelation" I found in the very first clause :

Verily, thus saith the Lord unto my servant Joseph, that inasmuch as you have enquired at my hand, to know and understand wherein I, the Lord, JUSTIFIED [!] my servants Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, as also Moses, David and Solomon, my servants, as touching the principle and doctrine of their having many wives and concubines," &c.

What could I possibly think of a "Prophet" who, after having the law laid down so clearly, and being told so distinctly that the doings of David and Solomon were an "abomination," and that a man should have but one wife, should enquire of the Lord how he "justified" the very things which He had just declared were "an abomination" unto him ?—Then, too, what blasphemy to represent God as one day giving a "Revelation" declaring a thing sinful, and the next day "justifying" it ! I felt perfectly humiliated with myself that I had never before had the courage to look the matter calmly in the face and discover, as I must have discovered, had I only used my unaided reason, the shameful imposture which had been palmed upon us. I now made careful enquiry, and it was soon clear to me that evidence was not wanting to prove that the doctrine of plural marriages originated in the licentious hearts of Joseph Smith and those associated with him. When once I was convinced of that, the whole fabric of my religion crumbled before my eyes ; and from that time I can hardly say that I had faith in anything that had been taught me.

My husband's second wife was also very unhappy now. She, too, after the general rule, had flattered herself that she was "his first and only love," and it was not pleasant to have her dream of happiness dispelled; but now that another "jewel" was to be added to our husband's crown she could no longer deceive herself. She little knew, poor girl, when she married, that a Mormon's heart is like a honeycomb—there is always a vacant cell wherein another may nestle.

Real trouble, too, she had.—One of her children was taken very sick, and after a severe illness died. I remained with her night and day, and did what I could for the poor child. Had it been possible for me to have felt a greater loathing and detestation for that vile system of Polygamy, that feeling would have been conceived while I watched at the bed-side of my husband's dying child. It was there that I vowed that no Polygamist should ever marry another daughter of mine, and resolved that to my dying day my voice should be raised against the unholy and unnatural teachings of the Mormon Priesthood. I looked at that lonely young mother, who in her hour of trial ought to have had all her husband's sympathy, all his attention, to support her; but who, instead, knew that, however kind he might be to her, he was contemplating a new marriage, and his thoughts must of necessity be more or less with his purposed bride. All unkind feeling was banished from my heart—I forgot that she was my husband's wife, and remembered only that, like myself, she was a suffering woman, a victim to a false faith; and I felt very deeply for her in her time of sorrow and bereavement.

My husband, at this time, had been a member of the Mormon Church for twenty-five years. He had lectured, preached, written and published, in Great Britain, Switzerland, and the United States, in support of the Mormon faith. He had been a most earnest and consistent member of the Church, and devotedly attached to Brigham Young. This attachment to Brother Brigham he shared in common with all the staunchest of his brethren; for while the members of the Church retain unshaken confidence in the new revelation, they naturally acquire a great regard for the Prophet, and render him un-questioning obedience. I believe that my husband would willingly have laid down his life, if by so doing he could have shielded Brigham Young from harm or have been of essential service to him.

But causes were now in operation which, by and by, detached him from the Church, and made it possible for me also to leave the Mormon faith. Hitherto, for my children's sake, I dared not leave the Church without my husband, and I therefore anxiously watched for anything which might rescue him from the bondage in which he was held.

As proprietor of a daily paper, his business had frequently called him to the Eastern States for several months at a time, and I observed that after those visits his editorials took a more liberal turn. My Mormon friends frequently said to me, "Brother Stenhouse is doing himself no good by his constant association with the Gentiles;" and subsequently, when we did apostatise, our secession from the Church was attributed to contaminating Gentile influences.

Then, too, we had frequent visits from strangers passing through Salt Lake City. I saw, with pleasure, that this intercourse with the outside world was gradually undermining my husband's confidence in the teachings of the Elders, and it gave me courage to hope that, after all, the day of liberty might dawn at last. Feeling as I did thus, it will not surprise the reader that I regarded with more and more distrust the proposed marriage of my husband to Brother Brigham's daughter; for I felt that then he would be deeper than ever in the toils of the Priesthood, and I sometimes almost believed that it was my duty to use every influence in my power to prevent it.

Putting my own feelings out of the question, it is probable that I might have done this simply for his own good; for I doubted not that some day the scales must fall from his eyes, and then he would be thankful that I had prevented the marriage. Our paths by this time had certainly diverged far asunder, and my husband had another wife and family; but I believed that he was sincere, though sadly mistaken, or I should not have felt so kindly towards him as I did.

At other times, and observing his devotion, I almost myself began to think that perhaps the nonsense that I had heard was, after all, true, and that this girl was the only one he had really loved ; and, if so, of course he ought to marry her. In fact, so divided was my attention that I hardly knew what to think ; I therefore resolved to act according to circumstances.

Brigham Young, in one of his sermons, says that : "The first thing manifested in the case of apostacy was the idea that the Prophet was liable to make a mistake : when a man believes that, he has taken the first step towards apostacy ; he need only take one step more, and he is out of the Church." This was spoken of Joseph and his Saints, but it suits just as well Brigham and his : I knew very well that my husband had taken the first step, and I sincerely hoped that he might soon take the second. For my own part, I had for some time, not only believed that a Prophet might be mistaken, but, as Brother Heber would say, I knew it.

My husband and his bride elect, like all other lovers, had frequent little quarrels—I suppose for the purpose of making up again, and being then all the more ardent in their affection. But they now had a disagreement which lasted longer than all that had gone before ; although I suppose that neither of them had, at that time, the slightest idea how it was going to end. They had been courting for fifteen months at least, and after so much devotion on the part of my husband, and so much fervent affection on the part of the young lady, it really did seem too bad that so large an amount of love should be thrown away. It was hard that after such a long strain upon their religious and devotional feelings—for they were both very pious lovers—all their labor of love should come to nought. Things had certainly taken a twist, for I know well enough that at one time they both firmly believed that their marriage was preërdained in heaven, and that they were as completely one in feeling as mortals ever could be. The mother, too, who was a very pious woman, once told my husband that she had had a vision in which it was revealed to her that they were destined for each other in the eternal worlds :—the lovers of course firmly believed her. But, for all that, the estrangement still continued, and my husband was constantly making it wider by the articles which appeared in his paper, until at last certain of the sisters whispered that the heart of the lady had been attracted towards some brighter luminary.

Long courtships often end disastrously; but when I heard rumors of the lady's presumed faithlessness, it seemed to me hardly fair, for the day had been fixed for the marriage and the wedding-dress actually made. Of course I sympathised with my husband.—Would any wife like to see her husband disappointed in his love-affairs with another woman, I wonder?

While under these natural feelings of indignation, I one day told Brigham Young, that I thought, after all the courting that had been done—and it was not a trifle—they certainly ought to be married. He said he was willing enough himself, if they wished it; but girls, he said, often changed their minds, and as they could have but one husband, it was only fair that their wishes should be consulted. "If Zina has really changed her mind," he added, "I have plenty of other daughters, and they have all got to be married, let him take one of them,—if one won't, another will!" The reader will see the liberal ideas which Brother Brigham entertains on the subject of marriage.

It may, perhaps, seem rather strange that I should be anxious to have them marry; but, after all that I had seen and endured in Polygamy, can it be wondered at that I should no longer regard the father of my children as my own husband? Had I thought him a bad man, or had he acted as I know many of the good brethren do act; had he brought home girl after girl with the hope of alluring one or more of them into Polygamy, or had he been utterly reckless of my feelings, I might perhaps have been able to cast him from my heart without a single regret. But I really believed that he was acting consistently with the teachings of his religion, and if I felt degraded by the life I lived, it was not his fault—it was the fault of the system. I therefore felt that if things came to the worst, and if I were driven to extremities, and forced to separate from him, I should like to know that he had a wife whom he loved. I felt certain that there was now but little love between him and his second wife, and that some day a separation was sure to take place. The idea of divorce was so repugnant to my feelings that it was only in moments when grief overpowered me, and my heart was wrung with anguish, and I felt utterly reckless, that I for one moment thought of anything like it. Even then I only entertained the idea of a separate life—not divorce. That last resource of the unhappy wife was, however, spared me; and, looking back, I thank God that in His all-wise providence He so shaped my life at that time that my husband and myself, no longer disunited by that disgrace to civilisation and Christianity—Polygamy—can now rejoice together that that last step was never taken, and that no false creed or superstition can ever again divide our interests or our hopes.

Nevertheless, it was strange that the words of my talkative friend should be again verified, and that a second time I should be found persuading my husband to take another wife!

SOME CURIOUS COURTSHIPS—BRIGHAM RUINS OUR FORTUNES—BELINDA DIVORCES "OUR" HUSBAND.

THE reader will see that, setting aside the fact that my husband was already married, there was nothing in his courtships to distinguish them from those of lovers among the Gentiles.

But all courtships in Utah are not carried on in this fashion. Some of the brethren entirely omit the love-making part, and with them to take a new wife is simply to make a bargain. The better the Saint, the less, as a rule, does he seem to care about the feelings of the woman whom he makes his wife. My husband, however, was still leavened with the fashions of the old world and the days of his youth, and like some of the other brethren of good standing in Salt Lake City, he fell into Gentile ways instead of keeping to the true style of Mormon courtship.

I heard of one American Elder who went to the young lady upon whom he had fixed his choice, and without a word of preliminary discourse of an affectionate nature, said: "I've twenty head o' stock, fifty acres o' good land; got a good log-house, an' the nicest ole 'oman in the country!"—Now, sis, will you have me?" Whether the fair damsel was dazzled by this alluring picture or not, I am not quite certain, but one would suppose that she ought to have been.

Now, to balance the Yankee, it is only fair that I should tell you of a certain Englishman who lived in Cache Valley, about a hundred miles from Salt Lake, and who was very anxious to find a second wife. He could not get one in the place where he lived, as the girls were all either married, or, as the Mormons say, "bespoke;" so he came to Salt Lake City as a last desperate resort. To the first unmarried girl to whom he was introduced, without a moment's hesitation he proposed in the following abrupt fashion:

"Say, sis! My bishop told me to take a week's holiday, and come down here and get a wife. Now, if you don't mind going back with me, I shall start to-morrow morning."

The next morning, at seven o'clock, the young lady was to be seen standing by the Englishman's wagon with a sunbonnet on her head and a bundle under her arm. They went to the Endowment House, got sealed for all eternity, and started for home. Hundreds of girls in Utah have been won "for all eternity" with just as little trouble. They must have been girls of rather more than average mortal intelligence, if in the time taken to form their decision they could tell from the little they know of the men who had proposed to them, that they would be willing to live with them "for time;" but to make a bargain for "eternity" with so little ground to rest upon, certainly does seem a little rash.

The Mormons, of all people, with their peculiar notions respecting the eternity of the marriage contract, should be careful whom they marry. But, to tell the truth, they are the most careless.

There is living in Utah, to-day, a woman whom I know, who has been sealed "for all eternity" to no less than nine husbands; and if the divorces which she has obtained are, as Brother Brigham says, not worth the paper upon which they are written, she will be likely to have some trouble when she meets them all in another world. I know of several others who have been sealed to four, five, or six husbands! One of Brigham's own sisters was the wife of several husbands after this fashion. How all these matters can be set right it is difficult to determine, but somebody will have work to do.

Mormonism had been, to my husband, everything. It had for years grown with his growth, until it had become a part of himself. Doubts had occasionally crept into his mind, it is true, but it required time to effect a change. The measures adopted by Brigham Young in the spring of 1869, for the purpose of controlling the commerce of Utah, as well as the property and faith of the people, caused great discontent. The teachings of the Tabernacle were wild and arrogant, and Brigham assumed that it was his right to dictate in everything, "even," he said, "to the setting up of a stocking or the ribbons which a woman should wear." Many of the people, when they heard these words and witnessed the fanaticism created thereby, were aroused to opposition, but Brigham only became more fierce in his denunciations and more harsh in his measures.

I could plainly see that all this had the, to me, much desired effect of alienating my husband from Mormonism, and I never allowed an opportunity of strengthening the impression thus produced to pass unimproved. The articles in his paper showed the condition of his mind, and brought down upon him the wrath of Brigham. At this also I rejoiced, and did not fail to make him feel that he ought to resent the Prophet's interference. Brigham felt too certain of the submission of his slave, and accused Mr. Stenhouse of having published favorable notices of Gentile stores, also of having their advertisements in his paper, and otherwise aiding and abetting the wicked Gentiles,—all which accusations my husband began to feel was an infringement upon his own private personal rights as a citizen and a man. One circumstance followed another, and I could plainly see that his confidence in Brigham's inspiration was slowly but surely dwindling away, and that the day which I had so long anxiously watched for was breaking at last. Notwithstanding this, however, there was one bond which still united him by no weak tie to the Church—he was a Polygamist. The contemplated marriage between him and Brigham's daughter could, I believed, never now take place; but even allowing that, he still had another wife; and now that I had entirely lost faith in Mormonism generally, and the "Celestial Order of Marriage" in particular, I resolved that I would no longer have a partner in my husband's affections—as if he were a "joint-stock concern!"—I would have the whole of a husband, or none. I had not yet, however, sufficient courage to speak to him of my feelings.

I can imagine I see some strong-minded woman smile at the idea of a wife wanting courage to speak to her husband. But such women never knew what Mormonism is. Had they been born Gentiles, they would probably never have entered the Mormon Church; had they been born in the Church they would have been what John Stuart Mill calls "subjugated." John Stuart Mill considered the "Subjugation of Women" among the Gentiles a hard thing, and he wrote a pamphlet and "expressed his mind" about it. But I fancy, if he could have known the iron cruelty of Mormon Polygamy; if he could have seen how the hearts of women are crushed and ground down by the "Celestial" Order among the Saints, until not a spark of womanhood remains in them; if he could have seen the "Subjugation of Women" in Utah, he would have considered their case a thousand times harder than that of their Gentile sisters and would never have ceased writing pamphlets or "expressing his mind."

One Sunday evening, Mr. Stenhouse, when he came home, said to me: "Brother Brigham has given me a mission; he wishes me to go to Ogden and publish my paper there."

This was very unexpected news; but with the vividness of lightning, a glimpse of what the Prophet intended by such a strange proposition flashed across my mind. "He wishes to ruin us!" I exclaimed; "You surely will not go!"

Now Brigham, of course, knew that my husband's paper had a large circulation in Utah Territory as well as in Salt Lake City, and that his business was in a most prosperous condition; he knew also that to do aught that might impair or destroy that business, would be to bring misery and disaster upon all who were dependent upon it for their daily bread. And yet, for all that, he told my husband to break up his establishment, or in his own words, to "pull up root and branch," and go to a place where the people were so miserably poor that it was impossible to make a newspaper successful among them.

In all this the crafty Prophet no doubt acted wisely. The Daily Telegraph would in all probability become a power in the Territory, and he feared that in a short time it would emancipate itself from his control. Brother Brigham has none of the far-seeing perception of the eagle—that perception which has enabled great men to forecast coming events, and thus, to a great extent, mould them when they came. His is more the cunning, crafty eye peculiar to cats, which are blinded when the pure light from heaven falls upon them, but are very quick indeed to perceive the very smallest thing which transpires in holes and dark places within their own contracted little circle of vision. No man can be sharper or more quick-sighted than Brigham in his own circle and within range of his own mental powers; but his circle is limited, and beyond it his mental powers never soared.

I do not doubt that, long before this time, he had noted that my husband was weakening in the faith; but he had waited for his opportunity, and now he considered that it had come. We knew very well that this was the way in which he had always acted towards those whom he feared or doubted:

—when he saw them growing weak in the faith he ruined them, or did the best he could to that effect, before they finally left the Church. I urged my husband to resist this arbitrary decree on the part of the Prophet, and represented strongly the misery which would result from his failure, and the utter impossibility of success. But I soon found that, though he doubted Brigham, his faith in Mormonism was by no means all gone—he, like many another, feared that in disobeying Brigham, perhaps, after all, he might be resisting God. He could see the wrong-doing of the Prophet, and felt that his conduct was unworthy of one who pretended to such great things ; but he regarded this as the weakness of the Prophet's humanity, at the same time believing that in matters of religion he might be divinely inspired. He was still under the influence of the past—he could not yet break asunder the yoke, and bid defiance to Brigham and the Priesthood. He told me that now was the time for him to prove his obedience, cost what it might ; and all the brethren urged him to submit, saying that the Lord would overrule everything for his good.

Believing this, he broke up his establishment at Salt Lake City, and went, as “counselled,” to Ogden. There he remained for several months, during which time he was losing money every day. Finding at last that he could stand it no longer, he asked Brigham Young's permission to return and recommence his paper in Salt Lake City, for no one then dared stir a foot without permission. This was granted, for Brigham had now accomplished his purpose. But some of our friends told me that the teachers, when making their weekly visits, were telling the people not to take in Brother Stenhouse's paper again, if he came back to Salt Lake City, for he was apostatising, and they must not sustain an Apostate. Now, I thought, my husband will believe that I was right in my judgment of Brigham's motives.

My own family and that of the second wife, did not accompany my husband to Ogden ; he was therefore quite at home when he returned, but the expense of transferring his business from one place to another was perfectly ruinous. He had not only purchased valuable property, as I before mentioned, in the City, but he had also realised quite a comfortable little fortune by the success of his paper; but now the property had to be mortgaged, and his fortune was, of course, utterly insufficient for these heavy daily losses. Just then, the severe illness of my eldest son, in San Francisco, made it necessary that we should leave immediately to attend him, for we had received intelligence that he was not at all likely to recover. As it was my own son who was sick, my husband had very naturally determined that I should accompany him; but this brought on such a severe fit of jealousy on the part of his young wife, who already was by no means too happy, that when we returned, after my son's recovery, she threatened to obtain a divorce. My husband told me of this, but I had so frequently heard such threats from wives who were unhappy or neglected that I thought little about it.

One day, not long after our return, I was quite surprised to see Mr. Stenhouse and Joseph A. Young drive up to the door, looking as if something of great importance had just transpired. Mr. Stenhouse jumped out of his buggy and hurriedly gave me a letter, as I thought,—at the same time saying, "Take great care of this for it makes me a free man again." Saying this, he left the house, jumped into the buggy again, and was gone, while I stood holding the paper, wondering what it all could mean.

My husband had told me to "take care" of the paper. He neither said "read it" or "don't read it," and, of course, I was not in the least curious. The envelope was not sealed, so I made up my mind that, though he had not said so, he must have wished me to read what was inside, and at any rate I resolved to risk doing so. To my astonishment I found that the document which he said set him free, was nothing else than a bill of divorce between him and his young wife. It appeared afterwards that she had been to Brother Brigham, had told him of her grievances, and had asked for a divorce.

Now when the wife of any man who is of good standing in the Church, and whom Brigham wishes to honor, comes to him for a divorce, he generally sends for the husband first, tells him about it, and they talk it over together. The husband is counselled to "make the matter up," and a compromise is effected. In the case of my husband, Brigham acted otherwise. The clerk had been directed to make out the papers, which the second wife signed, and, as far as she was concerned, her marriage was dissolved. My husband was then notified that he was wanted at the Prophet's office, and he had a very shrewd guess as to what the nature of the business was for which his presence was desired. He waited till the afternoon when he knew that Brigham would be absent, and then as he was driving out with Joseph A., the Prophet's son, he drew up before the office and asked Joseph to accompany him inside in order to witness a little business which he had to transact. Joseph agreed; but when he found what the business really was, he strongly urged my husband not to sign the papers, or, at least, to take time and consult with President Young first. Mr. Stenhouse, however, never for a moment doubted that Brigham had expected by this hasty move to bring him to his feet, and he would not therefore yield. So, asking the clerk for the papers, he signed them, and Joseph also signed them as a witness—the other witness was David Mackenzie, Brigham's clerk. Belinda had already affixed her name. Ten dollars were then handed over as the usual fee; My husband took one copy of the "bill of divorce," the wife had a right to a second copy, and the third was deposited in the archives of Zion. My husband had then, as we have seen, hastened home to tell me that he was "a free man:"—and yet these two had been "sealed" to each other at the altar in the Endowment House. "for all eternity!"

This is the way that divorces are granted in Utah:—there is not the slightest difficulty about them, if only Brother Brigham is willing. The reader would, perhaps, be interested in seeing one of these terrible documents. I therefore append a true, perfect, and exact copy of my husband's own bill of divorce. It is a fac simile—type, signatures, and all. This is a specimen of an orthodox divorce among the bon ton in Salt Lake City. Out in the Settlements they do things in a much more primitive style, and some of their documents are rather amusing. The following is a correct copy of a Mormon divorce bill taken from the records of Beaver City:—

March 8th 1871

To whomsoever it may concern

This is to certify that in the beginning of 1869 when I gave a bill of divorce to Sarah Ann Lowry I gave to her for the good of her four children the following property viz A parcel of land of about nine acres enclosed all around with a house of two rooms and one cow and heifer

WILLIAM C RITTER

I could, if space permitted, give many others equally interesting.

I cannot say that I was much grieved at the sight of my husband's divorce. At the same time, long training in the school of trouble had hardened my heart and rendered me almost indifferent, and I cannot say that I very greatly rejoiced. Nature adapts us morally, as well as physically, to the positions which we have to occupy in life. The hand of him who labors much becomes hard, and the unshodden foot grows horny, and the heart which at first is tender and, like the æolian harp, ready to answer to the slightest passing breath, by and by, beneath the rough hand of trial and the world, becomes callous and stony, and the roughest storms and the sweetest pleasures alike seem to make little impression upon it.

Thus it was with me when I received that paper. A few years before, a reliable assurance that my husband would never enter into Polygamy would have been to me the realisation of my best earthly wishes. But now my heart was almost dead, and I felt as if I hardly cared one way or the other. If I felt thus, who had still all my darling children around me, who had never missed one dear little face from the fireside or from the table; what must have been endured by those mothers who not only gave away their husbands to other wives, but who lost child after child, until, bereft of all they loved on earth, they could but, like Rachael, sit down in ashes and mourn for the dead?

But the more I thought over what had happened, the more doubtful I felt as to what the result would be. That there would be some great change in our life, I felt assured ; but to me the change was coming almost too late. Then, too, the young wife who in her hasty anger had obtained the divorce.—I felt that her happiness must surely be gone, and I could not bear the thought that my peace should be purchased with the sorrows of another. Brother Brigham's part in the matter was also ever present in my mind. That he had resolved to bring ruin upon my husband I did not now for a moment doubt. But if a weak woman's efforts could in any way assist in thwarting his designs, I fully resolved that he never should have the satisfaction of seeing those designs successful. I would stand by my husband, I would work for, and assist, him, and would give not even a passing thought to what I might have suffered, or remember that he had ever loved others better than myself. I would be to him now the true wife that before God I had vowed to be, for worse as well as for better; and however I myself might have been wronged, I would, for my part, endeavor faithfully to perform my whole duty to my husband and to God.

After I had formed this mental resolution, and had begun to realise our new position, I felt as if awakening from a long dream of many years;—I was released from the clutches of that frightful nightmare—Polygamy ; and I could once more take my place beside my husband as his wife. I knew that he would have much to contend against, and would need all the moral support that I could accord to him. Brigham's efforts in respect to my husband's paper had been far too successful, and although it was still carried on, fresh difficulties sprang up every day. My husband had been deceived by Brigham's oily manner and plausible way ; but to others his intention in sending him away was no secret. A man, named Bull, who is now and was also at that time, employed in the Deseret News office, said that no one but Mr. Stenhouse had ever been deceived by what the Prophet had done—it was commonly reported that Brigham intended to ruin my husband, and that when he prophesied that the paper in Ogden should be a great success, he was himself perfectly aware that it was utterly impossible that such should be the case.

Whether Brigham was the deceiver or the deceived, I do not wish to say. Men who consider themselves inspired, and go on day by day uttering all sorts of nonsense and blasphemy, and giving impertinent and mischievous advice in the "name of the Lord," at last become thoroughly impervious to reason, and daily and hourly deceive themselves. I hope, for his own sake, it was so with Brigham, for I would rather believe him a self-made fool than a downright knave; and in many of his transactions—perhaps I ought almost to say all—it is clear to every one that he is either one or the other. Of one thing I am certain,—I was fully contented that we should lose all, if only my husband were taken, once and for ever, clean out of the meshes of Mormonism. We might have to make a terrible sacrifice, but to me it was a sacrifice well worth the making.

CHAPTER XL.

MARY BURTON—LIFE'S JOURNEY ENDED · REST AT LAST.

Sent for in Haste—"Sister Mary had taken Poison"—Mary's Troubles—Elder Shrewsbury's Wives—Removing to Salt Lake City—Domestic Life without Love—A Wife's Despair—A Divided Household—Seeking Sympathy—The forsaken Wife—The change which Polygamy produced in a Husband—Comforting a heartbroken Wife—Dark thoughts—Waiting for the End—Mary attempts to destroy Herself—A Painful Story—Heartless conduct of Elder Shrewsbury—A Wife's Curse—Shadows of the Night—Broken-Hearted—The Little Medicine Chest—A fatal Potion—Elder Shrewsbury visits his dying Wife—"What a Curse was there!"—With my dying Friend—Life's Journey Ended—Rest at last.

IT was about this time that one morning, very early, before I was well up, a young girl came to the house in a great hurry, asking to speak to me without a moment's delay.

I threw a wrapper round me, and went out at once to see her. She said she came from the house of Sister Mary Burton, and begged me to come directly and see her, for Mary had taken poison and it was thought she was dying.

Now, I have been so much engaged of late in telling my own sorrows, that Mary Burton has quite dropped out of my story. But it must not be supposed that all that time I saw nothing of my poor friend. On the contrary, I had seen her much more frequently of late than I used to when I first came to Salt Lake City. When I last spoke of her it was when she was about to return to Southern Utah, where she and her husband then resided. It was evident to me from her conversation, as it must have been to the reader, that her faith in Mormonism had even then entirely gone, that she felt her husband's neglect and unkindness most keenly, and that she had become a miserable, broken-hearted woman. It was very painful to contrast what she now was with what she had been when I first knew her, and then to think what a happy wife and mother she might have been if the spectre of Mormonism had not crossed her path.

Mary and her husband, Elder Shrewsbury, left the Settlements about a year after the time I last mentioned her, and took up their abode in Salt Lake City. Elder Shrewsbury had prospered exceedingly, and when he came to Salt Lake he brought with him, besides Mary, his second wife, Ellen, who, as we before noticed, had become very much attached to her. The other three wives and their children were left at the farm in Southern Utah. He would probably have brought them all with him, had there been in the City a house large enough to hold them all. As it was, he purchased a good lot about half a mile from where we resided, with a comfortable house upon it; and there his first and second wives lived together. This was the man who had solemnly sworn before God, that he would never practice Polygamy! But I doubt if Elder Shrewsbury, with his comfortable house in the City, his farm and lands in the South, his fast increasing property, and his many wives, felt truly the hundredth part of the happiness which he would have experienced in the devotion of one faithful heart, even had it been in the midst of poverty and care. He, however, poor infatuated man, did not think thus; he was actually even now courting a young girl of about seventeen years of age, who the two wives daily expected would be brought home to aid in building up their husband's "Kingdom." I do not think Mary cared much about this. It was the taking of the first plural wife that was her great sorrow. After that, her love for her husband weakened, until it altogether died out, and she did not care how many wives he took.

Mary's high spirit was always urging her into rebellion. In married life both husband and wife give way to each other in a thousand little things, of no consequence in themselves, but quite sufficient, without the presence of love, to sow the seeds of discord. But when love has fled, and the husband looks upon his wife—the companion of his youth, the mother of his children—not as the partner of his whole life and the sharer of all his joys and sorrows, but as a person whose presence is a reproach to him and who is an inconvenience rather than otherwise ;—and when the wife regards her husband as one whom formerly she loved with true devotion, but who has cruelly broken her heart and trampled upon her feelings, and who is nothing to her now but a tyrant whose very presence is painful to her,—can there then be any forbearance, any of those gentle kindnesses, any of those loving forgivenesses, any of those mutual tendernesses and sweet confidences which constitute the charm of married life, and make it what the Apostle said it was—a type of the sacred union between Christ and His people in heaven.

In giving up Mormonism, my unhappy friend gave up, as too many have done, faith in all else. She had lived, as she thought, a life of religion ; and when she found what a terrible mockery of all that is holy that so-called religion was, she cast it aside, thinking that all religion was vain. She did not see that she would have acted just as wisely in rejecting all food because she chanced to partake of some that was poisoned ; she did not see that, although the broken reed on which she rested was unable to yield her any true support, nevertheless the everlasting foundations of Eternal Truth which God Himself has laid can never be removed ; and that though creeds and systems may fail and pass away, only to give place to others equally unsatisfactory, yet those divine verities are established for ever, are beyond the reach of earthly vicissitudes, and know nothing of time or change.

Utterly miserable and sick at heart, Mary cared not whether she lived or died. There was nothing to bind her to life, and beyond the life of this world she was altogether without hope. A more wretched existence it is scarcely possible to imagine.

While they were still in the Settlements, she treated the other wives with the greatest contempt, sitting by them at the table or passing them in the house without vouchsafing a look or a word. Her husband, as might be expected, avoided her whenever it was possible, and the other wives returned her coldness and disdain, and in turn annoyed her as much as they could when they were not too busy looking after one another. It would be impossible to picture a house more divided against itself than was that of Elder Shrewsbury.

When the two wives, Ellen and Mary, lived together with their husband in Salt Lake City, Mary, of course, had no opportunity of showing her hatred and contempt for the Polygamic wives. But towards her husband she evinced a cold disdain, as if he were now nothing at all to her—as if her very heart itself had been withered. For Ellen, who since Elder Shrewsbury had taken his other wives had clung to her with a child-like affection, and to her own little girl alone, she showed that deep and constant love which she had once lavished upon such an unworthy object.

She used to come to me and tell me all her griefs ; and in a passion of rage and tears she would hurl defiance at Mormonism and curse bitterly the system that had wrecked her life. Then I would soothe her, and speak calmly to her, and try to place matters in their best light ; and she would sit and listen in a painful state of apathy as if she cared for none of these things. Presently she would rise and go, and then, perhaps, I would not see her for weeks together, unless I chanced to call upon her at her own house. Sometimes, for days and even weeks at a time, she would shut herself up in her room and refuse to see her husband or any one else, except her little girl, who slept in the same room with her, and who at such times used to bring in what food they wanted ; for in these melancholy fits she would not even let the servants come near her.

There was a little table near the window, and from the casement of the window could be seen in the far distance the lofty ranges of the Wahsatch Mountains. And sitting at that table, gazing from that window, with her cheek resting upon her hand, Mary would watch the whole day long as if entranced in some ecstatic vision. Her little girl—a child of winning ways, bashful to an extreme and very pretty, but, though so young, with a look of wistful sadness upon her childish face—had become accustomed to her mother's ways; and when one of these long spells of melancholy came upon her, she would either steal out quietly and wander away for a long walk all by herself—for she never played with the other children in her father's house—or else, as was more frequently the case, she would sit down on the ground near her mother and silently amuse herself with a book or some childish toy.

To my mind there was something inexpressibly painful in all this. When Mary did not come to see me, I would call round at her husband's house, and try to draw her out from her melancholy seclusion. It was very seldom that I saw Elder Shrewsbury, and I cannot say that I wished to do so. He had, as his wife told me, undergone a complete change since I knew him in England.—The open look, the upright bearing, the earnestness of speech, which then characterised him, were now gone for ever. He was still a handsome man, rather portly, and evidently well to do in the world; but there were lines about his eyes which ought not to have been seen in the face of a man of his years; and his lips, without uttering a word, told their own story. I could remember watching those lips—rather full and voluptuous even then—in the old days when Polygamy was unknown and Mormonism came upon us in all its freshness and stirred our very souls to their utmost depths.—Then they seemed instinct with the thought and intellect of the man, and their very expression conveyed a meaning almost as eloquent as the words which proceeded from them. Now they were listless and heavy; and if any expression hovered around them still, it was an expression of sensuality and selfishness. Was it, I sometimes asked myself, Polygamy that ruined that man; or was there in his nature—hidden of course in early days—that which led him to Polygamy, and which, had there been no Mormonism, would have developed itself in some other degrading way?

Heartbroken and wretched, weary of life, and yet with no hopeful assurance of life beyond the grave, poor Mary lived on year after year, while those who seemed to dance in the very sunshine of existence were cut off like the summer flowers in the harvest-field. Lately, however, I thought I saw symptoms of a change. The pitcher may be taken often to the fountain, but it will be broken at last, and this poor, weak body of ours, wonderful as its powers of endurance are, cannot last for ever. With a mind at ease and happy, we can bid defiance to many of the ills which flesh is heir to, but when the mind is troubled, and the heart is weary, and the flesh also is weak, the thread of life is ready at any moment to be snapped asunder.

I saw this clearly in the case of my poor friend. Every time she came to see me, or I called at her house, I noticed that she was perceptibly growing thinner and thinner; her eye seemed brighter, and there was always a flush upon her cheek, which would have been beautiful had it not been for the seal of melancholy which was stamped upon every feature. But the brightness of the eye, and the flush upon the cheek, were not symbols of health, but the imprint of the finger of death.

She did not know this. Though she longed to die, she little thought that death was so near her. Sometimes she would talk almost happily of the old by-gone days; then she would sit brooding over her griefs; and then again she would talk anxiously about the future of her little daughter. I had seen other wives as wretched as poor Mary was,—aye, more so, for they had abject, grinding poverty superadded to all their woes;—but, more than for any other I felt for my poor friend, and exerted myself to the uttermost to comfort her. In this I had been to a certain extent successful. She would appear for a time a little more cheerful, but it was not long before she relapsed into her habitual melancholy way.

That which troubled me most of late, in my intercourse with Mary, was the fact that she was always talking about death. This certainly was no matter of surprise to me, but it was very painful. Over and over again she would discuss the question—whether under any circumstances suicide could be justified, and whether if any one, in absolute despair were to take away their own life, God would ever pardon them.

I would never enter into such subjects as these, for I considered that such conversation showed a morbid condition of mind, could not possibly be of any good to either of us, and would only suggest harmful thoughts. But again and again Mary reverted to the subject, and I really at last began to grow quite anxious about her.

It was not, therefore, with surprise that I received the summons that morning. I did not wait to ask any questions about the poisoning, but hastened to the bedside of my unfortunate friend, trusting that I might yet be in time to render some assistance.

I found her lying on the bed, partly dressed, and, as it seemed to me at first, asleep. There was, at the bedside, and bending over her, the second wife, who was in as much trouble as if the sufferer had been her own sister. The poor girl had been weeping, and was evidently very much distressed. There was also present in the room another sister, whom I recognised as a friend of Mary's. The little daughter of the unfortunate woman was there as well. One person, whom every one would naturally have expected to see at the bedside of a dying wife under such circumstances, was conspicuous by his absence,—I mean, of course, Elder Shrewsbury himself.

I sat down on the bed, beside poor Mary, and took her hand in mine. It was cold but damp, and her breathing was somewhat heavy. She was still unconscious. I asked the pretty pale-faced girl—the second wife—who was bending over her, how it had all happened, and whether they had had a doctor.

"Oh, yes," she said, sobbing all the time, "we sent for the doctor, and he has only just gone. He said he had done all he could, and that we could let her sleep on now."

She then told me what had taken place. It appeared that the night before, Elder Shrewsbury had gone up into Mary's room to speak to her about a matter of some importance. Although living in the same house she had not seen him for several weeks, and the mere fact of being in his presence agitated her. He told her he had come to talk about her child—little Mary, called Mary after her mother. For some reason or other, which nobody then seemed to understand, Elder Shrewsbury had taken a fancy that the child should be separated from her mother; he wanted to send her to stay with his other family in the Settlements, and it was for this purpose he came to see Mary that night. It certainly did seem the refinement of cruelty to separate the child from her poor mother, who would thus have become, as one might say, doubly widowed; and I am strongly inclined to question whether Elder Shrewsbury's motives were of the purest kind. It is, however, only just to state, that subsequently, when speaking to a friend about the matter, he said that he had long noticed in his wife what he considered were incipient symptoms of madness, and he thought that his duty towards the child imperatively demanded that he should immediately take her away from her mother. He added—as was indeed true—that his other wives in the South would have taken the greatest care of her.

Mary was furious when the proposal was made to her. She bitterly upbraided her husband for all his cruelty and neglect, she cursed him for his perfidy, and she vowed that nothing but death should separate her from her little girl.

Elder Shrewsbury trembled at the anger of his poor forsaken wife, and he crept out of her room and downstairs. But Mary could not be appeased. She went to the room of the second wife—the only creature in the house, besides her little girl with whom she sometimes condescended to hold intercourse—and there she acted in a very wild and extravagant way. It was with great difficulty that she was at last persuaded to lie down and take a little rest. She would not go to her own room; so Ellen—the second wife—persuaded her to remain with her all the night. She lay down, but did not sleep. She muttered strange things, and by and by sat up in the bed and spoke as if people were present whom she had known years and years ago. Ellen was frightened; but out of love to Mary, and not wishing that others should see her in that crazy condition, she did not call for help, thinking that presently she would fall asleep and in the morning all would be right. But the long night passed away, and just before day-break Ellen fell into a sort of fitful slumber. It would seem that just then poor Mary discovered for the first time that she was not sleeping in her own room, and that her little daughter was not with her. Distracted as her mind was, she probably thought that they had stolen the child away, and went in search of her.

She found her way to her own room, and then what happened no one, of course, could tell. She must have seen that her child was safe; and it is not unlikely that, reassured on that point, she felt that she needed rest, and thought that it would be best to take some sedative to produce the sleep which she believed would restore her to herself again. She had in her room a little leather medicine-chest—a very useful article for any one travelling, or to keep in the house—and to that she must have had resort. Certain it is, that when, an hour later, Ellen awoke and went to see what had become of her husband's first wife, she found the little medicine-chest open upon the bureau, Mary lying upon the bed, apparently asleep, and a faint sickly smell, which one better versed in such things would have known was the smell of opium, pervading the whole room.

Ellen began to scream and call for help, and one of the women about the house, who was up at that early hour, came to see what was the matter. She, upon hearing what Ellen said, rushed downstairs shrieking for assistance. Fortunately for every one, Elder Shrewsbury, who had just risen, was standing in the hall-way below. He took hold of the noisy woman and asked her what was the matter, and after hearing all she had to say he sent her to attend to her domestic duties, with a strict injunction to say nothing to a living soul about what she had seen or heard.

Elder Shrewsbury then went up to Mary's room, and there he learned that all that the silly woman had just said to him was quite true. He, however, betrayed no emotion. Very calmly he put the stopper back into the laudanum bottle, then looked at his watch and hesitated, all the while that pale-faced Ellen was looking anxiously at him, wanting to know what she could do. After a few moments of indecision, Elder Shrewsbury turned to Ellen and said, "Yes; go for the doctor."

Ellen flew upon her mission.

Meanwhile, Elder Shrewsbury looked towards the bed where poor Mary lay—Mary, for whose love he had perjured his soul—Mary who never would have been his had he not given that sacred promise, the breaking of which made him an outlaw from heaven and a thing to be despised of men. He looked for one single moment at his poor wife as she lay there, and then he turned upon his heel and went out of the room. For the wealth of all the world I would not feel as that man felt, if the thoughts which then crowded upon his brain were what, for the sake of our common humanity, I trust they were. The remembrance of the life which his folly or fanaticism—it matters little which—had blasted; the thought of that solemn vow which he had taken to love her only and for ever; the sight of that dear one to whom he had once plighted his troth, now desolate, forsaken, almost maniac in her wretchedness.—Oh God! what a curse was there for any man's soul to bear!

The physician, when he came, administered an emetic and made them walk the patient about the room. Ellen and the friend of Mary who was present volunteered for this service. They supported her, one on each side, and paced her round and round the room, thus compelling her to exertion ; and from time to time they made her swallow doses of strong coffee, in which a little brandy had been mixed. When, at length, signs of returning consciousness were apparent, the physician left, promising to call again in the course of the morning.

It was then that some one present thought of sending for me, and I arrived not long after the physician had gone. I was the only person, outside the family, beside the friend whom I have mentioned, who knew of any thing that had taken place—so careful were they that the matter should not get abroad ; and I should certainly not have been summoned had it not been for the close intimacy which existed between Mary and myself, which made us more like sisters than friends. The reader must not, however, suppose that in relating this I am even now betraying a trust ; for my friends in Utah know as well as I do that so many unhappy wives have in their desperation been driven to attempt self-destruction, that having no clue in the name, which solely out of love for my poor friend, I have all through this narrative given her, they will not know who to fix upon as the person to whom I allude.* There is, however, one still living—he will know—let his own conscience be his accuser.

In about half an hour's time, Mary began to recognise those who were around her, but she did not seem disposed to speak. She opened her eyes and looked dreamily at me for a long time, but the slight pressure of my hand was her only recognition of my presence. I bent down over her and whispered a few assuring words in her ear, and for a moment a faint, weary smile lighted up her thin, pale face. It was not like the sweet smiles of the by-gone days which used to suffuse her whole countenance with sunshine—it was but the very ghost of a smile. Presently she sank into a gentle slumber ; but I still sat by her on the bed, holding her hand in mine, and I remained there for two or three hours. Then, after seeing that every thing was at hand which she could possibly want if she awoke, and assured by Ellen that she would not leave her until she was able to sit up, I left for my own home.

* Besides poor Mary's family, in every other instance [with the solitary exception of Sister Ann—my "talkative friend"—who is still living and is so well known in Salt Lake City,] I have been as scrupulous in giving real names as I have been in stating only facts which I had either witnessed or knew beyond question were true.

At the bottom of the stairs, in the hall-way, I was confronted by Elder Shrewsbury himself. This surprised me, as hitherto he had most sedulously avoided coming in contact with me. He gave me one searching glance, as if to read my thoughts, and then said: "Sister Stenhouse, this is a most unhappy affair, but say nothing about it—no good can come of talking of such matters."

I assured him that for Mary's sake—not for his—I would not speak of what had transpired; but when he held out his hand for me to shake I affected not to see it, but wished him good-morning, and left the house.

* * * * *

For some time she said nothing to me about the sad event which had so greatly troubled us, and when at length she hesitatingly alluded to it, I was much relieved to find that the taking of the deadly drug was on her part wholly accidental. It was as I from the first suspected—for I knew and loved my dear friend too well to wrong her even by a thought. Cruelly as she had suffered, wretched and miserable as she was, bitterly as she felt, the instincts of her heart were too true and her nature too noble to allow of her seeking oblivion from her troubles in voluntary and premeditated death, as I have known was the case with many wretched Mormon wives. She had only thought to take an opiate to soothe the feverish excitement which had almost bereft her of reason, and, in the weak and enfeebled condition in which she was, the draught had been too powerful for her. Guiltless as she was, she dreaded that others might impute wrong motives to her in what she had done; and even to me she spoke of her sickness painfully and with hesitation.

After this, I called day after day upon my poor friend, until she was sufficiently recovered to walk about and even to get out of doors a little. The story of the unhappy attempt which she was supposed to have made upon her life, by some means, however, got rumored abroad, and she heard of it. She said nothing at the time, but I believe it preyed upon her mind. Weak and failing in health, as she long had been, the shock which her system had received was too much for her, and it was evident to every one who saw her that her earthly trials would soon be ended. She sank gradually, and life ebbed from her gently and without pain. A few days before she died, she sent for me, and I spent several hours with her. I might say that they were happy hours; for the near prospect of death seemed to have dispelled all those gloomy fears of the future life, which had for so many years troubled her soul; and she now looked forward with peaceful resignation to her approaching change. Death came at last to her when she was sleeping, and she passed away tranquilly and without a sigh. I almost rejoiced when I heard that at last her weary journey was over and she was at rest. She had been ever very dear to me, and I loved her with the fondest affection. But I shall never think of her without bitter feelings towards that unholy system which brought her to an untimely grave; for she of all others was one of the fairest flowers which were ever blighted by Mormonism and Polygamy.

CHAPTER XLI.

MY HUSBAND DISFELLOWSHIPED—WE APOSTATISE— BRUTAL OUTRAGE UPON MY HUSBAND AND MYSELF.

NOTWITHSTANDING all my own personal troubles and the difficulties which surrounded us, the loss of my dear friend affected me very deeply. And yet her story is the same as might be told of hundreds of other English girls who have been lured from their happy homes and have died broken-hearted and neglected in Utah.

Now came that change in our life which I had so long hoped for, but which had always seemed to me so very far distant. We had been tossed by many a storm, but the violence of this last gale was such that it forced us clean out of the sea of Mormonism, and landed us high and dry upon the firm ground of apostacy.

My husband had been so long engaged in the defence of Mormonism that it had become almost a part of himself ;—its doctrines and observances seemed to him beyond a question, its weak and doubtful points were ignored, and implicit obedience to the behests of the Priesthood was with him an article of faith. When therefore I heard him, with others, talking over some of the questionable teachings of the Church, criticising Brigham's counsellings, doubting some of his measures, and speaking of him as they would of any of the other brethren, I was satisfied that his days of faith were numbered. The point that I had all along been aiming at was to get him to think for himself, for hitherto he had been a mere tool in the hands of the Priesthood. Long years of submission and receiving as divine inspiration all that a "Prophet" is pleased to say, necessarily benumbs the soul and withers its life, until unconsciously the victim becomes an abject slave. And this is the position to-day of many otherwise well-informed and intelligent people in the Mormon Church—they are mere automata.

About the time when my husband returned with his paper to Salt Lake City, the Utah Magazine, a liberal journal just struggling into existence, began to call in question some of Brigham's measures, and the editors, who were all men of some mark in the Mormon Church, presumed to hint that the people had rights and privileges as well as the Priesthood. This was done in a very quiet, unobtrusive way, but it was, nevertheless, pronounced rebellion and apostacy. My husband's paper was silent upon the subject ; and, in consequence, he was suspected of being in league with the enemy. This was another good reason why the people should be "counselled" not to take in the Telegraph. Although he was not yet sufficiently advanced in thought to give much direct aid to the questioners of Brigham's authority, I saw with pleasure that he did not wish to oppose them ; the tone of his paper was evidently changing, and the articles which appeared from time to time gave serious offence to Brigham Young. This, however, was not all his wrong-doing ;—he had of late been neglectful in his attendance at the "School of the Prophets"

—a meeting which was then held every Saturday for the benefit of the Elders, but which has now for a time been discontinued, on account of some of the brethren turning traitor and revealing all that was said.

Together with the editors of the Utah Magazine, Mr. Stenhouse and one or two others were summoned to appear at the School on the following Saturday, to give their reasons for previous non-attendance. This they had all along anticipated, and were therefore not surprised at the summons, but they hardly expected that Brigham would act so precipitately; for, without waiting to hear their reasons, he disfellowshipped them all for irregular attendance.

Brigham's assumption of the right to disfellowship men from the Church because of irregular attendance at the School was a stretch of authority which startled my husband: "What will he not do next?" he said. "To submit would be to acknowledge him absolute, and me a slave. There is but one alternative now—slavery or freedom. Cost me what it may, I will be free!"

Those who have never been enslaved by a superstitious faith which mentally and bodily enthrals its devotees, as Mormonism does, can form no idea of the joy, the happiness, which is experienced when, after years of spiritual servitude, the shackles are burst asunder and the slave is "FREE!" There is pleasure even in the thought itself that one is free—free to think and free to act, free to worship according to the dictates of one's own conscience, and free to speak one's own opinions and sentiments, without the constant fear that some spy is listening to every word and that the consequences may be far from pleasant!

In August of the same year, my husband sent a respectful and kindly letter to the Bishop of our Ward, stating that he had no faith in Brigham's claim to an "Infallible Priesthood," and that he considered that he ought to be cut off from the Church. I added a postscript, stating that I wished to share my husband's fate—little thinking that within three days my request would be answered in a too literal manner.

A little after ten o'clock, on the Saturday night succeeding our withdrawal from the Church, we were returning home together. The night was very dark, and as our residence is in the suburbs of the City, north of the Temple block, and the road very quiet, the walk was a very lonely one and perhaps not altogether too safe. We had gone about a third of the way, when we suddenly saw four men come out from under some trees at a little distance from us. In the gloom of the night we could only see them very indistinctly, and could not distinguish who they were. They separated; and two of them came forward and stumbled up against us, and two passed on beside us. For a moment I thought that they were intoxicated, but it was soon clear that they were acting from design. As soon as they approached, they seized hold of my husband's arms, one on each side, and held him firmly, thus rendering him almost powerless. They were all masked, for it was supposed that thus we should not be able to discover their identity, and that if by any chance an investigation should subsequently be made into the doings of that night it would not be possible for any one to witness against them.

I am inclined to think that these wretches, when they planned the attack, had not calculated upon my being present with my husband, and I imagine that when they saw me with him they supposed I should scream and run away, after the manner of many women. In this, however, they were mistaken. I still clung to my husband's arm, but with my left hand caught hold of one of the ruffians by the collar of his coat; for I apprehended the worst, well knowing of what atrocities these men were capable. It is no secret that the police of Salt Lake City—for it is the police who there commit murders and other inhuman outrages—treat with the greatest brutality all the unhappy Gentiles and Apostates whose misfortune it is to fall into their power. This also is the wretched effects of the fanatical teaching of the Church. These men believe that Utah is Zion—the “Kingdom of God,” and that citizens of the United States are but intruders upon this holy ground; that they ought to be driven out and despoiled of everything, and even murdered if opportunity offers. They make no secret of these feelings towards the Gentiles, and towards Apostate Mormons it is shown, if possible, in a somewhat stronger manner.

The movements of the two men who held my husband were somewhat impeded by my clinging to his arm, and they seemed to hesitate for a moment. The other two, who stood a few feet distant from us, also hesitated. One of the men who held my husband said to them, "Brethren, do your duty." We recognised his voice at once as that of a certain policeman—a young man whom we had known in England when a child, and with whose family we had been upon the most friendly terms.

In an instant I saw them raise their arms, as if taking aim, and for one brief second I thought that our end had now surely come, and that we, like so many obnoxious persons before us, were about to be murdered for the great sin of apostacy. This, I firmly believe, would have been my husband's fate, if I had not chanced to be with him or had I run away;—they would probably have beaten him to death;—they, who I have every reason to believe were two of the regular and two of the special policemen;—and then, the next morning, they would have "discovered" the body, and it would have been said that he had been murdered by Gentiles or Apostates in a personal quarrel or a street brawl. My presence somewhat disarranged their plans, and it was that probably which caused the two men to hesitate, not knowing what would be considered their "duty" under present circumstances.

A much less noble fate than assassination was reserved for us. The wretches, although otherwise well armed, were not holding revolvers in their hands as I at first supposed. They were furnished with huge garden-syringes charged with the most disgusting filth, in the preparation of which they took especial pains. So kindred to their own base natures was such an act that I doubt not they found it quite a labor of love. The moment the syringes were pointed at us, my husband, thinking a shot was coming, moved his head, and thus to a certain extent escaped the full force of the discharge. I, however, was not so fortunate. My hair, bonnet, face, clothes, person—every inch of my body, every shred that I wore—were in an instant saturated, and my husband and myself stood there reeking from head to foot.

The villains, when they had perpetrated this disgusting and brutal outrage, turned and fled. We ran after them for some little distance, but we had no arms and nothing with which to defend ourselves; in fact we pursued them instinctively rather than with any idea of overtaking them. There was another man standing a little distance off in the direction in which they were running, and we could not tell how many might be concealed:—the place, too, was dark and lonely, for they had gone behind the Temple block—a fit corner for murderers to skulk in; a convenient spot for the commission of any unholy deed. I was burning with indignation, and longed to revenge myself upon the brutal cowards who had assaulted us. In my anger I called upon them to come and kill us outright, for I would have preferred death to such an indignity. I almost wonder that they did not take me at my word and return and finish their foul work, for they have long acted upon the principle that “dead men tell no tales.”

There were, at that time, in Utah, a great many special or secret police who were always ready for any dirty, brutal, or murderous work. Just near our home in Salt Lake City, there is one miserable old fellow who has not yet been called to account for his numerous crimes and villainies. In his younger days he was one of these secret police, and, to judge from his language, his only regret now is that he is no longer fit for active service. He has often told a neighbor of mine, who he believes is a good Mormon, that nothing would give him more pleasure than to serve my husband and myself as he thinks we deserve—simply because we have dared to oppose Mormonism. The wife of one of the men whom we had suspected, not long after came to see me and told me that she did not doubt that her husband had been engaged in the affair, for she had accused him of it and he had not denied it. It seems perhaps strange that any wife should act thus, but this poor woman had a great regard for me, but none at all for her husband who treated her most brutally.

I shall never forget that night. I declared that henceforth I would tear from my heart every association—every memory—every affection, which still remained to bind me to Mormonism—not one solitary link should be left. Henceforth I would be the declared and open enemy of the Priesthood. To the utmost of my power—weak though I might be—I would arouse the women of Utah to a sense of the wrongs which they endured; I would proclaim to the world the disgrace which Mormonism is to the great American nation, the foul blot that it is upon Christianity and the civilisation of the age!

I do not blame the mass of the Mormon people that such outrages as this can be perpetrated in their midst,—I blame the Priesthood, and I blame the leaders and their teachings. I know the honest hearts of the Mormon community at large, and that as a body they revolted at the atrocious wrong that had been done to us. Although no one who valued their standing in the Church dared openly express what they felt, hundreds did so in private; while the whole Gentile community was aroused and indignant, and letters came from all parts of the country, and visitors daily called upon me to express their sympathy.

My son-in-law, Joseph A. Young, on the night of the attack offered a reward to the chief of the police, for the apprehension of the ruffians; but we knew well enough they would never be discovered. A few Gentile friends also offered a reward of five hundred dollars for any evidence that might lead to their identification, but nothing, of course, was elicited. The Mormon paper, in order to divert attention from the guilty parties, insinuated that the outrage had been provoked by some family difficulty, and suggested that the brothers of my husband's second, and now divorced, wife were the offenders. This I knew was utterly false, for they were respectable young men who would have scorned such an action, and between them and my husband not the slightest ill feeling existed. I therefore sent a letter to Belinda, telling her what had been said and asking her to write to me stating that it was all untrue. I felt sure that she would willingly comply with my request, and I proposed, as I informed her, to publish her reply, and thus exonerate her brothers from all blame.

A lady who was present when Belinda received the note, told me that she asked her mother, who was also there at the time, what she should do about it, and that her mother said—"You had better take the letter to Brother Brigham, and do whatever he counsels you to do." She did so, and Brother Brigham told her to pay no attention to it. Brigham did not care whether her brothers or any one else were disgraced, or who was made the scapegoat, so that the vile minions of the Priesthood might escape undetected.

The suggestion that a personal difficulty or a family matter had provoked the outrage was by no means a new one. In the same way the "Indians" had been credited with many a deed of blood when Apostates fleeing from Zion were found murdered and horribly mangled in the Cañons or on the Plains. The same course also was adopted when Dr. Robinson, of whom I have already spoken, was assassinated. On the following Sunday, in the Tabernacle, Brigham Young suggested that the doctor had met his death in a gambling quarrel, and that some man whom he had personally wronged had dealt the fatal blow. But every one in Salt Lake City—whether Mormon or Gentile, Brigham Young included—knew that Dr. Robinson was innocent of any gambling predilections, and was the last man to make a personal enemy. Then Brigham offered a reward of five hundred dollars for the discovery of the murderers; but subsequently, when several of the brethren had been arrested, charged with that very crime, and indictments against them had been found by the Grand Jury, he withdrew his offer lest, as he said, some evil-minded person might commit perjury for the sake of the reward!

It was the same with ourselves. Every one could conjecture with tolerable accuracy who it was that had planned the outrage, but the reward which was offered was, as we well knew it would be, all in vain. Good Mormons did not dare to express their thoughts ; but we all knew that the outrage was the direct result of the teachings of the Tabernacle, and that although the authorities might not, and probably did not, directly command it, they connived at it, and never took the first step towards the discovery of the wretched scoundrels who perpetrated the deed.

CHAPTER XLII.

AMUSING TROUBLES OF MY TALKATIVE FRIEND—CHARLOTTE WITH THE GOLDEN HAIR!

Another Visit from my Talkative Friend—A preliminary Fuss—"The picture of Despair?"—He did it on Purpose—"That little Shrimp of a Girl"—Her red hair: "Charlotte's hair is Golden!"—A Little Hasty!—An Object of Interest—"My husband is a Man"—"You can't calculate a Man"—A nice Question of Privilege—Rather too much to Manage—A nice Young Woman of Thirty-Five or so!—Stout in Proportion—Old enough to be his Grandmother, and Squinted—Getting used to a proposed Bride—Watching a Truant Husband—Not the least Jealous?—A curious kind of Church-Meeting!—Keeping up his Dignity—"Enjoying themselves without me!"—A little "Unpleasantness"—Charlotte's Scratched Face—She didn't like such "Accidents"—"My Henry and that Girl!"—Millinery and Prayers—Bringing a Husband to Reason—Wife against Wife—Too busy to Apostatise.

NOT long after our separation from the Mormon Church, I received another visit from my talkative friend.

As according to her custom she was making a preliminary "fuss" at the door before entering, I heard her voice, and was at a loss to conjecture whether she came for the purpose of lamenting my apostacy and entreating my immediate return to the bosom of the Church, or to condole with me concerning the brutal outrage to which we had been subjected. In both suppositions I was, however, mistaken—she came to talk about her own woes.

"You'll be surprised, my dear Sister Stenhouse," she said, "to see me looking so utterly miserable. I'm sure I must look the picture of despair, and I feel it. You don't know what I've been suffering, and how shamefully I have been used."

"You look very well I think, but I'm sorry to hear you have met with any difficulty," said I, when she stopped for a moment to take breath.

"Oh, you may say so," she replied, "but you know you don't think so in your heart. Why, I did not even stop to put on my bonnet straight," she said, stealing a look at the glass, "and I ran all the way here, for I felt as if I should die if I could not pour my sorrows into the bosom of some faithful-hearted friend. Oh! I have been treated shamefully, and I feel it the more as you know what a reserved woman I am and how seldom it is that I open my lips about family matters, even to my dearest friends!"

"Well, but," I said, "what really is the matter? You have not yet told me what your trouble is."

"Sister Stenhouse," she said, "you have had a few little vexations in the course of your life, I know, but they are nothing to compare to the frightful indignities that I have suffered in the course of the last few days. I never thought I should come to this! I hate every man in the place, and I detest my husband most of all, and I loathe his wives, and I execrate Brother Brig—"

"Why, Sister Ann, what can have happened?" I exclaimed, interrupting her.

"Happened!" she cried, starting from her chair in indignation, "I tell you, Sister Stenhouse, nothing has 'happened'—nothing was done by chance—he did it all with his eyes open and against my advice—I tell you he did it on purpose!"

"Did what?" I asked, "and who was it that did it?" But by this time I had begun to form a shrewd guess as to who the culprit was.

"Why, he married that wretched little shrimp of a girl, with blue eyes, and red hair, and a die-away, lackadaisical manner—it was he—my husband, Henry—he married her this very day, and I tell you he did it on purpose!"

"I'm sorry that it annoys you," I said, "but really I am surprised after all you have said to me that you should care if he had taken half-a-dozen wives, to say nothing of the one he married this morning, and who you say is only a very little one

“It doesn’t matter the size, Sister Stenhouse,” she said, “but the color of the eyes and the shade of the hair matters a great deal. If that miserable little minx had had black hair or green eyes I daresay Henry would not have cared two straws about her, unless he had done it out of sheer perversity, for all men are made of the same contrary stuff. But he dotes on blue eyes; I heard him myself tell her so one day, when I was listening to them through the crack of the door, and they didn’t know I was so near. But my wounded feelings would not suffer me to remain silent, and I bounced in, and, said I,—Henry, how dare you talk such outrageous nonsense to that child in my presence?”

“‘But I didn’t know you were present,’ he said.

“I tell you,” said I, “I’m quite disgusted with you; a man with three wives—and me one of them—to go talking twaddle to a little chattering hussy like that, with her cat’s eyes and her red hair!”

“‘Golden hair, my dear,’ he said, ‘Charlotte’s hair is golden.’

“I say red!—it’s straight, staring red—as red as red can be, I told him; and then we had a regular fight over it. I don’t mean that we came to blows, but we had some hot words, and he went out and left us two alone. Then that young hussy was impudent, and I don’t know how it was, but, somehow, when we left off our conversation I found some of Charlotte’s red hair between my fingers; and there”—she said, innocently, holding out quite a respectable sized tuft of auburn hair,—“there; I put it to you, Sister Stenhouse, is that red, or is it not?”

I was about to reply; but, without waiting an instant, she dashed the stolen locks to the ground, and said—“I daresay Sister Stenhouse, you think me a little hasty, and yet among my friends I’ve always been quite proverbial for the calmness and evenness of my temper; but I’ve been tried very much lately, and—if only you would not keep interrupting me, dear !—if you'd just allow me to say a word or two in my turn !—I'd tell you something that would open your eyes to the ingratitude and wickedness of men. I don't wonder that you have left the Church ; I am thinking of doing so myself, and you won't wonder at it when you hear what I've got to say. What do you say to my leaving the Church ? Won't people be astonished ? But I declare, Sister Stenhouse, I do seriously mean to leave the Church as soon as I get my new bonnet—”

“ Why your new bonnet ? ” I asked in surprise.

“ Because, dear, I shall become an object of interest. All the sisters will have their eyes upon me, and even Gentiles will say—There's a lady who had the courage to leave the Mormon Church and quit an ungrateful husband who was not worthy of her. And you know, Sister Stenhouse, it would not do to have people looking at me and talking about me before I got my new bonnet.”

This was a rather amusing reason for delay in changing one's religion, but it was quite characteristic of my friend. So I humored her a little and tried to get her to explain how it all came about.

“ Oh yes,” she said, “ I ought to have told you that before, but I was so angry at what had just happened that I forgot everything else. The fact is, my husband is a man, and there's no calculating what a man will do. Women, you know, are proverbial for the constancy of their affections and their slowness in changing their minds—you know when you're talking to a woman that she is a woman, and you know exactly what to do with her ; but with a man it's quite different. You can't calculate a man—you can't fathom him. When you've been thinking one way and another, and at last begin to fancy you know what to do, why then, a man—if it's him you've got to do with—will turn just round, and while you've been making everything smooth for him to do one thing, he'll go and do exactly the opposite. I know what men are by this time, and I speak from experience.

“ It was just so with Henry and this girl. He has gone quite against the grain with me, and I feel it all the more because he used to be so quiet and anxious to do exactly what I wanted. But he doesn't care a fig now whether I'm pleased or not—he only thinks about this red-headed girl. In fact he's quite crazy about her, and if there's any sin in apostacy, you may remember that it was he who drove me into it."

"That seems hardly fair," I said, "for you knew all along that it was his privilege to take more wives."

"That's very true," she exclaimed, "it is his privilege to take wives, but it's my privilege to choose them for him. I'm a good Mormon and I don't mind how many wives my husband takes, if he'll only act reasonably about getting them. But, Sister Stenhouse, I do not want a parcel of girls about the house. I'm so far from wishing to usurp authority, that, as I told Henry, I would not mind if his wives were even a little older than me, but I won't have them younger. It makes Henry look so silly. Why, to see him with that girl Charlotte, now, who isn't more than half my own age—No ; I don't mean that, I mean she's slightly younger than I am—you might really almost imagine that he thought more of her than he does of me. I know he doesn't, for he has told me so, but any one to see them together would get quite a wrong impression."

"When did he marry Charlotte?" I asked. "You spoke so hastily, Sister Ann, that I did not quite understand you."

"When? Why he married her this morning, as I thought I told you—he has only just done it.—He said he was anxious to be in a quiet state of mind to-day, so I gave him a piece of my mind, and he was so astonished at the pointed way in which I explained to him what a fool he'd been making of himself that he quite showed it in his face. The fact is, Sister Stenhouse, he has lately become rather more than I could manage. About six months ago he seemed, I thought, to be getting a little inattentive to his last wife, so I thought it was quite time for me to see about finding him another. So I looked round, but didn't for some time meet with a suitable person. At last I found a very nice young woman, thirty-five or forty years of age, who I thought would do. She was nice and tall—a little taller than Henry himself, but that didn't matter for she was stout in proportion. Henry would have it that she didn't look straight with her two eyes, but that was all nonsense. She was a nice, motherly woman, with a deep bass voice which sounds so well in large, fat women; but though she wasn't what you would call handsome, she certainly wasn't plain. My reason in choosing her was that I thought she would do nicely for the housework and could look after the children, for I was forced to stay at home so much that it was quite injuring my health."

"A very good reason," I said.

"So I thought, dear," she replied; "but I could not bring Henry to see it in that light. Whenever I spoke to him about her he said she was old enough to be his grandmother, and squinted. At last I got quite tired out, for I could never get him to call upon her, and when she came to the house he hardly said a word to her; so I got her to come and stay with us, for then I thought Henry would become accustomed to her presence. But he took to holding his tongue at meal times—the only times when we all met together—and it was as much as I could do to keep up the conversation, for you know I am naturally very taciturn. Then he suddenly took to attending all the Church meetings, and it was astonishing how many he discovered it was his duty to attend, he seemed to be absent almost every evening. The mystery to me was, what could have made him so pious all of a sudden—he seemed altogether too good—You can understand, Sister Stenhouse, that had there been any young girl at the meetings, to whom he had taken a fancy, it would have been useless for them to try to throw dust in my eyes—you know that I'm not likely to be deceived?"

I said that I did know it, and she continued:—

"There was one of the brethren—a near neighbor of ours, who, between ourselves, I think rather admires me, for he said once quite publicly that I beat every one he knew in conversation, and if that's not a compliment, I don't know what is:— well, this brother I got to watch my husband. I told him that I did not want him to act as a spy upon his movements, as that would have been very mean. I only wanted him to watch carefully all that he said and did at the meetings and to notice who he spoke to, and if it was a meeting where women were admitted, to be doubly watchful, and especially to notice how he looked when he talked with any one. You see, Sister, I agree with you that it is quite right for us to look closely after our husbands, although, of course, I would be the last one to encourage a system of espionage."

I ventured to suggest that I had not expressed any opinion at all about watching our husbands, and said I believed there were not half-a-dozen women in Salt Lake City who would dare to think of such a thing.

"Well, never mind all that, Sister Stenhouse," she said, "If you did not have that opinion you might have had it, and it comes to much the same thing. I used to see the good brother I spoke of very frequently—in fact, almost every day—and the first question I always asked was—Did my husband come to meeting last night? As often as not he said he didn't know for he hadn't been himself, and after a month or more I had learned nothing, except that my husband was never seen with a lady at any of the meetings. This was all very well; but so certain was I that all his dressing and titivation was not done for nothing, and that he wouldn't be so pious without expecting to get something in return—for he is a very good and sensible man in all religious matters—that I resolved to take the whole affair in hand myself, and ferret out the mystery, if there really was one. The very next night he went out as usual, and I, having dressed myself in readiness, followed him. But we hadn't gone two minutes walk before I met the brother I just mentioned, and, of course, I was compelled to stop and tell him all about it; and, by the time we left off, my husband was out of sight and it was no good looking after him. Some people, when they begin to talk, you never know when they'll end, and this good brother is one of them—you can't edge in a word.

"Well, you see, now I was out it seemed a pity to go home without calling upon some one; so I went round to Sister Ellis. They told me she was out and I was just going away when, lo and behold, who should I see but my dear Henry marching down the street in the direction of the theatre with a red-headed girl hanging on his arm. Oh, said I to myself, that's the kind of Church-meeting you go to my dear, is it? They were so busy with one another—I never saw Henry look worse or more stupid in my life—that they didn't see me at all. I did not cross over to them, for I felt too much compassion for their folly to wish to interrupt them then. Go on, my dears, I thought; make the most of your opportunity for I'll answer that one of you won't go to the theatre again for some time. I wasn't the least bit jealous—jealousy is a sentiment that could never dwell in my bosom—but I did hate the sight of that odious girl, and I resolved to take my husband in hand immediately."

"Well Sister," I said, "I should have thought that his finding a wife for himself would have saved you a world of trouble."

"Oh dear no, Sister Stenhouse," she replied, "it was trouble I did not want to be saved. Men have no business, in my opinion, to choose their own wives, after the first. I know the men do do it, one and all; but it's a shameful stretch of authority. I should like to know whether it is not of much more consequence to me what wife my husband has than it is to him? However, I resolved that my husband should never marry the red-headed girl, and the very next morning I told him so, and what do you think the inhuman creature said? 'You've been persuading me all these years,' he said, 'to take another wife, although I've already got three, and now I've begun to do so you blame me. I think I've as good a right as any one to say who I'll marry and who I won't.' Did you ever hear of such ingratitude? Would you hear of such a thing from your husband, Sister Stenhouse?"

I told her that with Mormonism my husband had given up Polygamy; and she continued:

"Well, I tried to bring him to reason, but it was of no use.

And then I told him that the girl should never set foot inside the house while I was in it. This was a very unfortunate speech, for I do believe that up to that time he wanted as much as possible to keep the girl out of my way; but the moment I said that, to show his dignity I suppose, he declared that she should come to tea with us that very afternoon, and he would go and fetch her; and he did so. I wouldn't go down to tea at first, though both the other wives were there and he sent up for me, but my pride would not allow me to stoop. At last I got tired of being all alone, and as it occurred to me that perhaps they might be enjoying themselves without me, I resolved to go down and see if I could not do something to annoy them. Down I went, and Henry, all smiling, introduced the girl to me as 'Sister Charlotte,' talking of her as if he had known her for years. Was it not shameful?"

"It must have been very awkward for you," I said.

"It was indeed, Sister Stenhouse, and I soon made it awkward for them; I assure you, after I joined them, there was not a soul present who had a moment's comfort till that girl went away. My husband, however, took her home, and from that very day he seemed resolved to have the upper hand. He never for a moment would listen to a word I said about the girl; he brought her in every evening and took her to the theatre constantly, and paid her ten times more attention than he ever paid me. I wasn't jealous, Sister Stenhouse; no one—as I said before—could ever suspect me of jealousy, but I did hate that girl. If he had not loved her, I can't say whether I myself might not have liked her. But the very fact of him loving her makes me detest her, but its only a little proper pride on my part—I'm not in the least jealous, Oh dear no!"

"Of course not," I said.

"I don't know about that," she said, "I've borne enough from those two to drive fifty women crazy with jealousy, and things went on from bad to worse, until the other day when, as I told you, we had that little unpleasantness. My husband when he came back was downright angry, and made use of shocking language, and told me that, if he could not have peace in the house, he would have me board out by myself in some other part of the city. He said that I had scratched Charlotte's face and torn out her hair; but that was quite untrue, as I told him; and as for the hair which fell out, it was all an accident. He said that Charlotte did not like such accidents and that he would not put up with it. He was very cross and disagreeable all the rest of the day and made me quite miserable and broken hearted, and the next day, to wind it all up, he told me that he and Charlotte had arranged the day of the wedding. I stormed and raved, for I had fully resolved that, marry whom he might, he should never marry a girl if he really loved her or if I had not chosen her. But it was of no use—I was forced to go over with him to the Endowment House to give him that detestable little vixen. I tell you, Sister Stenhouse, I hate her; and oh, oh, dear what shall I do now my husband has fallen in love with her!"

Here, to my infinite astonishment, she rose from her seat and rushed about the room, wringing her hands and exclaiming, "Oh dear! Oh dear!" She then threw herself right down on the couch and actually burst into tears, crying out "Oh dear, what shall I do with my Henry and that girl!"

I raised her up and tried to comfort her as well as I could, but she was a very awkward woman to deal with under such circumstances. The more gently I spoke to her, the more violent did she become, and the louder were her lamentations. She forgot that she had been the cause of her husband taking any plural wives at all, and she upbraided him as the source of all her woes. One moment she would denounce him as a heartless wretch: then she would go into fits of maudlin sympathy over him, declaring that her Henry was the dearest man alive until "that horrid red-headed girl" led him astray. "Oh dear, dear Sister Stenhouse," she exclaimed as she threw both her arms round my neck and covered me with tears—"never do as I have done—never get a wife for your husband again, or he'll learn to do it for himself. And, oh, Sister Stenhouse let us kneel down and ask the Lord to strengthen us in this hour of tribulation; and, oh," she added piteously, "I should take it such a very great favor, Sister, if you wouldn't mind trimming that bonnet for me—you've got such taste!"

I assured her that I would trim the bonnet or do anything else that would help to assuage her grief. So she had her cry out and then she went on talking. She stopped and had some lunch, and still she talked; and at last when a little girl came round with a message from her husband saying that she was wanted at home, she left me in the middle of a long speech in which she was explaining the steps which she meant to take to bring her Henry "to reason," and to compel him to obtain a divorce from "that red-headed hussy."

The same evening she came again. This time she brought with her the bonnet and the materials for trimming it, and I promised her that she should have but a little while to wait; for she said she was overflowing with anxiety to quit the Mormon Church, and she felt convinced that that could not properly be done by any one wearing an old or dowdy bonnet. She had had a warm time with the bride and bridegroom, and seemed quite cheerful at the thought that she had thoroughly spoilt the happiness of their wedding-day, for she had left them both with ruffled tempers and in the worst of humors. After that she was almost always with me until the bonnet was finished, which was not until a couple of days later, for I was delayed by some more important matters which unexpectedly engaged my attention; and when she went away she was as lavish with her thanks and praises as she was with her promises respecting the mighty things which she was going to do, and the bright example she would become to the women of Utah.

I did not see her for several weeks, and then I accidentally met her in the street, and asked her why she had not called upon me lately. She was wearing the new bonnet, but I had heard nothing about her apostacy.

"Oh, Sister Stenhouse," she said, "I'm delighted to see you! You've been constantly in my thoughts, but I've been so hard at work—Oh, so busy, that I really had not time for anything—not even to apostatise.”

“How was that?” I asked.

“Oh,” she replied, “when I thought over the matter I saw very clearly that it wouldn’t do to render myself conspicuous with this old dress. The bonnet’s very nice and I want to thank you, dear, for the trimming; but I must wait till I get that silk dress which Henry says I really shall have soon. I’m not so very sure though whether he would give me the dress if I were to apostatise, so I’d better wait and get it first. Then, too, you see I’ve had my hands full. If you want to make a man slight one woman and get tired of her, there’s nothing like putting a nicer woman than her in his way. So I reconsidered the matter and resolved, cost what it might, I’d get another wife for my husband right away. I don’t care now whether she’s old or young, ugly or pretty, so long as she cuts out that detestable red-headed girl. I’ve run all over the town and rushed about here and there, all for his sake, though he’ll never be grateful for it; and now at last, do you know, dear, I really do think I’ve got the girl I want. She’s all dark—dark hair, dark eyes, dark complexion. If he marries her, as I mean him to do, she’ll lead him a fine life, notwithstanding all her winning ways. I wouldn’t stand in his shoes when she’s his wife; but I know I shall be able to manage her, for I have a deeper insight into character than he has, and a better command of temper. She’ll teach Miss Charlotte to keep her place, and she’ll make Henry mind too. It’ll do him good;—I’ve done it all out of love to him, not a spark of jealousy or ill feeling, as you are well aware.”

The idea of setting one wife against another, in order to keep the peace, would appear in the case of my talkative friend to have been successful; for, sure enough, six months after the time of which I have just spoken, her Henry did marry the dark beauty, and she and her auburn predecessor presented an interesting contrast when they chanced to appear in the street together in the company of their husband. There did not seem to be much love lost between them.

Successful in her plans, and having, as she said, now brought her Henry to reason, my talkative friend gave up all idea of leaving the Church, and when I last saw her she said "I'm busy now looking after a likely girl, for I do think a man in my Henry's position ought to live his religion and have at least seven wives!—seven, you know, is such a very lucky number."

“The world was all before them where to choose Their place of rest : with Providence their guide,
They hand in hand with trembling steps and slow,
Through Eden took their solitary way.”

Paradise Lost.

WHEN we left the Mormon Church, we were not quite as badly off as were our first parents when they began life, although in some respects we certainly resembled them. The world was all before us, and it was necessary that we also should choose a place of rest; but it was by no means an Eden from which we were dismissed,—or, rather, had dismissed ourselves,—and in the matter of experience in the thorny ways of that world in which we were about to begin afresh the battle of existence, we certainly had the advantage over the exiles from Paradise.

The crisis of our own lives had now arrived;—the act of sending in our resignation as members of the Church cut us off from all the associations of the past and all the friendships and pleasant intimacies of so many years;—a great gulf divided our by-gone life from the unknown future which lay before us.

My husband was now made painfully aware that it was altogether useless for him to attempt to carry on his paper, for his subscribers, as I before stated, had been “counselled” to discontinue taking it in. The Daily Telegraph had had a very large circulation, but as there was very little money in the Territory, the yearly subscriptions were mostly paid at harvest time, and many of them in grain. At the time, therefore, when the paper was finally given up, the Mormon people, as the book-keeper in Ogden informed me, owed about twenty thousand dollars; but when it was discovered that we were “Apostates,” the majority of them considered that they were released from all obligations on that score, and my husband being an easy, generous-minded man, most of them evaded payment. The idea that, because we had left the Church, no Saint was bound to pay us any debts which they might happen at the time to owe, was the natural result of the teachings of the Tabernacle. Apostates are delivered over to “the buffetings of Satan,” and the Saints consider it is their duty to begin in this world their master’s work of castigation. Any ill turn that can be done to an Apostate is consequently a good action in the opinion of the Mormons, and they neglect no opportunity of showing that these are the sentiments which influence them.

Although we had now left the Mormon Church, never to return, my husband could not at once shake off entirely that influence which had so long held him captive. His thoughts and belief, his hopes and ambitions, had for a quarter of a century all pointed in one direction, and the very idea of rebellion on his part against the authority of the Priesthood, would, but a very little while before the time of which I speak, have been considered by him an utter impossibility. It was impossible, in a few short months only, to undo the work of five-and-twenty years—the best years of his life. He could no longer remain in the Church or conscientiously support Brigham Young; but he had not outgrown Mormonism sufficiently to enable him to throw off the yoke entirely and make his paper an opponent of Brigham and his faith. Could he have done so, I think it is highly probable that the Telegraph might yet have been saved, for I know that many of the more influential of the Gentiles would have aided him materially in such a course. As it was, nothing remained but to give it up with the best grace he could.

Two offers in reference to the paper were received by Mr. Stenhouse, and it remained for him to decide which he would accept. One of them came from a Gentile, who proposed to run it in opposition to Brigham Young, and the other came from a certain Mr. Fuller, who had for some time been my husband's travelling agent, and was a very intimate friend of John W. Young, Brigham's youngest son by his first wife. We knew that this Mr. Fuller had nothing beyond his salary, but, as the friend of Brigham's son, we thought that probably it was the Prophet's wish that he should have this paper and we believed that he was simply buying it for the Church. My husband argued that, although he could no longer unite with the Mormons, he could at least refrain from doing them any injury; he therefore concluded that, rather than let the paper go into the hands of an avowed enemy, he would sell it to Mr. Fuller, who, on account of his friendship for the Prophet's family, would, he presumed, try to be just to the people.

This, no doubt, was very conscientious and just, although, of course, no Mormon would give my husband credit for entertaining such sentiments. For my own part, I naturally wished him to accept the offer that would pay him best, which was that made by the Gentile. He could not, however, bring his mind to do this. The paper, therefore, was sold to Mr. Fuller, who ran it for a few months and then himself ran away, leaving behind him debts enough to swallow up everything. Thus ended the Telegraph under that name, but destined, however, to rise again as the Salt Lake Herald—a paper devoted to the interests of Brigham and the Priesthood. To my husband it was an utter loss, but it was hardly fair that his conscientious conduct should meet with such an ill return.

It was now necessary that some steps should be taken to provide for our family. The reader may, perhaps, remember that when we first arrived in Salt Lake City, as I stated, I myself engaged in business until my husband was able to find some suitable and profitable employment. When the Telegraph, however, was established and proved such a great success, and we were in a position of affluence, I considered—the pressure of necessity being removed—that I should do well to resign my own business connection and employ my time more profitably in domestic affairs. This was a great relief to me, for I always felt considerable repugnance to mixing with the world in the way of business, while among my children and attending to their wants and interests I found myself in my own legitimate sphere. But there was now no alternative. All interest in the Telegraph had been resigned; my husband's property had been wasted in an attempt to keep it up, and he had nothing now to depend upon. Something must be done, and I resolved that I would not be backward in bearing my full share of the burden.

It was only natural that we should feel very much unsettled in mind by the great change which had taken place in our position, for it is no easy matter to cut asunder the ties and associations of a life-time. Any one suddenly changing his religious faith would, to a certain extent, feel and understand what I mean in this respect. But in reference to any ordinary religion, the person forsaking it would probably experience comparatively little alteration in his every-day life. In Mormonism it is very different, especially to any one who has occupied a prominent position among the Saints. To resign our religion was to revolutionize our lives. Every thing was changed: the friends of years would look coldly on us and avoid us; persons whom we had before shunned as Gentiles or Apostates would be the only individuals who would regard us with favor;—our entire position in the midst of a most exclusive community was completely reversed; in a word, we ourselves were now "Apostates!"

Thinking to turn the current of his thoughts, and believing that change would be beneficial to him, I suggested to my husband that he should pay a visit to the Eastern States. In New York I believed he could find employment which would help to divert his thoughts from Mormon affairs and, at the same time, would be profitable to him in other respects. My suggestion was acted upon, and my husband set out East, while I prepared to engage again in the same business which I had formerly conducted so successfully.

Now, for the first time since I embraced Mormonism, I mixed freely with Gentiles and those who had left the Church, and it was not long before I found that this intercourse with the outer world produced a marked and decided effect upon my mind. My views were enlarged and my thoughts became more liberal in their tone. My husband's letters showed me that a similar change was taking place in him.

We were not the only Apostates from the Church at that time. The New Movement, as the reaction against the tyranny of Brigham Young was called, was then in progress; and the minds of all intelligent Saints were led to reflect upon the unheard-of claims of Brigham's "Infallible" Priesthood. At this time the Prophet endeavored to rivet still more firmly the fetters which bound his deluded followers, by establishing "Zion's Coöperative Mercantile Institution" and reviving the "Order of Enoch."

The Coöperative Institution was announced as a joint-stock concern, established under the pretence that it would be a benefit to the working classes, and all the members of the Church were invited to purchase shares, which were sold at twenty-five dollars each. The statement so often made by Brigham and repeated by strangers, to the effect that the exorbitant prices charged by Gentile merchants necessitated the establishment of such an institution was, as every Mormon knows, only a pretence, and a very shallow one, too; for the Walker Brothers and other merchants had, for many years, supplied goods to Mormons and Gentiles alike, at what, under the circumstances, were reasonable and just prices; for the railway not then being constructed, and every article of commerce being of necessity carried across the Plains—a distance of over a thousand miles—by horse-teams, prices were, of course, very high, and would, if this circumstance were not taken into consideration, appear extortionate. In fact, subsequently, the "Coöperative" stores, which had started with high rates, under the belief that every rival would be crushed, were compelled to lower their prices to those of the Walker Brothers, or, in spite of their faith, the Mormons would have forsaken Brigham's Institution for the sake of their pockets. Many, in fact, did secretly go to Gentile stores, but they were watched by the police and reported to the teachers.

That large Mormon store, in which Brigham Young had such a heavy interest, was to become the parent establishment, the fountain-head from which temporal blessings, in the shape of cheap goods of every description, were to flow unto the people. Each Ward was to have its own store, and there the Saints of that Ward were expected to deal exclusively, and, as the teachers said, "keep off Main street where the Gentile stores were located." These Ward-stores purchased their goods from the parent store where nothing was sold by wholesale.

All the lesser Mormon Merchants were "counselled" to sell out their stock to the Church, for just what the Church chose to offer them, or dispose of it otherwise as best they could, and then they might go farming, or on mission, or anything else—but sell out they must, for they were plainly told that they would not be allowed to carry on business in opposition to the new Institution.

Now, instead of benefitting the poorer Saints, by supplying goods to them at a small advance upon cost prices, as was at first proclaimed to be the object of the "Co-op"—as the Institution was briefly and familiarly called—the reverse was the case, for competition was altogether banished. All the trade of the Gentile merchants—with one or two exceptions—was forcibly taken from them, for the people were not to trade in any store without first looking to see if the sign of the Institution—a picture of "The All-seeing Eye," and the words "Holiness unto the Lord"—were over the door-way. How often I have seen groups of country people straggling along, with their heads thrown back and their eyes straining aloft in eager quest of that sign, although perhaps their purchases would only amount to a few yards of ribbon or a paper of pins!

No one can predict what the Church—otherwise Brigham—will do, if money should chance to tempt him. In this case, the parent Coöperative store turned, as I might say, traitor to the Ward-stores—its own children—for no sooner had they all been established, and had bought up all the old stock from the parent store, than it was whispered abroad that the latter was about to open in the retail line with a splendid stock of new goods—to suit the Gentiles, of course; for the Saints were not allowed to trade outside of their own Ward-stores, where they were expected to buy up all the old goods. In fact, in order to gain Gentile trade and fill the pockets of Brigham and the leading Elders who really constituted the Institution (and do so still), the same prices were asked at the parent store as had been charged the poor, confiding stock-holders of the Ward-stores at wholesale. This, of course, caused great dissatisfaction, and many of the Saints rebelled, declaring they would go where they pleased to spend their money, when they had any to spend. The Ward-stores, in consequence, were obliged, at great loss, to lower their prices, and many were utterly ruined. Others which had more capital tided over the difficulty, and learned a lesson concerning the honesty of the Church leaders which it is to be hoped did them good.

As an example of the way in which matters were managed, I may instance a very old and infirm woman who was one of their victims. She came to me one day and said, "Sister Stenhouse, will you buy out my stock in the Coöperative store? Our store has failed, and I have my twenty-five dollars' worth in my basket. I pitied her and asked her to let me see her stock, and thereupon she brought out a pound and a half of nails! I did buy out her stock, for I thought that the nails might be handy to have in the house, although I did not give her twenty-five dollars for them. Another person—a Frenchman, whom I knew—bought a share, and when he saw certain ruin looming over his Ward-store, he went to the headquarters and purchased twenty-five dollars' worth of goods, and having got them all secured, laid down his shareholders' receipt in payment and beat a hasty retreat. He was a fortunate man and acted prudently, but Alas! for the poor souls who ventured all their little savings in these Church "Institutions" and then were left to poverty and starvation.

The "Order of Enoch" is the crowning swindle of all. Its victims, under a legal form, make over to the Church every cent of which they may be possessed, even to the very clothes upon their backs, and place themselves—their whole life and being—entirely at the command of "The Church." They do, in fact, literally make themselves slaves, only their slavery is infinitely worse and more debasing than the bondage of the Negro, for they give soul and mind, as well as body and goods, utterly, absolutely, and for ever, into the iron grasp of the Mormon Priesthood. This "Order of Enoch" is quite a favorite institution with Brigham Young, who has lately been preaching it up throughout Utah; and many hundred fanatical and deluded Saints have at his instigation given—not sold, for they receive nothing in return—themselves into this abject slavery. And yet these are the institutions which "unprejudiced" newspaper reporters and editors, when they visit Utah, and are, according to the fixed and ordinary custom of Brigham, treated and toadied to until, poor dupes, they think that the favors they receive are simply marks of the appreciation of the Mormons for their own conceited or deluded selves personally, and not part and parcel of his system:—these, I say, are the institutions which such visitors laud to the skies when they speak of the Prophet's generosity, his open-heartedness, his patriarchal benevolence, and his other saintly virtues.

When we left the Church, these institutions were attracting a good deal of attention among the Saints. The "Coöperative" still flourishes, and the "Order of Enoch" has within the last few weeks been gathering into its net, not tens, but hundreds of dupes.

About this time, also, it was that the Mormon women, under the auspices of Eliza R. Snow and the Female Relief Society, got up that petition to Mrs. Grant, to which I have referred in another place, begging her to use her influence with the President in favor of a toleration of Polygamy. The names to that petition were affixed without any reference to propriety or right. Hundreds of names were copied from the books of the Society without any permission being obtained, or even asked, of their owners. It was then, as I before stated, that the names of the dead were actually added as subscribers to the petition, and in one case, when a lady mentioned that her dead daughter had never belonged to the Church, as she died before her mother heard of Mormonism, she was told that her daughter would now, of course, have found out that Polygamy was the true order of domestic life in heaven, and that she would certainly be willing to subscribe if she could return to earth. Her name was, therefore, added without any further ceremony, although she had been dead a good many years.

In January, 1872, a counter-petition was got up by the Gentile and Apostate ladies. It set forth the cruel bondage which Polygamy inflicts upon women; spoke of the heartless conduct of the Mormon leaders, and of the murders and other foul crimes which had been committed by them or at their instigation; showed that, should Utah become a State, under the name of Deseret,—which has ever been the ambition of Brigham Young,—there would be no protection for life or property; stated that the authorities themselves had declared that when statehood was conferred, Gentiles and Apostates would have good cause to tremble; and, finally, prayed the National Government to stretch forth its long arm of power for the defence and protection of honest and law-abiding citizens. This petition was signed by four hundred and forty ladies of Utah, most of them members of the Mormon Church, whose real names were all fairly and openly affixed by their own selves. It was presented to the Senate by the Hon. Schuyler Colfax—then Vice-President; was read, discussed, and ordered to be printed. As might be supposed, it excited a great deal of angry discussion on the part of the Church authorities; and the following Sundays the names of those who had signed were read out in the Tabernacle, and strong remarks made upon their conduct, in order to intimidate them and prevent others from following their example. The consequence was that many of their husbands and sons were threatened with loss of employment, and they were thus forced to retract.

That same year, a bill was brought into the Territorial Legislature, providing that boys of fifteen years of age and girls of twelve might legally contract marriage, with the consent of their parents or guardians! In stating this disgraceful fact, I feel certain that the reader who has never lived among the Saints and is not versed in Utah affairs will think that I must be mistaken in what I say. It is, however, I am sorry to say, only too true, and the records of the Legislature will bear me witness. The fact was stated in the New York Herald of January 27, 1872.

It will be a matter of interest to the advocates of women's suffrage to learn that Brigham Young conferred the franchise upon the Mormon ladies. This, at first, appears to be a very liberal measure; but let not the innocent reader be deceived thereby. The opening of the mines and the great influx of Gentiles, consequent upon the completion of the Union Pacific Railroad, proved very clearly to Brigham that the day might come when the Gentiles would have an equality, if not a majority, of votes, and in that day the slavish despotism of the Mormon Priesthood would be overthrown. The time, certainly, was very far off, but it was wise to provide for contingencies. So a bill was brought in conferring upon women the privilege of voting. No Mormon woman would for a moment ever dream of voting otherwise than she was directed by her husband, and no man would think of voting except as he was "counselled" by the Priesthood. Thus, a man with half a dozen wives would now have half a dozen votes, and Brother Brigham, instead of having only his own single vote, would have nineteen for his nineteen wives, to say nothing of his daughters and the whole army of spiritual wives which he might produce. I have often seen one solitary man driving into the City a whole wagon-load of women of all ages and sizes—they were going to the poll, and their votes would be one ! It is very easy to see how in this way the influence of the Priesthood has been extended, and women themselves have been made the instruments for rivetting still more firmly their own fetters. But it is by no means easy to see that women in Utah have derived any benefit from being permitted to vote.

Voting among the Saints has always been carried on in a very free and easy manner. One gentleman—an English convert—not long since told me that when he had been less than two months in the States, and, of course, was not naturalised, and had no rights as a citizen, he was "counselled" by the Mormon leaders to give in his vote; he did so, and, in obedience to instructions received, he gave in also his wife's vote and the vote of their little baby girl—an infant of only a few months old—although that was before the voting of women was legalised.

Others have voted two or three times, so as to make sure that the Church should not lose their interest. And this very common practice of the same persons voting over and over again renders all statistics given by Mormon authority utterly untrustworthy. Besides which, the voting-tickets are all numbered, and the voters' names carefully registered in a book, so that the Priesthood can tell at a moment's notice on which side, or for whom, a man has cast his vote. In this way the ballot in Utah becomes a most ridiculous farce, instead of a means for obtaining unbiassed and uninfluenced elections. Anxious to obtain admission into the Union as a State, it is the interest of Brigham Young and the leaders to swell the numbers of the population by every means in their power. For this they have strained every nerve to bring over converts from abroad, and with the same object—to “build up the kingdom”—they have forced Polygamy upon the people. The most unscrupulous measures have been resorted to, and it is even said that on one occasion when a goodly show of names was needed, not only were the names of the dead and of relations and converts who had never been in the country at all, added as subscribers to the document, but that they actually Christened their mules—conferring upon them the names of men, and then made them vote also!

Notwithstanding the vigilance of the Priesthood, many young Mormon ladies have preferred Gentile husbands, and some of them have left the Territory; but they have been invariably traduced and scandalised, and whenever the rumor of misfortune occurring to any of them reached Salt Lake City, it was retailed with undisguised gratification, as a sweet morsel, by the Priesthood. Some Mormon mothers, hating the idea of their daughters marrying polygamists, have encouraged the addresses of Gentiles, and were only too glad to have their children marry out of Mormonism. Such mothers, of course, are apostate in heart, although nominally they may not have left the Church.

The extravagancies of modern dress render it every year more and more difficult for men of moderate means to support many wives. Fashion is proving a deadly foe to Polygamy, and the feminine taste for finery is in Utah helping to bring about some really good practical results. There is now a pleasing change noticeable in the plural marriages in Salt Lake City. There are not nearly so many marriages of this kind among the actual citizens as there were three or four years ago. The opening of the mines and the construction of the railroad brought so many strangers among us that it was impossible to withstand their influence. Many of our young Mormon maidens have been beguiled into matrimony by these wicked Gentiles, against whom Brother Brigham has so often warned us; and not only so, but many good Saints have apparently come to the conclusion that though Polygamy was so absolutely necessary to their own salvation, it is not by any means essential to the salvation of their daughters. Thus, some of them have given their daughters to the sons of strangers, to become in due time mothers of a race of wicked Gentiles, and if one might judge from their conversation they do not appear to regret it very much.

The dislike of the women to Polygamy has increased, especially in Salt Lake City, although in the Settlements fanaticism is as rampant as ever, and the "Celestial" system is the order of the day. Young Mormon girls are disgusted when they hear young men and even boys talking of their "privileges," boasting how many wives they mean to take, and how they will take two on the same day in order to preserve peace. Girls of the slightest feeling or intelligence resent all this and the more refined regard these little would-be Polygamists, and all they say, with intense loathing and contempt. To Gentile girls such insults are of course unknown, and the Mormon girls, when they have the opportunity of mixing with the outside world, are not slow to discover that while, if they marry among people of their own faith, they will never occupy their proper position in society, if they become Gentile wives they will be the cherished companions and equals of the men to whom they are united. Sensitive girls will say that they would rather have a little less glory in the world to come and have a little more comfort in this.

Then, too, the married women compare the condition of the Gentile wives with their own, and the comparison is by no means in favor of Polygamy. A polygamic wife who is one of many and only sees her husband occasionally, and that as a favor, cannot well visit a Gentile wife in her own home without drawing a comparison by no means in favor of Mormonism. Many Mormon wives have thus become unhappy ; and hence the most strenuous exertions are made on the part of the leaders to prevent as far as possible all intercourse between the Saints and the outside world. Notwithstanding this, a leading attorney in Salt Lake City told me, that during the year succeeding our abandonment of Mormonism, more than one hundred first wives called upon him proposing to enter suit for divorce and alimony, and this represents but a small proportion of those who would sacrifice almost anything if only they could escape from Polygamy.

Left to itself, Mormonism would long ago have perished, so great has been the number of Apostates. But England and Scandinavia furnish yearly a multitude of dupes, who come over every summer by thousands to aid in carrying on the imposture. These, with the people in the Settlements, who are purposely kept in ignorance, slavery, and poverty, perpetuate Polygamy in Utah.

John W. Young, the Prophet's son, to whom I have already alluded, became disgusted with Polygamy and abandoned it. Therefore, according to his father's teaching, he cannot now enter into the "Celestial Kingdom." But Brigham Young says that he, as the successor of Joseph Smith, holds the "Keys of the Kingdom," and he probably thinks that he will be able to shuffle his son John W. in, in a quiet way. For my own part I do not suppose that Brigham Young believes one word of the nonsense he teaches to the people—he is far too shrewd for that ! A certain Utah official once said to my husband, "Brigham has got the best thing in America, and he means to hold on to it." That is about the sum and substance of Brigham's religion.

About eight years ago, John W.—who is a handsome, gentlemanly young man—married a Miss Lucy Canfield, of Ogden—it was said, in obedience to the "counsel" of his father. Two years subsequently he married Miss Clara Jones, whose father when living had occupied a prominent position in the Church. This lady also, it was stated, he married in obedience to a command of the Prophet, who had been known to say that he wished one of his sons to marry her and that, if they did not, he would marry her himself. Brigham has often told men to marry certain women, and they have felt bound to obey, believing, probably, as Mormon men generally do, that it makes very little difference, after all, who they married, as they have got to have a certain number of wives in order to enter the "Celestial Kingdom," and among them all they will be sure to find one whom they can love. Mormon men are not very different from other men; for although they tell their numerous wives quite another story, they can truly love but one woman at a time. Some good Saints, I doubt not, do really believe to the contrary, but love thus divided is not worthy of the name. In this respect men resemble women,—no woman can love two men at the same time.

The two young girls, the wives of John W. Young, of course, each in turn, believed that she was the beloved one; but subsequently they discovered how greatly they had been mistaken, for John W. had not yet met with his "affinity." In the course of time, however, the fair one appeared who was to enslave his heart, and John W. submitted without a murmur.

Mrs. Lucy Canfield Young, the first wife, had cousins living in Philadelphia, and as John W. was returning from England, where he had been on mission, at the request of his wife he called to see them, and there he met with his fate in the person of Miss Lizzie Canfield—one of his wife's cousins. He immediately fell deeply in love with this young lady and requested her to go with him to Salt Lake City to visit his wife. She agreed, and, with her sister, accompanied him, and before they arrived at the termination of their journey she had promised to marry him. She had no faith in Mormonism, but every thing was forgotten in love.

After their marriage, Miss Canfield—now Mrs. John W. Young, number three—became very unhappy, for she felt deeply her degraded position, and though she dearly loved her husband, would have left him had she not felt that such a step would render him perfectly miserable, for it was evident that he cared nothing at all for his other two wives. They, poor girls, were also destined to become victims to this disgraceful system—abandoned in their youth, and one of them the mother of two or three children.

The first wife—Lucy Canfield Young—perceiving that her husband no longer cared for her, with true womanly dignity withdrew from his husbandly care, obtained a divorce, and became “Miss” Lucy Canfield again.

Mrs. Clara Jones Young could not so easily bring her mind to leave the father of her children, but still hopes that her truant husband will return to his unhappy wife, from whom he has not yet been divorced, although he no longer lives with her. In this, however, she is mistaken;—John W. will never return to her, for he is completely disgusted with his father’s pet scheme of “Celestial” marriage, and, undoubtedly, would be formally separated from his second wife, were it not that, according to Mormon law, the wife alone has the privilege of applying for a divorce. He is, in fact, at heart a “vile Apostate,” as his father calls seceders from the Church; for no one can possibly be a good Mormon without believing with all his soul in Polygamy. Take Polygamy and the Endowments from Mormonism, and there is nothing left to distinguish that faith from any other of the absurd religions which have from time to time been advocated by fanatical men.

John W. Young, notwithstanding the apostate spirit which has fallen upon him, has lately been appointed to preside over the Saints at St. George, in Southern Utah, and I sincerely trust that he will lead all those good Saints, over whom he is sent to preside, to think as he does respecting plural marriage, and that his wife may do her best to create in the minds of the unhappy and degraded sisters around her a desire for that higher social position, that perfect equality with man, which is the inalienable right of every woman.

It is very fortunate for John W. Young that he is the son of his father; for if he had been any other man’s son, and had abandoned Polygamy, he would never have been appointed to preside over the Saints in St. George, or anywhere else. But Brigham is all-powerful in Mormondom; it is he who controls the affairs of the "Kingdom"; and if he chooses to allow an Apostate son not only to pass muster but to be accounted worthy to rule among the Saints, who shall gainsay it? Brigham has a bitter hatred of Apostates and apostacy. The very name—"Apostate"—is the most cruel arrow in his quiver. And yet the very man, who if Brigham's own precedent were followed, ought to succeed him—Orson Hyde, the President of the Twelve Apostles, was once an Apostate, in Missouri, and a very cowardly one at that. Brigham himself, little as he perhaps imagines it, is the Prince of Apostates. He became an Apostate Methodist when he left Methodism and joined the Mormons, and certainly he is now an Apostate from Mormonism as Joseph Smith first taught it. The change from Methodism to Mormonism, as it was first presented to the world, was nothing near so great as the departure which Brigham has made from the original faith of the Saints. There have been many Apostates from the teachings of Joseph in early days, but, of all Apostates, Brother Brigham is the chief.

It may, perhaps, surprise the reader to learn that in polygamous Utah, notwithstanding the constant importation of young girls from abroad, there are two thousand and fifty-six more males than females. In four counties only are the females in excess of the males. In Salt Lake County, which includes Salt Lake City, there are two hundred and ninety-nine more females than males; in Cache County there are ninety-three more; in Iron County there are thirty-one; and in San Pete there are two hundred and thirty-eight more females than males. In all the other seventeen counties, the males are in excess of the females. In many instances the sexes are singularly balanced; as, for instance, in Washington County, where there are fifteen hundred and thirty-two males and exactly the same number of females. Weber County has an excess of three hundred and thirty-six males; Piute has sixty-nine males to thirteen females, and in Sevier County there are nineteen unfortunate males who are not blessed with the presence of a single female! These figures I obtained from the Census Bureau at Washington. They speak for themselves, and clearly demonstrate that, as far as Utah is concerned, instead of Polygamy being a necessity on account of the preponderance of the female sex, the facts are exactly the reverse; and if some men have two, four, six, eight or ten wives, for every wife they take some other man is forced to remain single. Considering the multiplicity of wives among the more pious Saints, and the large number of miners who, of course, are either unmarried or have not brought their wives with them to Utah, it is quite evident that there must be a good many single men in Utah.

But before closing my narrative, I must add a few words relative to myself. After my husband had been in New York for some months, it became necessary on account of business that I should join him there. I did so, and found him busy upon a history of Mormonism which he had for some years contemplated writing, and for which he had collected a large amount of valuable facts and statistics from the Historian's Office in Salt Lake City. While still a Mormon he had proposed to vindicate the Saints and justify their leaders, but now that his eyes were open to the degrading superstition and cruel bondage of the system, he was determined, as far as he had ability to do so, to expose the corruption and tyranny of the Priesthood. I heartily coincided with him, and encouraged him with wifely commendations.

At that time, I had no idea of becoming myself an author, and it was not until the close of that same year, when I paid a second visit to New York, that I first seriously entertained the idea of appearing before the public. I was induced to write a little volume which I thought would expose some of the cruel wrongs which Mormon Polygamy inflicts upon deluded, helpless women. My work was very kindly received and extensively circulated, but it was, I must confess, only a very imperfect and brief sketch. In this present volume I have endeavored to supply the deficiencies of the former, and in a truthful, if imperfect, sketch of my own life and my own experience in, and observations of, the workings of the polygamic system, I have endeavored to give my readers a just idea of what Polygamy and Mormonism really are.

With the exception of the little literary efforts which I have made from time to time to expose through the press the iniquity of the "Celestial Order of Marriage," no event of more than personal and private interest has, since I left the Mormon Church, interrupted the even tenor of my life. Last year, however, I was able to deal another blow—weak, it might be, but still it was a blow—directed at that false system against which I have sworn eternal enmity. I lectured upon Mormon Polygamy in Washington, and Boston, and other large cities, and attempted in my humble way to attract the attention of the Gentile world to the iniquities of that terrible superstition which, in Utah, has degraded womanhood and wrecked the happiness of thousands of my deluded sisters. I met with sympathy everywhere, and then, as now, I resolved that efforts like these I would never relax until, if God spared my life, I should see the last stone in the fabric of Mormonism overturned and Mormon Polygamy counted among the sins and follies of the past.

His literary work accomplished, my husband returned to Salt Lake City. Looking back over the past, our Missionary life and our faith in Brighamism seems like a dream, so difficult is it for us to realise that we ever submitted our souls to the slavery of the Priesthood or placed any credence in that mass of folly, superstition, and licentiousness, known as Mormonism. During all his efforts to obey counsel and build up a "kingdom," my husband, I know, never ceased to love me. For the misery which he then; in—as I firmly believe—his conscientious endeavors to live his religion, inflicted upon me, I have long ago freely and fully forgiven him. I think that during all that time he never ceased to entertain the fondest affection for me; and, if he was foolishly confiding in those who he believed were divinely authorised and speaking by inspiration, can I blame him when I remember that I myself was actuated by the same faith?

It was impossible to obliterate utterly the education and influences of a whole life's experience. That wall of partition—Polygamy—which separated my husband from me for so many years, is now for ever broken down. But the effects of Mormonism will, no doubt, though unconsciously to ourselves, tinge the whole of our future life. We can never forget the past. The mournful sympathy which, according to the poet, the Peri at the gate of Paradise expressed over the sins and sorrows of humanity, might, with a slight variation, be applied to our own lives :—

“Poor race of men, said the pitying spirit,
Dearly ye pay for your primal fall ;
Some traces of Eden ye still inherit,
But the trail of the serpent is over them all.”

The terrible effects of our religion will, I know, follow us to our graves ; but that temporary alienation has, I think, like the quarrels of lovers, only made us still dearer to each other ; and now, happy in our family circle, and with our children growing up around us, untainted by the fearful superstition which embittered and wasted their parents' lives, we feel that in them is our greatest blessing, and thank God that we have lived to see the day when our greatest ambition is, by every effort which lies within our reach, to aid in undoing that work which we spent the best years of our life in endeavoring to perform.

L' ENVOI.

In the preceding pages I have endeavored to present to the reader the story of my life's experience in Mormonism and Polygamy, and to place before him a truthful picture of the doctrines and practices of the Saints.

Much has already been written on this subject—much that is in accordance with facts, and much that is exaggerated and false. Hitherto, with but one exception*—that of a lady who wrote very many years ago, and who in her writings, so mixed up fiction with what was true, that it was difficult to determine where the one ended and the other began—no woman who really was a Mormon and lived in Polygamy ever wrote the history of her own personal experience. Books have been published, and narratives have appeared in the magazines and journals, purporting to be written by Mormon wives; it is, however, perhaps, unnecessary for me to state that, notwithstanding such narratives may be imposed upon the Gentile world as genuine, that they were written by persons outside the Mormon faith would in a moment be detected by any intelligent Saint who took the trouble to peruse them.

Two objects influenced my mind when I first proposed to write this volume. In the first place, I earnestly desired to stir up my Mormon sisters to a just sense of their own position. I longed to make them feel, as I do, the cruel degradation, the humiliating tyranny, which Polygamy inflicts. I wanted to arouse them to a sense of their own Womanhood, and a just appreciation of those Rights and Duties which, as women, God has conferred upon them. I was anxious that they should understand and know the inconsistency and folly of that superstitious faith by which they have been so egregiously deluded; that they might learn to hate and loathe the falsely-named "Celestial" system of marriage; and rising in honest indignation and disgust against the tyranny of the oppressor, break asunder the yoke of bondage, cast from them for ever the moral, religious, and social fetters wherewith they are bound, and, walking in the light of truth, assert their perfect equality with their sons, their husbands, their fathers, and their brethren, and henceforth claim and occupy that position which God assigned them, and which by right is theirs!

In the second place, I was anxious to enlist for them the sympathy of the Gentile world. Most strenuous efforts have been made, large sums of money have been spent, and secret intrigues, as well as open and honorable negotiations, have been carried on for the purpose of obtaining admission for Utah into the Union, under the title of The State of Deseret. The name "Deseret" itself is taken from the Book of Mormon, and is said to signify in the celestial tongue a honey-bee; wherefore it is that the escutcheon of Utah Territory is a bee-hive; and to grant that name "Deseret" alone would be a concession to Mormon superstition. Out here in the Valley of the Great Salt Lake we are perfectly well aware that, with Utah once admitted as a State, it would be almost impossible for Gentiles to live peaceably and safely among the Mormons; and of this fact their leading men and their official organs have repeatedly boasted. With Utah as a State, and Brigham Young once more Governor, the enslavement of the people to the Priesthood would be complete, and the cruel bondage of Polygamy would be rivetted a thousand times more firmly upon the unfortunate women. I was anxious, therefore, to attract the attention of Congress and the Nation at large to these facts; that thus, when Mormon bills and Mormon petitions, replete with falsified statistics, and perverted, and—in many instances—utterly untrue, statements, are presented to the National Legislature, neither the representatives of the Nation nor the Nation itself may be deceived thereby. These were the two objects which I proposed to myself in writing my own experience as a wife and mother among the Mormons, and I trust to some extent at least I have realised them.

I have told my story simply, but truthfully, and, as far as was possible, I have endeavored to TELL IT ALL. Some facts I have had occasion to relate, so horrible and repulsive, that a person unused to Mormonism and unversed in Mormon doctrine and Mormon practice would find difficulty in giving credence to such things—and yet, Alas! they are all too true! It is only right that I should add, that in the conduct and publicly expressed opinions of Brigham Young and many of the leaders, there have been such disgusting atrocities and such impure statements that for the sake of decency and propriety I dared not even mention them. For this suppressio veri I feel assured the reader will not blame me. In all that I have said I have most scrupulously kept to the very letter of the truth—I have neither exaggerated nor concealed, and in every respect my great endeavor has been to act with the strictest impartiality and justice.

Mine, in one sense, is the story of a wasted life. From the day when I linked my destiny with that of a Mormon Missionary Elder, to the time when, after long weary years of trial and endurance, I abjured the faith of the modern Saints, I suffered a constant martyrdom. Poverty, self-denial, and suffering, I gloried in, when I believed myself the humble instrument in the hands of the Almighty for proclaiming the “Fulness of the Gospel” to those who were walking in the darkness of unbelief. The trials of a Missionary life were to me a pleasure. I bore with gladness the cross, believing that hereafter I should exchange it for the glories of an eternal crown; and I think, even now, I should never have wearied of that life of devotion, so great was my faith in my religion, had the leaders of the Church remained steadfast to that simple Gospel creed which we were at first taught was the Evangel of the Latter-Day Dispensation. But when Polygamy—that accursed thing!—that offspring of deceit and licentiousness!—came across our path, darkening the way and blighting the affections, the hopes, the whole life, of every true woman among the Saints; when Polygamy came, casting its foul stain over all that was holy, crushing out from our hearts all that was good, and pure, and heaven-born, degrading our womanhood and embittering existence itself; when its dark shadow, like the gloom of the deadly Upas, brought death of the soul and the withering of the heart's true love to all who came within its influence;—then my faith began to waver, my zeal to wax cold, and in anticipation, and subsequently in realisation, of the cruel wrong which that system could inflict upon the affections and life of a wife and mother, I endured daily a trial of my faith—a moral and spiritual martyrdom, such as I trust my readers may never experience.

Not a day passed but what more and more evidence of the wickedness of the system, and its cruel debasement of woman's nature, was brought beneath my observation. Whatever came in contact with it, whoever fell beneath its influence, was the subject of immediate loss;—men, women, and children alike suffered from its effects. The innocence of childhood was sullied by its contamination; girlhood and youth were degraded and disgraced; the fair, sweet dreams of virgin purity were marred by its presence; the ideal of love—pure, faithful, holy, heavenly, which God himself has implanted in the heart, was rudely trampled upon, and perverted, and destroyed; the lives of wives and mothers were but the record of outrage, cruelty, and wrong, or else the deadening and blasting of every holy impulse and every tender emotion; while men themselves were brutalised and debased;—the husband became the lord, and frequently the tyrant and the despot; and the wife was either the toy of the hour, or the drudge who looked after the children—but never the cherished companion, the help-meet of the man. Such was the influence of Polygamy—such the results of the “Celestial Order of Marriage!”

Contrary to the laws of the land; contrary to the holiest sentiments of the heart; contrary to the divine teachings of Heaven, that system still exists! It is a disgrace to the National Government; it is a reproach to Civilisation; it is a blot upon the fair escutcheon of the World's Greatest Republic!

And yet visitors will come from Utah, and will tell you that the Mormon women are happy in Polygamy, for it is a part of their religion. Never; until new hearts and new natures are given to the women of Utah, and all that is womanly, and pure, and sacred, is crushed out from their souls, can one single woman be truly happy in Polygamy! They may say so publicly, they may, for their religion's sake, tell strangers that thus it is; but listen to them when they are alone among themselves; read, if you can, their hearts, and mark the bitterness which they try to stifle there; nay, see upon their very features the handwriting which bears witness against their assertion that they are happy and which proclaims to the world the sorrow which they vainly try to hide!

I send forth this little book with many earnest prayers and many heartfelt aspirations that my Mormon sisters may be benefitted thereby. Out of the evil which man originates, God alone can produce good; and I trust that my feeble attempt to portray the cruel wrong which Polygamy inflicts upon the Women of Utah may excite the sympathy of every man and woman whose influence may avail to hasten that time when this relic of ancient barbarism may be utterly rooted out before the advancing civilisation of the age.

The night—the gloomy night of superstition—cannot last for ever. Already there are signs of the coming dawn. The time, I trust and pray, will not long be delayed when the veil shall be removed from the eyes of the enslaved men and women of our modern Zion, and they shall cast aside for ever the yoke of the Priesthood. I trust that I shall yet live to see the day when the Mormon wives and mothers shall awake to a sense of their position and responsibilities, shall understand that God never required that their womanhood should be degraded, their love crushed out, and the holiest instincts of their nature perverted; I trust to see them assert their inalienable rights—their womanly prerogatives—their very birthright itself; I trust to see them shake off the slavery of that cruel superstition which has so long held them captive; I trust to see them take their places side by side with Gentile matrons—the honored wives and mothers of the men of Utah; I trust to see that dark shadow banished from their features, banished from their hearts, banished from their lives,—I trust to see them FREE!

Full of love for them—my sisters, my friends, the companions of my life hitherto, whose religion was once my own, whose hopes and joys I have shared, whose sorrows and trials have been also mine—with hopeful prayer I lay down my pen and present my labors to the world. And if my humble efforts shall have conduced, even in the smallest degree, to keep one sister from entering into this sinful “Order”; if they shall have aroused the Women of Utah to investigate the foundations of their faith, to calmly and impartially consider the iniquities of the system of Polygamy, to renounce the man-made slavery of the “Celestial Order”; if I shall be found to have awakened in the minds of thinking men and women a hatred for the licentious doctrine which enslaves the wives and daughters of the Saints; if I have to any extent enlisted active, practical sympathy in their behalf—I shall feel that my endeavors have been abundantly rewarded and that my labors have not been bestowed in vain.

GOOD READING.

ONE of the most deeply-felt wants of this generation, is a pure, healthy, courageous, and inspiring literature, presented attractively, yet in such a form as to make it attainable by all.

Among the workers in this field, none deserve more credit or heartier recommendation than a publication always true to its wise mottoes, always welcome to its readers, and always helpful with its delicate sympathy, earnest advice, sound counsel, and interesting stories.

The present (fourteenth) volume of the Magazine proves the promises of its enterprising publisher, and the ability of its well-known editor.

Under such supervision the public may be sure its hopes will not be disappointed, while the rapidly increasing circulation of the work shows that it is duly appreciated.

Terms, $1.00 per year.

THE BOOK OF MORMON.

THE conviction has become almost universal, except among Mormons themselves, that the "Book of Mormon" was founded upon Rev. Solomon Spaulding's romance, entitled "Manuscript Found." It is eminently fitting, therefore, that a history of Washington County, Pa., in one of whose villages Spaulding spent his last years, and where, after a checkered life, his wearied body found its resting-place, should contain at least a brief notice of the man whose pen has been the guiltless cause of one of the most remarkable delusions the world has ever witnessed.

Solomon Spaulding was born in Ashford, Conn., in 1761; graduated at Dartmouth College, N. H., in 1785; entered the ministry of the Congregational Church; preached for three or four years, and then, on account of impaired health, relinquished the sacred office, removed to Cherry Valley, N. Y., and engaged in mercantile business; in a few years failed in this enterprise, and in 1809 removed to Conneaut (formerly New Salem), Ashtabula Co., Ohio, where he engaged in building a forge. This business also proved unsuccessful, and he became involved in debt. Residing at Conneaut for three years, his attention was arrested by the numerous Indian mounds and fortifications in its vicinity, and being a man of literary tastes, and particularly fond of history, he conceived the project of writing a romance which would purport to account for the presence of the mound-builders on this continent, and to narrate their history. This employment beguiled the tedious hours of his enforced leisure, and when the romance approached completion, the idea suggested itself that its publication, by the profits arising from its sale, might enable him to discharge his debts.

The time of Spaulding's residence at Conneaut was chiefly spent in the preparation of this historical romance, and as the work progressed the author was accustomed to inform his neighbors, who would gladly assemble to hear each new installment read. In this small frontier settlement, where books were few and mail facilities very limited, each additional portion of the romance was awaited with the same interest with which the reader of the modern magazine looks for the number that will contain a fresh installment of the popular serial of the day. The characters and the incidents became subjects of general discussion, the outlines of the narrative were deeply impressed on the minds of the hearers, and the names of the prominent personages grew "familiar as household words."

At last, in 1812, with the fond hope that his day-dreams might be converted into something more substantial, Spaulding removed to Pittsburgh, at that time a small but rapidly-growing city (its population in 1810 was 4768, with 767 houses in all), and took his manuscript to the printing-office of Mr. Patterson (father of the present writer) to see if arrangements could be made for its publication. For some reason, probably lack of funds on the part of the author and doubts of success on that of the publisher, it was not given to the world. In 1814, Mr. Spaulding removed to Amity, Washington Co., Pa., where he died Oct. 20, 1816.¹ His widow removed to the home of her brother, W. H. Sabine, Esq., at Onondaga Valley, N. Y.

Thus far all accounts agree. What became of Mr. Spaulding's manuscript is not so clear. That it was not published is matter for profound regret. How many bitter tears had remained unshed, how many homes undesolated, how many hearts unbroken had the printing in 1812 of Spaulding's prose epic rendered forever impossible the imposture under which, eighteen years afterwards, with many incongruous additions, it saw the light!

In this discussion there are manifestly but two points to be considered. The first is to establish the fact that the historical portions of the Book of Mormon are certainly derived from Spaulding's "Manuscript Found;" and the second to show, if practicable, in what way and by whom the plagiarism was probably effected. Of these, the first is the only vitally important one. If the identity can be determined the imposture will be proved, even though it may not be possible to demonstrate absolutely how the fraud was perpetrated.

¹ The headstone which formerly marked the grave of Mr. Spaulding at Amity has almost entirely disappeared. Rev. Abner Jackson, of Canton, Ohio, when visiting Amity in 1840, thoughtfully copied the inscription, then entire, from the crumbling stone, and records it in his letter published in the Washington Reporter of Jan. 7, 1881. It was as follows:

IN MEMORY OF

Solomon Spaulding, who departed this life Oct. 20th, A.D. 1816. Aged 55 years.

"Kind cherubs, guard the sleeping clay
Until the great decision day,
And saints complete in glory rise
To share the triumphs of the skies."

I. THE PLAGIARISM.—In our inquiries upon the first point a merited tribute should be paid to the value of Mr. E. D. Howe's "Mormonism Unveiled," issued by its author at Painesville, Ohio, in 1835, only five years after the publication at Palmyra, N. Y., of the Book of Mormon, by Joseph Smith. Mr. Howe's work was the pioneer upon this subject, and though long out of print, the few copies extant are still the store-house from which successive investigators derive their most important facts. It contains the statements of eight witnesses, whose testimonials were obtained in 1833, twenty-one years after Mr. Spaulding left Conneaut, seventeen years after his death, and three years after the appearance of the Book of Mormon. Their authenticity has never been impeached. Our limits permit only the extracts given below, but as printed in full by Mr. Howe they show the opportunities of the respective writers to become fully acquainted with Mr. Spaulding's romance, and this feature, had we room for the entire statements, would give them great additional force. Our transcript is taken at second-hand from D. P. Kidder's "Mormonism and the Mormons," Carlton & Lanahan, publishers, New York, 1842.

I. John Spaulding, a brother of Solomon, visited the latter at Conneaut just before his removal, and states as follows:

"He then told me he had been writing a book, which he intended to have printed, the avails of which he thought would enable him to pay all his debts. The book was entitled the 'Manuscript Found,' of which he read to me many passages. It was an historical romance of the first settlers of America, endeavoring to show that the American Indians are the descendants of the Jews, or the lost tribes. It gave a detailed account of their journey from Jerusalem, by land and sea, till they arrived in America, under the command of NEPHI and LEHI. They afterward had quarrels and contentions, and separated into two distinct nations, one of which he denominated Nephites and the other Lamanites. Cruel and bloody wars ensued, in which great multitudes were slain. They buried their dead in large heaps, which caused the mounds so common in this country. . . . I have recently read the Book of Mormon, and, to my great surprise, I find nearly the same historical matter, names, &c., as they were in my brother's writings. I well remember that he wrote in the old style, and commenced about every sentence with 'And it came to pass,' or 'Now it came to pass,' the same as in the Book of Mormon, and according to the best of my recollection and belief, it is the same as my brother Solomon wrote, with the exception of the religious matter."

2. Mrs. Martha Spaulding, wife of John Spaulding, states in regard to Solomon Spaulding and his writings as follows:

"I was personally acquainted with Solomon Spaulding about twenty years ago. . . . The lapse of time which has intervened prevents my recollecting but few of the leading incidents of his writings; but the names of Nephi and Lehi are yet fresh in my memory as being the principal heroes of his tale. They were officers of the company which first came off from Jerusalem. He gave a particular account of their journey by land and sea till they arrived in America, after which disputes arose between the chiefs, which caused them to separate into different bands, one of which was called Lamanites and the other Nephites. Between these were recounted tremendous battles, which frequently covered the ground with the slain; and these being buried in large heaps was the cause of the numerous mounds in the country. . . . I have read the Book of Mormon, which has brought fresh to my recollection the writings of Solomon Spaulding; and I have no manner of doubt that the historical part of it is the same that I read, and heard read, more than twenty years ago. The old obsolete style, and the phrases of 'And it came to pass,' &c., are the same."

3. Henry Lake, the partner of Spaulding in building the forge, writes from Conneaut in September, 1833, as follows:

"He [Spaulding] very frequently read to me from a manuscript which he was writing, which he entitled the 'Manuscript Found,' and which he represented as being found in this town. I spent many hours in hearing him read said writings, and became well acquainted with their contents. He wished me to assist him in getting his production printed, alleging that a book of that kind would meet with a rapid sale. I designed doing so, but the forge not meeting our anticipations we failed in business, when I declined having anything to do with the publication of the book. This book represented the American Indians as the descendants of the lost tribes, gave an account of their leaving Jerusalem, their contentions and wars, which were many and great. One time when he was reading to me the tragic account of Laban I pointed out to him what I considered an inconsistency, which he promised to correct; but by referring to the Book of Mormon I find, to my surprise, that it stands there just as he read it to me then. Some months ago I borrowed the Golden Bible, put it into my pocket, carried it home, and thought no more of it. About a week after my wife found the book in my coat-pocket as it hung up, and commenced reading it aloud as I lay upon the bed. She had not read twenty minutes till I was astonished to find the same passages in it that Spaulding had read to me more than twenty years before from his 'Manuscript Found.' Since that I have more fully examined the said Golden Bible, and have no hesitation in saying that the historical part of it is principally if not wholly taken from the 'Manuscript Found.' I well recollect telling Mr. Spaulding that the so frequent use of the words, 'And it came to pass,' 'Now it came to pass,' rendered it ridiculous."

It should be stated in explanation of the above that the Book of Mormon, at the time of its publication, was frequently spoken of as the "Golden Bible." Also that an incongruity occurs in the story of Laban, in the First Book of Nephi, where Nephi says they "did speak many hard words unto us, their younger brothers, and they did smite us even with a rod." Whereupon an angel appears and says, "Why do ye smite your younger brother with a rod?" Consistency would require that the number, whether plural or singular, should be the same in both sentences. The oversight is in itself a trifle, but its occurrence in both the Spaulding manuscript and the Book of Mormon is an unanswerable proof of identity.

4. John N. Miller writes from Springfield, Pa., September, 1833, as follows:

"In the year 1811 I was in the employ of Henry Lake and Solomon Spaulding, at Conneaut, engaged in rebuilding a forge. While there I boarded and lodged in the family of said Spaulding for several months. I was soon introduced to the manuscript of Spaulding, and perused it as often as I had leisure. He had written two or three books or pamphlets on different subjects, but that which more particularly drew my attention was one which he called the 'Manuscript Found.' . . . It purported to be the history of the first settlement of America before discovered by Columbus. He brought them off from Jerusalem under their leaders, detailing their travels by land and water, their manners, customs, laws, wars, &c. He said that he designed it as an historical novel, and that in after-years it would be believed by many people as much as the history of England. . . . I have recently examined the 'Book of Mormon,' and find in it the writings of Solomon Spaulding from beginning to end, but mixed up with Scripture and other religious matter which I did not meet with in the 'Manuscript Found.' Many of the passages of the Mormon Book are verbatim from Spaulding, and others in part. The names of Nephi, Lehi, Moroni, and in fact all the principal names are brought fresh to my recollection by the Golden Bible. When Spaulding divested his history of its fabulous names by a verbal explanation, he landed his people near the Straits of Darien, which I am very confident he called Zarahemla. They were marched about that country for a length of time, in which wars and great bloodshed ensued. He brought them across North America in a northeast direction."

5. Aaron Wright, a former neighbor of Spaulding, writes at Conneaut, August, 1833, as follows:

"I first became acquainted with Solomon Spaulding in 1808 or 1809, when he commenced building a forge on Conneaut Creek. When at his house one day he showed and read to me a history he was writing of the lost tribes of Israel, purporting that they were the first settlers of America, and that the Indians were their descendants. Upon this subject we had frequent conversations. He traced their journey from Jerusalem to America, as it is given in the Book of Mormon, excepting the religious matter. The historical part of the Book of Mormon I know to be the same as I read and heard read from the writings of Spaulding more than twenty years ago; the names more especially are the same without any alteration. He told me his object was to account for all the fortifications, etc., to be found in this country, and said that in time it would be fully believed by all except learned men and historians. I once anticipated reading his writings in print, but little expected to see them in a new Bible. . . . In conclusion, I will observe that the names and most of the historical part of the Book of Mormon were as familiar to me before I read it as most modern history."

6. Oliver Smith, another old neighbor of Spaulding, writes at Conneaut, August, 1833:

"When Solomon Spaulding first came to this place, he purchased a tract of land, surveyed it out, and commenced selling it. While engaged in this business he boarded at my house, in all nearly six months. All his leisure hours were occupied in writing an historical novel founded upon the first settlers of this country. He said he intended to trace their journey from Jerusalem, by land and sea, till their arrival in America; give an account of their arts, sciences, civilization, wars, and contentions. In this way he would give a satisfactory account of all the old mounds so common to this country. During the time he was at my house I read and heard read one hundred pages or more. Nephi and Lehi were by him represented as leading characters when they first started for America. . . . [Mr. Smith narrates his last interview with Spaulding, when the latter was about starting for Pittsburgh, and solicited Smith's leniency as one of his creditors, not to prevent his going. Mr. Smith then closes as follows:] This was the last I heard of Spaulding or his book until the Book of Mormon came into the neighborhood. When I heard the historical part of it related, I at once said it was the writing of old Solomon Spaulding. Soon after I obtained the book, and on reading it found much of it the same as Spaulding had written more than twenty years before."

7. Nahum Howard, another of Spaulding's neighbors in Ohio, writes from Conneaut, in August, 1833, as follows:

"I first became acquainted with Solomon Spaulding in December, 1810. After that time I frequently saw him at his house and also at my house. I once, in conversation with him, expressed a surprise at not having any account of the inhabitants once in this country, who erected the old forts, mounds, etc. He then told me that he was writing a history of that race of people, and afterwards frequently showed me his writings, which I read. I have lately read the Book of Mormon, and believe it to be the same as Spaulding wrote, except the religious part. He told me that he intended to get his writings published in Pittsburgh, and he thought that in one century from that time it would be believed as much as any other history."

8. Artemas Cunningham, of Perry, Geauga Co., Ohio, who visited Spaulding in October, 1811, at Conneaut for the purpose of securing a debt due him from Spaulding, found the latter "destitute of the means of paying his debts," his only hope resting "upon the sale of a book which he had been writing," and which, he thought, "would meet with a ready sale." Mr. Cunningham, writing in 1833, proceeds to say:

"Before showing me his manuscripts he went into a verbal relation of its outlines, saying that it was a fabulous or romantic history of the first settlement of this country, and as it purported to have been a record found buried in the earth, or in a cave, he had adopted the ancient or Scripture style of writing. He then presented his manuscripts, when we sat down and spent a good share of the night in reading them and conversing upon them. I well remember the name of Nephi, who appeared to be the principal hero of the story. The frequent repetition of the phrase 'I, Nephi,' I recollect as distinctly as though it was but yesterday, although the general features of the story have passed from my memory through the lapse of twenty-two years. He attempted to account for the numerous antiquities which are found upon this continent, and remarked that after this generation had passed away, his account of the first inhabitants of America would be considered as authentic as any other history. The Mormon Bible I have partially examined, and am fully of the opinion that Solomon Spaulding had written its outlines before he left Conneaut."

The testimony of these eight witnesses was published by Mr. Howe in 1835 at Painesville, Ohio, in close proximity to Kirtland, then the headquarters of Mormonism, where Rigdon in that very year delivered his seven famous lectures on faith, which are prefixed to the Mormon "Doctrine and Covenants," where the same year the first "quorum of the twelve apostles" was ordained, and where in the following year the first Mormon temple was dedicated. Through all this portion of Ohio public curiosity in regard to this new fanaticism had been intensely excited, and Mr. Howe's book was widely disseminated by his agents. Of its contents Rigdon and Smith could not possibly have remained in ignorance. Yet no denial, no protest, not the slightest attempt to evade these clear proofs of plagiarism was made, and under such a charge, so direct and public, preferred by persons of intelligence and of unimpeachable veracity, silence was equivalent to a confession of guilt. So strong, moreover, was Mr. Spaulding's disposition to read his history to every willing auditor, that the number of attestants to its general character and contents could at that date easily have been quadrupled. Other witnesses in other places have since 1835 added their evidence to that already given. Extracts from their statements are subjoined:

9. Mrs. Matilda (Spaulding) Davison, the widow of Rev. Solomon Spaulding (married in 1820 to Mr. Davison, of Hartwick, Otsego Co., N. Y.) made a statement in 1839 to Rev. D. R. Austin, of Monson, Mass., which was written down by him and published in the Boston Recorder in May of that year. She relates substantially, as already mentioned, the circumstances under which her late husband's "imaginary history" was composed, and adds,—

"It claimed to have been written by one of the lost nation, and to have been recovered from the earth, and assumed the title of 'Manuscript Found.' The neighbors would often inquire how Mr. Spaulding progressed in deciphering the manuscript; and when he had a sufficient portion prepared, he would inform them, and they would assemble to hear it read. . . . After the Book of Mormon came out, a copy of it was taken to New Salem, the place of Mr. Spaulding's former residence, and the very place where the 'Manuscript Found' was written. A Mormon preacher appointed a meeting there, and in the meeting read and repeated copious extracts from the Book of Mormon. The historical part was immediately recognized by all the older inhabitants as the identical work of Mr. Spaulding, in which they had all been so deeply interested years before. Mr. John Spaulding was present and recognized perfectly the work of his brother. He was amazed and afflicted that it should have been perverted to so wicked a purpose. His grief found vent in a flood of tears, and he arose on the spot and expressed to the meeting his sorrow and regret that the writings of his deceased brother should be used for a purpose so vile and shocking."

10. Mrs. M. S. McKinsty, the only child of Rev. Solomon Spaulding, made a statement at Washington, D. C., April 3, 1880, which was carefully taken down by Mrs. E. E. Dickinson, and was published in Scribner's Monthly for August, 1880, in which, speaking of her father's "Manuscript Found," she says,—

"He read the manuscript, which I had seen him writing, to the neighbors and to a clergyman—a friend of his—who came to see him. Some of the names that he mentioned while reading to these people I have never forgotten. They are as fresh to me to-day as though I heard them yesterday. They were 'Mormon,' 'Maroni,' 'Lamanite,' 'Nephi.'"

11. William H. Sabine, Esq., of Onondaga Valley, Onondaga Co., N. Y., a lawyer of eminence and accustomed to weigh evidence, was the brother of Mrs. Solomon Spaulding, at whose request she gave D. P. Hurlbut authority to receive her late husband's "Manuscript Found" from Mr. Clark, at Hartwick, N. Y., in whose care it had been left. Mrs. McKinsty, in her statement above referred to, says that "Mr. Sabine had undoubtedly read the manuscript while it was in his house, and had faith that its production would show to the world that the Mormon Bible had been taken from it." He based his request for the loan of the manuscript to Hurlbut upon his "desire to uproot this Mormon fraud."

12. To these statements of members of Spaulding's family or connection must be added the testimony of Joseph Miller, of Amity, Pa., born Feb. 1, 1791, and now in his ninety-second year. His memory, notwithstanding his advanced age, is remarkably clear and distinct; he has long been a ruling elder in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and his veracity is unimpeachable. He was intimately acquainted with Spaulding during the entire residence of the latter in Amity; often heard him read his romance; assisted in nursing him during his last illness, in performing the last offices to his remains, and in settling his temporal affairs. He is the oldest of three men who are living witnesses to the identity of the Book of Mormon with the Spaulding manuscript as read in their hearing by its author. Mr. Miller's testimony has been repeatedly published. The following extracts are taken from the record made, with the utmost care to be accurate, by Dr. W. W. Sharp, of Amity, and published in the Pittsburgh Telegraph, Feb. 6, 1879. Mr. Miller says,—

"I was well acquainted with Mr. Spaulding when he lived in Amity, Pa. . . . Mr. Spaulding seemed to take delight in reading from his manuscript (written on foolscap) for the entertainment of his frequent visitors. Heard him read most, if not all of it, and had frequent conversations with him about it. Some time ago I had in my possession for about six months the Book of Mormon, and heard most of it read during that time. . . . On hearing read the account from the book of the battle between the Amlicites and the Nephites [Book of Alma, chapter 1], in which the soldiers of one army had placed a red mark on their foreheads to distinguish them from their enemies, it seemed to reproduce in my mind not only the narration but the very words, as they had been impressed on my mind by the reading of Spaulding's manuscript. . . . The longer I live the more firmly I am convinced that Spaulding's manuscript was appropriated and largely used in getting up the Book of Mormon. I believe that, leaving out of the book the portions that may be easily recognized as the work of Joe Smith and his accomplices, Solomon Spaulding may be truly said to be its author. I have not a doubt of it."

13. Redick McKee, Esq., formerly a resident of Washington County, Pa., afterwards of Wheeling, W. Va., and now of Washington, D. C., a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church, and esteemed for his many Christian virtues, is another living witness to the similarity of the Book of Mormon and Spaulding's manuscript. In a communication from Washington, D. C., April 14, 1869, published in the Washington (Pa.) Reporter for April 21, 1869, and suggested by a statement then recently published in the Reporter by Rev. J. W. Hamilton of the reminiscences of Mr. Joseph Miller, above mentioned, Mr. McKee writes,—

"In the fall of 1814 I arrived in the village of 'Good Will,' and for eighteen or twenty months sold goods in the store previously occupied by Mr. Thos. Brice. It was on Main Street, a few doors west of Spaulding's tavern, where I was a boarder. With both Mr. Solomon Spaulding and his wife I was quite intimately acquainted. . . . I recollect quite well Mr. Spaulding spending much time in writing (on sheets of paper torn out of an old book) what purported to be a veritable history of the nations or tribes who inhabited Canaan. . . . He called it 'Lost History Found,' 'Lost Manuscript,' or some such name, not disguising that it was wholly a work of the imagination, written to amuse himself, and without any immediate view to publication. . . . I was struck with the minuteness of his details and the apparent truthfulness and sincerity of the author. . . . I have an indistinct recollection of the passage referred to by Mr. Miller about the Amlicites making a cross with red paint on their foreheads to distinguish them from enemies in the confusion of battle."

Also, in a letter to the present writer, dated Washington, D. C., April 15, 1879, Mr. McKee says,—

"There can be no doubt that the Book of Mormon was founded on and largely copied from the vigorous romance of Solomon Spaulding."

14. Rev. Abner Jackson, of Canton, Ohio, in a communication to the Washington County Historical Society, dated Dec. 20, 1880, and published in the Washington Reporter of Jan. 7, 1881, gives a more minute account of Spaulding's romance, and a fuller outline of its narrative, than any of the preceding witnesses. He also institutes a close comparison between its plot and that of the Book of Mormon, showing the strict adherence of the latter to the former. Just before Mr. Spaulding's removal to Pittsburgh he brought his romance to Mr. Jackson's father, read much of the story to him, and gave him an outline of the whole. The son, being confined to the house with a lame knee, was present, and heard the conversation that passed between them. He is the third surviving witness to the unmistakable resemblance between the Book of Mormon and Spaulding's story. Of the latter he gives his recollections, and adds,—

"Spaulding frequently read his manuscript to the neighbors, and amused them as he progressed with his work. He wrote it in Bible style. 'And it came to pass' occurred so often that some called him 'Old Come-to-pass.' . . . The Book of Mormon follows the romance too closely to be a stranger. In both many persons appear having the same name, as Maroni, Mormon, Nephites, Laman, Lamanites, Nephi, and others. Here we are presented with romance second, called the Book of Mormon, telling the same story of the same people, traveling from the same plain in the same way, having the same difficulties and destination, with the same wars, same battles, and same results, with thousands upon thousands slain. Then see the Mormon account of the last battle, at Cumorah, where all the righteous were slain. . . . How much this resembles the closing scene in the 'Manuscript Found.' The most singular part of the whole matter is that it follows the romance so closely with this difference: the first claims to be a romance; the second claims to be a revelation of God, a new Bible! When it was brought to Conneaut, and read there in public, old Esquire Wright heard it and exclaimed, 'Old Come-to-pass has come to life again!' Here was the place where Spaulding wrote and read his manuscript to the neighbors for their amusement, and 'Squire Wright had often heard him read from his romance. This was in 1832, sixteen years after Spaulding's death. This 'Squire Wright lived on a farm just outside of the little village. I was acquainted with him for twenty-five years. I lived on his farm when I was a boy, and attended school in the village. I am particular to notice these things to show that I had an opportunity of knowing what I am writing about.'

The testimony of Esquire Wright was given above (No. 5). The constant recurrence in Spaulding's romance of the phrase, "And it came to pass" has been referred to by a number of the above witnesses, and Spaulding himself was admonished of its undue repetition, yet failed to remedy the defect. It is an important coincidence, worthy of special observation, that in no other volume probably in the whole range of English literature does the same peculiarity occur with one-tenth the frequency of its appearance in the Book of Mormon. This remarkable concurrence of a literary blemish is itself an indication of a common origin. The authorship of the Homeric poems, and even of some portions of the Bible, has been disputed by scholars on the ground of the presence or absence of much slighter peculiarities.

15. Rev. Robert Patterson, to whom the Spaulding manuscript was taken in 1812 for publication, should certainly have been applied to for information among the first. Mr. Howe, in his book already mentioned, states that "Mr. Patterson said he had no recollection of any such manuscript being brought there for publication, neither would he have been likely to have seen it, as the business of printing was conducted wholly by Lambdin at that time." This statement seems irreconcilable with the testimony of the widow and daughter of Spaulding, and also in conflict with the fact that the partnership of R. Patterson and Lambdin was not formed until Jan. 1, 1818. In 1812, Lambdin was a lad of fourteen in the bookstore of Patterson & Hopkins, and afterwards was continued in the employ of R. & J. Patterson. Mr. Howe, on being applied to for his authority for the statement, answered, "I think Hurlbut was the person who talked with Patterson about the manuscript." But Hurlbut himself informed the present writer (Aug. 19, 1879) that he had never seen Mr. Patterson or had any communication with him. There is therefore no known authority for the statement in Mr. Howe's book. On being applied to in 1842 by Rev. Samuel Williams, who was preparing for publication a pamphlet entitled "Mormonism Exposed," Mr. Patterson wrote the following brief certificate, which we copy in full from Mr. Williams' pamphlet:

"R. Patterson had in his employment Silas Engles at the time, a foreman printer, and general superintendent of the printing business. As he [S. E.] was an excellent scholar, as well as a good printer, to him was intrusted the entire concerns of the office. He even decided on the propriety or otherwise of publishing manuscripts when offered,—as to their morality, scholarship, &c., &c. To this character, he informed R. P. that a gentleman, from the East originally, had put into his hands a manuscript of a singular work, chiefly in the style of our English translation of the Bible, and handed the copy to R. P., who read only a few pages, and finding nothing apparently exceptionable, he [R. P.] said to Engles he might publish it if the author furnished the funds or good security. He [the author] failing to comply with the terms, Mr. Engles returned the manuscript, as I supposed at that time, after it had been some weeks in his possession, with other manuscripts in the office.

"This communication written and signed 2d April, 1842.

"ROBERT PATTERSON."

It is matter of sincere regret that so meagre a document is all the written evidence that Mr. Patterson has left. Mr. Williams introduces it with the remark (p. 16) that "Mr. Patterson firmly believes, also, from what he has heard of the Mormon Bible, that it is the same thing he examined at that time." So many errors of date have crept into this part of the history of Mormonism that it may be well to note the following: Mr. Lambdin died Aug. 1, 1825, in his twenty-seventh year; Mr. Engles, July 17, 1827, in his forty-sixth year; Mr. Patterson, Sept. 5, 1854, in his eighty-second year. Messrs. Williams, Howe, and Hurlbut are still living (March 4, 1882).

16. A coincidence may here be noted: Mr. Howe, in 1835, had in his possession a story in Spaulding's handwriting, and admitted to be his, which "purported to have been translated from the Latin, found on twenty-four rolls of parchment in a cave on the banks of Conneaut Creek," giving an account of a ship driven upon the American coast, with a party from Rome, previous to the Christian era. The Book of Ether, which is a portion of the Book of Mormon, purports to relate the history of a party which commenced its wanderings at the confusion of tongues at Babel, found its way to America, and whose history, written by Ether upon twenty-four plates whilst he was concealed in the cavity of a rock, was long afterwards discovered by the people of Limhi. Here is a threefold resemblance: each is the history of a colony not Jewish transported to this continent; each is recorded on the same number of plates or parchments, each colony seeming to have perished; and each history is hidden in a cave and is long afterwards discovered. That two plots so much alike should originate so nearly about the same time and place in two different minds seems incredible.

17. The statement which follows is accorded a place here not because it is entitled in its present form to be regarded as evidence, but that attention may be attracted to it and inquiry continued. In "Appleton's Cyclopædia," under the title "Mormons," occurs the following statement: "As early as 1813 this work [Spaulding's] was announced in the newspapers as forthcoming, and as containing a translation of the 'Book of Mormon.' Spaulding entitled his book 'Manuscript Found,' and intended to publish with it, by way of preface or advertisement, a fictitious account of its discovery in a cave in Ohio." The author of this article, on being interrogated, could not recall his authority for the statement, but was positive that he had ample warrant for it at the time of writing.

Few files of Pittsburgh papers of 1813 are in existence; some perished in the great conflagration of 1845; and all search for the said announcement has thus far been unsuccessful. Any reader of this paragraph who has access to a file of Pittsburgh newspapers of 1813 will do well to institute a search and report the result.

It should be remembered that the evidence adduced above has reference only to the historical portions of the Book of Mormon. Intermingled with these are crude ideas on various theological points that were themes of popular discussion in Western New York about the time when this pseudo-revelation was in preparation for the press. The opportunity of settling disputed points in favor of the side maintained by the medium of revelation was too good to be lost. For all such interpolations, and for the constant disregard of grammatical rules, Mr. Spaulding should not be held responsible.

The candid inquirer after truth cannot fail to be impressed by the concurrent testimony of a dozen witnesses, many of them personally unknown to the others and widely separated from them, yet agreeing in their recollections of Spaulding's romance, its plan and purpose, its general scope, the names of leading characters and tribes, its grand division of the population of this continent into two classes, the righteous and the idolatrous, and the discovery of the history of these people as recorded, and the record concealed in the earth. The same witnesses concur in recognizing precisely the same features in the "Book of Mormon,"—an identity in the names of prominent persons and places; an identity in the amazing frequency of wars and the vast number of sanguinary battles; an identity in events and the order of their occurrence so great that one witness declares that the "Book of Mormon was familiar to him before he read it," an identity of style, even the blemishes of the original being faithfully adhered to in the transcript; and an identity in the alleged discovery of the record in the earth. All this is established by the united testimony of men and women of unimpeachable veracity. Much of this evidence was published within five years after the appearance of the "Book of Mormon," must necessarily have been known to the Mormon leaders, and was never contradicted by them. The conclusion is irresistible that these two productions must have had a common origin. The adherents of Joseph Smith have never claimed that the "Book of Mormon" was the offspring of his imagination. They freely admit that he was too illiterate and ignorant to accomplish such a task. They contend that the "Book of Mormon" was divinely inspired, as truly so as the Bible itself. The question is thus narrowed down to a very simple alternative: either the "Book of Mormon" was inspired or its historical portion was the work of Solomon Spaulding.

II. THE PLAGIARIST.—If the origin of the "Book of Mormon" has been established by the testimony cited above, we might at this point lay down the pen, were it not that public curiosity has been busy with the inquiry, How was the plagiarism effected? And we are free to confess that all the evidence thus far elicited creates simply a very strong circumstantial probability. One theory has been advanced that Smith might have stolen the manuscript from Mrs. Spaulding's trunk whilst it remained for some years unlocked in the house of her brother, William H. Sabine, Esq., at Onondaga Valley, N. Y., Smith being at the time, it is said, a laborer in Mr. Sabine's employ. No evidence is offered that Smith was thus employed; if so, he was not more than fifteen years of age, scarcely able to read, and the document would have been of no use to him; and Mrs. McKinstry's statement in Scribner's Monthly for August, 1880, effectually disposes of this hypothesis, as she testifies that about 1820 her mother sent to Mr. Sabine for her effects, and "that the old trunk with its contents reached her in safety." We have also the evidence of both mother and daughter that down to 1834 (the date of Hurlbut's visit and four years after the "Book of Mormon" was published) the alleged or suggested theft had not been discovered. Popular opinion has tended strongly towards the adoption of a different theory, that the agent through whom the romance was transformed into a revelation was Sidney Rigdon, and the evidence both for and against that judgment will be given as briefly as possible.

Sidney Rigdon was born near the present village of Library, Allegheny Co., Pa., Feb. 19, 1793; attended in boyhood an ordinary country school; joined the Baptist Church near his home May 31, 1817; studied divinity with a Baptist preacher named Clark in Beaver County, Pa., in the winter of 1818-19, and was licensed to preach; went to Warren, Ohio, where he was ordained, and in the winter of 1821-22 returned to Pittsburgh; became pastor of the First Baptist Church there Jan. 28, 1822, and for doctrinal errors was excluded from the Baptist denomination Oct. 11, 1823. He continued to preach in the court-house to his adherents, but in 1824, according to one account, he removed to the Western Reserve, Ohio; according to another account he engaged in the tanning business in Pittsburgh until 1826, and then removed to the Reserve, residing for brief periods at Bainbridge, Mentor, and Kirtland. At this time he was connected with the Campbellite or Disciples' Church, and preached its doctrines, mingled with extravagant conceits of his own, until in 1830 he joined the Mormons.

The theory hitherto most widely published and perhaps generally accepted has been that Rigdon was a printer in Patterson's printing-office when the Spaulding manuscript was brought there in 1812-14, and that he either copied or purloined it. Having it thus in his possession, the use made of it was an afterthought suggested by circumstances many years later. More recently another theory has been advanced, that Rigdon obtained possession of the Spaulding manuscript during his pastorate of the First Baptist Church, or soon thereafter, 1822-24, without any necessary impropriety on his part, but rather through the courtesy of some friend, in whose possession it remained unclaimed, and who regarded it as a literary curiosity. The friends of Rigdon, in response to the first charge, deny that he ever resided in Pittsburgh previous to 1822, or that he ever was a printer, and in general answer to both charges affirm that he never at any time had access to Spaulding's manuscript. Taking up for convenience their statement first, we find the following evidence in its support:

1. Rigdon's relatives at Library, Pa., Carvil Rigdon (his brother) and Peter Boyer (his brother-in-law), in a written statement dated Jan. 27, 1843, certify to the facts and dates as above stated in regard to his birth, schooling, uniting with the church, licensure, ordination, and settlement in Pittsburgh in 1822. Mr. Boyer also in a personal interview with the present writer in 1879 positively affirmed that Rigdon had never lived in Pittsburgh previous to 1822, adding that "they were boys together and he ought to know." Mr. Boyer had for a short time embraced Mormonism, but became convinced that it was a delusion and returned to his membership in the Baptist Church.

2. Isaac King, a highly-respected citizen of Library, Pa., and an old neighbor of Rigdon, states in a letter to the present writer, dated June 14, 1879, that Sidney lived on the farm of his father until the death of the latter in May, 1810, and for a number of years afterwards, farming with very indifferent success; "it was said he was too lazy and proud to make a good farmer;" received his education in a log school-house in the vicinity; "began to talk in public on religion soon after his admission to the church, probably at his own instance, as there is no record of his licensure;" went to Sharon, Pa., for a time, and was there ordained as a preacher, but soon returned to his farm, which he sold (June 28, 1823) to James Means, and about the time of the sale removed to Pittsburgh.

3. Samuel Cooper, of Saltsburg, Pa., a veteran of three wars, in a letter to the present writer, dated June 14, 1879, stated as follows: "I was acquainted with Mr. Lambdin, was often in the printing-office; was acquainted with Silas Engles, the foreman of the printing-office; he never mentioned Sidney Rigdon's name to me, so I am satisfied he was never engaged there as a printer. I was introduced to Sidney Rigdon in 1843; he stated to me that he was a Mormon preacher or lecturer; I was acquainted with him during 1843-45; never knew him before, and never knew him as a printer; never saw him in the book-store or printing-office; your father's office was in the celebrated Molly Murphy's Row."

4. Rev. Robert P. Du Bois, of New London, Pa., under date of Jan. 9, 1879, writes: "I entered the book-store of R. Patterson & Lambdin in March, 1818, when about twelve years old, and remained there until the summer of 1820. The firm had under its control the book-store on Fourth Street, a book-binding, a printing-office (not newspaper, but job-office, under the name of Butler & Lambdin), entrance on Diamond Alley, and a steam paper-mill on the Allegheny (under the name of R. & J. Patterson). I knew nothing of Spaulding (then dead) or of his book, or of Sidney Rigdon."

5. Mrs. R. W. Lambdin, of Irvington, N. Y., widow of the late J. Harrison Lambdin, in response to some inquiries as to her recollections of Rigdon and others, writes under date of Jan. 15, 1882: "I am sorry to say I shall not be able to give you any information relative to the persons you name. They certainly could not have been friends of Mr. Lambdin." Mrs. Lambdin resided in Pittsburgh from her marriage in 1819 to the death of her husband, Aug. 1, 1825. Mr. Lambdin was born Sept. 1, 1798.

6. Impartial justice requires the addition to the above testimony of the very explicit denial of Rigdon himself, addressed to the Boston Journal, dated at Commerce (better known afterwards as Nauvoo, Ill.), May 27, 1839, in reply to the letter of Mrs. Davison, published a few days before, as already mentioned. Another extract from her letter will be found farther on, which provoked the following rejoinder from Rigdon:

"It is only necessary to say, in relation to the whole story about Spaulding's writings being in the hands of Mr. Patterson, who was in Pittsburgh, and who is said to have kept a printing-office, and my saying that I was concerned in the said office, etc., etc., is the most base of lies, without even the shadow of truth. There was no man by the name of Patterson during my residence at Pittsburgh who had a printing-office. . . . Mr. Robert Patterson, I was told, had owned a printing-office before I lived in that city. . . . This Mr. Patterson, who was a Presbyterian preacher, I had a very slight acquaintance with during my residence in Pittsburgh. . . . If I were to say that I ever heard of the Rev. Solomon Spaulding and his hopeful wife until Dr. P. Hurlbut wrote his lie about me I should be a liar like unto themselves. Why was not the testimony of Mr. Patterson obtained to give force to this shameful tale of lies? The only reason is that he was not a fit tool for them to work with; he would not lie for them, for if he were called on he would testify to what I have here said."

A portion of this letter is too coarse for publication. The first sentence of the above extract does not impress one with its author's grammatical attainments. He is certainly incorrect, also, as to there being no Patterson's printing-office in Pittsburgh during his residence there, as his pastorate there began in January, 1822, and the firm of R. Patterson & Lambdin was in business until Jan. 1, 1823. But whatever may be thought of his testimony, as that of an interested party, there can be no doubt that the five preceding witnesses on this point have conscientiously stated what they firmly believed to be the facts. No one who knew them would for a moment doubt their veracity. On the other side, however, we have the following:

1. Mrs. Davison, in her letter of May, 1839, had used this language, "Sidney Rigdon, who has figured so largely in the history of the Mormons, was at that time connected with the printing-office of Mr. Patterson, as is well known in that region, and, as Rigdon himself has frequently stated, became acquainted with Mr. Spaulding's manuscript, and copied it. It was a matter of notoriety and interest to all connected with the printing establishment."

Rigdon's passionate reply to this charge by Mrs. Davison has just been given above; but her impression deserves to be considered in connection with the statements of the four witnesses next following. The question also suggests itself, How could Mrs. Davison have known anything, in her remote Massachusetts home, about Rigdon if he did not come to Pittsburgh until 1822, eight years after her departure?

2. Joseph Miller, of Amity, Pa., in his evidence, part of which has been already quoted, testified also as follows:

"My recollection is that Mr. Spaulding had left a transcript of the manuscript with Mr. Patterson, of Pittsburgh, Pa., for publication; that its publication was delayed until Mr. Spaulding would write a preface, and in the mean time the transcript was spirited away, and could not be found. Mr. Spaulding told me that Sidney Rigdon had taken it, or that he was suspected for it. Recollect distinctly that Rigdon's name was used in that connection."

On being closely questioned whether he had not possibly confounded subsequent impressions, derived from what he had read and heard, with his personal recollections of what Spaulding had said, he emphatically answered "No!" and affirmed positively that "it was Spaulding's own statement."

3. Redick McKee, Esq., already mentioned as an inmate of Spaulding's family at Amity, says in his letter of April 15, 1879,—

"Mr. Spaulding told me that he had submitted the work to Mr. Patterson for publication, but for some reason it was not printed, and afterwards returned to him. I also understood he was then occasionally re-writing, correcting, and he thought improving some passages descriptive of his supposed battles. In this connection he spoke of the man Rigdon as an employee in the printing or book-binding establishment of Patterson & Lambdin, in Pittsburgh; but about him I made no special inquiries."

Mr. McKee differs from Mr. Miller in his recollection as to the return of the manuscript, but agrees with him as to Rigdon being an employee. These two venerable men are above the suspicion of stating anything they did not believe to be true. We are thus confronted with the singular fact to which these witnesses testify, that at least fourteen years before the completion of the plagiarism, and some ten years before even the conception of it, the future perpetrator is an object of note, it would seem of suspicion, in the mind of the man he is one day so deeply to wrong. By what mysterious intuition did Spaulding mark the rustic, uneducated youth, innocent as the latter must then have been of any base intent, whose name was destined to be so strangely and sorrowfully blended with his own?

4. Rev. Cephas Dodd, who died Jan. 16, 1858, was long the pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Amity, also practiced as a physician, and in this capacity attended Mr. Spaulding in his last illness. Of his testimony Mr. George M. French, now in his eighty-third year, residing near Amity, and whose wife was a relative of Sidney Rigdon, retains a vivid impression.

Shortly after Mr. French's removal from Fayette County, Pa., to Amity in 1832, when the Mormon delusion was beginning to excite remark, Dr. Dodd took Mr. French to Spaulding's grave, and there told him his positive belief that Rigdon was the agent in transforming Spaulding's manuscript into the Book of Mormon. The conviction thus expressed within two years after the publication of the Book of Mormon, and three years before the appearance of Mr. Howe's book, which attributed the plagiarism to Rigdon, shows that Dr. Dodd's judgment was formed independently of any of the testimonies cited above. As to the plagiarism, it must have been based on his own knowledge of Spaulding's romance and comparing it with the Book of Mormon; and as to the agent, his attention, like Mr. Miller's, may first have been directed to Rigdon by Spaulding himself. Mr. French has no personal knowledge of Rigdon's connection with the printing-office.

5. Mrs. R. J. Eichbaum, of Pittsburgh, now in her ninetieth year, with a memory marvelously tenacious of even the minutest incidents, with the vivacity of a maiden in her teens, with health, until recently, exceptionally good for one of her years, with a still keen enjoyment of the humorous, a clear mind, a kindly heart, and the Christian's hope of a better existence, seems to realize Wordsworth's picture "Of an old age serene and bright,

And lovely as a Lapland night."¹

We give her reminiscence in full, dated Pittsburgh, Sept. 18, 1879, only remarking that one who could hear her relate the incidents of her youth, and specify her reasons for fixing names and dates with unusual distinctness, would find it difficult to resist a conviction of the accuracy of her memory. She says,—

"My father, John Johnston, was postmaster of Pittsburgh for about eighteen years, from 1804 to 1822. My husband, William Eichbaum, succeeded him, and was postmaster for about eleven years, from 1822 to 1833. I was born Aug. 25, 1792, and when I became old enough I assisted my father in attending to the post-office, and became familiar with its duties. From 1811 to 1816 I was the regular clerk in the office, assorting, making up, dispatching, opening, and distributing the mails. Pittsburgh was then a small town, and I was well acquainted with all the stated visitors at the office who called regularly for their mails. So meagre at that time were the mails that I could generally tell without looking whether or not there was anything for such persons, though I would usually look in order to satisfy them. I was married in 1815, and the next year my connection with the office ceased, except during the absences of my husband. I knew and distinctly remember Robert and Joseph Patterson, J. Harrison Lambdin, Silas Engles, and Sidney Rigdon. I remember Rev. Mr. Spaulding, but simply as one who occasionally called to inquire for letters. I remember that there was an evident intimacy between Lambdin and Rigdon. They very often came to the office together. I particularly remember that they would thus come during the hour on Sabbath afternoon when the office was required to be open, and I remember feeling sure that Rev. Mr. Patterson knew nothing of this, or he would have put a stop to it. I do not know what position, if any, Rigdon filled in Patterson's store or printing-office, but am well assured he was frequently, if not constantly, there for a large part of the time when I was clerk in the post-office. I recall Mr. Engles saying that 'Rigdon was always hanging around the printing-office.' He was connected with the tannery before he became a preacher, though he may have continued the business whilst preaching."

These witnesses are all whom we can find after inquiries extending through some three years who can testify at all to Rigdon's residence in Pittsburgh before 1816, and to his possible employment in Patterson's printing-office or bindery. Of this employment none of them speak from personal knowledge. In making inquiries among two or three score of the oldest residents of Pittsburgh and vicinity, those who had any opinion on the subject invariably, so far as now remembered, repeated the story of Rigdon's employment in Patterson's office, as if it were a well-known and admitted fact; they "could tell all about it," but when pressed as to their personal knowledge of it or their authority for the conviction they had none.¹

The remaining testimony which now claims consideration is independent of any connection of Rigdon as an employee with Patterson, and it necessitates no charge of Rigdon's dishonorably acquiring the Spaulding manuscript, and no suggestion of such an improbability as that a young man, not noted for industry or application, would perform the arduous task of transcribing so large a document, clandestinely too, when he had at that time certainly no ulterior object in view.

6. The earliest published intimation we have seen that Rigdon had obtained the Spaulding manuscript occurs in Howe's book, issued in 1835, where it is advanced as "the strongest presumption," and is based on Rigdon's residence in Pittsburgh in 1823-24, on the probability that the manuscript had remained in the printing-office until then, and on Mr. Lambdin's friendship for Rigdon. Says Howe, "We have been credibly informed that he was on terms of intimacy with Lambdin, being seen frequently in his shop." The name of his informant is not given, as it should have been. In support of the "presumption" of Rigdon's connection with the Book of Mormon, Mr. Howe states that "some new points of doctrine" which Rigdon had commenced preaching "were afterward found to be inculcated in the Mormon Bible." Also his frequent protracted absences from his home during the year or two preceding the publication of the Book of Mormon are cited as circumstantial evidence pointing to his co-operation with Smith.

7. Rev. Samuel Williams, of Castle Shannon, Allegheny Co., Pa., a successor of Rigdon in the pastorate of the First Baptist Church, Pittsburgh, published in 1842, as already stated, a pamphlet entitled "Mormonism Exposed." On page 4 he says, "In 1818, and for some years afterwards, Patterson & Lambdin were the principal firm engaged in printing and publishing books. The widow of Mr. Spaulding states that it [her husband's romance] was taken to that printing-office, and Mr. Patterson and many others of this city knew that Mr. Rigdon and Mr. Lambdin, who superintended the printing-office, were very intimate during Rigdon's residence here." On page 16, Mr. Williams expresses his conviction "that the manuscript remained in the office with others from 1814 until Sidney Rigdon came to this place and obtained it from Lambdin."

8. Rev. John Winter, M.D., was one of the early ministers of the Baptist Church, laboring in Western Pennsylvania and Eastern Ohio. During a portion of the time when Sidney Rigdon was pastor of the First Baptist Church in Pittsburgh, Dr. Winter was teaching a school in the same city, and was well acquainted with Rigdon. Upon one occasion during this period, 1822-23, Dr. Winter was in Rigdon's study, when the latter took from his desk a large manuscript, and said in substance, "A Presbyterian minister, Spaulding, whose health had failed, brought this to the printer to see if it would pay to publish it. It is a romance of the Bible." Dr. Winter did not read any part of it, and paid no more attention to it until after the Book of Mormon appeared, when he heard that Mr. Spaulding's widow recognized in the writings of her husband.

The authority for the above important statement is Rev. A. G. Kirk, to whom Dr. Winter communicated it in conversation at New Brighton, Pa., in 1870-71. Dr. Winter died at Sharon, Pa., in 1878. Mr. Kirk conveyed this information to the present writer by letter, March 23, 1879. Mrs. Mary W. Irvine, a daughter of Dr. Winter, writes from Sharon, Pa., April 5, 1881, as follows:

"I have frequently heard my father speak of Rigdon having Spaulding's manuscript, and that he had gotten it from the printers to read it as a curiosity; as such he showed it to father; and that at that time Rigdon had no intention of making the use of it that he afterwards did; for father always said Rigdon helped Smith in his scheme by revising and making the Mormon Bible out of Rev. Spaulding's manuscript."

Rev. A. J. Bousall, pastor of the Baptist Church at Rochester, Pa., and a step-son of Dr. Winter, authorizes the statement that he repeatedly heard Dr. Winter say that Rigdon had shown him the Spaulding manuscript romance, purporting to be the history of the American Indians, which manuscript he had received from the printers.

¹ If any one would learn an impressive lesson upon the transitory nature of man's hold upon the remembrance of his fellow-men, let him engage in an investigation into some matter of local or personal history dating back a half-century ago. So rapidly, in the very places where a man has lived and labored, does the recollection of him fade into rumor, or myth, or oblivion. The candid reader will doubtless suspend his judgment on this hitherto accepted theory of Rigdon's printership, or set it down as at most only probable, but certainly not yet proved.

It was the impression of these three witnesses that Dr. Winter had himself committed his recollections of his above-mentioned interview with Rigdon to writing, as he intended to do, and was even understood to say he had done, but a careful search among his papers has thus far proved unavailing to find it. Dr. Winter was noted for his retentive memory and for his scrupulous accuracy in treasuring up conversations with brethren in the ministry and incidents in their history, many of which he contributed to the press in the form of sketches of Western church history. The reliability of the persons who have, in the interest of truth, related his statement to them will be confidently vouched for by all who know them; and Dr. Winter's evidence, thus attested, is of itself sufficient to establish the certainty that Rigdon, in 1822-23, had possession of Spaulding's manuscript.

9. Mrs. Amos Dunlap, of Warren, Ohio, in answer to inquiries, writes Dec. 7, 1879,—

"When I was quite a child I visited Mr. Rigdon's family. He married my aunt. They at that time lived in Bainbridge, Ohio. During my visit Mr. Rigdon went to his bedroom and took from a trunk which he kept locked a certain manuscript. He came out into the other room and seated himself by the fireplace and commenced reading it. His wife at that moment came into the room and exclaimed, 'What! you're studying that thing again?' or something to that effect. She then added, 'I mean to burn that paper.' He said, 'No, indeed, you will not. This will be a great thing some day!' Whenever he was reading this he was so completely occupied that he seemed entirely unconscious of anything passing around him."

10. Mr. Z. Rudolph, father of Mrs. Gen. Garfield, knew Sidney Rigdon very well, and has stated that "during the winter previous to the appearance of the Book of Mormon, Rigdon was in the habit of spending weeks away from his home, going no one knew where; and that he often appeared very preoccupied, and would indulge in dreamy, imaginative talks, which puzzled those who listened. When the Book of Mormon appeared and Rigdon joined in the advocacy of the new religion, the suspicion was at once aroused that he was one of the framers of the new doctrines, and probably was not ignorant of the authorship of the Book of Mormon."

11. Pomeroy Tucker, Esq., a native of Palmyra, N. Y., and well acquainted with all the Smith family from their coming to Palmyra in 1816 from Vermont, was the editor of the paper—the Wayne Sentinel—in the office of which at Palmyra, in 1830, the Book of Mormon was printed. He performed much of the proof-reading, and had frequent familiar interviews with Smith. In 1867, Mr. Tucker published a volume entitled the "Origin and Progress of Mormonism," of which he was so well qualified to write. The facts which he records as having occurred in his own vicinity may be accepted as either personally known to him, or as stated upon reliable and convincing testimony. After narrating Smith's vicious and vagrant life down to the summer of 1827, he states (p. 28),—

"A mysterious stranger now appears at Smith's residence, and holds private interviews with the far-famed money-digger. For a considerable length of time no intimation of the name or purpose of this personage transpired to the public, nor even to Smith's nearest neighbors. It was observed by some of them that his visits were frequently repeated. The sequel of these private interviews between the stranger and the money-digger will sufficiently appear hereafter." [Great consternation was occasioned by the theft of one hundred and sixteen pages of Smith's translation from the golden plates, as it seems to have been impossible to retranslate the stolen portion. Whereupon (p. 46)] "The reappearance of the mysterious stranger at Smith's was again the subject of inquiry and conjecture by observers, from whom was withheld all explanation of his identity or purpose." [At last the Book of Mormon was printed, Rigdon was among the first converts, and Mr. Tucker says (p. 75):] "Up to this time Sidney Rigdon had played his part in the background, and his occasional visits at Smith's residence had been noticed by uninitiated observers as those of the mysterious stranger. It had been his policy to remain in concealment until all things should be in readiness for blowing the trumpet of the new gospel. . . . This man Rigdon now appeared as the first regular Mormon preacher in Palmyra. . . . 'Who can doubt that he and Smith had become confederates in a grand scheme of cupidity and imposture? They had surreptitiously possessed themselves of a fabulous composition peculiarly adapted to their design. Secrecy and falsehood were necessary to the success of such a scheme, and to these, it is self-evident, they were mutually sworn.'" (P. 121.)

12. Mrs. Dr. Horace Eaton, for the last thirty-two years a resident of Palmyra, N. Y., has published a brief sketch of the "Origin of Mormonism," in which, after careful and thorough study of the subject, she concurs with Mr. Tucker. She says, "Early in the summer of 1827 a 'mysterious stranger' seeks admittance to Joe Smith's cabin. The conferences of the two are most private. This person, whose coming immediately preceded a new departure in the faith, was Sidney Rigdon, a backsliding clergyman, at this time a Campbellite preacher in Mentor, Ohio." Mrs. Eaton also mentions a theory, which has a strong probability sustaining it, that Parley P. Pratt, a peddler who "knew everybody in Western New York and Northern Ohio," and who was a member of Rigdon's church, was the medium through whom Rigdon made the acquaintance of Smith when seeking a suitable tool for his purpose. Pratt became, of course, an immediate convert to Mormonism, and one of its most famous and successful missionaries. Through his persuasive powers, we are told, Rigdon himself became a Mormon!

13. The "History of Franklin County, Pa.," by I. H. McCauley, published by John N. Pomeroy, Chambersburg, Pa., states, as if a matter too well known to require argument (p. 198), that "Joseph Smith, the founder of Mormonism, and Sidney Rigdon were intimate acquaintances for a considerable time before Mormonism was first heard of."

14. The Millennial Harbinger, edited and published at Bethany, W. Va., by Rev. Alexander Campbell, the founder of the "Disciples" denomination, in the volume for 1844, p. 39, contains a letter dated Jan. 22, 1841, from Rev. Adamson Bentley, a very intimate friend of Rigdon (their wives were sisters), and whose testimony is beyond the imputation of doubt or suspicion. Mr. Bentley is writing to Rev.

Walter Scott, another old and cherished companion of Rigdon:

"I know that Sidney Rigdon told me there was a book coming out, the manuscript of which had been found engraved on gold plates, as much as two years before the Mormon book made its appearance or had been heard of by me."

The editor of the Harbinger, the Rev. Alexander Campbell, clinches the above as follows:

"The conversation alluded to in Brother Bentley's letter of 1841 was in my presence as well as in his, and my recollection of it led me, some two or three years ago, to interrogate Brother Bentley touching his recollections of it, which accorded with mine in every particular except the year in which it occurred, he placing it in the summer of 1827, I in the summer of 1826, Rigdon at the same time observing that in the plates dug up in New York there was an account not only of the aborigines of this country, but also it was stated that the Christian religion had been preached in this country during the first century, just as we were preaching it on the Western Reserve."

According to the testimony of these two unimpeachable witnesses, Rigdon was minutely informed that the Book of Mormon was in process of preparation, and was thoroughly acquainted with the character of its contents, at least three, if not four, years before its actual issue. His own personal responsibility for its appearance is the only basis on which this foreknowledge can be explained. This testimony also shows how little reliance can be placed upon Rigdon's solemn and repeated asseveration that he had never heard of Smith or of the Book of Mormon until he received the information from Parley P. Pratt, in August, 1830, and after a brief struggle accepted the new faith.

15. In Hayden's "Early History of the Disciples in the Western Reserve," pp. 239-40, occurs a statement from Rev. D. Atwater, a man noted for his strict regard for truth and justice, dated Mantua Station, April 26, 1873, from which the following extract is taken:

"Soon after this the great Mormon defection came on us. Sidney Rigdon preached for us, and notwithstanding his extravagantly wild freaks he was held in high repute by many. For a few months before his professed conversion to Mormonism it was noticed that his wild, extravagant propensities had been more marked. That he knew before of the coming of the Book of Mormon is to me certain from what he said the first of his visits at my father's some years before. He gave a wonderful description of the mounds and other antiquities found in some parts of America, and said that they must have been made by the aborigines. He said there was a book to be published containing an account of those things. He spoke of these, in his eloquent, enthusiastic style, as being a thing most extraordinary. Though a youth then, I took him to task for expending so much enthusiasm on such a subject, instead of things of the gospel."

16. As the character established by Rigdon among his brethren in the Baptist Church whilst he was a member of that denomination has a direct bearing upon the question of his probable guilt or innocence, we make two quotations touching his reputation at that time. (1) From Rev. S. Williams' pamphlet, already referred to, pp. 1, 2: "He professed to experience a change of heart when a young man, and proposed to join the church under the care of Elder David Philips. But there was so much miracle about his conversion, and so much parade about his profession, that the pious and discerning pastor entertained serious doubts at the time in regard to the genuineness of the work. He was received, however, by the church and baptized by the pastor, with some fears and doubts upon his mind. Very soon, Diotrophes-like, he began to put himself forward and seek the pre-eminence, and was wellnigh supplanting the tried and faithful minister who had reared and nursed and fed the church for a long series of years. So thoroughly convinced was Father Philips by this time that he was not possessed of the spirit of Christ, notwithstanding his miraculous conversion and flippant speech, that he declared his belief 'that as long as he [Sidney] should live he would be a curse to the church of Christ.'" (2) In the (Pittsburgh) Baptist Witness of Jan. 1, 1875, Dr. Winter, in the course of a historical notice of the First Baptist Church of Pittsburgh, says, "When Holland Sumner dealt with Rigdon for his bad teachings, and said to him, 'Brother Rigdon, you never got into a Baptist Church without relating your Christian experiences,' Rigdon replied, 'When I joined the church at Peters Creek I knew I could not be admitted without an experience, so I made up one to suit the purpose; but it was all made up, and was of no use, nor true.' This I have just copied from an old memorandum, as taken from Sumner himself."

17. As an apology for Rigdon, and probably in reply to Dr. Winter's article, quoted above, a communication appeared in the Baptist Witness two months later, March 1, 1875, from A. H. Dunlevy, of Lebanon, Ohio, who, giving as his authority Dr. L. Rigdon, of Hamilton, Ohio, an elder brother of Sidney, states as follows:

"Sidney Rigdon, when quite a boy, living with his father some fifteen miles south of Pittsburgh on a farm, was thrown from his horse, his foot entangled in a stirrup and dragged some distance before relieved. In this accident he received such a contusion of the brain as ever after seriously to affect his character and in some respects his conduct. In fact, his brother always considered Sidney a little deranged in his mind by that accident. His mental powers did not seem to be impaired, but the equilibrium in his intellectual exertions seemed thereby to have been sadly affected. He still manifested great mental activity and power, but he was to an equal degree inclined to run into wild and visionary views on almost every question. Hence he was a fit subject for any new movement in the religious world."

The most skeptical reader will find it difficult to resist the conviction, after an impartial consideration of the preceding testimony, that Rigdon as early as 1823 certainly had possession of Spaulding's manuscript (how he obtained it is unimportant for the present purpose); that during his career as a minister of the Disciples' Church in Ohio he carefully preserved under lock and key this document, and devoted an absorbed attention to it; that he was aware of the forthcoming Book of Mormon and of its contents long before its appearance; that the said contents were largely Spaulding's romance, and partly such modifications as Rigdon had introduced; and that during the preparation of the Book of Mormon Rigdon had repeated and long interviews with Smith, thus easily supplying him with fresh installments of the pretended revelation. The conclusion is irresistible that Sidney Rigdon was the agent by whom the plagiarism was effected. The memory of Lambdin should, however, be relieved from any charge of complicity in Rigdon's guilty use of the manuscript, and of any culpable intent in allowing him to peruse it as a curiosity in literature. Lambdin was resting in his early grave before Rigdon had conceived his criminal scheme.

III. THE TWO MANUSCRIPTS.—The question has been propounded with a somewhat triumphant air by Mormons, Why not produce the Spaulding manuscript and publish it with the Book of Mormon in parallel columns, and thus demonstrate the plagiarism?

This was the very work for which Mrs. Davison, in 1834, gave D. P. Hurlbut an order for the delivery to him of her copy of her husband's "Manuscript Found;" and she in her lifetime was fully convinced, as is her daughter now, that Hurlbut obtained that invaluable document and treacherously sold it to the Mormons. In confirmation of this opinion we quote from "Gleanings by the Way," by Rev. John A. Clark, D.D., published by Robert Carter, New York, 1842. This volume is made up largely of letters published in the (Philadelphia) Episcopal Recorder. On page 263, Rev. Mr. Storrs, of Holliston, Mass., in a letter dated June 28, 1841, to Rev. Dr. Clark, says, "Dr. Hurlbut took the manuscript. It is reported in Missouri that he sold it for four hundred dollars; that the manuscript is not to be found." On page 265, Rev. D. R. Austin, of Monson, Mass., in a letter to Dr. Clark, dated also June 28, 1841, writes, "He (Dr. Hurlbut) stated some time after he had received the manuscript that he had made $400 out of it. Mrs. Davison has not the least doubt now but that he obtained it in order to sell it to the Mormons." This is the earliest report we have seen of this alleged embezzlement, dating only seven years after Hurlbut's visit, but the statement has been often repeated since. It should be remembered, too, that only with the greatest reluctance did Mrs. Davison authorize the lending of the manuscript to Hurlbut at the solicitation of her brother, W. H. Sabine. The present writer called on Hurlbut at his home, and interrogated him with reference to this charge. The result of this interview is contained in the following paper, which Mr. Hurlbut signed:

"GIBSONBURG, OHIO, Aug. 19, 1879.

"I visited Mrs. Matilda (Spaulding) Davison at Monson, Mass., in 1834, and never saw her afterwards. I then received from her a manuscript of her husband's, which I did not read, but brought home with me and immediately gave it to Mr. D. P. Howe, of Painesville, Ohio, who was then engaged in preparing his book, 'Mormonism Unveiled.' I do not know whether or not the document I received from Mrs. Davison was Spaulding's 'Manuscript Found,' as I never read it; but whatever it was Mr. Howe received it under the condition on which I took it from Mrs. Davison, to compare it with the 'Book of Mormon' and then return it to her. I never received any other manuscript of Spaulding's from Mrs. Davison or any one else. Of that manuscript I made no other use than to give it, with all my other documents connected with Mormonism, to Mr. Howe. I did not destroy the manuscript nor dispose of it to Joe Smith, or to any other person. No promise was made by me to Mrs. Davison that she should receive any portion of profits arising from the publication of the manuscript if it should be published. All the affidavits procured by me for Mr. Howe's book, including all those from Palmyra, N. Y., were certainly genuine.

"D. P. HURLBUT."

This statement conflicts with the one given in 1834 by Hurlbut to Mr. Howe, as contained in his book, from which it appears that Hurlbut obtained this manuscript from "the trunk referred to by the widow," it being the only manuscript there in Spaulding's handwriting. When his attention was called to this discrepancy, Hurlbut had no explanation to offer, nor did he give any satisfactory reason when asked why, after spending months in securing testimony to the identity of the Spaulding manuscript and the Book of Mormon, he did not avail himself of the opportunity of settling the question beyond dispute when he had, as he supposed, the very document in his hands, without waiting for days until he gave it to Mr. Howe, at Painesville, and not reading it even then.

Whatever opinion the reader may form of Hurlbut's conduct, and of his refusal to account for it, it is at least clear, from the testimony of Mrs. Davison and her daughter, that Spaulding's "Manuscript Found" had been with his other writings in the old trunk at Hartwick, N. Y., and that it was abstracted either by Hurlbut or by some one else previous to his search. In either case it is simply adding insult to injury to call upon Mr. Spaulding's daughter now to collate the Book of Mormon with her father's manuscript, of which she has been so shamefully robbed. The Mormon who resorts to this dishonorable plea only shows to what a desperate strait he has been reduced in defending his "inspired" book.

Whether the manuscript which Rigdon had in his possession was Spaulding's own or a transcript made by Rigdon, is a matter of comparatively little moment, and it is one which it is impossible now to determine. It would not be strange if Spaulding, being a man of leisure, and fond of writing, had made out a revised copy for the printer, retaining his own first sheets, and that these latter were what he took to Amity, leaving the other at Patterson's office, possibly with a faint hope that some means of putting it to press might yet "come to pass." It is true Mrs. Davison says that the manuscript was returned to him, but she also says that Mr. Patterson was the "editor of a newspaper," which was an error easily made, as he had a job printing office; and, in like manner, after the lapse of twenty-five years, she might readily have forgotten that there were two copies, if such were indeed the case. Be this as it may, the copy passing through Rigdon's hands of course we cannot follow. Thus, unfortunately, both copies (Rigdon's and Mrs. Davison's) of Spaulding's now famous romance would seem to be irretrievably lost.

In the collection of the materials for the above imperfect presentation of a question of no little historical interest, the writer takes pleasure in acknowledging the courtesy of the numerous correspondents to whom he has applied for information, and will be pardoned for mentioning his special obligations to Dr. W. W. Sharpe, of Anity, Pa., to George Plumer Smith, Esq., of Philadelphia, and to James T. Cobb, Esq., of Salt Lake City, at the instance of the last named of whom he commenced this inquiry, and to whom he is indebted for many of the references made.

IV. CLOSING REMARKS.—It was not the object of the present investigation to account for the origin of Mormonism, or to trace its rise and growth, or to describe it as a system of belief. This would have opened a far wider field of research, and would have required sketches of Joseph Smith and his numerous coadjutors, only one of whom has any connection with the question here under discussion. The one topic proposed for consideration was the authorship of the historical parts, constituting much the larger portion, of the Book of Mormon. Hence we have left entirely out of view the absurd fables devised by Smith—or, more probably, invented for him—to account for his possession of the Book of Mormon, namely, that an angel showed him, Sept. 22, 1823, where the golden plates were concealed; that four years afterwards, Sept. 22, 1827, Smith removed them from the place of deposit where they had remained for fourteen hundred years; that these plates were covered with Egyptian characters, which he could not understand, but by looking at them through two transparent stones which had been deposited with them the proper English words, one at a time, became visible to him; and being himself unable to write a legible hand, the words were by him dictated one by one to a scribe, who sat separated from Smith by a blanket hung up as a screen, as it would be certain death for any one but Smith to see the golden plates. In this way his first scribe, Martin Harris, in 1828 wrote one hundred and sixteen pages, which Mrs. Harris (honor to her memory) committed to the flames. As this portion, for some reason, could not be retranslated, the work was suspended until April 17, 1829, when a second scribe, Oliver Cowdery, undertook the labor, and in June, 1829, the manuscript was taken to the printer. To persons who accept Joseph Smith's statements in regard to his angelic visitants it does not seem at all incredible that Cowdery could in two months perform the stupendous task of writing out from dictation a manuscript about equal in magnitude to the Old Testament! And one story is as probable as the other. Such is the Mormon version of the origin of their sacred book, and the intelligent reader can choose between this theory and the only alternative offered, the Rigdon-Spaulding one.

It may not be amiss, in closing this summary of the evidence proving the fraudulent origin of the Book of Mormon, to remember that whilst honest indignation cannot and ought not to be suppressed against those who wrought this wickedness, nothing but sincerest compassion should be felt and shown for their deluded victims. That multitudes of them are honest in the convictions they express, incredible as at first it may appear, cannot be denied by any one who has acquainted himself with the heroic endurance and patient suffering, even unto death, which numbers of this misguided people have shown. The heart must be hard indeed that would not ache for them in reading Col. Kane's graphic narration of their banishment from Nauvoo and their pitiful pilgrimage to Utah, their pathway marked by the graves of those that perished.

And still more to be commiserated than the fate of those who fell by the way is the inexpressibly sadder lot of those poor women who survived the hardships, and their successors since, whose devotion to their God has been so wrought upon by designing men that, in dread of disobedience to a divine command, they have submitted to a polygamous relation against which every feeling of their souls revolted. The horrors of the lated Inquisition had no torture so terrible for the flesh to endure as that living death of agony to which many a pure spirit has been and is still subjected by this conscience-enforced union with a beastly tyrant. Let the galling chain be broken, but let not the innocent captive be punished for the crime of her cruel master. Surely among these soul-stricken sufferers the compassionate Saviour has his hidden ones.

Should the eyes of any honest believer in the inspiration of the Book of Mormon fall upon these pages, his impartial and unbiased examination of the evidence here adduced is earnestly solicited. The number of attesting witnesses is not a tenth part of what it would have been had a thorough investigation been undertaken even a score of years ago. This has been made painfully manifest in the progress of this inquiry by the frequently-repeated statement that this one and that one had recently died who could have given the very information sought. A conviction that the delusion would be short-lived operated, unfortunately, to prevent the collection of a far more abundant mass of testimony. But what is here presented should convince every sincere searcher for truth that the Book of Mormon, as issued by Smith, originated in fraud, and therefore with it the whole Mormon superstructure falls.

It is scarcely necessary to say that Spaulding himself must be acquitted of all intention to deceive, even though four of the hearers of his romance as read by him have attested his singular presentiment—was it prescience?—that in after-years his romance would be accepted by thousands as veritable history. But even he could not have foreseen that this coinage of his brain would ever pass current as having been enstamped by the authority of heaven. The unconscious prophet of a new Islam, in all his imaginings he did not dream that his hand was outlining the Koran of a dark delusion, that the fables which beguiled his restless hours would be accepted by hundreds of thousands of his fellow-men as the oracles of God, and that in inglorious yet heroic martyrdom some of them would even seal with their blood their faith in the inspiration of his phantasies. Journeying to Pittsburgh in 1812, with the sanguine hope of soon seeing his romance in print, it never entered his mind that in threescore years and ten thereafter the shades of Laman and Nephi, of Mormon and Maroni, evoked by his magic wand from the sepulchral mounds of Conneaut,—the graves of a long-forgotten race,—would be stalking over two hemispheres, and would be leading through the very city of his sojourn their myriad victims of deception to distant homes of wretchedness and shame. Struggling to escape the burden of his debts, he little imagined how vast the burden he was about unwittingly to lay upon his country.

Sleep on, humble dreamer, in thy lowly bed! Thy fond desire to win a public hearing for thy wondrous story was denied thee in thy toilsome life. Thou knowest not that a strange immortality awaited it and thee. Rest peacefully, for from thine eye, which sought to penetrate the past alone, this saddest of future visions was mercifully withheld. Surely never hitherto have passed such sorrowful processions near the grave of so innocent an author of their woe.¹

THE

"MANUSCRIPT FOUND."

A Verbatim Copy from the Original.

HEREWITH we present to the reader the notorious "Manuscript Story" ["Manuscript Found"], of the late Rev. Solomon Spalding. What gives this document prominence is the fact that, for the past fifty years it has been made to do duty by the opposers of the Book of Mormon and the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, as the source, the root, and the inspiration, by and from which Joseph Smith and Sydney Rigdon wrote said Book of Mormon and organized said Church. It has been popularly and persistently claimed that the plan, subject matter, including prominent names and localities, history of the origin of the aboriginal races of America, with their arts and sciences, civilizations and customs, were identical in this "Manuscript Found" and in the Book of Mormon. Thousands have believed this false and foolish statement, without giving its truth or falsity an hour's fair and unprejudiced investigation, and then fought the book and the church with a readiness and a zeal almost without a parallel. And now that this veritable "Manuscript Found," with an unbroken chain of evidence proving its identity and running back to E. D. Howe, D. P. Hurlbut, Spalding's "old trunk," and so back to Pittsburgh, Conneaut, and to the very pen of Solomon Spalding, has by the providence of God been furnished us and that, too, by those not of the Church, we take pleasure in exhibiting in the sunlight of solid facts, this hob-goblin of the pulpit, this "nigger-in-the-woodpile" of the press and the forum, that with which they have fooled and frightened the masses and blinded those inquiring into the origin and character of the Book of Mormon.

This seeming huge hindrance and insurmountable obstacle which is always thrown in the way of the investigator with all the skill and power that craft and cunning and malice and fear and blind zeal can invent and command, vanishes from the presence of this original witness in the case; for when it speaks it reveals the flimsiness and falsity of the claim that it was in any way or in any sense the origin of the Book of Mormon, or that there is the least likeness between the two. This newly found "missing link" completes the chain of evidence which proves that the "Manuscript Found" never was and never could be made the occasion, cause, or germ of the Book of Mormon.

Mr. Spalding has been exalted by the opposers of the Latter Day Saints to the very pinnacle of fame, as a very learned, very moral, and very pious man. It is fortunate that his true measure and worth in respect to his learning, his morals, and his piety, is now furnished us in this "Manuscript Story." God judges men by their works, and it is wise for men to judge of each other after this manner. And when we estimate Mr. Spalding by the character of his work as exhibited in this document, we must grade him down to a very low level, whether in respect to scholarship, mental power, moral purity, or pious attainments and tendencies.

 The following Correspondence explains the manner in which the Manuscript was preserved and placed in the hands of the present publishers.

This from the Bibliotheca Sacra was republished in many leading journals east and west, among them the Herald of Grinnell, Iowa; the Western Watchman, Eureka, California; the New York Observer, and Frank Leslie's Sunday Magazine.

"The theory of the origin of the Book of Mormon in the traditional manuscript of Solomon Spaulding, will probably have to be relinquished. That manuscript is doubtless now in the possession of Mr. L. L. Rice, of Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands, formerly an anti-Slavery Editor in Ohio, and for many years State Printer, at Columbus. During a recent visit to Honolulu, I suggested to Mr. Rice that he might have valuable anti-slavery documents in his possession, which he would be willing to contribute to the rich collection already in the Oberlin College Library. In pursuance of this suggestion, Mr. Rice began looking over his old pamphlets and papers, and at length came upon an old, worn, and faded manuscript of about one hundred and seventy-five pages, small quarto, purporting to be a history of the migrations and conflicts of the ancient Indian Tribes, which occupied the territory now belonging to the States of New York, Ohio, and Kentucky. On the last page of this manuscript is a certificate and signature, giving the names of several persons known to the signer, who have assured him that to their personal knowledge the manuscript was the writing of Solomon Spaulding. Mr. Rice has no recollection how or when this manuscript came into his possession. It was enveloped in a coarse piece of wrapping paper, and endorsed in Mr. Rice's hand-writing, "A Manuscript Story."

"There seems no reason to doubt that this is the long-lost story. Mr. Rice, myself, and others, compared it with the Book of Mormon, and could detect no resemblance between the two, in general or in detail. There seems to be no name or incident common to the two. The solemn style of the Book of Mormon, in imitation of the English

The "Manuscript Found."

Scriptures, does not appear in the manuscript. The only resemblance is in the fact that both profess to set forth the history of lost tribes. Some other explanation of the origin of the Book of Mormon must be found, if any explanation is required." Signed, James H. Fairchild.

The letter below was written in answer to our suggestion that the Manuscript be sent for safe keeping to some Historical Society in Chicago, Illinois.

MR. JOSEPH SMITH:

The Spaulding Manuscript in my possession came into my hands in this wise. In 1839-40 my partner and myself bought of E. D. Howe the Painesville Telegraph, published at Painesville, Ohio. The transfer of the printing department, types, press, &c. was accompanied with a large collection of books, manuscripts, &c. and this manuscript of Spaulding among the rest. So, you see, it has been in my possession over forty years. But I never examined it, or knew the character of it, until some six or eight months since. The wrapper was marked, "Manuscript Story—Conneaut Creek." The wonder is, that in some of my movements, I did not destroy or burn it with a large amount of rubbish that had accumulated from time to time.

It happened that Pres't Fairchild was here on a visit, at the time I discovered the contents of it, and it was examined by him and others with much curiosity. Since Pres't Fairchild published the fact of its existence in my possession, I have had applications for it from half a dozen sources, each applicant seeming to think that he or she was entitled to it. Mr. Howe says when he was getting up a book to expose Mormonism as a fraud at an early day, when the Mormons had their head-quarters at Kirtland, he obtained it from some source, and it was inadvertently transferred with the other effects of his printing office. A. B. Deming, of Painesville, who is also getting up some kind of a book I believe on Mormonism, wants me to send it to him. Mrs. Dickinson, of Boston, claiming to be a relative of Spaulding, and who is getting up a book to show that h was the real author of the Book of Mormon, wants it. She thinks, at least, it should be sent to Spaulding's daughter, a Mrs. Somebody—but she does not inform me where she lives. Deming says that Howe borrowed it when he was getting up his book, and did not return it, as he should have done, &c.

This Manuscript does not purport to be "a story of the Indians formerly occupying this continent;" but is a history of the wars between the Indians of Ohio and Kentucky, and their progress in civilization, &c. It is certain that this Manuscript is not the origin of the Mormon Bible, whatever some other manuscript may have been. The only similarity between them, is, in the manner in which each purports to have been found—one in a cave on Conneaut Creek—the other in a hill in Ontario county, New York. There is no identity of names, of persons, or places; and there is no similarity of style between them. As I told Mr. Deming, I should as soon think the Book of Revelations was written by the author of Don Quixotte, as that the writer of this Manuscript was the author of the Book of Mormon. Deming says Spaulding made three copies of "Manuscript Found," one of which Sidney Rigdon stole from a printing office in Pittsburg. You can probably tell better than I can, what ground there is for such an allegation.

As to this Manuscript, I can not see that it can be of any use to any body, except the Mormons, to show that it is not the original of the Mormon Bible. But that would not settle the claim that some other manuscript of Spaulding was the original of it. I propose to withhold it in my own hands for a while, to see if it can not be put to some good use. Deming and Howe inform me that its existence is exciting great interest in that region. I am under a tacit, but not a positive pledge to President Fairchild, to deposit it eventually in the Library of Oberlin College. I shall be free from that pledge, when I see an opportunity to put it to a better use.

Yours, &c.,

L. L. RICE.

P. S.—Upon reflection, since writing the foregoing, I am of the opinion that no one who reads this Manuscript will give credit to the story that Solomon Spaulding was in any wise the author of the Book of Mormon. It is unlikely that any one who wrote so elaborate a work as the Mormon Bible, would spend his time in getting up so shallow a story as this, which at best is but a feeble imitation of the other. Finally I am more than half convinced that this is his only writing of the sort, and that any pretence that Spaulding was in any sense the author of the other, is a sheer fabrication. It was easy for any body who may have seen this, or heard anything of its contents, to get up the story that they were identical.

L. L. R.

HONOLULU, Sandwich Islands,

May 14th, 1885.

MR. JOSEPH SMITH; Dear Sir:—

I am greatly obliged to you for the information concerning Mormonism, in your letters of April 30th and May 2d. As I am in no sense a Mormonite, of course it is a matter of curiosity, mainly, that I am interested in the history of Mormonism.

Two things are true concerning this manuscript in my possession: First, it is a genuine writing of Solomon Spaulding; and second, it is not the original of the Book of Mormon.

My opinion is, from all I have seen and learned, that this is the only writing of Spaulding, and there is no foundation for the statement of Deming and others, that Spaulding made another story more elaborate, of which several copies were written, one of which Rigdon stole from a printing office in Pittsburgh, &c. Of course I can not be as certain of this, as of the other two points. One theory is, that Rigdon, or some one else, saw this manuscript, or heard it read, and from the hints it conveyed, got up the other and more elaborate writing on which the Book of Mormon was founded. Take that for what it is worth. It don't seem to me very likely.

You may be at rest as to my putting the manuscript into the possession of any one who will mutilate it, or use it for a bad purpose. I shall have it deposited in the Library of Oberlin College in Ohio, to be at the disposal for reading of any one who may wish to peruse it; but not to be removed from that depository. My friend, President Fairchild, may be relied on as security for the safe keeping of it. It will be sent there in July, by a friend who is going there to "take to himself a wife." Meantime, I have made a literary copy of the entire document—errors of orthography, grammar erasures, and all—which I shall keep in my possession, so that any attempt to mutilate it will be of easy detection and exposure. Oberlin is a central place, in the vicinity of Conneaut, where the manuscript was written.

I have had an idea, sometimes, that it is due to the Mormons to have a copy of it, if they took interest in it enough to publish it. As it is only of interest as showing that it is not the original of the Book of Mormon, no one else is likely to wish it for publication.

Miss Dickinson, whom you call a granddaughter of Solomon Spaulding, represents herself to me as his grandniece: "My great uncle, Rev. Solomon Spaulding," she writes.

Rev. Dr. Hyde, President of the Institution, in this place, for training Native Missionaries for Micranesia, (a very prominent and successful institution), has written an elaborate account of this manuscript, and of Mormonism, and sent it for publication in the Congregationalist, of Boston. I presume it will be published, and you will be interested in reading it.

Very respectfully, yours,

L. L. RICE.

In a postscript Mr. Rice says he found the following endorsement on the Manuscript:

"The writings of Solomon Spaulding proved by Aron Wright, Oliver Smith, John N. Miller and others. The testimonies of the above gentlemen are now in my possession.

(Signed)

D. P. HURLBUT."

COPY OF MR. RICE'S LETTER.

HONOLULU, H. I., June 12, 1885.

PRESIDENT J. H. FAIRCHILD:—

Herewith I send to you the Solomon Spaulding Manuscript, to be deposited in the Library of Oberlin College, for reference by any one who may be desirous of seeing or examining it. As a great deal of inquiry has been made about it since it became known that it was in my possession, I deem it proper that it be deposited for safe keeping, where any one interested in it, whether Mormon or Anti-Mormon, may examine it. It has been in my possession forty-six years—from 1839 to 1885—and for forty-four years of that time no one examined it, and I was not aware of the character of its contents. I send it to you enclosed in the same paper wrapper, and tied with the same string that must have enclosed it for near half a century—certainly during the forty-six years since it came into my possession. I have made and retain in my possession a correct literary copy of it, errors of orthography, of grammar, erasures and all. I may allow the Mormons of Utah to print it from this copy which they are anxious to do; and a delegation is now in the Islands awaiting my decision on this point. They claim that they are entitled to whatever benefit they may derive from its publication; and it seems to me there is some justice in that claim. Whether it will relieve them in any measure, from the imputation that Solomon Spalding was the author of the Book of Mormon, I do not attempt to decide. It devolves upon their opponents to show that there are or were other writings of Spalding—since it is evident that this writing is not the original of the Mormon Bible.

Truly, yours, &c.,

L. L. RICE.

P. S.—The words "Solomon Spaulding's Writings" in ink on the wrapper were written by me, after I became aware of the contents. The words "Manuscript Story—Conneaut Creek," in faint penciling, were as now when it came into my possession.

OBERLIN COLLEGE, OBERLIN, O.,

July 23, 1885.

I have this day delivered to Mr. E. L. Kelley a copy of the Manuscript of Solomon Spaulding, sent from Honolulu by Mr. L. L. Rice, to the Library of Oberlin College, for safe keeping, and now in my care. The copy was prepared at Mr. Kelley's request, under my supervision, and is, as I believe, an exact transcript of the original manuscript, including erasures, misspellings, &c.

INTRODUCTION.

NEAR the west Bank of the Coneaught River there are the remains of an ancient fort. As I was walking and forming various conjectures respecting the character situation & numbers of those people who far exceeded the preesent Indians in works of art and inginuety, I hapned to tread on a flat stone. This was at a small distance from the fort, & it lay on the top of a great small mound of Earth exactly horizontal. The face of it had a singular appearance. I discovered a number of characters, which appeared to me to be letters, but so much effaced by the ravages of time, that I could not read the inscription. With the assistance of a heaver I raised the stone. But you may easily conjecture my astonishment when I discovered that its ends and sides rested on stones & that it was designed as a cover to an artificial Cave. I found by examining that its sides were lined with stones built in a connical form with - - - - - down, & that it was about eight feet deep. Determined to investigate the design of this extraordinary work of antiquity, I prepared myself with the necessar requisites for that purpose and decended to the Bottom of the Cave. Observing one side to be perpendicular nearly three feet from the bottom, I began to inspect that part with accuracy. Here I noticed a big flat stone fixed in the form of a door. I immediately tore it down and Lo, a cavity within the wall presented itself it being about three feet in diameter from side to side and about two feet high. Within this cavity I found an earthen Box with a cover which shut it perfectly tight. The Box was two feet in length one & half in breadth & one & three inches in diameter. My mind filled with awful sensations which crowded fast upon me would hardly permit my hands to remove this venerable deposit, but curiosity soon gained the assendency & the box was taken & raised to open it. When I had removed the Cover I found that it contained twenty-eight rolls of parchment - & - that when - - - appeared to be manuscripts written in elegant hand with Roman Letters & in the Latin Language.

They were written on a variety of Subjects. But the Roll which principally attracted my attention contained the history of the author's life & that part of America which extends along the great Lakes & the waters of the Mississippi.

Extracts of the most interesting and important matters contained in this Roll I take the liberty to publish.

Gentle Reader, tread lightly on the ashes of the venerable dead. Thou must know that this Country was once inhabited by great and powerful nations considerably civilized & skilled in the arts of war, & that on ground where thou now treadest many a bloody Battle hath been fought & heroes by thousands have been made to bite the dust.

In the history given of these nations by my author you will find nothing but what will correspond with the natural sentiments we should form on viewing the innumerable remains of antiquity which are scattered over an extensive Country. This is an evidence of the author's impartiality and veracity. But if any should pretend that the whole story is fictitious or fabulous

To publish a translation of every particular circumstance mentioned by our author would produce a volume too expensive for the general class of readers, But should this attempt to throw off the veil which has seculed our view from the tranactions o nations who for ages have been extinct, meet the approbation of the public, I shall then be happy to gratify the more inquisitive and learned part of my readers by a more minut publication. Apprehensive that skeptical illiberal or superstitious minds may censure his performance with great accrimony I have only to remark that they will be deprived of a great fund of entertainment - - - of a contrary disposition will obtain. My compassion will be excited more than my resentment and here the contest will end.

Now, Gentle Reader, the Translator who wishes well to thy present and thy future existence entreats thee to peruse this volume with a clear head a pure heart and a candid mind. If thou shalt then find that thy head and thy heart are both improved it will afford him more satisfaction than the approbation of ten thousand who have received no benefit.

And now permit me to admonish thee that if thou shouldst reside in or travil thro' any part of the Country

CHAPT. I.

AN EPITOME OF THE AUTHOR'S LIFE & OF HIS ARIVAL IN AMERICA.

As it is possible that in some future age this part of the Earth will be inhabited by Europeans & a history of its present inhabitants would be a valuable acquisition I proceed to write one & deposit it in a box secured - - - - so that the ravages of time will have no effect upon it that you may know the author I will give a succinct account of his life and of the cause of his arival which I have extracted from a manuscript which will be deposited with this history

My name was is Fabius The family name I sustain is Fabius, being decended from the illustrious general of that name. I was born at Rome & received my education under the tuition of a very Learned Master. At the time that Constantine arived at that city and had overcome his enemies & and was firmly seated on the throne of the Roman empire I was introduced to him as a young Gentleman of genius and learning & as being worthy of the favourable notice of his imperial majesty. He gave me the appointment of one of his secritaries, & such were the gracious intimations which he frequently gave me of his high approbation of my conduct that I was happy in my station.

One day he says to me Fabius you must go to Brittia & carry an important - - - - to the general of our army there - - - - sail in a yessel & return when she returns Preparation was made instantly and we sailed - - - The vessel laden with provisions for the army - - - Cloath-knive and other impliments for their use had now arrived near the coasts of Britain when a tremendous storm arose & drove us into the midst of the boundless Ocean. Soon the whole crew became lost & bewildered. They knew not the direction for to the rising Sun or polar Star, for the heavens were covered with clouds; & darkness had spread her sable mantle over the face of the raging deep. Their minds were filled with consternation and despair. & unanimously agreed that What could we do? How be extreated from the insatiable jaws of a watry tomb. Then it was that we felt our absolute dependence on that Almighty & gracious Being who holds the winds & floods in - - - hands. From him alone could we expect deliverance. To him our most fervent desires assended. Prostrate & on bended knees we poured forth incessant Supplication & even Old Ocean appeared to sympathize in our distress by returning the echo of our vociferous Cries & lamentations. After being driven five days with incridable velocity before the furious wind the storm abated in its violence. but still the strong wind blew strong in the strong as I now believe in the same direction. Doubtful whether the wind had not changed her point we gave the ship full sail & let her drive. On the sixth day after, the storm wholly subsided, the sun rose clear and the heavens once more appeared to smile. Inexpressible was the consternation of all the crew. they found themselves in the midst of a vast Ocean. No prospect of returning. All was lost. The wind blowing westwardly, & the presumption was that it had been blowing in that direction during the whole of the storm. No pen can paint the dolorious cries & lamentations of the poor mariners, or the loss of friends for the loss of everything they held most - - - - At length a Mariner stept - - - - the midst and proclaimed. Attend O friends & listen to my words.

A voice from on high hath penetrated my soul & the inspiration of the Almighty hath bid me proclaim. Let your sails be wide spread & the gentle winds will soon waft you into a safe harbor. a Country where you will find hospitality.
Quick as the lightnings flash joy sparkled in every countenance.
A Hymn of Thanksgiving spontaneously burst forth from their lips.
In full confidence that the divine prediction would be accomplished they extolled the loving kindness and tender mercies of their God & promised by the assistance of his grace to make ample return of Gratitude. On the fifth day after this we came in sight of sand, we entered a spacious river & continued sailing up the
- - - - many leagues until we came in view of a town.
Every heart now palpitated with joy, & loud shouts of gladness expressed the enthusiastic transports of our souls.
We anchored within a small distance from shore. Immediately the natives ran with apparent signs of surprise & astonishment to the bank of the River. After viewing us for some time, & receiving signs of Friendship, they appeared to hold a council for a few minutes. Their King then stept forward to the edge of the bank, & proffered the hand of friendship, & by significant gestures invited us to Land, promising us protection and hospitality.
We now found ourselves once more on terra firma, & were conducted by the king & four chiefs into the town whilst the multitude followed after, shouting & performing many ostentatious jesticulations. The King ordered an entertainment to be prepared for his new friends which consisted of - - - - fish boiled beans & samp - - - - The whole was placed under a wide-spreading Oak in wooden dishes. A large clam shell a Stone Knife were provided for each one. The king then came forward with about twenty of his principal subjects, & con seated us (being about twenty in number) & seated us by the side of our repast. He & his company then took seats in front. After waving his hand & bowing all fell to eating & a more delicious repast we never enjoyed. The repast being finished, our attention was called to a collection of about one thousand men & women who had formed a ring & invited our company to come forward into the midst. After gazing upon us sometime with surprise we were permitted to withdraw & to take our stand in the Ring. About forty in number then walked into the middle of the Ring & began a song with but a discordant and hedious modification of sounds, & such frantic jesticulations of body that it seemed that chaos had bro't her uries to set the world in an uproar. And an uproar it was in a short time for the whole company fell to dancing, shouting, whooping, & screaming at intervals, then dancing jumping & tumbling with many indescribable distortions in their countenance & indelicate jestures. In fact, they appeared more like a company of devils than human beings. This lasted about one hour. They then took their places in a circle & at a signal given gave three most tremendous whoops, they then instantly dispersed playing many antike capers & making such a confused medly of sound by skreaming, whooping, screaching like owls, Barking like dogs and wolves & bellowing croaking like Bullfrogs, that my brain seemed to be turned topseturvy, & for some time I could scarce believe that they belonged to the human species.

CHAPT. II.

AN ACCOUNT OF THE SETTLEMENT OF THE SHIP'S COMPANY & MANY PARTICULARS RESPECT-ING THE NATIVES.

As no alternative now remained but either to make the desperate attempt to return across the wide boistrous Ocean or to take up our residence in a country in a land of savages inhabited by savages & wild ferocious beasts, we did not long hesitate. We held a solemn treaty with the King & all the chiefs of his nation. They agreed to cede to us a tract of excellent land on the north part of the town & which was six wigwams & engaged perpetual amity & hospitality & the protection of our lives & property. In consideration of this grant we gave them fifty yards of scarlet cloth & fifty knives. With this present they were highly pleased.

Arrangements must now be made for - - - - settlement. Vessel & cargo had received no material damage by stripping the vessel of its plank we could erect a house in which we could deposite the whole cargo in safety. All hands were immediately employed, some in procuring timber which we hewed on two sides & then locked together some in procuring shingles & some in stripping the vessel of its plank; & having a large quantity of nails on board, in ten days we finished a very convenient store-house, sufficiently spacious to receive the whole cargo. We also built a small house adjoining which was to be the habitation the Captain & myself. Having secured all our property, we then found it necessary to establish some regulations for the government of our little society. The Captain whose name was Lucian & myself were appointed judges in all matters of controversy & managers of the public property to make bargains with the natives & barter such articles as we did not need for necessaries. As we all professed The next thing to be done was to to believe in the religion of Jesus Christ we unanimously chose Trojanus, the mate of the ship, a pious good man to be our minister, to lead our devotions every morning & evening & on the Lords day.

But now a most singular & delicate subject presented itself for consideration. Seven young women we had on board as passengers to visit certain friends in Brittain. Three of them were ladies of rank & the rest were healthy buxom lassies. Whilst deliberating on this subject a mariner arose whom we called Droll Tom Hark ye, shipmates says he. Whilst tossed on the foaming billows what have son of Neptune had any more regard for woman than Sturgeon, but now we are all safely anchored on Terra firma, our sails furled & ship keeled up, I have a huge longing for some of those rosy dames. But willing to take my chance with my shipmates, I propose that they should make their choice of husbands. The plan was instantly adopted. As the choice fell on the young women they had a consultation on the subject, & in a short time made known the result. Droll Tom was rewarded for his benevolent proposal with one of the most sprightly, rosy dames in the company. Three other of the most cheerful, resolute mariners were chosen by the other three buxom Lassies. The three young Ladies of rank fixed their choice on the captain the Mate & myself. Happy indeed in my partner,

I had formed an high esteem of the excellent qualities of her mind. The young Lady who chose me for a partner was possessed of every attractive charm both of body & mind. We united heart & hand with the fairest prospect of enjoying every delight & gratification which are attendant on the connubial state. Thus ended the affair. You may well conceive our singular situation. The six poor fellows who were doomed to live in a state of celibacy or acceptance of savage dames, discovered a little chagrin & anxiety. However, they consoled themselves with the idea of living in families, where they would enjoy the company of the fair sex, and be relieved from the work which belongs to the department of women.

Our community might be said to be one family, though we lived in separate houses situated near each other. The property was common stock. What was produced by our labor was likewise to be common. All subject to the distribution of the judges, who were to attend to each family & to see that proper industry & economy were practised by all.

The Captain & myself, attended with our fair partner & two mariners, repaired to the new habitation, which consisted of two convenient apartments. After having partook of an elegant dinner & drank a bottle of excellent wine our spirits were exhilarated & the deep gloom which beclouded our minds evaporated. The Captain assuming his wonted cheerfulness, made the following address. "My sweet, good soul'd fellows, we have now commenced a new voyage. Not such as bro't us over mountain billows to this butt end of the world. No, no, our voyage is on dry land, & now we must take care that we have sufficient ballast for the rigging. Every hand on board this ship clasp hands & condesend to each others humour. This will promote good cheer & smooth the raging billows of life. Surrounded by innumerable hordes of human beings, who resemble in manners the Orang outang, let us keep aloof from from them & not embark in the same matrimonial ship with them. At the same time, we will treat them with good cheer & inlighten their dark souls with good instruction. By continuing a different people & preferring our customs, manners, religion & arts & sciences & other things another Italy will grow up in this wilderness, & we shall be celebrated as the fathers of a great & happy nation."

May God bless your soul, says one of the mariners, what would you have us do who have had the woful luck not to get mates, to cheer our poor souls and warm our bodies. Methinks I could pick out a healthy plum Lass from the copper colored tribe that by washing & scrubbing her fore & aft & upon the labbord & stabbord sides she would become a wholesome bedfellow. I think, may it please your honour, that I could gradually pump my notions into her head & make her a good shipmate for the cupboard & and as good hearted a Christian as any of your white lamshells & upon my Soul I warrant you if we have children, by feeding them with good fare, & keeping them clean, they will be as plump & as fair & nearly as white as your honours children. Upon this I filled the bottle with wine & observing to honest Crito that he was at liberty to make the experiment if he could find a fair - - - to his liking. I then expressed the sweet pleasure I received from the addresses of the speakers & wished drank success to the new voige. All drank plentifully, & the exhileration produced the greatest cheerfulness & hilarity. By this time the Sun had hid his head below the horizon & darkness invited all the animal creation to sleep & rest. We retired two & two, hand in hand. Ladies heads a little awri, blushing like the morn & - - - But I forgo to mention that our society passed a resolution to build a church in the in the midst of our vilage.

CHAPT. III.

MANY PARTICULARS RESPECTING THE NATIVES.

Interest as well as curiosity invited an acquaintance with our new neighbors. They were called in their Language Deliwanucks. They were Tall, bodies weel proportioned, strait limbs, complexions of a brownish hue, broad cheek bones, black wild roling eyes, & hair black & course. To strangers they were both - - - true to their engagements, ardent in their friendship, but to enimes implacable, cruel & barbarous in the extreme. Innumerable hordes of this description of people were scattered over an extensive country, who gained their living by hunting the elk, the deer & a great variety of other wild animals by fishing & fowling & by raising corn, beans & squashes. Shooting the arrow, flinging stones, wrestling, jumping opping, and runing were their principal amusements, & prizes would often be staked as a reward to the conqueror. Their cloathing consisted of skins dressed with the hair on, but in warm weather only the middle part of their bodies were incumbered with any covering. The one half of the head of the men was shaved & painted with red & the one half of the face was painted with black. The head was adorned with feathers of various kinds, & their ears & noses were adorned ornamented with rings formed formed from the sinues of certain animals, on which were suspended smooth stones of different coulors. Thus cloathed, thus painted, thus ornimented, the Deliwannuck made a most terrific - - - They held festivals at stated times which varied in the manner of conducting them, according to the object they had in view. At one of their annual festivals their ceremonies were particularly singular & different from any that were ever practised by any nation. Here a description would give us some idea of their religion, & would satisfy the curiosity of an injenious mind.

When the time arives, which is in September, the who whole tribe assemble. They are dressed & ornimented in the highest fashion. The women in particular have their garments & heads so adorned with feathers, shells, & wamum, that they make a very brilliant & grotesque appearance. They form a circle: their countanances are solemn. The Speaker mounts a stage in the midst. At this moment two Black Dogs led by two Boys & two white Dogs led by two young damsels enter the circle & are tied together. The Speaker then extended his hands & spoke. Hail, ye favorite children of the great and good Spirit, who resides in the Sun who is the father of all living creatures & whose arms encircle us all around, who defends us from the malicious design of that great malignant Spirit that pour upon us all the evils we endure He gives us all our meat & our life & causes the corn & the fruits to spring up & makes us to rejoice in his goodness. He hath prepared a delightful Country to receive us, if we are valiant in battle or are benevolent & good. There we can pick all kinds of delicious fruit, & have game & fish in abundance & our women being improved in beauty & sprightliness will cause our hearts to dance with delight. But woe unto you wicked, malicious mischievous mortals. Your lot will be cast in a dark dreary, mirey swamp, where the malignant Spirit will torment you with musquitoes & serpents & will give you nothing to eat but toads, frogs & snails. But my dear friends, all hail, here is a custom which is sanctioned by time immemorial. Look steadfastly on the black dogs & let not your eyes be turned away, when they are thrown on the sacred pile & the flames are furiously consuming their bodies, then let your earnest prayer ascend for pardon & your transgressions will flee away like shadows & your sins will be carried by the smoke into the shades of oblivion. When this solemn expiatory sacrifice is ended then prepare your souls to partake of the holy festival Each one will receive a precious morsel from these immaculate snow colored dogs, in token that your offences have all evaporated in the smoke of the holy sacrifice. & that you are thankful to him the benevolent Spirit, for the abundance of good things that you enjoy, & that you humbly anticipate the continuance of his blessing that he will defend you against the evil designs of that malignant Spirit, who gives us gall & wormwood, & fills our bosom with pain & our eyes with tears. He then proclaimed, let the sacred pile be erected & the solemn sacrifice performed. Instantly about on hundred men come forward with small dry wood & bundles of dry sticks & having thrown them in one pile within the circle, they set the pile on fire. The black dogs were hooked on the middle head, & thrown on the top, in a moment all was in a blaze & the flames assended in curls to heaven. The whole company assumed the most devout attitude & muttered in sounds almost inarticulate their humble confession & earnest requests.

When the dogs were consumed & the fire nearly extinguished, the ceremonies of their sacred festival began. The white dogs which were very plump & fat were hooked on the head & their throats cut. Their hair was then singed off, having first their entrails taken out, & being suspended by the nose before a hot fire, they were soon roasted, thrown upon a long table & desected into as many pieces as there were persons to swallow them. The company immediately formed a procession, one rank of men the other of women, the men marching to the left & the women to the right of the table, each one took a piece & devoured it with as good a - - - if it had been the most delicious morsel. Having completed these sacred ceremonies with great solemnity, the whole company formed themselves into a compact circle round the stage ten musicians immediately mounted, & facing the multitude on every side sang a song. The tune & the musical voices of the singers pleased the ear, whilst the imagination was delighted with the poetic ingenuity of the composition. The multitude all joined in the chorus with voice so loud & multitudinous, that the atmosphere quaked with terror, & the woods & neighbouring hills sent back by way of mockery, at back the sound of their voices, their vociferation improved by ten-fold confusion. Perhaps, reader, you have the curiosity to hear the song. I can give you only the last stanzy & the chorus.

"For us the sun emits his rais

"The moon shines forth for our delight.

"The stars shine forth extol our heroes prais

"And warriors flee before our sight.

CHORUS.

"Delawan to chakee poloo

"Manengengo forwah toloo

"Chanepant, lawango chapah

"Quinebogan hamboo gowah.

The solemnities are ended & in their opinion their poor souls are compleatly whitewashed & every stain entirely effaced. A little - - - will now dissipate the solemnity & inspire them with cheerfulness & meriment. The whole tribe repair to the top of an hill, at one place their is a gradual slope a small distance, & then it desends about twenty-five feet in an almost perpendicular direction, at the bottom of which is a quagmire which is about ten feet in length. & the soft mud is about three feet deep. At each end the ground is soft, but not miry. Down this declivity twenty pair of very suple & sprightly young men & women are to desend. If by their dexterity & agility they escape the quagmire, a piece of wampum will be the reward to each fortunate champion; but if they plunge in their recompense will be the ridicule of the multitude. In making this descent, six young women & five young men by a surprising dexterity in whirling their bodies as they descended cleared themselves from the quagmire. The rest as their turn came, plunged in & came out most wofully mudded the great diversion of the Spectators. The incident which excited the most meriment, hapned when the last person desended. by an unlucky spring to clear himself from the quagmire he bro't his body alongside of the declivity & ed his whole 'length into the midst of the quagmire, here he lay his whole length in an horizontal position on back neither heels nor head up, but horizontally, soft easy, but alas, when one unlucky event happens another follows close on its heels. the fair-plump corpulent damsel affectionate sweetheart came instantly sliding with great cocity. She saw the woful position of here beloved. She shed him no harm, she raised her feet, this bro't the center gravity directly over the center of his head, here she ted a moment, his head sunk, she sunk after him, his els kicked against the wind like Jeshuran waxed fat, but a word from his lips, but his ideas came in quick suction, tho't he, what a disgrace to die here in the mud der the pressure of my sweetheart, however his time for h reflections were short, the tender hearted maid collect- all her agility in one effort, dismounted & found herself dry land in an instant, not a moment to be lost. She ized her lover by one leg, & dragged him from the mud, a ious figure extending about six feet six inches on the ound, all besmeared from head to foot, spitting, puffing, ating & struggling for breath. Poor man, the whole litude laughing at thy calamity, shouting ridiculing, e to give thee consolation but thy loving and sympathetic rtner in misfortune.

Upon my soul, exclaims Droll Tom, Stern foremost. at bouncing Lass ought to have the highest prize for drag- her ship from the mud. She was cleaning the filth m his face.

CHAPT. IV.

A JOURNEY TO THE N. W. & REMOVALL

Gracious God how deplorable our situation Are we doomed to dwell among hordes of savages & be deprived of all intercourse with friends & the civilized world? what will be the situation of our offspring? Will they preserve our customs & manners, cultivate the arts & sciences & maintain our holy religion; or rather will they rather degenerate into savages & by mingling with them become the most - - - race of beings in existence. We can indure such reflection, such heart-rending anticipation They pour upon my soul like a flood & bear me down with the weight of a milstone. O that my head were water, & my eyes a fountain of tears, Then my intolerable burthen should should be poured forth in a torrent & my soul set at liberty. But behold the light springs up beams upon my soul. She brings in her train Hope the celestial Godes, that sure & strong anchor that dispenser of comfort & pleasing anticipation, & that dispeller of corroding grief & blank despair. She bids me review the exploded reasoning of of a great philosopher & compare it with my own observations, perhaps the result will point out a safe road to the land of our nativity.

Thus I reasoned respecting the solar system of which the earth is a part. Provided the earth is stationary according to the present system of philosophy, then the sun moon & the plannets, being at an immense distance from earth, must perform their revolutions around her with conceivable velocity; Whereas, if according to the platic system, the earth is a globe & the sun is stationary, on the earth by a moderate velocity - - - perform her revolutions. This scheme will represent the solar system as displaying the transendant wisdom of its Almighty architect, for in this we behold the Sun suspended by Omnipotence & all the planets moving round him as their common center in exact order & harmony. In this we can easily account for days & nights & the different seasons of the year. When the earth presents one part of her face to the sun it is day, & when that part is turned from his beams it is night. When she varies to the South the sun shines upon her in a more perpendicular direction, the sun beams become more dense & the heat increases, as she turns back the heat decreases in proportion as this part of the earth loses its perpendicular direction, & to the sun & the cold becomes more intense in the same proportion. This account for the various seasons of the year appears correct & consistent & highly honourable to the divine perfection.

But behold the other system. The earth firmly fixed on a firm foundation, perhaps a stone, some say on a giant's back who stands on a - - - back. Its surface widely extends nearly horizontal, & its cut down & its sides cut down straight or perpendicular to the the very bottom, below which is a fathomless abyss. Pray, Mr. Philosopher, what man has ever there & looked down & what prevents the Ocean, unless it is dammed with earth & rocks, from pouring down & losing itself in this horrible abyss? But how extensive is this teraqueous surface? Indeed I am of opinion if this system is true, I am nearly at one end of it. But the hypothesis is too absurd & inconsistent. The earth must be of a spherical form & a westerly course will lead us to the land of our nativity. Perhaps this is a part of the eastern continent, or perhaps only a narrow strip of the Ocean intervenes? On no other principle can we account for the emigration of the ancestors of these innumerable hords of human beings that possess this continent. Their tradition is that their ancestors came from the west, & they agree in their information that at the distance of fifteen days journey in a westernly direction there are nations vastly more numerous, powerful & civilized than themselves.

The earth therefore must be of a spherical form a Globe & a westerly course will lead us to the land of our nativity. On what principle can we account for emigration of the ancestors of these innumerable hords of human beings that possess this Continent? Their tradition tells them that they emigrated from the westward. From this I draw the conclusion that the sea if any, which intervenes between the two Continents at the westward is not so extensive but that it may be safely navigated I have also learned from some of the natives We are also informed by some of the natives that at the distance of about fifteen days journey a north westerly course there is a great river which runs a south westerly direction, they can not tell how far & that along the banks of this river there are great towns & mighty kings & a people who live in a state of civilization. From all these considerations I am determined to remove & pursue a westerly course, & seek the delightful country ancestors. I immediately communicated my determination & the reasons on which it was founded to our little society, who joyfully acquiesced. It was thot to be the most prudential to find out the disposition & character of the inhabitants, who were settled along the great River lest we should fall into the hands of Robbers. For this purpose my man Crito & myself & a Delawan for an interpreter set forth. We passed thro' a country interspersed with villages, inhabited by the same kind of people as the Delawans, until we came to a great Mountain. Having passed over this, we had not traveled far before we came to the confluence of two great rivers which in conjunction produced a river which was called Owaho, deep enough for the navigation of ships. Here was a large town or city inhabited by a different race of people from any we had seen before. We were immediately conducted to the King & were received who received us very graciously, & having asked a number of very pertinent questions & received answer to his satisfaction, I then made known to him our business & had all my requests granted. As we proposed to move into his territory, he offered to furnish us for our convenience, with four Mammoons & four men to manage them. These were an animal of prodigious magnitude even bigger than the elephant, which the natives had tamed & domesticated. They were very sagacious & docile & were employed in carying burthens & in drawing timber in plowing their land. Their hair at the Spring season was about seven inches in length, & was of a fine woolly assistance, & being sheared off at the proper season, was manufactured into coarse cloath. And the milk of the female which they produced in abundance afforded a very wholesome nutriment. Having thus succeeded beyond our expectations, we made as much expedition to return as possible. We arrived in safety without any material accident. The Little Society I had left were greatly rejoiced at our return, & highly pleased with the account we gave of the country we had visited, & at the sight of those extraordinary & prodigious animals Mammons which we had bro't to convey our baggage. No time was lost to make preparations for the journey. The Captain, Mate & myself went to the King & held a conference with him & the chiefs & obtained leave to depart, tho' with apparent regret & reluctance. Sacks were provided from course cloth to receive the most valuable part of our goods & furniture. These were thrown across three of the Mammoons. The other was caparisoned in a manner too tedious to describe for the accommodation of our women & children. They were all mounted upon him & rode with great convenience & safety. Being thus prepared & ready Thus having resided among the Delawares two years, & being prepared to take our departure. The King & his chiefs & many of his principal Subjects came forward to take an affectionate farewell. This was done on both sides with mutual expressions of the most ardent & sincere friendship & the most earnest wishes & prayers for future prosperity & happiness. Having taken our final adieu I observed honest Crito shedding tears very plentifully. You seem to be affected, said I. God bless your honour said he, when I think how kind & generous these poor Delawans have been to us, I can not help forming an affection & friendship for them. We were obliged to anchor amongst them, we were strangers, & helpless they were ignorant Savages, yet they held out the hand of kindness, & treated us as brothers & sisters. Have they fulfilled the law of Christian charity? O that they w good Christians, may God forgive their ignorance & unbelief, & reward them for their kindness & generosity. We pressed on. No obstacles impeded our journey until we came to the great river Suscowan, which lies, runs between the Deliwah River & the great moun mountain. The water being too deep for fording, we built a small boat, & with this at several times, we conveyed the whole of the baggage & company & baggage across, except the managers of the Mammoons, who mounted them & forded & swam across. We then proceeded on by slow marches. - - - but in crossing the great mountain we had some difficulties encounter, but however met with received no material damage. but finally arrived safely at the great city Owahon on the twenty-fifth day after our departure from Delawan.

Fatigued with a long & difficult journey great joy & gladness were visible in every in countenance & all were disposed to establish our residence here, until further information could be obtained, & further measures concerted to prosecute our journey to Europe. The King & his principal officers proffered us every assistance necessary to make our situation agreeable. They assigned us in compliance with our request conformity to our desire a number of houses on the bank of the river a little distance from the city. We made him some valuable presents in return, which he received as a token of friendship, but not as a compensation. For such was the high sense of honor which this prince sustained, that when he made a present he would take it as an insult to offer him anything as a compensation.

Having now once more become settled our little community continued the same regulations which they had established at Deliwah & all things proceeded in peace & our affairs prospered.

CHAP. V.

A DESCRIPTION OF THE OHONS, & MANNER OF PROCURING A LIVING.

I am now to describe a species of nation who have but little resemblance to those to those innumerable tribes of savages, who live along the coast of the Atlantic. Their complexion, the form & construction of their bodies, their customs manners laws government & religion all demonstrate that they must have originated from some other nation & have but a very distant affinity with their savage neighbors. As to their persons they were taller on an average than I had ever seen in any nation, their bones were large limbs strait & shoulders broad. Their eyes rather small & sunk deep in the head. Their foreheads were prominent & the face below tapering in such a manner that the chin that was formed nearly to a point. As to their complexion it was bordering on an olive tho' of lighter shade. Their eyes were generally of a dark brown or black. Their hair of the same color, tho' I have sometimes seen persons, whose hair was of a redish hue.

They clothed themselves in choath which was manufactured among themselves from the hair of the Mammoo & from Cotton, which was transported from the South west westward. The men wore shoes & long stockings wide trousers, a waistcoat & a garment with wide short sleeves, which came down to their nees, & in cold weather a cloak over the whole. The covering for the head was generally a kind of a Cap, which ran up high & tapered to point. This was generally made of fur skins & was ornamented with feathers. It had a small brim in the shape of a half moon to project over the forehead. The women besides stockings & shoes wore a short petticoat a shirt of cotton a loose garment with sleeves which they girted around them with belts & a cloak. They had various ornaments such as ribbons made from cotton & coulered with different coulers, the most beautiful feathers that could be obtained & shells of various kinds. Indeed the higher class women were extremely fond of ornament, & wore secured a large share of their happiness in the brilliancy & ready appearance of their garments. These people obtained their living generally by the cultivation of the Land, the manage by tending & managing certain animals which had been so long domesticated that they had lost their wild nature & become tame. Corn, wheat, beans, squashes & carrots they raised in great abundance. The ground was plowed by horses & generally made very mellow for the reception of the seed.

It was the occupation of a certain part of the men to attend upon the tame animals, to drive them to pasture, & keep them from straying, & feed them when the snow was on the ground. Two men would tend twenty Mammouths, which were indifferent whether they fed on grass or cropt bushes. When these animals were fat their flesh was highly esteemed. They had droves of Elk, which they had so tamed & tutored that they could manage them as they pleased. These had their tenders (several words intelligible) & would follow them like a flock of sheep. & it is but seldom that any would leave their companions. The elk constituted a considerable portion of their animal food. The horses were managed in the same way & the people tho't their meat to be a savoury dish. They had large numbers of turkies & gees, which tho' originally wild yet by treating them with great familiarity by cropping their wings & feeding them they frequently they discovered no disposition to ramble off, but would propogated their species & laid eggs in abundance.

Hunting & fishing were the employment of some others followed the mechanical buiness & others carried on a bartering trade to the Southwestward in order to furnish to furnish the people with cotton & other articles whose production was not congenial to their climate. By pursuing these various employments they generally had an abundance of provision & were at all seasons comfortably cloathed. And here I would remark as one striking characteristic of this people, that they observed great neatness in their dress, in their cookery & in their houses.

The manufacturing of lead Iron & lead was understood but was not carried on to that extent & perfection as in Europe. A small quantity of Iron in proportion to the number of Inhabitants served to supply them with all the impliments which custom had made necessary for their use. By hammering & hardening their Iron they would convert it nearly into the consistence of Steel & fit it for the purpose of edged tools.

The potery business was conducted with great ingenuity & great quantities of stone & earthen ware consisting of every kind of vessel of every construction which were needed for family use, were manufactured in every part of this extensive country. They would These vessels they they ornimented with pictures with the likenesses of rious kinds of animals & trees & impressed upon them such coulars as would strike the fancy with delight. The males of the high Class most wealthy Class would often have a large & superfluous quantity of this brittle furniture to decorate one apartment of the house. The vessels they were arranged in such order as to make a display of taste & impress the mind with the agreeable sensation of beauty.

In Architecture there can be no comparison with the civilized nations of Europe. In their most wealthy & populous Cities they their houses & public buildings exhibit no elegance, no appearance of wealth or grandure, all is plain & nothing superfluous. But convenience seems to be the whole object they had in view in the construction of their buildings of every kind.

Their houses were generally but one story high built of wood, being framed & covered with split clapboards or shingles, & in the inside the walls were formed of clay, which was plastered over with a thin coat of lime. Their houses seldom consisted of more than three apartments. As to their chimneys they built construct a wall of stone about five feet high for the fire to be against which they build their fire, from the top of this wall they construct the chimney with thin pieces of split timber, on the inside with wet dirt or clay of which they plaister wet dirt or clay which completely covers & adheres to the timber & prevents the fire from having any operation upon it. The inside of their houses as the women generally practise neatness, makes a much better appearance than the outside.

It is my opinion says Trojanus that this people display taste in building which is formed upon the true principles of Reason. Their houses are sufficiently spacious for convenience. No expense or Labour are thrown away in building useless apartments or in erecting their houses higher than what convenience requires. The whole catalogue of ornamental trumpery is neglected. This in Rome produces more than half the Labour & expense in building. Yes says Lucian, and without this these labouring people must starve for want of employment, & the citizens of the Roman empire would be deprived of the honor of possessing a splendid Capital & of the exquisite pleasure of beholding the greatest exhibition of human ingenuity in the elegance the splendour the purity & beauty of their houses, their palaces & their public edifices. True indeed, replied Trojanus, men may be dazed & delighted with such objects for the moment, But could not wealth be better bestowed upon to promote interest of the community & for charitable purposes & these artists better employ their strength & ingenuity in producing some substantial benefits themselves & others? Rejoins Lucian, the course reason dictates is to avoid extremes. A slab colored world would tire the senses by its uniformity & too much ornament & splendor, would cease to please by its frequency.

Besides, lofty houses can be more easily overthrown by tornadoes or tumbled down upon our heads by earthquakes. The course, says Lucian that reason dictates is to avoid extremes. A slab colored world by its uniformity would tire the senses, & by its possessing too much ornament & splendor it would cease to please. (But the wonder wont cease when it is considered that mankind with but few exceptions to walk in the tracks of their fathers to pursue the road marked out by their education.)

CHAP. VI.

DESCRIPTION OF THE LEARNING, RELIGION &
CUSTOMS OF THE OHONS.

Learning appears to be so important to the nature of a & a good convenient share of it so easy to obtain, that we may wonder why it is not universally diffused thro' the world. But If we can place any reliance on the dark fables of antient history, it is certain that letters are indebted for their existence to the inventive genius of certain extraordinary characters. Egypt & Chaldea contended for the honour of being the first who invented letters. Perhaps they were invented in each nation nearly at the same time.
 Let this be as it may could no other nation in the world produce as great geniuses as Egypt or Chaldea? * Is there a natural obstacle to prevent their production in America as well as in Asia? Whatever may be the reasoning of others on this subject, the fact is that I found Letters or some degree of learning, tho' in a very imperfect state among this people. At present I shall wave the account of its introduction & shall merely describe the state of learning as it existed among the Ohons. They had characters which represented words & all compound words were had each part represented by its appropriate character. The variation of ideas, moods & tenses was designated by certain marks placed under the characters. They generally wrote on note. The most probable conjecture is that they were communicated from one nation to the other.

parchment beginning at the right wrote from the top to the bottom, placing each character directly under the preceding one & having finished one column or line they begin the write the next on the left of that & so continue on until they cover the parchment if the subject requires it. It is a work of considerable labour & time to obtain such knowledge of their characters & the application as to be able to read with fluency & to write with ease & accuracy.

In the principal Cities & towns the government appointed learned men to instruct the sons of the higher class of Citizens & in the course of four or five years they will make such proficiency as to become tolerable scholars.

The works of the learned are not very voluminous. Records are kept of the transactions of their Government. Their constitution & laws are committed to writing. A sacred Roll in manuscript is preserved among the Records of their Emperors & kings. & are dispersed thro' the Empire & much pains taken to diffuse the knowledge of them among the people. In all their large town & Cities they have deposited under the care of a priest a sacred Roll which contains the tenets of their Theology & a description of their religious ceremonies. This order of men publish comments upon these sacred writings. They publish some tracts on moral philosophy & some containing a collection of proverbs & the wise sayings of their sages.

But the kind of composition in which they most excel is poetry. In poetic numbers they describe the great events which take place & the exploits & mighty achievements of their heroes. In soft elegies they describe paint the Amours of Lovers & in pathetic strains they delineate the calamities of sorrow of the unfortunate.

In their assemblies it is very common for a certain class of these learned poets to entertain the company (- - - the gone - - -) with a recital of poetic pieces describing battles & exploits of their warriors, or to sing some humorous or witty ballad. As for theators they have none, but as a kind of substitute there are actors who entertain the people by pronouncing dialogues or plays in which they play all the arts of mimicry & act out the express in their countenance their gesture & the tone of their voices the different passions of the human mind. As only a small portion of the people are instructed in the arts of reading & writing, of consequence the great mass must possess a large share of ignorance, but not so great a share as savages who have no learning among them. They hear the conversation & the lectures of their sages, they are entertained with their poetic orators entertain them with the productions of their poets, containing the history of great events & mighty achievements. Their actors divert & please them by exciting the various passions at the same time communicating instruction & correcting the natural savageness of manner & as the pieces they rehearse contain many ideas & sentiments tending to expose the deformity of vice & the folly of superstition & the disgustingness of rude & clownish manners, the people are of consequence improved & considerably refined & add to their living in compact towns or considerable cities in which there is a constant & reciprocal communication of ideas, which of course would have no effect to inform their minds. To all these causes combined the Ohons the great mass of the people are indebted for possessing a considerable share of knowledge & civilization.

RELION VII.

In every nation there is some kind of Religion & in every religion, however adulterated & corrupted, there are some things which are commendable, some things which serve to improve the morals & influence mankind to conduct better than what they would do provided they pursued the natural dictates of their depraved mind. without any restraint As this sentiment is an established maxim which has been believed in every nation from the earliest ages every nation, hence it has been the policy of all governments to encourage & protect some kind of religion. In examining the religious systems, sentiments & precepts which are believed & practised throughout this extensive Empire, & which are encouraged & protected by the government. I found some things which are common to the various systems of theology in Europe & Asia, & some things which have no resemblance to either. From the sacred Roll as it is denominated I shall extract the tenets of their theology & a description of their religious ceremonies. It expresses them to this effect.

"There is an intelligent omnipotent Being who is self-existent & infinitely good & benevolent. Matter eternal existed. He put forth his hand & formed it into substances as he pleased. He presides over the universe & has a perfect knowledge of all things. From his own spiritual substance he formed seven sons. These are his principal ats to manage the affairs of his empire. He formed the es of men from matter. Into each body he emitted ined a particle of his own spiritual substance, in consence of which man in his first formation was inclined to volence & goodness. There is also another great in-gent Being who is self-existent & possessed of great er but not of Omnipotence. He is filled with infinite ce against the good Being & exerts all his subtlety & er to ruin his works. Seing the happy situation of man approached so near as to tuch his soul with his deliterious

l. The poison was immediately diffused & contamid his passions & appetites. His reason & understand-received no injury. The good being looking upon his ppy offspring with infinite love & compassion, made a ee that if mankind would reduce their passions & appe-

Such not thy bodies or thy garments to remain long besmeared with dirt & filth. Cleanliness prevents many diseases & is pleasant to the sight. But from a dirty filthy mortal we turn with disgust & abhorrence. As the great Author of our existence being is benevolent to all his offspring, so he becomes us to be benevolent to our fellow beings around us. Our Country is one body & we are part of its members. We are therefore bound to maintain their rights, privileges & the the honour & dignity of our Country at the risk of our lives. Great rewards attend the brave for their exploits & achievements in contending against tyrants & in defending the Rights their of their Country will be celebrated on the plains. But the vision now expands & directs our contemplation to fix on his attributes, whose spiritual substance is commensurate with infinity. As even a single particle from his substance constitutes our souls, how small how diminutive must we appear in the view of Omniscience. We must therefore contemplate his attributes thro' the medium of his works, & admire with profound reverence & adoration his wisdom goodness & power which are visible in the formation & arrangement of material bodies and spiritual beings. He requires us to supplicate his favours, & when received to express our gratitude. As our passions & appetites often get the ascendancy of our reason, we are therefore bound to confess our faults & implore forgiveness.

Now that you may know and keep all these things which were made known by divine inspiration, it is ordained

Once in three months ye shall have a great festival in every great city & town, & your priests shall sacrifice an Elk as a token that your sins deserve punishment, but that the divine mercy hath banished them into shades of forgetfulness.

Be attentive oh man, to the words of truth which have been recorded & respect to all the commandments which have been written for your observance. Your Maker will be rejoiced to see you rejoice in the participation of his favour & to behold your faces brighten with the cheerful beams of cheerfulness.

AN ACCOUNT OF BASKA CHAP VIII

Among the great & illustrious characters who have appeared in the world in different ages as instructors & reformers of mankind, Baska holds is entitled to a conspicuous place.

The place of his nativity is not recorded. But the first notice which is given of him is his appearing at the great festival of Golanga, which is situate on the Banks of the Siota river. He was attended by his wife & two little sons. The fashion of their garments were different from the natives. Their complexion likewise was of a little whiter. They were Baska was grave solemn & sedate reserved in conversation, but when he spoke wisdom proceeded from his lips. His fame spread rapidly thro' the city & country, & he was celebrated as a man of the most brilliant & extraordinary talents. He was conducted to the King & introduced to him. The King asked him from what country he came. His reply was, at a great distance from the westward. He then asked him induced him to come into his country. He replied

CHAP VIII

Perhaps reader, before we describe the government of the Ohons it might be proper to relax our mind by with a few scceches of Biography. The character which will be connect with the history of the learning & religion & the government & laws of the Ohons is that of the great and illustrious Lobaska.

He is the man who first introduced their present method of writing who presented them with the sacred Roll which contains the tenets & precepts of their religion, & which formed their political constitution as it respects the connection of various kingdoms or tribes under one government.

There are many anecdotes which tradition has handed down respecting this extraordinary man, which have a complexion of fables the miraculous & hence I conclude they must be fabulous Such as his As for instance he is represented as forming a curious machine by which & having placed himself upon it he mounted into the Atmosphere ended a great hight & having sailed a considerable time ance thro' the air he descended slowly & received no hage & that multitudes of astonished Spectators had a nber of times seen him perform this miraculous exploit, that he declared that when he took these excursions, his raordinary wisdom & knowledge was communicated to

n. If he did in fact perform such exploits no wonder t he managed an ignorant people as he pleased. But as s not my intention to amuse my readers by a splendid ation of fables, I shall confine myself to facts which can-be contested. The place of his nativity is not recorded.
e first account given of him was his appearance in the eat City of Golanga which is situate on the Banks of the ota River. When he entered that city he was attended his wife & four sons the the eldest of whom was about hteen years of age. He himself appeared to be about ty. His personal appearance was commanding being midling Stature of a bold frank countenance & eyes ely & penetrating. In his general deportment he was eerful yet displayed much sedateness & gravity. He s affable & familiar in conversation but not loquacious, never would converse long on trifling subjects, had a onderful faculty to intermix some wise sayings & re-arks that should improve & of turning with dignity and avefulness the attention of the company to subjects that re important & interesting. None could then withstand e energy of his reasoning, & all were astonished at the genuity of his arguments and the great knowledge and sdom which he displayed. His fame spread thro' the ty & multi & country & multitudes frequently assembled importuned him to give them instruction. Always eerful to gratify the curiosity & comply with the reasonable requests of the multitude, he entertained them by conversing with them familiarly, & by exhibiting public discourses. All were charmed with his wisdom & eloquence and all united in pronouncing him to be the most extraordinary man in existence, & generally believed that he had conversation with the celestial beings, & always acted under the influence of divine inspiration. The people were very liberal in their donations, which enabled him to support his family in affluence. Having thus in a short time established a character with respect to wisdom & eloquence to any man who had ever appeared before him in the nation, he then at an interview which he held with the king & the chiefs told them that he had invented the art of expressing ideas by certain marks or characters, and having explained the nature of the subject to their full satisfaction he then proposed to establish a school for the instruction of the sons of the principal subjects of the King. This proposal was received and accepted with much gratitude & cheerfulness. A house was immediately prepared for the accommodation of Schollars, & in a short time the number amounted to nearly two hundred. But here it must be observed that the art of making & applying the characters to the words which they represented, was taught principally by his sons. They had all received an education from their father & even the youngest who was but eleven years old could read & write with great correctness. & facility. He superintended their instruction & very frequently gave them lectures on scientific & moral subjects, his scholars made great progress in learning & delighted their parents with the improvement they had made in literature civilization & refinement. He still continued to associate among the people, & was indefatigable in his labours to dispel the brance, correct their superstition & vices & to diffuse a e accurate knowledge of the mechanical arts. The uufacture of Iron in particular was not known. This aught a number by showing them how to build a small ace, & to cast iron ware & then to build a small forge ere refine pigs, & convert them into Iron.

He had resided among the Siotans about three years, ne happy effects of his labours were visible to all ob-
ers. A great reformation had taken place in the mor-& manners of the people, Industry had encreased, & culture & the mechanical arts had received great im-vement & houses were built on a more commodious & ant construction. But not willing to stop here the beolent mind of the great Tobaska meditated a more im-tant revolution. Now was the propitious era to had ed & the way was prepared for the introduction of that em of Theology, which is comprized in the sacred Roll.

In the first place he read & explained the whole system he King & the chiefs of the nation, who cordially gave their approbation & gave permission to propagate it ong the people. Under the pretense that this system s revealed to him in several interviews, which he had n permitted to have with the second son of the great & od Being, the people did not long hesitate but received sacred & divine truth every word which he taught them.
ey forgot their old religion which was a confused & urd medly of Idolitry & superstitious nonsense & em-ced a religion more sublime & consistent, & more fraught h sentiments which would promote the happiness of nkind in this world.

Whilst the Siotans were thus rapidly progressing in ir improvements they were unhappily disturbed by the certain prospect of war. Bombal, the King of the Kentucks, a nation that lived on the south side of the great River Ohio, had taken great umbrage against Kadokam the King of Siota. This Bombal was the most haughty & the most powerful prince who reigned in this part of the western Continent. It had been the custom for several ages for the King and chiefs of the Kentucks to have the exclusive right to wear in their caps a bunch of blue feathers, which designated their preeminence over every nation. The Siotan princes envying them this distinguished honor & considering themselves as being at least their equals assumed the liberty to place bunches of Blue feathers upon their caps. This in the opinion of the Kentucks was an unpardonable offense if persisted in, & a most daring insult upon their supreme dignity. A messenger was immediately After a solemn Council was held with his chiefs Bombal with their unanimous consent dispatched a messenger to Kadocam, who thus proclaimed.

Thus saith Bombal, the king of kings & the most mighty prince on earth. Ye have insulted my our honour & dignity, in assuming blue feathers which was the badge of our preeminence. Know ye that unless you tear them from your caps ye shall feel the weight of our vengeance.

Kadocam replied. Tell your master that a great Company of Wolves made an attack upon a City, to rob the citizens of their dear and elk, & they let forth their dogs upon them, which attacked them with such fury, & courage that they fled mangled & torn to a most dreary swamp. Here they by the most tremendous the most plaintive howling, they lamented their sad disaster & disgrace.

An answer so shrewd & insulting it was expected would soon be followed by an invasion. Measures mu mediately be taken for the defense of the kingdom. Lobaska was invited to set in council. All were unanimously of opinion that to comply with the haughty demand of Bombal, by tearing the Blue feathers from their caps would be degrading the honour of the nation & a relinquishment of their natural right, that they were likewise sensible that the most vigorous exertions were necessary to save the country from ruin. The opinion & advice of Lobaska was requested. It is my opinion says he that by using a little vigour, this war might be bro't to a conclusion. which will be honourable to this kingdom. We will pursue, says Lobaska your advice & directions. I shall be happy says Lobaska to assist you with my best advice. Call immediately into the field an army of three Thousand men, procure two thousand shovels five hundred mat-hooks & five hundred wheelbarrows, & one hundred axes. I will give directions how to make them. Not a moment was lost. The army was assembled, & implements provided with the most expedition. & they marched down the river. to a certain place where the Army of the Enemy must pass in order to arrive at the city of Golanga. At this place the hills or mountains came within less than a mile of the river, a flat or level land intervened. Here Lobaska directed that a canal should be cut from the River to the River to the Hill That it should be eight feet wide & eight deep & that the dirt which they dug should be thrown into the river. That the canal except what should be wanted to lay over thin pieces of split timber, which should be extended over the canal so weak & slender that the weight of a man could break them down. This novel invention invention was soon carried into effect & the work compleatly finished.

Every precaution was used to prevent any intelligence of these transactions from getting to the enemy.

In the meantime Kadokam bro't into the field seven thousand more of his warriors, men of brave hearts & valiant for the battle. The indignant king of the Kentucks had by this time assembled an army of Thirty Thousand men, who were ready at the risk of their lives to vindicate the preeminence of their nation. & the transcendent dignity of their King & his chiefs. Had of this At the head of the army Bombal began his march to execute his threatened vengeance on the Siotans. As he entered their country he found the viliges deserted, & all the movable property conveyed away. not a man or wom was to be seen until he came in view of the army of Kadokam, who was encamped within a small distance of the Canal. Bombal halted & formed his men in two Ranks, extending from the River to the Hill. He had a reserved core, who were placed in the rear of the main body, Having thus arranged them for battle he went from one wing to the other, proclaiming aloud, we have been insulted, brave Soldiers, by these cowardly Siotans. They have assumed the blue Feather the badge of our preeminance & exalted dignity. Behold it flying in their Caps. Will your highborn souls submit to behold such Dastards place themselves on equal terms with you? No, my valiant warriors, let us revenge the insult by the destruction of their puny army, & the conflagration of their city. Make a furious charge upon them & the victory is ours. Let your motto be blue Feather & you will fight like wolves robbed of their puppies. Hadokam had by this time formed his army in order of Battle close to the edge of the canal & extended them in one rank on from the River to the Hill. As the Kentucks approached in a small distance, the Siotans gave back & began a retreat with apparent confusion, notwithstanding the premeditated efforts of the King & his officers to prevent their retreating. Bombal, observing this commanded to rush forward on the full run, but to keep their ranks in order. As they instantly obeyed as one man, & as soon as their feet stepped on the slender covering of the canal it gave way & they fell to the bottom, some in one position & some in another. A disaster so novel & unexpected might have appalled the stoutest & filled their minds with amazement & horror. Nor did this complete their misfortune of the army of Bombal. An ambush of the Siotans, who lay on the top of the hill opposite to the reserved Corps of the Kenyans, rushed down upon them in an instant. Surprise & horror prevented resistance, they threw down their arms & were rendered. The retreating army of Hadokam immediately returned with shouting to the edge of the Canal. Their enemies, who but a moment before thought themselves invincible & certain of victory, were now defenceless & wholly in their power. When Lobaska was present & saw the success of his stratagem, his great soul disdained revenge on an enemy helpless & prostrate enemy. He conjured the Siotans not to shed one drop of Blood, but to be generous & merciful. Bombal had now recovered from his surprise, feeling the deplorable situation of his army, his haughty pride felt the keenest anguish. Where says he is the King of the Siotans? Here I am says Hadokam. What is your request my brother? Reduced says he by a stratagem the most ingenious & artful to a situation which subjects us wholly under your power, & in which you can take ample vengeance. I now implore your generosity & compassion for my army. Spare their lives & then name your terms, & if I can comply with them without degrading the honour of my crown it shall be done. Your request says Hadokam is granted Surrender your army, & let you army return in peace. As for your majesty & the chiefs of your nation who are present, you will give us the pleasure of your company in our return to the city of Golanga, there we will execute a treaty of peace & amity, that shall be advantageous & honourable to both nations. These terms were accepted & the Kentucks returned in peace to their own Country, not to describe exploits & bloody victories, but the curious stratagem of Lobaska.

The two kings & their splendid retinue of princes having arrived at Golanga, every attention was paid by the Hodokam & his chiefs to their honorable visitors. Hadokam made a sumptuous entertainment at which all were present. The next day both parties met for for the purpose of agreeing to terms of peace & perpetual amity. What are your terms says Bombal? Lobaska, says Hadokam shall be our Arbitrator. He shall name the terms his wisdom will dictate nothing which will be dishonourable for either party. Your proposal, says Bombal is generous Lobaska shall be our Arbitrator. Lobaska then rose. Attend, says he to my words, ye princes of Siota & Kentuck. You have all derived your existence from the great Father of Spirits, you are his children & belong to his great family. Why, then have you thirsted for each others' blood? for the Blood of Brothers? & what has, & what has produced this mighty war? A blue feather, may it please your majesties, a blue feather a badge of preeminence. It is pride, it is unrul'd ambition & avarice which devastate the world & produce rivers of human Blood. & the war ch take place among nations generally originate from as ng causes as the blue feather.

Let this be the first article of your treaty that any per-may wear a blue feather in his Cap, or any other feath-that he pleases.

Let this be the second, that the individuals of each na-may carry on a-commerce with each other, & that they be protected in their persons & property.

Let this be the third, that I shall be at liberty to es-sh a school or schools in any part of the dominion of tuck & furnish them with such instructors as I please t none shall be restrained from hearing our instructions at we shall be patronized & protected by the King & chiefs.

Let this be the fourth, that perpetual peace & amity remain between both nations & as a pledge for the ful-ent of these articles on the part of the princes of Ken-
, that the eldest son of the King & four sons of the princhiefs, shall be left as hostages in this City for the of Term of Three years. These terms met the cor-approbation of both parties & were ratified in the most nn manner.

Thus happy was the termination of the war about the feather having taken place Lobaska proceeded with fatigable industry & perseverance in his benevolent me of enlightening & reforming mankind. And how oy would it be for mankind if all wars about as trifling es as this might terminate in the same way. The be-lent mind of Loboska soared above trifles viewing all kind as brothers & sisters he wished the happiness of

He then made provision in the treaty with the Ken-tucks for the introduction of schools in Kentuck among them. This was the first step which he foresaw would introduce improvement in agriculture & the mechanical art produce a reformation in their morals & religious principles & a happy revolution in some part of their political institutions.

Bombal had become so captivated with Lobaska, that he invited him to bear him company to his own dominion. He consented, & when he had arrived at the royal City of Gamba, which is situate on the River Kentuck, he there pursued the same course which he had done at Golanga, & his success answered his most sanguine expectations. The people were now prepared for the introduction of a school. He returned back to Tolanga, & sent his second son & three of the most forward scholars of the Siotans to establish a school at Gamba.

In the meantime his intention was to make some amendments in the government of Sciota. But as there were several Cities & a great number of villages that acknowledged the jurisdiction of the Sciotan king which still were ignorant of the principles & doctrines which he taught he found it necessary to visit them & to introduce instructors amongst them. In this work he was engaged about two years, & the happy effect of his labors were now visible, in various kinds of improvement & in the reformation of manners morals & religion. The way was now prepared to introduce his system of government. The chiefs of the nation were invited to attend a grand council at Tolanga. When they were met Lobaska rose, & presented them with the following constitution of government.

The king of Siota shall be stiled the Emperor of Ohion the King of Siota, his crown shall be hereditary in the dest male heir of his family. The cities & vilages who knowledge his jurisdiction or who may hereafter do it, shall be entitled to protection from the Emperor. If inaded by an enemy, he shall defend them with all the force the Empire. Once every year, the chiefs shall meet at olanga to make laws for the good of the nation.

These young men having imbibed the spirit & prin-ple of their great preceptor, spared no exertions to instruct e schollars & to diffuse useful knowledge amongst the ople. The happy effects of their Labors were visible in short time. The people The people embraced the relign of Lobaska & became more industrious & civilized. In eir various improvements in agriculture, the mechanical ts they & literature they even exeled the Sciotans, & apared to be as prosperous & flourishing. Even Bombal mself declared that the termination of the war about the ue feather, which at first appeared unfortunate, yet as it cated such happy effects among his people, it gave m more satisfaction & pleasure than the reputation of beg a great Conqueror. what he could have received from e reputation of being a great Conqueror.

CHAP. IX.

GOVERNMENT & MONEY.

The people who were denominated Ohians were settled on both sides of the River Ohio from & along various branches of the river. The settlements extended a great distance in the time of Lobaska, but how far it is mentioned. They lived in comfortable villages or towns except the cities. We might except the cities, Golanga the River Sciota & Gamba on the which River Kentucky The various villiges or towns formed independent sovereignties, & were governed by their respective chiefs.

Excepting the Cities of Golanga & Gamba, which the Kings claimed jurisdiction over an extent of country country of about one hundred & fifty miles along the River Ohio & about the same extent distance back from the River, the remaining part of this extensive country was settled in compact villages or towns & These formed independent sovereignties & were governed by their respective chiefs. Frequent bickerings contentions & wars took place among these chiefs, which were often attended with perilous consequences. To remedy these evils & to facilitate & accomplish the general & benevolent plan, of reforming & civilizing the Ohians, Lobaska had formed a system of Government, with a design of establishing two great Empires on each side of the River Ohio. Their different constitutions were on the same plan & were presented by the plan of Lobaska to the respective Kings of Sciota & Kentucky.

The Sciotan Constitution was comprised in these words.

The country east of the great River Ohio shall form the Empire of Sciota. At the head of this Empire shall be placed with the title of Emperor, Labamack the oldest son of Lobaska. The office shall be hereditary in the eldest male of his family. He and his sons successively shall marry natives of the kingdom of Sciota & all their daughters shall marry within their own dominions. He shall have four counsellors. He, with the advice of his counsellors, shall have the exclusive right, of making war & peace, of forming treaties with other nations. He shall be the Commander in chief of all the forces of the King & the King of Sciota shall be next to him. All controversies between the rulers or chiefs of the different tribes shall be referred to the decision of him & his counsellors, & he is authorized to compel a compliance. He shall hold his settings annually in four different parts of the Empire. The King of Sciota & the chiefs of the different tribes shall hold their offices & exercise the same authority in civil matters that they have done. They shall be amenable to the emperor & his counsellors, whose duty it shall be to inquire into all complaints against them from their subjects & to redress grievances & punish for oppression & injustice by fines. He & his counsellors shall have the exclusive privilege of coining money. They may likewise lay taxes for the support of the government & for the defence of the nation. They shall coin no more money than what is necessary for the convenience of the people, & in such quantity only that the value shall not depreciate. In time of war he shall appoint the officers of his army except where the chiefs chuse to command their own subjects. In this case, they shall be subject to the commands of the Emperor. The people every City town or village shall respectively chuse one more Censors, whose duty it shall be to enquire into mal-conduct of rulers, & all vicious & improper conduct the priests & the people & they shall pursue such measures to obtain justice & to produce a reformation of morals in offenders as the laws shall direct.

In order that the priests & instructors of learning may know & perform their duty for the benefit of civilization, morality & religion, Lambon the third son of Lobaska shall preside over them & shall have the title of high Priest, the office shall be hereditary in the eldest males of his family successively. There shall be associated with him five priests as his assistants. They shall exercise a jurisdiction over all the priests of the Empire, & shall see that they faithfully perform the duties of their office. They shall attend to the instructors of learning & shall direct that a suitable number are provided thro'out the Empire. It shall likewise be their duty at all suitable times & places to instruct Rulers & people in the duties of their respective Stations, & to labour incessantly to persuade mankind to restrain subject their passions & appetites under the government of Reason. that they may secure happiness to themselves in this life & immortal happiness beyond the grave. The people shall make contribution in proportion to their wealth for the support of their priests. If any refuse to do so shall be denied the privilege of their instructions & shall be subjected to the ridicule & contempt of the people.

For the convenience of the people & the easy support of the government it is necessary that there governors should be something which shall represent property & which is of small weight. It is therefore provided certain small pieces of iron stamped in a peculiar manner shall be this circulating medium. Each piece according to its particular stamp shall have a certain value fixed upon it. It shall be the peculiar prerogative of the Emperor & his counsellors to direct the coining of these pieces, which shall be the denominated money. No more money shall be coined than what will be for the benefit of the Empire, nor shall the Emperor & his counsellors receive any more of it than an adequate compensation for their services. They shall keep an account of the amount of money coined annually & the manner in which it has been distributed & expended. This account shall be submitted to the examination of the King of Sciota & the chiefs of the Empire. The Emperor shall always be ready to receive the petitions & complaints of his subjects. He shall consult the welfare of his people & save them from oppression & tyranny & by his beneficent acts shall gain their affections & obtain the appellation of a just, a good & a glorious Prince.

When Hadocam King of Sciota had received this plan of government, he immediately assembled all the chiefs or princes within his kingdom. Lobaska pointed out the defects of the existing governments, & the excellencies of that form which he presented for their acceptance. His reasons could not be resisted, they unanimously agreed to establish as their constitution of Government. Labamack accepted the office of Emperor & his four counsellor were appointed. Ambon was ordained high Priest & his four assistants chosen. The new government was now put in operation. The various tribes living contiguous to the Empire seeing prosperity, solicited the privilege of being received as parts of the Empire. Their requests were granted. Improvement & prosperity attended them. This induced other contiguous Tribes to request the same privilege, & others still adjoining them came forward with their petitions. All were granted & the same regulations established in every part. Within about three years from the first establishment of the Empire, Lobaska had the pleasure of seeing his son reign over a territory of more than four hundred miles length along the River Ohio, & of beholding a nation rapidly progressing from a state of barbarism, ignorance & wretchedness, to a state of civilization & prosperity.

Having now beheld the happy result of his experiment at Sciota, Lobaska made a second visit to Bambo king of Kentuck. The second son whose name was Hambak was present at the city of Gamba at His youngest son Kalo attended him. He made known his plan of revolution to Bambo, who cordially acquiesced & called together the princes. They unanimously agreed to place Hambak on the throne of the Empire south of the Ohio River, & to ordain Kalo as their high Priest. With the exception of names & places the constitution of government was the same as that which the Sciotans adopted. The same measures were purposed to insure its success. A great & flourishing Empire arose & barbarous tribes connected themselves with the Empire, & under the fostering care of the government became wealthy civilized & prosperous.

Thus within the term of twelve years from the arrival of Lobaska at Golanga, he had the satisfaction of beholding the great & benevolent objects which he had in view accomplished. He still continued his useful Labours & was the great Oracle of both Empires. His advice & sentiments were taken upon all important subjects, & no one ventured to controvert his opinions. He lived to behold the successful experiment of his institutions, & to see them acquire strength & firmness as not easily to be overthrown.

Having acquired that renown & glory which are beyond the reach of envy, & which aspiring ambition would despair of attaining, at the age of eighty he bade an affectionate adieu to two Empires & left them to lament in tears his exile—exit.

These two empires continued to progress in their improvements & population, & to rival each other in prosperity during the reign of Ten successive Emperors on the throne of Sciota. Peace & harmony & a friendly intercourse existed between them. No wars took place to disturb their tranquillity, except what arose from the surrounding Savages, who sometimes disturbed the frontiers in a hostile manner for the sake of gaining plunder. But these attacks were generally repelled & defeated, without much loss of blood. They were in fact of such trifling consequence as to make no perceptible impediment to prevent the population improvement & prosperity of both Empires, & happy, thrice happy would it have been for them if they had still continued to have pursued the amicable & benevolent principles, which first marked the commencement & progress of their institutions.

CHAP. X.

MILITARY ARRANGEMENTS, AMUSEMENTS, CUSTOMS & EXTENT OF THE EMPIRES.

The customs & amusements of a Nation evince the state of society which exists among the people. When the two Empires of Sciota & Kentuck had commenced their new career on the plan which was formed by Lobaska, they adopted as a true maxim that to avoid war it was necessary to be in constant preparation for it. It was the wisest policy of the two governments to make such military arrangements as never to be surprized by any enemy unprepared. In every city town & vilage the people were required to provide military impliments, & to deposit them in a secure place. These magazines were to contain a sufficient quantity of arms & warlike implements to furnish every man who should be able to bear arms should be destitute. In order that every man might have sufficient skill to use them to advantage, great pains was taken to prepare him by teaching him the arts of war.

The knowledge of military tackticks as they it was then attainable, was likewise difused among the people. Young men from sixteen to twenty five years old were required to take the field four times in each year. & to spend sixteen days during each time in learning the military art, & in building fortifications. And very able-bodied men were required to spend eight days in each year in the same employments.

In consequence of these regulations a rivalship existed among the different sexions of the Empire to exceed each other in skill & dexterity in their military manoevers. Hence it was a general custom in every part of the country for different bodies of men to meet to engage in feigned battles once every year, in order to make a display of their improvements in the art of war. Premiums were given to those who were the most expert in shooting the arrow or in managing the spear & the sword. Their amusements were generally of the athletick kind, calculated to improve their agility & strength & prepare them for warriors.

Wrestling, slinging, & throwing stones at marks, leaping ditches & fences & climbing trees & precipices were some of their most favorite diversions. And as they took great pains to perfect themselves in these exercises, it would astonish Spectators of other nations, to observe the improvement they had made & the extraordinary feats of agility & strength which they exhibited.

Other diversions which had no tendency to fit them for war they seldom practiced, except when in the company of women, being taught by their religion the social virtues, they manifested a great regard for the rights of the other sex & always treated them with attention civility & tenderness. Hence, when in the company of the fair sex it was curious to observe that when in the company of women they easily exchanged the warriors rugged & bold attitude of the bold warrior for the complasant & tender deportment of the affectionate galant. The amusements which were pleasing to the female mind were equally pleasing to the men, whenever they held their social meeting for recreation. These meetings were frequent among the younger class of Citizens, whether married or single. Various kinds of amusements would frequently be introduced at such times for their mutual entertainment, but that which held the most conspicuous place was dancing. But their manner of Dancing was different from that of the polished Europeans. Gracefulness & easy attitude were not so much studied in their movements as sprightliness & agility, & those tunes which admitted the greatest display of activity & sprightliness were generally the most pleasing fashionable. Hence those whose bodies were formed for the quickest movements if they kept time with the music, were the most admired. In small assemblies it was fashionable to amuse themselves with at playing with pieces of parchment. This they denominate the Bird Play. Each peice of is of an oval form & of convenient length & width & on each one is portraided the likeness of a Bird. All the birds of Prey that came within their knowledge have the honour of being represented on these pieces of Parchment. On the other pieces are portraided other birds of different kinds. The whole number of the peices amount to about sixty. These are promiscuously placed in a pack & dealt of to the company of players whose number does not exceed six. The person then, who has the greatest number of carnivorous Birds by a dextrous management, may catch the greatest number of the other Birds & thus obtain the victory.

During these interviews of the different sexes & even in their common intercourse with each other they are always very cheerful & sociable & often display that fondness & familiarity, which in Europe would be considered as indicative of a lascivious character, but in this country are considered as what good manners requird. Nothing rude, nothing indecent or immodest according to their ideas of the meaning of these terms, are admissable in company, & absolute lasciviousness would meet the most severe reprehension. When a young man wishes to settle himself in a family state he proclaims it by wearing a red feather in his cap. This is considered as an admonition to the young women who would not receive him for a husband, to avoid his company, whereas those whose inclinations towards him are more favourable admit his attentions. From this number he selects one as the object of his addresses. He obtains an interview & proposes a courtship. If the proposition accords with her wishes, they then agree on a time when he shall make known the affair to her parents, whose approbation being obtained, he is then permitted to visit her ten times in sixty days. At the expiration of this time the bargain for matrimony must be finished. Otherwise there must be a final termination of the courtshi or a postponement of the courtship, for the term of one year, or else a The parties are at liberty during the postponement to But if the parties are pleased with each other, the contract is made & the time for the celebra performance of the nuptial ceremonies is appointed. An entertainment is provided made friends are invited & the Bridegroom & the Bride present themselves in their best apparl. The company form a circle & they take their stand in the centre. The father of the Bride speaks. For what purpose do you present yourselves They answer, to join hands in wedlock. Our hearts are already joined, & we have made a solemn contract covenant to be true & faithful to each other. The company then all explain. "Blessings will attend you if ye fulfil, but Curses if ye transgress. They are then conducted into a log, round which a Rope is tied. The Bridegroom takes hold of one end of the rope & the Bride the other, & being commanded to draw the log into the house. They pull in opposite directions with all their might. Having worried themselves for some time to no purpose to the great diversion of the company, the parents of both parties step forward & giving them a severe reprimand, command them to draw in the same direction. They instantly obey & the Log is easily drawn to its destined place. The rest of the time is spent in great cheerfulness, & meriment. They partake of the entertainment & conclude with customary amusements. The Bridegroom & Bride are now desirous to form a family by themselves. If their parents are of sufficient ability they furnish them with a convenient house & such furniture as will be required for family use & such other property as they will need to enable them to obtain a comfortable living. But if their parents are poor they receive a pittance & contributions from relations & neighbors, & are placed in such a situation that with proper industry & economy they can live live above indigence & enjoy life agreeably. At the time they enter their new habitation they are attended by Priests & by their relations & friends. They kneel in the centre of the Room & the Priest places his right hand on the head of the Bridegroom & his left on the head of the Bride. After explaining & enjoining in the most solemn manner the various duties of the married state, he concludes his injunctions with these words. "My Dear children, I conjure you as you regard your own peace & felicity, as you would wish to acquire wealth & respectability & set an example worthy of emulation, that as you are now yoked together to draw in the same direction. They then rise & he presents each with a piece of Parchment on which is written Draw in the same direction All the duties of the conjugal state in their opinion are comprized in this injunction Command.

As the Priests & the Censors were vigilant & careful to required to see that parents restrained the vices of their children & instructed them in the knowledge of their religious principles the effects were very conspicuous.

Having been early taught to restrain the govern their passions & to regard the practice of virtue as their greatest good, it was generally the case that love friendship & harmony existed in families. & when parents were treated by their children with great tenderness & respect.

Parents manifested an anxious solicitude for the future welfare & respectability of their children, & in their turn children treated their parents with respect & reverence. Nor did they forsake them in old age, but paid, provided liberally for their support &

But we are not to suppose that in the most virtuous age of the nation all were virtuous. Far from this. But with such punctual exactness were the laws executed, in the most prosperous state of the nation, that vice & impiety had but few advocates & the wicked were ashamed of their own characters. Tho' every vice was prohibited by law, yet the penalties were not severe. Murder alone was punished with death. With respect to other Laws, they were calculated to wound the pride & ambition of the transgressor, & produce shame & regret. Adultery was is punished by obliging the Culprit to wear a pair of Elk horns on his shoulders six days, & to walk thro' the City or vilage once each day, at which times the boys are at liberty to pelt him with rotten eggs. The thief is compelled to make ample restitution. For the third offense he is covered with tar & feathers & exhibited as a spectacle for laughter & ridicule. Pugilists or boxers, if they are equally to blame for fighting, are yoked together at least one day, & in this situation are presented to the view of the multitude. They must wear the yoke until the quarrel is settled. Such being the nature of their penal laws & such the punctuality of executing the penalties on offenders that crimes were far less frequent in this country than in Europe, where the Laws are more severe, & offenders more often escape punishment. Tho' learning civilization & refinement had not arrived at that state of perfection, in which they exist in a great part of the Roman Empire, yet the two Empires of Sciota & Kentuck during their long period of peace & prosperity were not less happy. As luxury and extravagance were scarcely known to exist especially among the common people, an happy equality was hence there was a great similarity in their manner of living, their dress, their habits & manners. Pride was not bloated & puffed up with enormous wealth. Nor had envy fewel to inflame her hatred & malice. As the two Empires were not displeased with each others prosperity & happiness & the two governments had no thirst nor jealous of nor jealous of each others power, as the governments were not infested with a thirst for conquest, Peace of consequence waved her olive branch, & the malignant passions lay dormant. Avarice & corruption did not contaminate the ruling powers nor bribery infest the seats of justice. The people felt secure in the enjoyment of their rights, & desirous to raise up families to partake of the same blessings which they enjoyed.

We can now trace the causes of their increase & prosperity. To a religion which presented powerful motives to restrain vice & impiety, & encourage virtue. To the diffusion of a competent share of learning & knowledge to enable the people to understand their right & enjoy the pleasure of social intercourse. To the establishment of political institutions, which guarded property & life against oppressing injustice & tyranny. To the knowledge which the people obtained of agriculture & the mechanical arts & the habits of industry & economy. To the mild nature of the laws & the certainty of executing the penalty upon transgressors, & to such an equality of property as to prevent the pride of wealth & the extravagance of Luxury. To such causes may be ascribed the rapid encrease of population, & the apparent contentment & felicity which extended thro' every part of the country of the Empires. We might add like wise the long peace that continued & the friendly intercourse that existed between the two rival Empires. A peace which had no interruption for the term of near five hundred years. During this time their villages & cities were greatly enlarged, new settlements were formed in every part of the country which had not been inhabited, & owns a vast number of towns were built, which rivaled as to number of inhabitants, those which existed at the time their imperial governments were founded. Their settlements extended the whole length of the great River Ohio to its confluence with the Mississippi, & over the whole country on both sides of the Ohio River, which are watered by streams which empty into it. And also along the great lakes of Eri & Michigan, & even some settlements were formed in some parts of the country which borders on Lake Ontario. Such was the vast extent of the country which they inhabited, & such the fertility of the soil, that many millions were easily fed & supported with such a plenty, & competence of provision as was necessary for their comfort & happiness.

During the time of their rising greatness & tranquillity, their policy led them to fortify the country in every part, the interior as well as the frontiers. This they did partly for their own safety, provided a war should take place, & they should be invaded by an enemy, & partly to keep alive military & improve a warlike spirit, & the knowledge of military tackticks. Near every vilage or City they constructed forts or fortifications These were generally of an oval form & of different dimentions according to the number of inhabitants who lived in the town. The Ramparts or walls were formed of dirt which was taken in front of the fort. A deep canal or trench would likewise be formed. This would still increase the difficulty of surmounting the walls in front. In addition to this they inserted sticks pieces of Timber on the top of the Ramparts. These peices were about seven feet in length from the ground to top, which was sharpned. The distance between each peice was about six inches, thro' which they would shoot their arrows against an Enemy. Some of their fortifications have two Ramparts which run paralel with each other, built in the same manner with a distance between of about two or three perches. Their gates are strong & well constructed for defense. Within these forts are likewise a number of small houses, for the accommodation of the army & inhabitants in case of an invasion & likewise a storehouse for the reception of provisions & arms. A country thus fortified containing so many millions of inhabitants hearty & robust & with habits formed for war, might well be supposed able to defend themselves against an invading enemy. If they were beat from the frontier, they would still retreat back to the fortifications in the interior & there make a successful stand. But what avails all the wisdom, the art, the works of men, what avails their valour their strength their numbers, when the Almighty God is provoked to chastise them, & to execute his vengeance in their overthrow & destruction.

CHAP. XI.

As the Sciotans & the Kentucks had maintained with each other an uninterrupted peace & friendly intercourse for the space of four hundred & eighty years, it seems almost incredible that a Cause which was of no great importance to either nation, should excite their resentment against each other & produce all the horrors of war. But such was the unhappy effect of an affair, which had no regard to a single person except the imperial families of the two empires & the king of Sciota. As the families had were descended from the great Lobaska, they had during the reign of all their Emperors been in the habit of visiting each other, but each Emperor & his children were required not to marry out of their respective dominions, no intermarriages had taken place. They however claimed relationship, & still continued to each other the appellation of our dearest & best loved Cousen.

A Cousen of this description who was the eldest son of Lumboon, the Emperor of Kentuck arrived at the City of Planga with a small but splendid retinue of Friends. At that time Rambock, who was the fourteenth Emperor, was sitting on the throne of Sciota. He received the young prince with apparent sensation of the highest pleasure, & spared no pains to manifest towards him by his treatment the greatest esteem & friendship. The Emperor had an only son whose name was Moonrod. He ordered him to attend the young prince & to treat him with every token of affection & honour. They spent their time in receiving visits from the officers of the government, in viewing curiosities, & in the assemblies of the first Class of young citizens who met for recreation.

Elseon, for this was the name of the young prince, was soon after his arrival introduced to Lamesa, the eldest daughter of the Emperor. She was a young Lady of very fair & beautiful countenance. Her features & the construction of her person were formed to please the eye, whilst the ease & gracefulness & modesty of her deportment, were very pleasing to all her acquaintance. Her mind was replenished with the principles of knowledge, virtue & such was her vivacity and the ease with which she expressed her ideas, that all were delighted with her conversation. No wonder that this fair imperial damsel attracted the attention of Elseon, & at their first interview kindled a spark in his bosom, which he could hardly prevent from being discovered thro' his blushing countenance & the embarrassment he felt in conversation. He strove to erase those tender impressions which she had made on his heart, but in vain; every renewed interview only served only to fix her image deeper in his mind with & to make the flame of Love more difficult to extinguish. He reasoned of the obstacles in the way of obtaining this young lady for a partner, but instead of cooling only ser it only increased the ardor of his passion, & produced a resolution that with the consent of Lamesa, nothing should prevent the attainment of his wishes.

To a mind thus ardent which possessed the natural courage, resolution & perseverance of Elseo, the gigantic obstacles would vanish into vapour. Nor was long before he found that a correspondent passion was kindled in her breast. The moment she first saw him, her heart palpitated, her face was covered with crimson, she turned her eyes & attempted to speak, her tongue stopped in motion in the middle of a period. She halted, sat down observed that she was not well. A description of this scene painted by a Sciotan bard in poetic numbers. He represents the young Lady as recovering in a short time from this state of agitation & confusion, & as being afterwards composed & having a better command of her passions. To follow the poet in the description which he gives of Elseon, whom he attaches a countenance & figure superior to her mortals, & qualities which produced the universal esteem & admiration. would not comport with the faithful age of history. Suffice it to say that Lamesa was captivated with his person, & was impressed with those ideas & sentiments that her happiness fled except when she either enjoyed or anticipated his company. After Elsieon had firmly determined to marry Lamesa, he was impatient for private interview with her to disclose his sentiments. This occurred in a short time. They were together in one of the apartments of the Emperors palace, the company had retired. I have, said he in a low voice to Lamesa, conceived that opinion of you that I hope you will not be displeased if I express my feelings with frankness & sincerity. You must, she replied, be the best judge of what it is proper for you to express. I am always pleased with sincerity. As the sun, says he, my dear Lamesa, when he rises with his radiant beams, dispels the darkness of night, so it is in our power to dispel the clouds of anxiety that rest upon your soul. The Crown of Kentuck will be like a Rock on your head, unless you will condescend to share with me the glory & felicity of my reign. Will you consent to be my dearest friend & companion for life? There is nothing, she replies, would give me more pleasure than a compliance with your request, provided it shall meet the approbation of my Father. But how can he consent, when our Constitution requires that his daughters should marry in own dominions? Beside, my father intends that I shall receive the King of Sciota for my husband. By performing, says he, the ceremonies of marriage at Talanga, shall literally comply with the imperial constitution, as Talanga is within the dominions of your Father. But as the King of Sciota, do you sincerely wish to have him a husband? No, she quickly replies, speaks anger sparkling in her eyes. No, the King of Sciota for my husband. His pride, his haughtiness, the pomposity of all his movements excite my perfect disgust. I should as leave be yoked to a porcupine. Several

These Lovers, as you may well conjecture, said nothing too tender & endearing to please the taste of the common Class of Lovers. In this interview which lasted about four hours, they exchanged the most transporting expression of love, made the most solemn protests of sincerity & perpetual friendship & finally agreed that El should make known to the Emperor their mutual desire to be joined in wedlock. The next day he wrote to the Emperor as follows.

May it please your most excellent Majesty. Permit me to express my most sincere gratitude for the high favour & honour, which thro' the beneficence of your Majesty I have enjoyed in your dominions. I am likewise impelled to request a favour, which to me would be the most precious gift, that is in the power of your Majesty to bestow. Having contracted an acquaintance with your most amiable daughter Lamesa, & finding that a correspondent affection & esteem exist in our hearts toward each other & a mutual desire to be united by the solemn covenant of marriage.

would therefore solicit your Majesty's permission that such connection may be formed.

Such a connection I conceive, may in its effect be very salutary & beneficial to both Empires. It will unite the two imperial families in a nearer in the bond of consanguinity, & fix upon them an additional obligation to cultivate friendship, peace & an amiable intercourse. It will strengthen the sinues of both governments & promote & promote a happy interchange of friendly offices. As to the objection that might arise from the constitution requiring, that the Emperors daughters should marry in his own dominions, this according to its literal meaning can have respect only to the place where the Emperors daughter shall marry. If by your Majestys permission, I should marry your daughter Lamesa in your dominions it will be a literal fulfilment of the constitution. From this ground therefore, I conceive that no objection of any weight can arise. Will your majesty please to vouchsafe me an answer to my request.

Signed. ELSEON. PRINCE OF KENTUCK.

This letter was presented to the Emperor by Helicon, intimate friend of Elseon. The Emperor read it assumed the aspect of deep consideration, walked the room a few moments, then took a seat & told Helicon that he might inform the young prince that he should receive an answer in ten days.

But why this few Ten days, a long time for two ardent lovers to remain in suspense. But the Emperor must consult his counsellors, his priests & the last & most fatal counsellor of all the King of Sciota, who presumed to claim the hand of the fair Lamesa. The affair became public. The popular sentiment at first favoured the connection.

The Emperors counsellors & his priests were at first inclined to recommend an affirmative answer. But the interest of the Sciotan King soon prevailed. This produced a different view of the subject The Counsellors perceived that such a connection would be a most flagrant violation of the true meaning & spirit of the constitution, & they considered that it would be an act of the greatest impiety as it transgressed an explicit injunction of the great founder of their government & religion. This opinion had great weight on the minds of a great majority of the people. The more liberal sort vindicated the cause of Elseon. This produced a great debate altercation & confusion throughout the City. All were anxious to know the Emperors decision.

On the tenth day the Emperor transmitted to the prince the following answer to his letter.

To our best beloved Cousen Elseon Prince of Kent
The letter we received from your highness has impressed our hearts with a deep sense of the honor & benefit, which you intended for your family & Empire. At first we were inclined to accept of the alliance you proposed. But having examined & considered the subject with great seriousness and attention, we find that to admit your Highness who is not a citizen of our Empire to marry into our family, would be a most flagrant violation of the true meaning & spirit of our constitution. & an impious outrage on the sacred memory of its Founder For these reasons we must solicit your Highness not to insist on our compliance with your request.

Signed. HAMBOCK, EMPEROR OF SCIO

As Elseon had been informed of the complexion which his affairs had assumed in the court, & throughout the City, he prepared for the answer which he received.

Without manifesting the least chagrin or Resentment

He appeared to acquiesce in the decision of the Emperor. He displayed his in his countenance, his conversation & deportment, his usual cheerfulness & vivacity. He continued his amusements & associated with company with the same ease, gracefulness & dignified conduct which he had done before. At the same time, his determination was fixed to transport the fair Lamesa into his fathers dominions. The first interview which he had with her after he received the Emperors letter, he informed her of its contents. She trembled, paleness began to cover her face, & had not Elsean received her into his arms, perhaps she would have fallen from her seat. However, by a few soothing words and caresses, she was restored to her former composure & recollection. Believe me, quoth he, my Dearest Lamesa, you shall be mine. This heart shall be torn from my bosom, & these limbs from my body, nothing else shall prevent our union & compleat enjoyment of happiness. Can the ancient scribbling of a great sage or the degree of an Emperor prevent the streams from uniting with the ocean? With the same ease & propriety can they prevent the union of our hands, since our hearts are united. With your consent, you shall be mine. Is it possible, she replies, is it possible to disregard the authority of an indulgent & beloved parent & disobey his command. This I never did. What if he should command you, says Elsean, to marry the King of Siciota? would you obey? He might, she replies, with more regard to my happiness, command me to plunge a dagger into my heart. I cannot endure that supercilious bundle of pride & affectation.

At this moment her maid entered the room, & gave her letter. I received this letter, she says, from your Brother, who told me it was from the Emperor. She opened it and read.

My Dearest & best beloved Daughter.

Having the most tender & affectionate regard for your future welfare & felicity, we have concluded a treaty of marriage between you & Lambul the King of Sciota. This alliance will be honourable to our family & be productive of many benefits to the Empire. On the tenth day from this time the nuptial ceremonies will be celebrated, consummated in our Palace. You will be in readiness & yield a cheerful compliance with our will.

Signed. BAMBOK. EM'R OF SCIOTA

Had the lightning flashed from the clouds & pierced her heart, it could not have produced a more instantaneous effect. She fell into the arms of Elseon, the maid ran for joy & cordial. Elseon rubbed her temples & hands & loosened her girdle about her waist. Within about an hour her blood began to circulate. Elseon to his inexpressible joy felt his pulse begin to beat, & perceived flashes of colour in his face. With a plaintive groan, she once more opened her eyes to the beams of day, & in a kind of wild distraction exclaimed, Ah cruel, cruel Father, why have you doomed your daughter to a situation the most odious & disgusting. As well might you have thrown her into a den of porcupines, opossums & serpents. With such animals I could enjoy life with less disgust & torment, than with this mighty King of Sciota, and An alliance with him an honour to my family, an honour to the descendants of the great Lobas. What wicked counsellors have deceived my Father, & induced him to throw me into the arms of this hateful monster? Ah, whither shall I fly & escape my barbarous destiny. I am your protector, says Elseon. I am your friend.

& will conduct you beyond the loving & gigantic grasp of Sambol. His loathsome arms shall never encircle my dear Lamesa. Consent to my request & we will be within ten days at the City of Gamba. There you will be esteemed as the brightest Orniment of my Fathers Empire. No longer Oh Elseon, she exclaimed, can I refuse my consent to your proposal. When a compliance with my fathers commands will entail wretchedness & misery thro' life. Heaven will pardon my disobedience. Yes, Elseo, I will go with you, & place my happiness in your power. rather than fall into the hands of this haughty Sambul.

What could she say more to excite the feelings of a heart struggling under the operation of different passions & opposite motives. She has taken her resolution, love has gained the preeminence over every obstacle

At this resolution, Elseon was transported with joy. He now proceeded to form his plans for their flight. On the fourth day after, he called upon the Emperor & requested his permission to depart to his own Country. The Emperor importuned him to tarry & be one of the guests at Lamesas wedding. But he declined by urging as his apology the anxiety & impatience of his father for his return. Permission was granted, & the Emperor aded that he should do himself the honour to furnish the prince with an escort when he left the city. Elseon replied that as he was not fond of much parade, he would wish that the escort might not consist of the Emperors soldiers, only his friend & his daughter & with with each of them a friend. These says he, are my dearest & best beloved cousens, for whom I shall ever retain the most sincere friendship. Nothing can afford me more pleasure, says the Emperor, than comply with your request.

Elseon took an affectionate leave of the Emperor & on the second day after, being prepared for his journey he set off with his three friends & their servants. Moonro prince of the Empire, & Lamesa with her two sisters, with each of them a friend, attended them on his journey about twenty miles. They all tarried at a village over night.

Imagination alone can paint the pleasant & happy scene. Elseon was transported with joy. He prest her to his bosom with all the ardor of enthusiasm, & she yielded to all his tender & innocent embraces with a grateful sensibility & modest resignation.

The invention & ingenuity of Elseon must now be employed in forming a plan for their flight to his Father's dominions. As he appeared to acquiesce in the decision of the Emperor, & had maintained the same cheerful deportment, none were suspicious of his design. The Emperor & the whole court still manifested toward him every token of high respect & sincere friendship. Without any hesitation the Emperor complied with his request that his dear cousins, the son & the three daughters of the Emperor, with each of them a friend, should accompany him about twenty miles on his return to Kentuck. The retinue of the young Prince consisted of four of his most intimate friends & their servants. He took care to send their baggage on by two servants one day before they set out. The morning arrived the sun shone with radiant splendor, not a cloud intervened or was seen to float in the atmosphere. It was the fourth day after Lamesa had received the letters which doomed her to embraces of Sambul. The Emperor, his Counselors, his Priests & principal officers assembled, & having invited the young prince & his friends to meet them, they entered the circle with great ceremony. The Emperor then addressed the Young Prince, thanked him for the honour of his visit & expressed his firm determination, to maintain a sincere friendship & an inviolable peace with the government of Kentuck. Elseon replied that the whole sentiments would meet the cordial approbation of his Father, who retained the same sentiments of friendship & peace toward the government of Sciota. He than thanked the Emperor & the whole assembly for the high respect they had shown him. This was done with that frankness & apparent sincerity that the whole assembly were highly pleased. The Emperor then embraced him & gave him his blessing. Customary ceremonies were mutually exchanged by the whole company, & even tears were seen to drop from every eye.

As the whole of this parade indicates no flight of Elseon & Lamesa, we must now view them with their select company of friends setting out on a short journey. All mounted on horses, they rode about twenty miles to a village where they halted. An elegant supper was provided, they were chearful & sociable, none appeared more so, that Elseon & Lamesa. The next day Elsean requested the company of his dear cousens a short distance on his journey. When they had rode about two miles they halted & proposed to take their leave of each other Lamesa & her friend, without being perceived by the company rode on. It was a place where the road turned, & by riding one rod, they could not be seen. The rest of the company entered into a short conversation & passed invitations for reciprocal visets & friendly offices. They then clasped each others hands & bowing very low, took an affectionate farewell. But where are Lamesa & her friend? During these ceremonies their horses move with uncommon swiftness, her heart palpitates with an apprehension that she might be overtaken by her brother. But now a friend more dear, her beloved Elseon with his companions, outstrip the wind in their speed. & within one hour & a half they overtake these fearful Damselfs. They all precipitate their course, casting their eyes back every moment to no purpose. her pursuers. But pursuers had not sufficient time to overtake them. They safely arrive on the Bank of the Great River. Elseon & Lamesa were the first that entered the boat, the rest follow. & such was Elseons engagedness & anxiety to secure his fair prize, that he even seized an oar and used it with great strength & dexterity. As their feet stepped on the opposite shore, Elseon claspt his hands & spoke aloud, Lamesa is mine. She is now beyond the grasp of a pompous tyrant, & the control of a father whose mind is blinded by the sordid advice of a menial junto of counsellors & priests. She is mine & shall soon be the Princess of Kentuck. Their movement is now slow thro' the remaining part of their journey. They at length arrive at the great City of Gamba. We may now contemplate them as having new scenes to pass thro' Not to delineate the parade which was made at the court of Hamboon, for the reception of his son, Lamesa, & their friends, or to describe the joy that was exhibited in every part of the city on their arrival, & the universal surprize occasioned by the story of the flight of these two Lovers. Suffice it to say, that those who beheld Lamesa did not blame Elseon.

As Hamboon was not very punctilious in his regard for the constitution, being possessed of very liberal sentiments, Elseon found no difficulty in obtaining his consent to marry Lamesa. On the fourth day after their arrival, Elseon & Lamesa, with each of them a friend appeared on a stage, which was erected on the public square of the City. The Emperor & Empress with his counsellors, his Priests & officers, & all his relations, with the principal Ladies of the City, formed a procession & surrounded the stage. The common Citizens being a great multitude, took their stands as they pleased. The Emperor & Empress then mounted the stage, & united Elseon & Lamesa in the bond of wedlock according to custom. & as pulling the Log was an indispensable ceremony one was provided with a rope around Elseon on the stage. The Bridegroom & Bride played their parts in pulling the rope with such dexterity & gracefulness, that the whole assembly was most pleasingly entertained. When all was ended, the whole assembly clapped their hands & cried, Long live Elseon & Lamesa. & giving three huzzas, the common citizens dispersed. The rest retired to a sumptuous entertainment, & spent the remaining part of the day & evening in conversation, singing & recreation.

CHAP XII.

The reader will recollect that Elseon & his friends left Moonrod & his friends in a very pleasant mood without the least suspicion, that Lamesa & her friend had deserted them. When they had arrived at the vilage, what was their surprize when they found that Lamesa & her friend were not in the company, nor had any one any recollection of her going in company, after they had stopped to take their leave of Elseon. Moonrod & the other gentlemen immediately rode back with the greatest speed to the place where they had halted, & not finding any traces of her Lamesa, the conclusion was then certain that she had preferred the company of the young Prince & was on her way to Kentucky.

Pursuit would be in vain. Their only alternative was to hasten back to carry the doleful intelligence to the Emperor. Their speed was nearly equal to that of Elseon. Without waiting to perform the customary ceremony of entering the palace, Moonrod immediately rushed into the Emperors presence, & exclaimed, your daughter Lamesa has been seduced by Elseon to leave our company unperceived, & has gone with him to Kentucky. Nothing but the pencil of the Limner, could paint the Astonishment of the Emperor. He rose, stood motionless for a moment, then staring fiercely on Moonrod he spoke. Is it possible, is it possible, are you not mistaken my Son. I am not, says my most excellent Father. I am not mistaken. This morning we attended Elseon a small distance from the village where we lodged. When we had halted to take our leave & our attention was all engaged she and her friend she and her friend rode off unperceived by any of our company. We did not miss her until we arrived again at the village. We have made full search & enquiry, & find that she has absolutely gone with the young prince to Kentucky. What an ingrate says the Emperor, what a monster of hypocrisy is the honourable attention we have shown him demands such treatment? How has he insulted the dignity of our family & outraged the high authority of our government. This affair will demand the most serious consideration. O mesa, Lamesa, my darling my best beloved child, was it possible for you to be so deceived by that artful prince, was it possible for you to disobey the command of your indulgent father? as they stept on the covering top of the canal, the thin pieces of timber broke & they all plunged in & found themselves in an instant at the bottom of the canal. Surprised & terrified & they soon found themselves in no situation to vindicate their exclusive right to wear blue feathers in their caps. They were compleatly in the power of their enemies who returned quick upon them They demanded quarter & surrendered themselves prisoners of war. And giving up their arms, their demand was granted. In the meantime a party of Sciotans who lay in ambush, on the side of the Hill rushed down upon the reserved corps of the Kentucks, who being filled with consternation at the fireful disaster of their companions, surrendered themselves prisoners of war without a struggle. Thus in a few moments, by pursuing the stratagem or plan of Lobaska, An army of thirty thousand men were captured, & the pride & naughtiness of a mighty Prince was humbled. Not a drop of blood was shed to accomplish the whole.

& bring upon our family such wretchedness & dishonour. Fame with her Her Thousand tongues commenced her pleasing employment, & as swift as the wings of Time she wafted the intelligence thro' the City with many distorted & exaggerated particulars. All was astonishment confusion & uproar. Resentment enkindled her indignant sparks into a flame & the general cry was revenge & war. The Sciotan King was walking in his parlour, feeding his imagination with the pleasing prospect of his future glory & felicity. I am, quoth he to himself, honoured above all the other princes of the Empire, & even above the heir apparent to the imperial crown of Kentuck. Who could be admitted except myself to marry this fair Lamesa, the eldest daughter of the Emperor, the most amiable the most accomplished & the most honorable Lady in the universe. This is a distinction which will place me on equal ground with the Emperor himself, & command from all my subjects the homage of their highest respect and reverence. Besides I have a soul that can relish the charms of the beautiful maid. She will adore me as her Lord & think herself highly honoured & exceeding happy to submit to my most endearing & affectionate embraces. But ah, mighty Sambul, you little tho't how soon this delightful prospect would be reversed, & that your soul would be filled with chagrin indignation & revenge. A messenger burst into his parlour & announced the astonishing tidings of Lamesa's elopement. She has absolutely gone, says he, to become the wife of Elseon, & the empress of Kentuck. Not the wondrous & instantaneous roar of ten Thousand thunder instantaneously thro' the atmosphere, could have produced greater surprise. His countenance was all amazement was for a moment covered with paleness, his lips quivered, his knees smote together & his gigantic body trembled like the shaking of a tower under the effects of an earthquake. But soon after a little silent his reflections & cogitation caused the blood to return with a ten-fold velocity into his face. it assumed the colour of redness & clinching He assumed the attitude of terrific majesty & poured forth his feelings in a voice more terrible than the roaring of a volcano. How have I been abused, dishonoured, insulted traged. How have my prospects of glory been instantaneously blasted & my character, my character become the ridicule of a laughing world. What felicities of enjoying the imperial maid in my arms, adoring me for her husband are now vanished. & by whom am I thus disgraced insulted & injured? By the mock prince of Kentuck, an effeminate stripling, a cringing & plausible Upstart. He has robbed me of the fairest ornament of my kingdom, she Lamesa, who was mine by solemn contract, & must he now revel in her charms which are mine, & pride himself in those deceitful arts by which he has seduced her, & stolen her from my enjoyment? No, ungrateful & insidious monster, your triumph shall be of short duration, & this arm shall visit your crimes upon your head with a ten-fold vengeance. Having poured forth a torrent of the most dreadful imprecations & menaces, he left his parlour & walked forth to consult his principal officers on the best plan to obtain revenge.

In the meantime the Emperor, less haughty & indignant, & possessed of sentiments more humane & benelent, sent an invitation to his Counsellors to attend him. They were unanimous in the opinion that the offense of Elseon required reparation. But should war be the consequence, should he refused to return Lamesa? On this question, two of the counsellors contended that an humble recantation would repair the injury done to the honour of the imperial family, & the authority of the government. The other two insisted that they should demand in addition that would not be sufficient But that they should demand in addition ten Mamouth which would be an adequate compensation, but they depreciated the horrors of war. In the midst of their debates which were managed with great coolness & impartiality, Sambul presented himself. I have come forward, says he, may it please your most excellent majesty, to demand the fulfilment of that solemn contract, which was made to deliver me your eldest daughter in marriage. She has been surreptitiously carried off by the young prince of Kentuck. She is mine by contract & your majesty is bound to deliver her to me. I demand Let her be immediately demanded, & if the Emperor the father of the young prince shall refuse to return her, this will implicate him in the same crime & be a sufficient cause of war. In that case war will be indispensable to vindicate the honour of the respective crowns, & the rights of the Empire. I should then give my voice for war, & would then never sheath my sword until the torrents of blood had made expiation for the ingratitude baseness & perfidy of the young Prince. An humble recantation or the delivery of ten mammoths would this be a sufficient reparation for such an offense flagitious? No, the very proposal would be an insult to the dignity of our government. Can anything short of the repossession of the fair object stolen, of the invaluable property feloniously taken from us, be an adequate compensation? Nothing short of this can heal our bleeding honour. Allay the indignation of our subjects, & reinstate friends & an amicable intercourse between both Empires. Let it be your demand that Lamesa shall be returned. Let a refusal be followed by an immediate declaration of war, & the resources & energies of the nation be called forth. Assemble your armies & pour destruction upon all who shall oppose the execution of our revenge. I myself will lead the van & mingle my arm with those who fight the most bloody battles. Heroes shall fall before us, their tombs

all be laid in ruins, & carnage shall glut our indignant ords.

When further deliberation had taken place, the Emperor & two of his counsellors adopted the advice of Sambul to demand Lamesa & an envoy was immediately dispatched to the Emperor of Kentuck with the following letter.

May it please your most gracious majesty. Nothing could have given us more pleasure than the disposition you manifested in sending Elseon, the heir apparent to your crown to visit our family. We treated him as our dearest person & as our most intimate friend. He was invited to associate with our children, & to consider himself whilst he resided as a member of our family. Such being the confidence we placed in his rectitude & honour, that he assumed the liberty to contract the most intimate acquaintance with Lamesa, our eldest daughter. This produced an agreement between them, that with our consent they would be united in marriage. Nothing could have been more pleasing than such a connection. But we found that it would be a mostagrant violation of the true meaning & spirit of our constitution, & an impious outrage on the memory of its great founder. For these reasons, we signified our pleasure that Elseon would not insist on our compliance with his request. He appeared to acquiesce in our decision. & we afterwards contracted with Sambul, King of Sciota to give her in marriage to him.

But the after conduct of your son, may it please your most gracious majesty, did not correspond with the high confidence we placed in him. With deep regret & the most painful sensations we are compelled to declare that he has committed a crime which has disturbed our peace & happiness, dishonoured our family & outraged the authority of our government, & the rights of our Empire. He formed a plan to transport Lamesa into your dominions. To accomplish this, he made use of the most insidious arts. He took advantage of our clemency & indiscretion, & of the high respect we manifested toward him, & without our consent & contrary to our will, he has succeeded in transporting to the City of Gamba. in his perfidious design. Lamesa is doubtless with you in the City of Gamba. A crime which of such malignity, committed against the honour & interest & dignity of our family government & Empire demands reparation. Your majesty will perceive that the only adequate reparation which can be made, will be the return of Lamesa to our dominions. We therefore demand that she be conveyed back with all possible expedition.

No other alternative can prevent the interruption of that confidence friendship & peace, which have long continued between both Empires, & save them from the horrors & calamities of war.

Signed. RAMBOCK, EMPEROR OF SCIOTIA.

When Hamboon had received this letter, he immediately invited his counsellors to attend him, & laid it before them, & as it was a subject of vast importance to the Empire, he likewise invited his priests & principal officers to join them in council. The various passions appeared to operate in the course of their consultation. To avoid Hostilities, with all its attendant calamities, was what they most ardently desired, & some contended that if no other alternative could be agreed upon, it would be for the interest of the Empire & the best policy to return the princess. Others reprobated this measure as pusilanimous, & cowardly.

& advised if no other reparation would be received, to retain the princess & maintain the conflict with a manly & heroic firmness. What, say they, do not honour & justice require that we should defend the rights of the imperial family? If the Sciotan government should demand that we should send them our Emperor or Empress, would not honour impel us to spurn at the demand, & reject it with indignation? Their present demand is as preposterous & as insulting. No satisfaction will they receive for the supposed injury, except that we should seize the Princess of the Empire, tear her from the bosom of her consort & transport her to Scio-a. Are we capable of an act so unjust & inhuman, so base & disgraceful? As the debate was proceeding Elseon rose. May I say he—claim your attention a moment. Undaunted by the cruel demand & haughty menace of the Sciotan government, I am willing to abide your decision. If transporting Lamesa into our dominions when she had been most unjustly & inhumanly denied me for a companion, is a crime so perfidious & flagitious as of such magnitude, then afflict a punishment that shall be adequate to the offense. But if the Almighty, whose benevolence is infinite, has designed the union of hands where hearts are united, I have then transgressed no divine law, but have obeyed the divine will. I am therefore innocent of any crime. I have an undoubted right to retain Lamesa for my wife, & no government on earth have any authority from heaven to tear her from my bosom. Nor will I submit to such an event, so long as the life blood circulates thro' my heart & warms my limbs. If war must be the consequence of my proceedings, which transgressed no principle of honour justice or humanity, were both innocent & honourable, it will give me the most painful feelings. I shall deplore its calamities, but will never shrink like a Dastard from the conflict. The Sciotan King, who is at the bottom of all the mischief shall never behold me fleeing before his gigantic sword, or skulking to avoid a single combat with him. You have therefore no other alternative but either first to slay your prince, & then like cowards to send back your princess to Sciota, or else to make immediate preparations to meet the threatened vengeance, with fortitude & courage.

This speech of the young prince united the whole council. & they unanimously agreed to reject the demand of the Sciotan government. A letter was written & an Envoy dispatched, with instructions to attempt a reconciliation. He precipitated his journey to the court of Rambock, when he arrived, he delivered him the following letter.

May it please your most excellent Majesty. Next to the welfare & prosperity of our Empire, we should rejoice in the welfare & prosperity of yours. It is therefore with extreme regret that we view the unhappy difference, which has arisen & which threatens to involve the two Empires in the calamities of war.

Had you demanded a reparation for the supposed injury which which would consist with the principles of justice & the honour of our crown & government, it should have been given you with the utmost cheerfulness. But to return your Lamesa, who has now become the princess of Kentucky, would be tearing her from the arms of an affectionate husband & breaking the bond of solemn wedlock. As the compliance with your demand, will subject us to the commission of such an injustice & cruelty, it must therefore be our duty to declare that we will not return the young princess. & as such an event would destroy her happiness as well as that of her affectionate consort, we shall permit her to tarry in our dominions & grant her protection. We are however desirous that an honourable reconciliation may take place, & a good understanding be restored. To effect this most important & very desirable object, we have given full authority to Labanko our beloved brother, the bearer of this Letter, to negotiate a settlement of our difference. provided you will receive anything as a substitute for what the object yo have demanded.

Signed. HAMBOON, EMPEROR OF KENTUCK.

The mind of Rambock was not formed for the perpetual exercise of resentment, & malice, & having conversed a considerable time with Labanco, who apologized for the conduct of the young prince with great ingenuity his anger abated & he felt a disposition for the negotiation of friendship. But the indignation & malice of Sambul encreased with time, his dark soul thirsted more ardently for revenge, & nothing would satisfy but blood & carnage, He employed instruments to assist in fanning the spark of resentment, & blowing them into the flames of war. Not content to represent facts as they existed, & in their true colours, monstrous stories were fabricated & put in circulation, calculated to excite prejudice & rouse the resentment of the people against Elseon, & the whole Empire of Kentuck. He had recourse to a class of men who were denominated prophets & conjurors to favour his designs. They had for many ages a commanding influence on the minds of a great majority of the people. As they pretended to understand, have art of investigating the councils & designs of the heavenly Hierarchy, & to have a knowledge of future events, the people listened with pleasure to their representations. predictions & tho't it impious to question or doubt their fulfilment A small company of these necromanceers or juglers assembled on the great square of the City, & mounted a stage which was provided for them. The citizens attended. It was a prodigious concourse of all classes of citizens. The of all descriptions both wise & simple, both male & female. They surrounded the stage & were all at attention. All anxious to learn the decrees of heaven, & the future destinies of the Empire. Drofalick, their chief prophet, extended his arms & cast up his eyes to-Heaven. Quoth he, Heaven unfolds her massy gates, & opens to my view a prospect wide & vast. The seven sons of the great Spirit seize their glittering swords, & swear that they shall not be sheathed till blood in torrents run & deluge the fair land of Kentuck. I behold armies martialing on the celestial plain & hear warriors & heroes cry, Avenge the crime of Elseon. I hear a thundering voice proceeding from the great throne of him who rules the world, proclaiming thus, Corn shall not grow in the Sciotan fields, nor mammoth yield their milk, nor fish be taken in the snare but pestilence shall roam, unless Sciota shall avenge the crime of Elseon. Drofalick ended his prophesy. Hamack then arose & in his hand he held a stone which he pronounced transparent. Thro' this he could view things present & things to come. He could behold the dark intrigues & cabals of foreign courts, & behold discover hidden treasures, secluded from the eyes of other mortals. He could behold the galant & his mistress in their bedchamber, & count all their moles warts & pimples. Such was the clearness of his sight, when this transparent stone was placed before his eyes. He looked firmly & steadfastly on the stone & raised his prophetic voice. I behold Hamboon with all his priests & great officers assembled around him. With what contempt he declares he despises all the Sciotans. They are, says he, cowards & poltroons. They dare not face my brave warriors. Here I see four men coming forward bearing an image, formed with all the fetures of ugliness & deformity. This they called Sambul the King of Sciota, the whole company break forth into boisterous Laughing. Ah, see & they are cutting off his head with their swords. Yes, & are now kicking it about the palace. Here is a pole. it is stuck up on that & carried thro' the City. Oh my loving sparks, Elseon & Lamesa, what makes you so merry? Why Elseon says he has outwitted the Sciotans, he has got the prize & he little regards their resentment. Hamack was proceeding with such nonsensical visions, when the whole multitude interrupted him with a cry, Revenge, Revenge, We will convince the Kentuckans that we are not cowards or poltroons. Their heads shall pay for their sport in kicking about the pretended head the head of our pretended beloved King We will avenge the crime of Elseon. The great & good Being is on our side & threatens us with famine & pestilence, unless we avenge the crime of Elseon.

The arts of the Conjurers were the consummation of Sambul's plan to produce in the minds of the multitude an enthusiasm & rage for war. He now repairs to the Emperor & solicits him to assemble his counsellors immediately, proclaim war & concert measures for its prosecution. The Emperor replies that they should soon be assembled, but as to war, it was a subject which required great consideration.

Early on the next day his counsellors-priests & principal officers met him in the council room. He laid before them the Letter of Hamboon, & added observed that tho' the government of Kentuck had refused to return Lamesa, that they had offered to make to our government a recantation, for Elseon's crime, & to pay us almost any sum as reparation for our injury. The council sat silent for some time. At length the venerable Boakim arose.

I must beg, says he, the indulgence of your majesty, & this honourable council for a few moments. Never did I rise with such impressions of the high importance of our deliberations, as what I now feel. The great question to be decided, is peace or war. If peace can be preserved with honour, then let us maintain peace, but if not, let us meet war with fortitude & courage.

As to the great Crime of Elseon, no one presumes to present an apology. Even their own government acknowledges that he has been guilty of a great Crime. But is it of such malignity as to require the conflagration of towns, & cities & the lives of millions to make an expiation? Can no other reparation consistent with justice & humanity be received Or must we compel in order to have an atonement made for the crime of Elseon compel the government of Kentucky to commit another crime to separate, to tear from each others embrace the husband & wife? Such a reparation as this, we cannot in justice expect. Shall we then accept of no other? Cannot our bleeding honour be healed without shedding blood without laying a whole Empire in ruins? Such refined notions of honour may prove our own ruin, as well as the ruin of those on whom we attempt to execute our vengeance. The calamities of war have a reciprocal action on the parties. Each must expect to endure a portion of evils. how large a portion would fall to our share in case of war, it is not for us to determine. While thirsting for revenge, we contemplate with infinite pleasure, their armies routed, & their warriors bleeding under our swords the women helpless & children expiring by thousands, & the country in flames. But reverse the scene. Suppose the enemy have as much wit, as much stratagem, courage, strength & inhumanity as what we you possess, & such may be your situation. When the floodgate is once opened, who can stop the torrent, & prevent devastation & ruin. We ought therefore It was never designed by the great & good Being that his children should contend, & destroy that existence which he gave them. they all have equal rights & ought to strive to maintain peace & friendship. This has been the maxim of our fathers & this the doctrine taught by the great Founder of our government & religion. Under the influence of this maxim, our nation has grown to an immense multitude, & contentment & happiness have been universal. But why can we not enjoy peace with honour? What insurmountable obstacles are there to prevent? Why cruelly a recantation &—(word illegible)—are no compensation for the injury? For other offenses these are accepted, & why must the offense of Elseon be singular?

The Emperors daughter we presume is happy, nor can it be a disgrace to the imperial family that she has married the son of an emperor, the heir apparent to his crown. But she was to have been the wife of Sambul, the King of Sciota We can therefore with honour to our government accept of the reparation offered. & thus preserve the blessings of peace. But if we suffer resentment, pride & ambition to plunge us into a war, where will its mischiefs, where will its miseries end? As to both empires are nearly equal as to numbers & resources, I will venture to predict their eventual overthrow & destruction.

Boakim would have proceeded, but Hamkol rose & interrupted. It was impudence in the extreme, but he had much brass & strong lungs, & could be heard further than Boakim

"Such sentiments, says he, may comport with the infirmities of age, but they are too degrading & cowardly for the vigor of youth & manhood. If we suffer insult, perfidy & outrage to pass off with impunity, we may afterwards bend our necks to be trodden upon by every puny upstart, & finical coxcomb. No. Let us march with our brave warriors into the dominion of Hamboon. This effeminate & luxurious Court will tremble at our presence & yield the fair Lamesa unto our possession. But if they should still have the temerity to refuse, we will then display our valour by inflicting upon them a punishment which their crimes deserve. Yes, our valiant heroes shall gain immortal renown by their heroic exploits. & by the destruction of all shall who Sciota will ever after have the pre-eminence over Kentuck, & compel her haughty sons to bow in our presence. Let war be proclaimed. & every kingdom & tribe from the River to the Lakes will pour forth their warriors. anxious to avenge our countrys wrongs. Scarce had he done speaking. And Lakoonrod, the High Priest arose. He was in the interest of Sambul & had married his sister. He had taken great umbrage at Elseon, for saying that the priesthood had too great an assendency at the court of Hambock. And lifting up his sanctimoneous eyes slowly toward heaven, & extending his right reverend hand a little above an horizontal position he spoke.

When the laws which are contained in our holy religion are transgressed, it is my duty as High Priest of the Empire to give my testimony against the transgression. Elseon, the heir apparent to the imperial throne of Kentuck has been guilty of Robbery & impiety within our dominions. He has robbed this Empire of an invaluable treasure, & as his crime is most flagitious transgression of our divine law it must have been committed in defiance of the high authority of heaven, therefore it is an act of the greatest impiety. The injury the insult & the outrage has not been committed against us alone, if this was the case, perhaps we might accept of reparation; but it is committed against the throne of Omnipotence & in defiance of his authority. No reparation can of consequence be received, except it be a return of the stolen treasure, or the Blood of the Transgressor. Nothing else can satisfy the righteous demand of the Great & Good Being. He therefore calls upon the civil power to execute his vengeance, to inflict an exampleary punishment. And as it is his cause & you are employed as his instruments, you may be assured that his almighty arm will add strength to your exertions, & give you a glorious victory over your enemies. The mighty achievements of your warriors shall immortalize their names, & their heads shall be crowned with never fading laurels. & as for those who shall die, gloriously fighting in the cause of their country & their God, they shall immediately receive ethereal bodies, & shall arise quickly to the abodes of increasing delight & glory.

He said no more. He had discharged some part of his malice against Elseon, for saying that the priesthood had too much influence in the court of Rambock. The door now opened & it was seen that Sambul at the head of a great multitude of citizens, had taken their stand in front of the house, all crying with a loud voice, Revenge & war. Long live the Emperor & King. We will avenge their wrongs. This uproar & the harang of the high Priest de-terminated the wavering mind of the Emperor. But the venerable Boakim & Bilhawa opposed the torrent & stood as stood firm They boldly affirmed that a war was impolitic & unjustifiable But the Their opposition however, was in vain. The popular voice was against them & the other two counsellors Hamkal & Gammack gave their vote for war urged with great vehemence that war should be declared.

In vain were all the reasonings of the venerable Boakim & Bilhawan. The other two counsellors, Hamkol & Gamanko joining the Emperor, they proceeded to make out a declaration of war. It was in these words.

War is declared by the government & Empire of Sciota against the government & Empire of Kentuck. The Sciotans are required to exterminate with distinction of age or sex all the inhabitants of the Empire of Kentuck. They are required to burn their houses & either to destroy or take possession of their property. for their own use & benefit. This destruction is demanded by the great benevolent Spirit & the government of Sciota

Signed. RAMBOCK EMPEROR OF SCIOTA.

A copy of this declaration was given to Labanco the brother & Envoy of Hamboon. He demanded a guard to defend him against the rage of the common people, who discovered a disposition to plunge their swords into the heart of every man whose fortune it was to be born on the other side of the River. Labanco was guarded as far as the River & conveyed across in safety. He repaired to Gambal & there he proclaimed the intelligence of the declaration of War & there made known all the proceedings of the Sciotan government.

ambolan, King of Chiauga was the next proud chief who peared at Tolanga, with a chosen band of warriors. He d fifteen thousand who boasted of superior strength & ility. Their countanances were fierce & bold, being true indicators of their hearts which feared no danger. They ere always obedient to the orders of their king, who alays sought the most conspicuous place for the display of s valor. Possessed of gigantic strength & of astonishing ility, he was capable of performing the most brilliant hievements, which would almost exceed belief His mind as uncultivated by science & his passions were subject to restraint. His resentment was quick & fiery & his anger ew no bounds for expression Nothing was concealed in s heart, whether friendship or enmity, but always exhib-d by expressions by expressions strong & extravagant.
 e had a soul formed for war. In the bustle of the camigh in the sanguine field where heroes fell, beneath his nquering sword his ambition was gratified & he acquired e highest martial glory.

Ulipoon King of Michegan received the orders of the mperor twith with great joy War suited his niggardly & aricious soul, as he was in hopes to obtain great riches from the spoils of the enemy. Little did he regard the miseries & destruction of others, if by this means he could obtain wealth & aggrandize himself. A mind so contracted & selfish, was not capable of imbibing one sentiment of generosity or humanity or even of honour. None however were more boistrous than he for war. None proclaimed their own valour with so loud a voice. Yet none were more destitute of courage & more capable of treachery baseness & cruelty. Yet with the sounding epithets of patriotism, honour & valour he proceeded with great expedition to collect a chosen band. of dauntless warriors the consisted of Eighteen thousand warriors. Their martial appearance entitled them to a command of more generosity & valour than the niggardly & treacherous Ulipoo.

Nemapon, the King of Cataraugus made no war prompt to comply-with the imperial requisition. Tho' he preferred the scenes of peace & being very fond of study of the mechanical arts, his mind was replenished with knowledge & he took great pleasure in promoting works of ingenuity. He was famed for great wisdom & subtle penetration of mind. was capable of forming great plans & of prosecuting them with great vigour & perseverance. He was deliberate & circumspect in all his movements, but was always quick on any sudden emergency, to conceive plans & to determine. had the full command of his mental powers in every situation. & even when dangers surrounded him, could instantly determine the best measures to be pursued. He preferred the scenes of peace, but could meet war with courage & firmness. At the head of a select band of Seventeen thousand men, all compleatly armed & an s to meet the foe, he marched to join the grand Army. Not far behind appeared Ramack, the King of Gen-

o. With Furious & resolute, he had made the utmost bidition to collect his forces. Nor did he delay a moment en his men were collected & prepared to move. At the nd of ten Thousand bold & robust warriors, he appeared he place of general rendezvoz, within one day after the ng of Cataraugus had arrived. He bosted of the rapid-of his movements & tho he commanded the smallest ision of the grand army, yet he anticipated distinguished rels of glory, not less than what would be obtained by ar first commanders.

When these kings with their forces had all arived at anga, the Emperor Rambock ordered them to parade a great plain. They obeyed & and were formed in solid ums. The Emperor then attended by his son Moon-his Counsellors & the high Priest presented himself bee them. His garments glittered with ornaments, & a ch of long feathers of various colours were placed on front of his cap. His sword he held in his right hand eing tall & straight in his person, & having a counte-ce grave & bold, when he walked his appearance was estic. He was the commander in chief & such was the a esteem & reverence, with which the whole army ved him, that none were considered so worthy of that on. Taking a stand in front of the army he brandished sword. All fixed their eyes upon him & gave profound ation. He thus made an address.

Brave warriors. It is with the greatest satisfaction & that I now behold you assembled to revenge one o most flagitious Crimes of which man was ever guilty.

Ingratitude & perfedy, seduction & Robbery, & the most daring impeity against heaven have been perpetrated. -wi in our dominions. The young Prince of Kentuck is monster who has been guilty of these Crimes. Our most amiable daughter Lamesa he has seduced, & contrary to our will has transported her into his own country. Wishing to avoid the effusion of human blood, we offered to withhold our revenge, if the Emperor of Kentuck would restore our daughter. But he has refused. He has implicated himself & all his subjects in the horrid Crimes of treason. Their whole land is now guilty & every man woman & child are the proper objects of severe chastisement. The great & Good Being is indignant towards them, & views them with the utmost detestation & abhorrence As we have received our power from him he requires that we should not only avenge our own wrongs, but likewise execute vengeance on the perfidious ingrates & monsters of wickedness & impiety That this is his divine will has been clearly investigated by our holy prophets & priests, who have given us the most indubital positive assurance that success shall attend our arms. that we shall be enriched with the plunder of our enemies. that laurels of immortal fame will crown the achievements of our warriors, & that they shall be gloriously distinguished on the plains of Glory. like the suns & stars in the firmament of heaven. Our cause is justified the celestial powers above are on our side. they have brandished their swords & sworn that blood shall deluge the fair land of Kentuck. You have done well my Brave warriors that you have assembled around the standard of your Emperor. I will conduct you to the field of battle & direct your movements. My son Moonrod, whose arm like mine not enfeebled by age, will mingle with the boldest combatants & lead you on to victory. By the most valorous exploits by blood & slaughter, we will convince our enemies that we are not cowards & paltrons. Their ridicule & derision shall be turned into mourning & lamentation. & we will teach their effeminate & luxurious government not to despise the hardy & brave sons of Sciota.

In full confidence that we shall gloriously triumph & add immortal lustre to our names, we will now march forward we will & avenge the injuries done to the honour of our imperial government & the rights of our Empire & all celestial beings above shall rejoice in the execution of our fine vengeance.

He said no more. The whole army with one voice proclaimed Long live the Emperor. We swear that he will never find us Cowards & Poltrons. The Emperor then ordered them to march by divisions & each king to lead on his own subjects. They began their march toward the land of Kentuck. Their provisions & baggage were borne on the backs of mammoth. Each man had a sword on his side & a spear in his hand. & on their breasts down their hips & on their thighs they wore pieces of mammoth skin to guard them from arrows & the weapons of death. & on their Caps they wore bunches of long feathers. Their garments were short so as not to encumber them in Battle. Thus equipped & mounted, they moved on in exact order until they arrived at the great River. Here they halted to provide boats to transport them across. Their baggage & provision were borne on the backs of their mammoth, which carried prodigious loads

And here we will leave them for the present & take a view of the proceedings in Kentuck.

When Labanco had presented to Hamboon the Emperor of Kentuck the declaration of war & related the proceedings of the Sciotan government he immediately assembled his counsellors who unanimously agreed to make the most active & vigorous preparations for war. The Emperor sent forth his mandates to all the princes of his Empire requiring them to assemble the most courageous warriors in their respective kingdoms & to march to the City of Gamba. All the princes of the Empire were quick to obey the requisition of their Sovereign. The army assembled & paraded on a great plain before the City. Hamboon attended by his two sons Elseon & Hanock, & by his counsellors & three of his principal priests, walked out of the city & presented himself before his army.

His garments were of various colours & his Cap was adorned with a bunch of beautiful Feathers, which waved high in the wind. In his left hand he held a spear & in his right a sword. His countenance was bold & resonant, such was his gracefulness & eloquence, when he spoke that all eyes were fixed upon him. & all ears were attentive.

Brave warriors My brave sons says he, I extremely regretted the necessity of calling you from your peaceful employments to engage in the bloody scenes of war. I know such is the violence the malice & ambition of the Sciotan government that nothing will satisfy them but hostility between the Empires. They have proclaimed war even war of extermination against our dominions. Nor was it in our power to prevent this most dreadful calamity, unless we tore asunder the bond of wedlock between the prince and princess of the Empire. & transported her like a Culp into their dominions. This was the only alternative which they offered to accept, to prevent this terrible crisis.

Why the rigor of this demand? Was it because the young Prince had violated any law either human or divine? No; it was because the King of Sciota had fallen in love with the Princess, & wished to have her for his wife. But as he viewed him with the utmost hatred & disgust, he has been disappointed. To gratify his malice & revenge, he has roused the Sciotans to take arms, & threatens to deluge our lands with the blood of our citizens & to lay our country in ruins. It is a war on their part to gratify malice & revenge & nothing will satisfy their malignant passions but complete extermination. On our part it is a war of self defense of self preservation, a defence which will extend to our wives & our children, & to all the blessings & dearments of life. We must either submit to behold our nearest friends expiring in agonies our property torn from us & our houses in flames & our dearest friends expiring in agonies & even like cowards suffer them without resistance cut our own throats or we must meet them like men determined to vindicate our rights, & to retaliate all their intended mischiefs. Nor need we fear the event of the contest. Infinite benevolence will reward our situation. & grant us that assistance which will give success to our efforts. You, my brave sons will be inspired with courage, your hands will be strong for the Battle, & their warriors will fall before you like corn before the reapers sickle. With all their mighty boasting & high confidence in their superior cunning & prowess, they are men formed of the same materials which we possess. Our swords will find a passage to their hearts, & the vital blood gushing forth they will fall prostrate at our feet. Let us march then with courage to meet the implacable foe, determined either to die gloriously fighting or to obtain victory.

Having thus spoken, the whole army with a loud voice replied, Victory or death. Lead us on to victory. The head of this army which consisted of one hundred fifty thousand men, he marched toward the great River. They arrived at the bank & beheld the Sciotas all busily employed in making preparations to cross the River.

The Empress, the Princess Lamesa, & the Emperor's daughters attended by a few friends & their servants arrived at the place where the army was encamped. As soon as Elseon heard the news of their arrival, he hastened to the place & found the company had alighted at an hotel & that Lamesa & her friend Holika were in a room by themselves. As soon as he entered Lamesa arose. The gloom & anxiety which were for a number of days displayed visible in her countenance at his appearance were dispelled. He received her into his arms with an affectionate embrace, & expressed the greatest pleasure at seeing her once more. The tears ran down her cheeks, for a moment she was silent, she raised her head & replied. O Elseon were it not for you I should be the most wretched being in existence, & yet my love for you has been the cause of my present affliction. If I had never seen you, those horrid prospects which now present themselves to my view would never have been. But you are innocent, nor am I guilty of any crime. But how can I endure to behold the calamities which must fall upon both nations in consequence of our connection? Two empires at war, spreading carnage & ruin, warriors bleeding on the field of Battle, innocent women & children perishing in the agonies of death, towns & cities in flames. Ah horrid prospect. Have you & I my dear Elseon produced these dreadful calamities? our conduct the cause which must We are not says he, ar Lamesa responsible for for the horrid effects of malice revenge which may be occasioned by our innocent conduct. If men will be so indignant towards each other, because we do right as to massacre & do all the mischief they can, we may deplore their weakness & depravity, but have more reason, to make ourselves unhappy on that account than if these effects were produced by some other cause. They alone are responsible for their crimes & have reason for unhappy reflections.

But how can I endure, says she, to see my dearest friends become each others implacable enemy? To see them mutually engaged to destroy each others life? My Father for whom I ever had the greatest affection, & my only Brother are now at the head of one hostile army, & our father & you my dearest husband are at the head of the other. When these armies meet, should you not plunge your sword into the heart of my Father & my brother, & should they not do the same by you if in their power? When such scenes present themselves to my view, they pierce my soul like daggers. & produce the keenest anguish. That I could fly to my Father & on my bended knees implore forgiveness.

Yes, says Elseon, when you have done that, he will take you to the mighty Sambul for his wife.

No, never says she, never would I submit. I abhor the monster more than ever. He is the most malignant scoundrel in existence. To gratify his revenge whole Empires must be laid in ruins. What punishment more just than that he himself should fall in battle. & endure the torments which his vengeful soul is bringing on others? But for my Father & my Brother, they have by his artifice been deceived. I conjure you if you have any regard for my happiness, not to take their lives if in your power. Rather than that my hands should be stained with the blood of your dearest friends I will present my bosom to the swords. There lives, says he, are safe from my sword, but hark, there is an alarm. An express arrived & informed him that the Sciotan army had found means to get their boats down the River in the night unperceived, & had landed without opposition about three miles below them the Kentuckian encampment. Elseon then embraced his wife & said when your protection & my own honour call I must obey. He left her in tears imploring heaven to protect him, & running swiftly to the army he took his station.

CHAP. XIV

Hamboon mounted on an elegant horse richly caparisoned, rode thro the encampment proclaiming aloud, every man to his station. Seize your arms & prepare for Battle. All his princes quick to obey his commands instantly repaired to their respective divisions. & gave orders to form their men into solid collums. When this was done, they marched a small distance to the place & paraded on the great plain of Geheno. They were now prepared for the hostile engagement. Their officers of the highest Ranks marched along their in front of their divisions & by their speeches they inspired the men with boldness & courage. They ardently wished to behold their enemies, & to have an opportunity of displaying their valour in their destruction. Hamboon then commanded his principal officers to assemble round him. When they were collected which was in front of the army, he thus addressed them.

I wish for your opinion my brave

NOTE.—Pages 143 and 144 are missing.

These heroic commanders had each a chosen band of warriors, who were ordered as soon as the battle should begin to march between the divisions & charge the enemy. in order to break their order & throw them into confusion The design of this arrangement was to break their ranks & to throw them into confusion.

The command of these bands were given to Elseon, Labanco Hanack & two counsellors of the Emperor, Hamul & Taboon. The momentous period had arrived. Each grand army were now ready, were anxious for the Combat, & sanguine in their expectations of obtaining a glorious victory. Musicians with instruments of various kinds were now playing thro' every division of both Armies. They blew horns pipes & a kind of trumpet, & beat with sticks on little tubs whose heads were formed of parchments. The melody was truly martial & calculated to inspire each warrior with an ardent desire for battle & the most daring heroism. All was hushed. The musicians fell back in the rear. There was a perfect silence thro' both armies. Each Emperor with their swords brandishing rode were in front facing their respective armies. Near three hundred thousand spears were glittering with the reflection of sunbeams. Not a cloud to be seen in the east. The sun shone with unusual brightness, in the west a dark cloud began to rise & distant thunder was heard to rumble. Hambock proclaimed with a voice which was heard from the right to the left March march my brave warriors, & fight like heroes. Hamboon saw them beginning to move but not changing his countenance, which was placid & bold, he proclaimed, Stand firm my brave sons. Let your arrows fly thick against your enemies as they advance & finish with your spears & your swords their destruction. The Music again played & both armies gave a tremendous shout. Spears & swords

When the Sciotans had advanced with a firm & moderate step, within a small distance of Hamboons army, the both armies discharged arrows with with such unerring aim & celerity that many brave warriors on both sides fell prostrate. Others were sorely wounded & retired back in the rear. Their places were immediately supplied & the second Rank coloped & took their stations in the front. Each man fixing his spear horizontally & about as high as his breast the Sciotans rushed forward with heroic yells & horrible shoutings & made a most tremendous & furious charge upon the Kentucks. They received them with firmness & courage spears met spears & many were bent or broken & others were thrust on both sides into the bodies of heroes. whose blood gushing forth they fell with horrible groans pale & lifeless on the sanguine plain. Neither army gave back, but being nearly equal as to strength & numbers they poured forth upon each other with a lavish hand the implements the weapons of death & destruction Determined to conquer or die, it was impossible to conjecture which Emperor would have gained the victory had the divisions or bands in the rear of each army remained inactive. But anxious to mingle charge with the boldest warriors, the Kentucky bands led on by their heroic princes rushed between the divisions of the grand army & made a most furious charge on the Sciotans. They broke thro' their ranks, beircing their indignant foes with deadly wounds. Heroes fell before them & many of the Sciotans being struck with surprise & terror, began to retire back. But the bands in the rear of their army instantly rushed forward, & met their furious combatants. The battle was now spread in every direction. Many valiant chiefs who commanded under their respective Kings, were overthrown & many thousand robust & brave warriors, whose names were not distinguished by office, were compeled to receive deadly wounds & to bite the dust. It was Elseons fortune to attack the division led by the valiant Kamoff. He broke his ranks & killed many warriors. While driving them furiously before him, he met Hamkol at the head of many thousand Sciotans. Hamkol beheld the young Prince & knew him & being fired with greatest rage & thirst for revenge, he urged on the comabat with the most driving violence. Now, he thot was a favourable chance to gain immortal renown. Elseon, says he, shall feel the effects of my conquering sword. The warriors on both side charged each other, with incredible fury, & Elseon & Hamkol met in the centre of their divisions. I have found you says Hamkol perfidious monster, I will teach you to rob our Empire of its most valuable treasure. He spoke & Elseon replied. Art thou Hamkol, the counsellor of Hamback. Your advice has produced this blood & slaughter. Hamkol raised his sword & had not Elseon defended himself from the blow he never would have spoken again. But, quick as the lightning Elseon darted his sword thro' his heart Hamkol He knashed his teeth together & with a groan tumbling headlong with a groan expired.

The battle raged. Labanco attacked the division of Sambul. His conquering sword had killed two chief & his band performed the most brilliant exploits Sambul met him & like an indignant panther he sprang upon him while Labanco was engaged in combat with another chief. Sambul thrust his sword into his side. Thus Labanco fell lamented & beloved by all the subjects of the Empire of Kentuck. Hamack His learning wisdom & penetration of mind, his integrity firmness & courage, had gained him universal respect & given him a commanding influence over the Emperor & his other Counsellors. He was viewed with such respect & reverence that the death of no man could have produced more grief & lamentation & excited in the minds of the Kentuck a more ardent thirst for revenge. The officers of his phalanx exclaimed Revenge the death of Labanco. Even lightning could not have produced more instantaneous effect. With tenfold rage & fury his warriors maintained the conflict & redoubled their efforts spreading death & carnage. Even The mighty Sambul trembled at the slaughter of his subjects warriors & began to despair of victory he began to fearing that his intended revenge was turning upon his own head. During the slaughter of Sambul's forces Hamack was engaged in battle with Habelan King of Chiauga. No part of the war raged with a more equal balance. Warriors met warriors with such equal strength & courage, that it was impossible to determine on which side was the greatest slaughter, even their heroic chiefs prudently avoided a combat with each other & employed their swords in overthrowing those of less distinction. The field was covered with the bodies of heroes besmeared with blood, which was spread thick on every side. In the mean time Hamul & Taboon who led on the other reserved divisions of the Kentucks were fiercely engaged in spreading the war thro' the ranks of the Sciota.

Iamul compelled to the division commanded by Sabulmah to fall back, but still they fought as they slowly retreated, being reinforced by a body of troops in their rear, they continued the conflict & maintained their position. The slaughter was emence & each party boasted of the most brilliant achievements.

Taboon made his attack on the division of Ulipoon, commanded by Hamelick. The Sciotan ranks were broken & they must have fled in confusion had not Rameck supported them with his division, warlike band. The contest now became bloody furious & equal feats of valour were displayed by contending heroes. The thirsty earth was overspread with the dead & dying bodies. of thousands & quenched their its thirst by copious draughts of human blood. Hamelick himself was slain, but not until his sword was crimsoned with the blood of enemies But The dubious war appeared at last determined. Hamback beheld his army giving ground on every hand. He rode throout their divisions & endeavored to inspire them with persvering courage. But in vain. They could not withstand the immensity the numbers & strength of their Enimies. Aided by the advantage they had obtained by the arrangement they had made to manage the conflict. The Sciotans began to retreat. Such was the situation of both armies, they the Sciotans must have principally have been overthrow & destroyed if the Kentucks had been permitted to continue the havoc & slaughter they had begun. But how often are the most sanguine expectations disappointed by the decrees of heaven. At this awful period whilst the atmosphere was replete with the multifarious sounds of the clashing of swords & spears, the playing melody of the martial musick

- - - the shouts of the conquerors & she shrieks & groans of the dying, even then the heavens were overspread with clouds of the most sable hue, which had been blown from the West. The thunders roared tremendously & the flashes of lightning were incessant. The wind began to blow from the west with great violence the hail poured down from the clouds & was carried with great velocity full in the faces of the Kentucks. They were unable to see the enemy, or continue the conflict. Hambock & his prince immediately rallied their retreating forces & facing round encouraged them to fight courageously since the great good Being had miraculously interposed in their behalf. The Kentuck army were unable to continue the conflict they were obliged in their turn to retreat. but such was the violence of the storm that the Sciotans could not take any great advantage of the confusion of their enemies. They however pursued them to the hill which had been in the rear of the Kentucks, overthrowing & killing some in the pursuit. But as the hill was overspread with trees, which broke the violence of the wind Hamboon commanded his men to face their pursuers, The Sciotans finding that their enemies had the advantage of the ground, & being intolerably fatigued with the battle, which had lasted near four hours retired a small distance back. & as soon as the storm abated, they marched beyond the ground which was strewn thick with the slain. Thus ended the great battle on the plain of Geheno. Both There they encamped & as the storm had now subsided, both armies proceeded to make provision to refresh themselves, being nearly exhausted by the fatcagus fatigues of a most bloody contest, which had lasted nearly five hours. That day afforded them no time to bury their dead. The sun did not tarry in his course, but hid himself below the horizon, & darkness spread itself over the face of the earth. The warriors with their spears in their hands extended themselves upon the earth, & spent the night in rest & sleep. Next morning they arose with renovated vigour. Their thots were immediately turned to the sanguine field. Many warriors say they, lie there pierced with mortal wounds & covered with with blood. Their spirits have assumed etherial bodies, & they are now receiving the rewards assigned to the brave on the plains of glory. But they demand of us that we should secure their remains from the voracious jaws of carniverous beasts animals by intering them in the earth. But how can this be done unless both armies will mutually agree to lay down their arms during the interment. of the remains of their respective warriors. Hamboon dispatched a messenger to Lambock who agreed to an armistice for the term of two days, & that ten thousand men might be emploid from each army in burying the dead. It was indeed a melancolly day. The conquest was not desided. Neither army had gained victory, or had reason to boast of any superior advantage obtained or any heroic atchievements which were not hatched by contending warriors. an emence slaughter was made. Hear one hundred thousand were extended breathless on the field. This was only the beginning of the war what must be the dreadful calamities if it should continue to rage? If a few more battles should be faught, & the infuriated conqueror should turn his vengeful sword against defenceless women & children & mingle their blood with the blood of heroes, who had fallen bravely fighting their defence. When both armies viewed the the emence slaughter that had been made of their respective friends, instead of cooling their ardor for the war it only served to increase their knowledge & their thirst for revenge.

Ten thousand men from each army without arms marched to the field where the battle was fought, & having selected the bodies of their respective warriors, they carried as many of them together as what could be done with convenience & then digging into the ground about three feet deep & throwing the dirt around in a circular form upon the edge of the grave they then deposited the bodies in covering the ground over which they had dug with the bodies & then placing others upon them until the whole were deposited. They then proceeded to throw dirt upon them & to raise over them a high mound. In this manner they proceeded until they had finished the interment. The bodies of the chiefs that were slain were carried to their respective armies, & performing many customary solemnities of woe, they were interred & prodigious mounds of earth were raised over them. After the funeral rites were finished & the armistice had expired, the hostile Emperors must now determine on further plans of operations.

The field was widely strewed & in many places thick covered with human bodies extended in various positions on their sides their backs & faces. Some with their arms & legs widely spread, some with their mouths open & eyes staring. Mangled with swords spears & arrows & besmeared with blood & dirt. Most hideous forms & dreadful to behold. Such objects excited horror & all the sympathetic & compassionate feelings of the human heart. Both Emperors had agreed to the suspension of arms for the purpose of burying the remains of these of the heroic warriors, ten thousand men from each army entered the field & began the mournful employment. They dug holes about three feet deep & in a circular form, & of about twenty or thirty feet diameter. & in these they deposited the bodies of their deceased heroes & then raised over them large mounds of earth. The bodies of the chiefs who had fallen were carried to their respective armies, & buried with the solemnities of woe. Over them they raised prodigious mounds of earth, which will remain for ages as monuments to commemorate the valiant feats of these heroes & the great battle of Gaheno.

After the funeral Rites were finished, & the armistice having expired, the hostile Emperors must now determine further plans for operation. Hamback requested the advice of his principal officers, who were unanimous in their opinion that it was their best policy to retire back, to the place, which was opposite to the place where they landed, & there wait for reinforcements. This they effected the next day without being prevented by their enemy. Hamboon the next day marched toward them, but not thinking it his policy to attack them at present took possession of the place in plain view of the Sciotans & there encamped with his whole army. As the Sciotans sallied out in parties to plunder & to ravage the country, these were pursued over the mountains & met by parties of the Kentucks. Many bloody skirmishes ensued with various success, & many feats of arms were displayed on both sides. Wherever the Sciotans marched, devastation attended their steps, & all classes of people without distinction of age or sex, who fell into their hands became the victims of their infuriated malice. The extermination of the Kentucks appeared to be their object, not considering that it might soon be their turn to have such cruelties retaliated upon themselves with threefold vengeance. They likewise had a further object in view, which was to provoke Hamboon to attack the main army, whilst posted in an advantageous situation. But it was Hamboon's policy by placing garrisons in different stations & by patrolling parties to prevent the Scioto from plundering & destroying his towns, & from obtaining provisions from his country & in this way to compel them to cross the river or to attack his army in the position he had taken. While the two Emperors were thus manoeuvring & seeking by various arts & stratagems to gain an advantage on each other, a very extraordinary incident of heroism & display of the most sincere & ardent friendship transpired which is worthy a place on the history page. Incidents transpired of heroism & friendship. In the dominion of Hamboon there lived two young men who were bred in the same village, having minds formed for the exercise of the noblest principles & possessed of congenial tempers. They early contracted the greatest intimacy & formed towards each other the strongest attachment. They joined the standard of Hamboon & in the great battle of Gaheno they fought side by side & performed exploits equally bold & heroic they ate at the same board & drank of the same cup & in all their excursions they attended each other, & walked hand in hand. As these two friends were sitting in their tent one evening, Thelgard who was the eldest says to Hamkon something whisper to me that this night we can perform a most brilliant exploit. The Scioto have held a great festival & until midnight they will be employed in singing & in dancing & in various diversions. Being greatly fatigued, when they lie down to rest the leep will be sound. We may then enter their camp by ly getting round them by their centinels unperceived & ake a most dreadful slaughter. Your plan replied Ham-on is excellent. It is worthy of the character of an hero.

will join you. I will either triumph with you in the suc-ss of the enterprize or perish in the attempt. Perhaps we ay atchieve a glorious deliverance to our Country by de-oying our cruel enimies. They both taking their swords tomehauks repaired toward the camp of the Sciotans, in der to reconoiter & find where they could enter & not be rceived by the Centinals. The Moon shone bright but ould set about three oclock in the morning This was the ne they had fixed upon to begin the massacer of their imies.

At length all became silent, the moon disappeared & ese young heroes had accomplished their plan in getting o the camp of the Sciotans unperceived. They found em lying in a profound sleep, for the fatigue of the day revels of the night had bro't weariness upon them, & con-ering when they came down that the vigilance of their ards would secure them fro surprize, they slept with unusual soundness, but their vigilance could not prevent unsuspected destruction. The Tomehauks & swords of se daring youth soon caused hundreds to sleep in eternal mber, & so anxious were they to finish the destruction of ir enimies that the day began to dawn, before they had ared themselvs from the camp of their enimies Scarce ever had they passed the last Centinal & the alarm was en. The Sciotans beheld a most terrible slaughter. of ir warriors, & being fired with indignation sallied forth parties in every direction. Kelsock & Hamook had rly gained the encampment of the Kentucks, & Ham-koon with a party of Sciotans had overtaken Hamko. Kelsock was so far in advance that he was now safe from danger. but turning his eyes round, he beheld Hakoon se his friend, who was attempting to defend himself against the party. Kelsock turned instantly & runing furious back cried, Spare oh spare the youth, he is innocent. alone contrived the slaughter of the Sciotans, too much love to his friend induced him to join in the enterprise. Here is my bosom, here take your revenge. Scarce had he spoken & Haloon plunged his sword into the heart of Hamko. The young hero fell & with a groan expired. Kelsock instantly rushed upon Haloon & darted his sword thro' his heart. Prostrate he tumbled at the feet of Hakoo. But Kelsock could not long survive. A spear pierced him in the side. He cast his eyes on the lifeless body of his friend & fell on his lifeless body it, he embraced it & never breathed again. Ah heroic youths friendship ye lived & in life & death ye were joined.

Forty days had now expired since the two armies had taken their different positions. Each had received large reinforcements which supplied the place of the slain. Experience had taught them to use stratagem instead of attacking under great disadvantages & yet to remain long in the present situation could not possibly terminate the war successfully on the part of the Sciotans. Rambock considering the obstacles which attended the prosecution of every plan at last by the advice of Sambul & Ulipoon, determined on a most rash & desperate enterprize. An enterprise which would in a measure satiate their revenge, provided that it should even produce the annihilation of the army. As soon as darkness had overspread the earth at night Rambock marched his whole army toward the City

Gamba. & such was the stillness of their movements that they were not perceived, nor was it known by Hamboon that they had marched until the morning light. As soon as the Kentucks found that the Sciotans found that had abandoned the place of their encampment & found the direction they had gone, they immediately pursued them with the utmost expedition. But too late to prevent the intended slaughter & devastation. The Sciotans without delaying their march by attacking any forts in their way, merely entered the vilages kiling the inhabitants who had not made their escape & burning their houses. They arrived before the City of Gamba. Great indeed was the surprize & terror & consternation of the Citizens. Many fled to the fort. A band of about three thousand resolute warriors seized their arms, determined to risk their lives in the defence of the City. The leader of the band was Samack the eldest son of Labanco. He inherited the virtue of his excellent Father & even thirsted to revenge his death, by sacrificing to his manes the bones of his cruel enemies. He posted his warriors in a narrow passage which led to the City. The Sciotan Emperor immediately formed his plan of attack. A large host selected from all the grand divisions of his army marched against them. They were commanded by Moonrod. He led them on against this galant & desperate band of Kentucks & made the most furious & violent charge upon them. But they were resisted with a boldness which will forever do honour to their immortal valour. Many hundreds of their enemies were peirced with their deadly weapons, & caused heaps of them to lie prostrate in the narrow passage. Such prodigious havock was made on the Sciotans by this small band of valiant citizens who were driven to desperation & whose only object was to sell their lives dear to their enemies. , the even Moonrod began to despair of forcing his way into the City thro' this narrow passage. Being informed by treacherous Kentuck of another passage, he immediately dispatched a band of about four thousand from his army enter the city thro that passage & to fall upon the rear of the Kentucks. This plan succeeded. These heroes now found the war to rage both in front & rear & part facing their new assailants, they attacked their new assailants the with incredible fury. What could they do? Resistance was now in vain. They could no longer maintain the bloody contest against such a mighty host. Lamack then commanded the survivors of his little band to break through the ranks of his last assailants, & to retreat to the fort.

It was impossible to withstand the violence of their charge. They broke thro' the ranks of their enemies, & made a passage over the bodies of heroes, thro' which the retreated marched to the fort. About seven hundred with their valiant leader thus made their escape & arrived safe in the fort.

The remainder of the three thousand sold their lives in defence of their friends & their country. This battle checked the progress of the enemy which prevented an immediate slaughter of Citizens, as the greatest part had opportunity by this means to gain the fort. As soon as all resistance was overcome & had subsided, the Sciottans lost no time but marched into the city & commenced a general plunder of all articles which could be conveniently transported. Ulipoon tho careful not to expose his person to the danger of weapons of an enemy, was however very industrious in the part of the war. None discovered so much engagedness in himself to grasp the most valuable property in the City. But expecting the Kentuck army to arrive soon, they m accomplish their mischief with the utmost expedition. The City they sat on fire in various places & then retired back & encamped near the fort intending on the next day, unless prevented by the arival of Hamboon with his army, to storm the fort & massacre the whole multitude of citizens which were there collected. Behold the conflagration of the city The flames in curls spread toward heaven, & as the darkness of the night had now commenced, this added to the horror of the scene. The illumination spread far & wide & distant vilages beheld the redning light assend. as a certain pioneer of their conflagration should the war continue to rage. But mark the sorrow & lamentation of the poor citizens now encircled by the walls of a fort. Happy that they had escaped the massacre of a barbarious unrelenting enemy, but indignant & sorrowful at beholding the ruins of all their property, & even filled with the greatest anxiety lest Hamboon should not arive in season to prevent the storming of the fort. But their anxiety soon vanished.

When the shades of evening began to overspread the earth Hamboon & his army had arived within five miles of the city. They beheld the flames beginning to spread. The idea was instantly realized that an indiscriminate slaughter had taken place. What were the distracted outcries of the dwellers of the city. Fathers & mothers brothers & sisters wives & children? In addition to the destruction of all their property, they now had a realizing anticipation of the massacre of their dearest friends & relations. Such was their anxiety to precipitate their march that it was scarcely in the power of their commander to retard their steps. so as to prevent them from breaking the order of their ranks. They determined however to make the utmost expedition, & if they found their enemy to take ample vengeance. But when they arrived & found that the greatest part of the citizens were safe in the fort, this afforded no small alleviation to their anxiety & grief. But their thirst for revenge & their ardent desire to engage the enemy did not in the least abate.

Determined that the Sciottans should have no chance to improve the darkness of the ensuing night, to make their escape, every preparation was made to attack them the next morning. This was expected by the Sciottans who were wishing for another opportunity to measure swords with the Kentucks. & as soon as the morning light appeared they marched a small distance to a hill & there paraded in proper order for battle. Scarcely had they finished the arrangements when they beheld Hamboons army marching towards them. He halted within about half a mile of the Sciottans, & sent out a small party to reconnoitre & discover their situation. In the meantime he ordered Hamack his son to march with twelve thousand men around the Sciottan army & lie in ambush in their rear in order to surprise them with an attack after the battle should commence.

As the two armies were paraded in fair view of each other the expectation was that a most bloody engagement would take place immediately. The cowardly mind of Ulipoon was not a little terrified when he beheld the numbers & the martial appearance of the enemy. But his inventive genius was not long at a loss for an expedient which he imagined would extricate himself from all danger. He repaired to Hambock & addressed him to this effect. May it please your your majesty. During the first battle it was my misfortune to be prevented from being at the head of my brave warriors & displaying my valour. It is my wish now to perform feats of heroism which shall place me on equal ground with the most valiant princes of your Empire. With your permission I will lead on my division & storm the fort of the Kentucks. This will fill their warriors with consternation & terror. You may then obtain an easy victory & destroy them with as much facility as you would so many porcupines. Besides by attacking the fort at this time when they are not expecting such a manoeuvre, the imperial family will be prevented from making their escape & I shall be able to restore to your majesty your daughter Lamesa. The Emperor being pleased with the plan granted to Ulipoon his permission to carry it into effect. Ulipoon did not wait a moment. But immediately returned back & commanded his forces which consisted of about seventeen thousand to march. He was careful to see that they carried with them at the same time all the plunder they had taken in the City of Gamba. & particularly that portion which had been set apart for himself. But nothing was further from the heart of Ulipoon than to fulfill his promise. He had no intention to risk his person in the hazardous attempt to storm the fort. But his determination was to march with the utmost expedition to his own dominions. & to carry with him his rich plunder. Having marched towards the fort until he had got beyond view of the Sciotan army. He then ordered them to turn their course to the great River to the place where they had left their boats. In this direction they had not proceeded far when they were seen by a number of pioneers whom Hamck had sent forward to make discoveries. As his band were not far distant, they soon gave him the intelligence. He immediately dispatched an express to Hamboon, informing him that he should pursue them as their object probably was to ravage the country, & recommending not to attack the Sciotans until further information from him. Hamacks division were not discovered by Ulipoon & of consequence he proceeded in his march without suspecting any anoiacé from the enimy. happy in the reflection that he had greatly enriched himself by a prodigious mass of plunder & not in the least troubled about his fellow warriors, whom he had deserted on the eve of a most hazardous engagement. Hamack pursued him, but was careful not to be discovered. When the sun was nearly down Ulipoon halted & encamped. During the night, Hamack made his arrangements. He formed his men into four divisions & surrounded the enimy. Their orders were as soon as the morning light began to appear to rush into Ulipoons encampment & to massacre his warriors without discrimination. The fatal moment had arrived, & punctual at the very instant of time, the attack was begun on every part. & such was the surprize & terror which it produced that the Sciotans were thrown into the utmost confusion, & it was impossible for their officers to form them into any order to make defence. Every man at last attempted to make his escape, but wherever they rushed forward in any direction they met the deadly spears of the Kentucks. It is impossible to describe the horror of the bloody scene, for even humanity recoils at beholding. Humanity sympathy & compassion must drop a tear at beholding the uproar & confusion, the distress & anguish, the blood & carnage of so many thousand brave warriors. whose great isfortune was to have a coward for their commander who were reduced to this situation by the cowardice & & niggardly & avaricious disposition of their commander But only three thousand made their escape. As for Ulipoon he was mor tally wounded & lay prostrate on the field After the slaughter was ended, in passing over the field of the Slain Hamack beheld this illfated prince an object truly pitiable to behold. In the agonies of death & wreathing under the most acute pains he explains Alas my wretched situation. It was avarice, cursed avarice which induced me to enagge in this horrid war & now my the mischief and cruelties I intended as a means to acquire wealth & agrandizement are justly turned upon my own head. He spoke & deeply groaning he breathes no more The galant Hamack dropped a tear & feeling no enmity toward the lifeless remains of those who had been his enimies he ordered three hundred men to bury remain on the ground & commit their bodies to the Dust. This says he, is the will of him whose compassion is infinite He then directed Como his chief captain to pusue the survivors of Ulipoons army & to destroy them if possible With the remainder of his own troops he returned back to cary into effect the order of Hamboon. Como overtook & killed about a thousand of the wretched fugitives. The remainder escaped to their own land except about fifty who fled to the army of Hamboon & gave him the dreadful intelligence of Ulipoons destruction. Great were the amazement & consternation of Hambock & his whole army. They now beheld their situation to be extremely critical & dangerous & saw the necessity of the most vigourous & heroic exertions. What says Hambock to his princes is our wisest Course to pursue? Sabamah, Hancoll & Wunapon advised him to retreat without losing a moment, for say they we have taken ample revenge for the crime of Elseon. To effect this, we have thrown ourselves into the heart of their country, have lost a large division of our army & are so weakened by our losses that we are in the utmost danger of being defeated, & even annihilated. It must therefore be the height of folly & madness to prosecute the war any further in this country. But Sambul & the other other princes condemned this plan as pusillanimous & disgraceful & proposed to steal a march on the Kentucks & to storm their fort, before be ore they should be apprized of their design. This last advice met the approbation of the Emperor, Nothing says he can save our army from destruction but the most daring achievements. That they might gain the fort without being perceived by the Kentucks, It was necessary that they should march some distance in the direction where Hamack had encamped in order to cooperate with Hamboon, when he should commence the engagement. When the night had far advanced Hambocks forces were all in readiness & began their march for the fort. They proceeded about two miles & a small party in advance discovered Hamacks warriors. This discovery produced an alteration in Hambocks plans. He directed Sambul to proceed against the fort, whilst he as soon as the light should appear would attack Hamack. Sambul was highly pleased with this command, as a victory would ensure him the capture of Lamesa. & afford him an opportunity to obtain revenge. He arrived at the fort just as the blushing moon began to appear. Great indeed was the surprise which his arrival produced. On three sides he stationed small parties, who were ordered to massacre all the citizens, who should attempt to make their escape. With the main body of his army, he made an assault upon the fort. Amazement & terror seized the minds of the whole multitude of citizens in the fort. This enterprize of the Sciotans was unexpected, as they were were unprepared to defend the fort against such a formidable force. Lamack however placed himself at the head of about one thousand warriors, & attempted to beat them back from the wall & prevent their making a breach. But it was impossible with his small band to withstand the strength of such a mighty army. They broke down part of the palisades and entered the fort thro' the breach & immediately began the massacre of the defenceless multitude without regard to age or sex. Sambul being anxious to find Lamesa, rushed forward with a small band & surrounded a small block house. He then broke down the door & entered. Here he beheld all the ladies of the imperial family & many other ladies of distinction. He instantly sprang towards Lamesa in order to seize her, but was prevented by Heliza, who stepped between them & falling upon her knees implored him to spare the life of Lamesa. Scarce had she spoken when the cruel monster buried his sword in her bosom, & she fell lifeless before the eyes of her dearest friend. Lamesa gave a scream & looking fiercely on Sambul she exclaimed, Thou monster of villiany & cruelty, could nothing satiate your revenge but the death of my dear friend, the amiable Heliza? Here is my heart I am prepared for your next victim. Ah no, says Sambul, your life is safe from my sword. I shall conduct you to my palace & you shall be honored with me for your partner. Insult me not says he, thou malicious bloody villian. Either kill me or be gone from my sight. My eyes can never indure the man who is guilty of such monstrous crimes. Set your heart at rest says he, my dear Lamesa. I will convince you that I am a better man than your beloved Elseon. His head shall soon satiate my revenge. & then you shall be the queen of Kiota. At this instant a loud voice was heard. The Ken-tucks are marching with a prodigious army toward the fort. Sambul turning to his warriors present ordered them to guard the women in that house, & not permit any of them to escape. For, says he, I must go and destroy that army of Kentucks. Great already had been the slaughter which the Sciotans had made of the citizens in the fort. Those who had attempted to escape by a gate which was thrown open were met & massacred by the Sciotan warriors on the outside, but their progress was arrested by the appearance of Elseon at the head of thirty thousand warriors. They had marched with the greatest speed, for they were informed by an express that the Sciotans had invested the fort. When Sambul beheld them he instantly concluded to withdraw his army out of the fort, & to try a battle with them in the open field. The orders were immediately spread thro' every part of the fort where his men were employed in killing the defenceless & in fighting with the little band of desperate heroes, whom Hamack commanded. The Sciotans were soon formed & marched out of the fort & paraded in proper order for battle. Elseon observing this commanded his two men to halt, & made his arrangements to rush forward & commence the attack. Having brandished his sword as a token for silence, he then spoke.

"My brave warriors," The glorious period has arrived for arived us to display our valour in the destruction of our enemies. What monstrous cruelties have they perpetrated! Behold your city in ruins, listen to the cries of your murdered friends whose innocent blood calls for vengeance. Consider the situation of those who are surrounded by the walls of yonder fort, how many thousand are massacred & how many must share their fate unless you fight like heroes. By our valour we can effect their deliverance & rid our land of the most disgraceful murderers that ever disgraced humanity. Their standard is that of the Sciotan king, whose malice & vengeful disposition have produced this horrid war. Urged on by his malignant passions, he has engaged undertaken a most desperate & mad enterprize. He has thrown himself & his army into a most critical & dangerous situation.

Fight as you did at the great battle of Gaheno & your enemies will lie prostrate in the dust, & your name shall be illustrious. Rush forward my brave warriors, & let your motto be victory or death.

Not a moment when his warriors were stimulated for the combat did Elseon tarry, but marched with precipitation prepared to make a most furious charge. Sambul was ready to meet him, & marched forward with equal boldness & celerity. The charge was tremendous. not the dashing against each other of two mighty ships in a hurricane upon the boistrous ocean would have been more terrible. Each warrior fearless of danger met his antagonist, determined to destroy his life or loose his own in the contest. The battle extended thro every part of both armies. As warriors fell in the front ranks their places were supplied from the rear. reserved Bands rushing between the divisions were met by others of equal strength & valour. Helicon, the intimate friend of Elseon beheld Sambul who was encouraging his warriors to fight bravely. As no other alternative remained for them but victory or death. When Helicon beheld him, his youthful mind felt the impulse of ambition. He sprang toward Sambul & challenged him to the combat. Sambul gave him no time to repeat the challenge but rushed upon him with more fury than a tiger. & with his sword he struck Helicon's head from his body. Thus for the brave the amiable youth, whose thirst for glory impelled him to attempt an exploit too rash & daring. Warriors fell on every side & the field was covered with the dead & dying heroes. A messenger ran & told Elseon the fate of Helicon who commanded the left wing of his army & that Sambul had broken the ranks & was making indiscriminate havock of his warriors. What intelligence could have been more shocking. Elseon could not refrain from tears for a moment. Ah Helicon says he, thou hast been more dear to me than a brother. Heaven demands that I should avenge thy cruel death. He instantly selected a small band & marched with the utmost speed to the left wing of his army. He rallied his retreating warriors & engaged in the conflict with tenfold fury. Soon he beheld the mighty Sambul whose sword was crimsoned with the blood of his friend, & Sambul cast his eyes upon him & he beheld him his malice instantly inkindled into such a furious flame that his reason fled for a moment & he raved like a madman. both heroes sprang towards each other. Their warriors beheld them & being mutually inspired with the same sentiments the respective bands retired back, leaving the two indignant champions in the space between.

Ah ingrate exclaimed Sambul. Robber & perfidious scoundrel, after securing the Emperors daughter & who was my wife & transporting her from our dominion have you the temerity to meet my conquering sword? The sword which pierced Labanco & cut off the head of Helicon & which has destroyed hundreds of warriors more mighty than yourself, shall be plunged into your cowardly heart & your head shall be carried in triumph into the City of T anga, & there it shall be preserved as a trophy trophy of my superior strength and valour.

Vain boaster says Elseon I rejoice to meet you; that the Benevolent Being will now terminate your career of bloody crime. This sword shall pierce your malignant heart, & cut of that head which has plotted the ruin of my country.

Sambul eager for revenge could hear no more He sprang forward aimed a thrust of his sword at Elseons heart but Elseon turned the point of his sword from him with his own & then darted his sword into his left arm. which caused the blood to gush forth. Sambul was now more indignant than ever. & raising his sword he threw his whole strength into one mighty effort with the intention to divide his body in twain, but Elseon quick as the lightning sprang back & Sambuls sword struck the ground with a prodigious force, which broke it in the middle. He himself had nearly tumbled his whole length but recovered & beholding his defenceless situation, he ran a small distance, & seizing a stone sufficiently big for a common man to lift, he threw it at Elseon. It flew with great velocity & had not Elseon bowed his head his brains must have quited their habitation. His Cap however was not so fortunate. Having met the stone as he bowed it was carried some distance from him & lodged on the ground. Elseon regardless of his Cap ran swiftly upon Sambul whose head having slipped when he threw the stone had fallen on his back & had not recovered. Spare oh, spare my life says he, & I will restore peace to Kentuck & you may be my Lamesa. No peace says Elseon, do I desire with a man, whose sword is red with the blood of my friend. He rose & plunged his sword into Sambuls heart. The Sciotans beheld the huge body of their King pale & lifeless. Consternation & terror seized their minds. They fled in dismay & confusion. Elseon pursued them with his warriors & overtook & killed thousands in the pursuit. About two thousand made good their escape, & carried the doleful tidings of Sambul's death & the slaughter of his army to their own land, & indeed their escape was owing to the great anxiety of Elseon & his warriors to visit their friends in the fort & to ascertain the extent of the massacre that Sambul & his army had made. After pursuing the Sciotans about six miles Elseon & his army returned in great haste & entered the fort. Great & inexpressibly great was the joy of the citizens when they beheld them return with the laurels of Victory. & when they were informed of the destruction of so many thousands of their enemies. But as great was the grief & lamentation when they beheld & reflected on the vast number of citizens & of Elseon's warriors who had fallen by the sword of the Sciotans. No death produced such universal regret & sorrow as that of Helicon & Heliza. The one was the intimate friend of Elseon & the other of Lamesa. They both possessed hearts which were formed for the most ardent friendship & love. Their acquaintance produced a sincere attachment. They exchanged vows of perpetual fidelity & love to each other & only waited for the termination of the war to fulfill their mutual engagement, to unite their hands in wedlock. Their pleasing anticipation of conjugal felicity was destroyed by the cruel sword of Sambul. Naught availed their innocence & the amiable accomplishments of the fair Heliza. She must fall a victim to satiate the revenge of a barbarous tyrant. Had Helicon known when he attacked the savage monster, that he had hadassasinated his beloved Heliza, would have inspired him with the added desire for revenge & added vigour to his arm & keenness to his sword. Ah, said A Kentuck bard represented the etherial form of Heliza as arriving on the celestial plain, & being told that she must wait a short time & Helicon would arrive & conduct her as his partner to a delightful bower which was surrounded by the most beautiful flowers & delicious fruits, & where they singing of musickal birds would charm them with their melody.

When Elseon had entered the fort he found that Lamack with his little band had made prisoners of the Sciotan warriors whom Sambul had left to guard the imperial ladies, & that the Sciotans had done them no injury nor even insulted them with words. Says Elseon, for this honourable treatment of my friends I will show these enemies compassion. Go, says he to them, return in peace to your own land, & tell your friends that Elseon will not hurt an enemy who has done him a favour. The time of Elseon was precious. He spent but a few moments with Jamesa, in which they exchanged mutual congratulations & expressions of the most tender & sincere affection. She conjured him to spare the life of her father & brother & not to expose his own life any farther than his own honour & the interest of his country required. I shall cheerfully says he, comply with every request which will promote your happiness. He embraced her, & bade her adieu. As the situation of Hamboons army might require his immediate return, he lost no time to regulate matters in the fort. But leaving five thousand men to bury the dead attend the citizens he marched with the remainder which consisted of about twenty thousand to Hamboons encampment. When Sambul marched with his division against the fort, it was Hambocks intention to have attacked Hamack the next morning, but perceiving that Hamboon had been apprized of his movements & was then within a small distance ready to cooperate with Hamacks division, Hamback altered his plan & determined to wait for the return of Sambul. As for Hamboon he concluded to wait until Elseons return. These determinations of the hostile Emperors prevented for the time any engagements between the two grand armies. But when the fate of Sambuls divisions was decided & Elseon had returned with the joyful news of his victory, the Kentucks were all anxious for an immediate Battle.

NOTE.—This was found with the foregoing manuscript and the same handwriting.

But having every reason to place the highest confidence in your friendship & prudence I have no reluctance in complying with your request. in giving you my sentiments of the christian Religion. And so far from considering this freedom you take in making the request impertinence I view it as a mark of your high esteem for me affectionate solicitude for my happiness. In giving you my sentiments of the Christian religion, you will perceive that I am not trameled with traditionary & vulgar prejudice that I do not believe certain parts & certain parts & certain propositions to be true merely because that my ancestors believe them because they are popular. In forming my creed I bring everything to the standard of reason, that intellectual Truth is an unerring & sure guide in all matters of faith & practice. Having divested myself heretofore of traditionary & vulgar prejudice, & submitting to the guidance of reason it is impossible for me to have the same sentiments of truth

Christian religion which its advocates consider as orthodox. It is in my view a mass of contradictions. & an heterogeneous mixture of wisdom & folly, nor can I find any clear & incontrovertible evidence of its being a revelation from an infinitely benevolent & wise God. It is true that I never have had the leisure nor patience to read the elaborate & varied productions of divines in its vindication. every part of it with critical attention or to study the metaphysical jargon of divines in its vindication. It is enough for me to know that propositions which are in contradiction to each other cannot both be true, & that doctrines & facts which represent the supreme being as a barbarous & cruel tyrant can never be dictated by infinite wisdom. Whatever the clergy say on the contrary can have no effect in altering my sentiments. I know as well as they that two & two make four, that three angles of a triangle of a triangle are equal to two right angles. But notwithstanding I disavow any belief in the divinity of the Bible, & consider it as a mere human production designed to enrich & aggrandize its authors & to enable them to manage the multitude. Yet casting aside a considerable mass of rubbish & fanatical rant, I find that it contains a system of ethics or morals which cannot be excelled on account of their tendency to ameliorate the condition of man. & to promote individual social & public happiness & that in various instances it represents the Almighty as possessing attributes worthy of transcendent character, having a view therefore to those parts of the Bible which are truly good & excellent I sometimes speak of it in terms of high commendation. And indeed I am inclined to believe that notwithstanding the mischiefs & injuries which have been produced by the bigoted zeal of fanatics & interested priests yet that such evils are more than counterbalanced in a Christian land by the benefits which result to the great mass of the people by their believing that the Bible is of divine origin. & that it contains a revelation from God. Such being my view of the subject, I prefer my candle to remain under to remain under a bushel, nor make no exertions to dissipate their happy delusion, as
